THE PREFACE.

HOW unfit, and how unworthy a choice I haue made of my selfe, to vndertake a worke of this mixture; mine owne reason, though exceeding weake, hath sufficiently resolued me. For had it beene begotten then with my first dawning of day, when the light of common knowledge began to open it selfe to my younger yeares: and before any wound received, either from Fortune or Time: I might yet well haue doubted, that the darkenes of Age and Death would haue couered ouer both It and Me, long before the performance. For beginning with the Creation: I haue proceeded with the History of the World, and lastly purposed (some few sallies excepted) to confine my Discourse, within this our renowned Iland of Great Brittain. I confesse that it had better sorted with my disability, the better part of whose times are runne out in other traualles; to haue set together (as I could) the vntoynted and scattered frame of our English affaires, than of the vniuersall: in whom, had there beene no other defect, (who am all defect) then the time of the day; it were enough; the day of a tempestuous life, drawne on to the very euening ere I began. But those inmost, and soule-peircing wounds, which are euer aking while vncured: with the desire to satisfie those few friends, which I haue tryed by the fire of Adversitie; the former enforcing, the latter perswading; haue caused me to make my thoughts legible, and my selfe the subiect of euery opinion wise or weake.

To the World I present them, to which I am nothing indebted: neither haue others that were, (Fortune changing) sped much better in any age. For, Prosperity and Adversity haue euer more tyed and vntied vulgar Affections. And as we see in experience, That dogs doe alwayes barks at those they know not; and that it is their nature to accompany one another in those clamours: so it is with the inconsiderate multitude. Who, wanting that vertue which wee call Honesty in all men, and that especiall gift of GOD which we call Charity in Christian men; condemne, without bearing, and wound, without offence giuen: led there-vnto by vncertaine report only, which his Maiesty truly acknowledgeth for the Author of all lies. Blame no man (saith Siracides) before thou haue enquired the matter: vnderstand first, and then reforme righteously. Rumor, res sine teste, sine laboremus; sequatur vel mala, dum bene merearis. Let vs satisfie our owne consciences, and not trouble our selues with fame: bee it neuer so ill, it is to be despised so we deserue well.

For my selfe; if I haue in any thing serued my Country, and prised it before my private: the general acceptation can yeeld me no other profit at this time than doth a faire sunshine day to a Sea-man after shipwrack; & the contrary no other harme than an outrageous tempest after the Port attained. I know that I lost the loue of many for my fidelity towards Her, whom I must still honor in the dust; though further then the defence of her excellent person, I neuer persecuted any man. Of those that did it, and by what device they did it: He that is the Supreme Iudge of all the world, hath taken the accompt, so as for this kinde of suffering, I must say with Seneca; Mala opinio, bene parita, delectat.

As for other men; if there be any that haue made themselves Fathers of that fame, which hath bene begotten for them: I can neither enuy at such their purchased glory, nor much lament mine owne mishap in that kind; but content my selfe to say with Virgil, Sic vos non vobis, in many particulars.

To labour other satisfaction, were an effect of phtexy, not of hope: seeing it is not Truth, but Opinion, that can trauell the World without a passport. For were it other wise; and were there not as many internal formes of the minde, as there are external figures of men; there were then some possibility, to perswade by the mouth of one Advocate, euen Equity alone.

But such is the multiplying and extensive verue of dead Earth, and of that breath-giving life which GOD hath cast vp Slime and Dust: as that among those that were, of whom we read and heare, and among those that are, whom we see and converse with; every one hath received a seuerall picture of face, and every one a diuers picture of minde; every one a forme apart, every one a fancy and cogitation differing: there being nothing wherein Nature so much triumpheth, as in dissimilitude. From whence it cometh that there is found so great diversity of opinions; so strong a contrariety of inclinations; so many naturall and vnatural; wise, foolish; manly, and childish affections; and passions in mortall Men. For it is not the visible fashion and shape of plants; and of reasonable Creatures that makes the difference, of working in the one, and of condition in the other; but the forme internall.

And though it hath pleased GOD, to reserve the Art of reading mens thoughts to himselfe; yet, as the fruit tells the name of the Tree; so doe the ourward workes of men (so farre as their cogitations are acted) giue vs whereof to guesse at the rest. Nay, it were not hard to expresse the one by the other, very neare the life: did not craft in many, feare in the most, and the worlds loue in all, reach every capacity, according to the compasse it hath, to qualifie & maske ouer their inward deformities for a time. Though it be also true, Nemo potest diu personam ferre fictam: cito in naturam suam residunt, quibus veritas non lubeat. No man can long continue masked in a counterfeite behauiour: the things that are forced for pretences, hauing no ground of truth, cannot long dissemble their owne natures. Neither can any man (saith Plutarch) so change himselfe, but that his heart may be sometime scene as his tongues end.

In this great discord and dissimilitude of reasonable Creatures, if we direct our selues to the Multitude; Omnis honesta rei malus iudex est vulgus. The common people are euill Iudges of honest things, and whose wisdom (saith Ecclesiastes) is to be despised; if to the better sort; every vnderstanding hath a peculiar iudgement, by which it both censurcth other men, and valueth it selfe. And therefore vnto me it will not seeme strange, though I finde these my worbles papers torne with Rats: seeing the slothfull Censurers of all ages haue not spared to raxe the Renowned Fathers of the Church, with Ambition; the severest men to themselves, with Hypocrisie; the greatest louers of Iustice, with Popularity; and those of the truest valour and fortitude, with vaine glorie. But of these natures which lye in wait to finde fault, and to turne good into euill, seeing Salomon complained long since: and that the very age of the world renders it every day after other more malicious; I must leaue the professors to their easie wayes of reprehension, than which there is nothing of more facility.

To me it belongs in the first part of this Preface, following the common and approoued custome of those, who haue left the memories of time past to after ages; to giue, as neare as I can, the same right to History which they haue done. Yet seeing therein I should but borrow other mens wordes; I will not trouble the Reader with the repetition. True it is that among many other benefites, for which it hath bene honoured; in this one it triumpheth ouer all humane knowledge, That it hath giuen vs life in our vnderstanding, since the world it selfe had life and beginning, euen to this day: yea it hath triumpht ouer time, which besides it nothing but eternitie hath triumpht ouer: for it hath carried our knowledge ouer the vast and denouring space of so many thousands of yeares, and giuen so faire and piercing eyes to our minde, that we plainly behold liuing now (as if we had liued then) that great World, Magni Dei sapiens opus, the wise worke (saith Hermes) of a great GOD, as it was then, when but new to it selfe. By it I say it is, that we live in the very time when it was created: we behold how it was governed: how it was covered with waters, and againe repeopled: How Kings and Kingdomes haue florished and fallen; and for what vertue and piety GOD made prosperous; and for what vice and deformity he made wretched, both the one and the other. And it is not the least debt which we owe vnto History, that it hath made vs acquainted with our dead Ancestors; and, out of the depth and darknesse of the earth, deliuered vs their memory and fame. In a word, wee may gather out of History a policy no lesse wise than eternall; by the comparison and application of other mens fore-past miseries, with our owne like errors and ill deservings.

But it is neither of Examples the most lively instructions, nor the words of the wisest men, nor the terror of future torments, that hath yet so wrought in our blind and stupified mindes; as to make vs remember, That the infinite eye and wisdom of GOD doth peirce through all our pretences; as to make vs remember, That the iustice of GOD doth require none other accuser, than our owne consciences: which neither the false beauty of our apparent actions, nor all the formalities, which (to pacifie the opinions of men) we put on; can in any, or the least kind, euer from his knowledge. And so much did that Heathen wisdom confesse; no way as yet qualified by the knowledge of a true God. If any (saith Euripides) hauing in his life committed wickednesse, thinke he can hide it from the euerlasting gods, he thinks not well.

To repeat GODS iudgements in particular, vpon those of all degrees, which haue plaied with his mercies; would require a volume apart for the Sea of examples hath no bottom. The marks, set on priuat men, are with their bodies cast into the earth; and their fortunes, written onely in the memories of those that liued with them: so as they who succeed, and haue not seene the fall of others, doe not feare their owne faults. GODS iudgements vpon the greater and greatest, haue bene left to posterity; first, by those happy hands which the Holy Ghost hath guided; and secondly, by their vertue, who haue gathered the acts and ends of men, mighty and remarkable in the world. Now to paynt farre off, and to speake of the conversion of Angells into Devils for Ambition. Or of the greatest and most glorious Kings, who haue gnawed the grasse of the earth with beasts, for pride and ingratitude towards GOD: Or of that wise working of Pharaos, when hee slue the Infants of Israel, ere they had recovered their Cradles: Or of the policy of Iezabel, in covering the Murder of Naboth by a triall of the Elders, according to the Law: with many thousands of the like: what were it other, than to make an hopelesse prooffe, that farre-off examples would not be left to the same farre-off respects, as heretofore? For who hath not obserued, what labour, practise, perill, bloodshed, and cruelty

cruelty, the Kings and Princes of the world haue undergone, exercised, taken on them, and committed; to make themselves and their issues masters of the world: And yet hath Babylon, Persia, Egypt, Syria, Macedon, Carthage, Rome, and the rest, noe fruit, flower, grasse, nor lease, springing vpon the face of the earth, of those seeds: No; their very roots and ruines doe hardly remaine. Omnia quæ manu hominum facta sunt, vel manu hominum euertuntur, vel stando & duran, do deficient: All that the hand of man can make, is either euerturnd by the hand of man, or at length by standing and continuing consumed. The reasons of whose ruines, are diuersly giuen by those that ground their opinions on second causes. All Kingdomes and States haue fallen (say the Politicians) by outward and forraigne force; or by inward negligence and dissension, or by a third cause arising from both: Others obserue, That the greatest haue sunck downe vnder their owne weight; of which Liuie hath a touch: eo creuit, vt magnitudine laboret sua: Others, That the diuine providence (which Cratippus objected to Pompey) hath set downe the date and period of euery estate, before their first foundation and erection. But hereof I will giue my selfe a day ouer to resolve.

For seeing the first bookes of the folowing story, haue undertaken the discourse of the first Kings and Kingdomes: and that it is impossible for the short life of a Preface, to trauaile after and ouer-take farre off Antiquity, and to iudge of it; I will, for the present, examine what profit hath bene gathered by our owne Kings, and their Neighbour Princes: who hauing beheld, both in diuine and humane letters, the successe of infidelitie, iustice, and crueltie; haue (notwithstanding) planted after the same pattern.

True it is that the iudgements of all men are not agreeable; nor (which is more strange) the affection of any one man stirred vp a like with examples of like nature. But euery one is touched most, with that which most neerely seemeth to touch his owne priuate; or otherwise best suited with his apprehension. But the iudgements of GOD are for euery changeable; neither is hee wearied by the long processe of time, and won to giue his blessing in one age, to that which hee hath cursed in another. Wherefore those that are wise, or whose wisdom, if it be not great, yet is true and well grounded; will be able to discern the bitter fruites of irreligious policie, as well among those examples that are found in ages removed farre from the present, as in those of latter times. And that it may no lesse appeare by euident proofe, than by asseueration, That ill doing hath alwaies bene attended with ill successe; I will here, by way of preface, runne ouer some examples: which the worke ensuing hath since reached.

The Preface.

Among our Kings of the Norman race, we haue no sooner passed over the violence of the Norman Conquest, than we encounter with a singular and most remarkable example of Gods Iustice, upon the children of Henry the first. For that King, when both by force, craft and cruelty, hee had dispossessed ouerreach, and lastly made blinde and destroyed his elder Brother Robert Duke of Normandy, to make his owne somes Lords of this Land: GOD cast them all, Male and Female, Nephewes and Nieces (Maud excepted) into the bottom of the Sea, with aboue a hundred and fifty others that attended them; whereof a great many were Noble, and of the King dearly beloued.

To passe ouer the rest, till we come to Edward the Second; it is certaine, that after the murder of that King, the issue of blood then made, though it had sometimes of stay and stopping, did againe breake out, and that so often and in such abundance, as all our Princes of the Masculine race (very few excepted) dyed of the same disease. And although the young yeares of Edward the Thirde, made his knowledge of that horrible fact no more then suspitions: yet in that he afterwards caused his owne Vncle the Earle of Kent to die, for no other offence than the desire of his Brothers redemption, whom the Earle as then supposed to be liuing, the King making that to be treason in his Vncle, which was indeede treason in him-selfe, had his Vncles intelligence becom true; this I say made it manifest, that he was not ignorant of what had past, nor greatly desirous to haue had it otherwise; though he caused Mortimer to dye for the same.

This cruelty the secret and consecret iudgement of GOD reuenged, on the Grand-child of Edward the Thirde: and so it fell out, euen to the last of that line, that in the second or third descent they were all buried vnder the ruines of those buildings, of which the Mortar had beene tempered with innocent blood. For Richard the second, who saw both his Treasurers, his Chaucellor, and his Steward, with diuers others of his Counsaillours, some of them slaughtered by the people, others in his absence executed by his enemies; yet he alwayes tooke himselfe for ouer-wise, to be taught by examples. The Earles of Huntington and Kent, Montague and Spencer, who thought themselves as great Politicians in those dayes, as others haue done in these; hoping to please the King, and to secure themselves, by the Murder of Gloucester, died soone after, with many other their adherents, by the like violent hands; and farre more shamefully then did that Duke. And as for the King himselfe (who in regard of many deedes, unworthy of his Greatnesse, cannot bee excused, as the disauowing him-selfe by breach of Faith, Charters, Pardons, and Patents) He was in the prime of his yongh deposed, and murdered by his Cosen Germane and rascall, Henry of Lancaster; afterwards Henry the fourth.

This

The Preface.

This King, whose Title was weak, and his obtaining the Crowne traitorous: who brake faith with the Loraes at his landing, protesting to intend onely the recouery of his proper inheritance; brake faith with Richard himselfe; and brake faith with all the Kingdome in Parliament, to whom he swore that the deposed King should liue. After that he had enioyed this Realme some few yeares, and in that time had beene set upon on all sides by his Subiects, and neuer free from conspiracies and rebellions: he saw (if Soules immortal see and discern any thinges after the bodys death) his Grand-child Henry the sixth, and his Son the Prince, suddenly, and without mercy, murdered; the possession of the Crowne (for which he had caused so much blood to be poured out) transferred, from his race; and by the Issues of his Enemies worne and enioyed. Enemies, whom by his owne practise hee supposed, that he had left no lesse power lesse, than the succession of the Kingdome, questionless; by entailing the same upon his owne Issues by Parliament. And out of doubt, humane reason could haue iudged no otherwise, but that these cautious prouisions of the Father, seconded by the valour and signall victories of his sonne Henry the fifth, had buried the hopes of euery Competitor, vnder the despaire of all reconquest and recouery. I say, that humane reason might so haue iudged: were not this passage of Calaubon also true; Dies, hora, monumentum euertendis dominationibus sufficit, quæ adamantinis credebantur radicibus esse fundatæ; A day, an houre, a moment, is enough to ouerturne the things, that seemed to haue beene founded and rooted in Adamant.

Now for Henry the sixth, upon whom the great storme of his Grandfathers greivous fautes fell, as it formerly had done upon Richard the Grand-child of Edward: although he was generally esteemed for a gentle and innocent Prince; yet as he refused the daughter of Armagnac, of the House of Nauarre, the greatest of the Princes of France, to whom hee was affianced (by which match he might haue defended his Inheritance in France) and married the Daughter of Aniou, (by which he lost all that hee had in France) so as in condescending to the unworthy death of his Vncle of Gloucester, the maine and strong Pillar of the house of Lancaster; He drew on himselfe and this kingdome the greatest ioynt losse & dishonor, that euer it sustained since the Norman Conquest. Of whom it may truly be said which a Counsellor of his owne spake of Henry the third of France, Qu'il estoit vne fort gentile Prince; mais son regne est aduenu en vne fort mauuais temps. That he was a very gentle Prince; but his raigne happened in a very vnfortunate season.

It is true that Buckingham and Suffolke were the practisers & contriuers of the Dukes death; Buckingham and Suffolke, because the Duke gaue instructions to their authority, which otherwise vnder the Queene had bin absolute; the Queene, in respect of her personall wound, spreteque in iuria forme forma, because Gloucester dissuaded her marriage. But the fruit was answerable to the seed, the success to the Counsaile. For after the cutting downe of Gloucester, Yorke grew up so fast, as hee dared to dispute his right both by arguments and armes; in which quarrell, Suffolke and Buckingham, with the greatest number of their adherents, were dissolved. And although for his breach of Oath by Sacrament, it pleased God to strike down Yorke: yet his sonne the Earle of March, following the plaine path which his Father had troden out, despoyled Henry the Father, and Edward, the sonne, both of their lines and Kingdomes. And what was the end now of that politique Lady the Queene, other then this, That she lived to behold the wretched ends of all her partakers: that she lived to looke on, while her Husband the King, and her onely sonne the Prince, were hewen in sunder; while the Crowne was set on his head that did it. Shee lived to see her selfe despoyled of her Estate, and of her moveables: and lastly, her Father, by rendring up to the Crowne of France the Earldome of Provence and other places, for the payment of fifty thousand crownes for her Ransome, to become a starke Beggar. And this was the end of that subtilty, which Siracides calleth fine but vnrighteous; for other fruit hath it neuer yielded since the world was.

Sirach 19.

And now it came to Edward the fourth turne (though after many difficulties) to triumph. For all the Plants of Lancaster were rooted up; One onely Earle of Richmond excepted: whome also hee had once bought of the Duke of Brittain, but could not hold him. And yet was not this of Edward such a Plantation, as could any way promise it selfe stability. For this Edward the King (to omit more than many of his other cruelties) beheld and allowed the slaughter, which Gloucester, Dorset, Hastings, and others, made of Edward the Prince in his owne presence: of which tragickall Actors, there was not one that escaped the iudgement of GOD in the same kinde. And hee, which (besides the execution of his brother Clarence, for none other offence then hee him-selfe had formed in his owne imagination) instructed Gloucester to kill Henry the sixth, his Predecessour; taught him also by the same Art to kill his owne sonnes and Successors Edward and Richard. For those Kings which haue sold the blood of others at a low rate; haue but made the market for their owne enemies, to buy of theirs at the same price.

To Edward the fourth succeeded Richard the Third, the greatest Maister in mischief of of all that fore-went him: who although, for the necessity of his Tragedie, hee had more parts to play, and more to performe in his owne person, then all the rest; yet hee so well fitted every affection that played with him, as if each of them had but acted his owne interest. For he wrought so cunningly upon the affections of Hastings, and Buckingham, enemies to the Queene and to all her kindred, as hee easily

easily allured them to condescend, that Riuer and Grey, the Kings Maternal Vncle and halfe brother, should (for the first) be seuered from him: secondly, hee wrought their consent to haue them imprisoned, and lastly (for the avoiding of future inconuenience) to haue their heads seuered from their bodies. And hauing now brought those his chiefe instruments to exercise that common precept, which the Deuill hath written on euery post, namely, To depresse those whom they had grieued, and to destroy those whom they had deprest; Hee urged that argument so farre and so forcibly; as nothing but the death of the yong king him-selfe, and of his brother, could fashion the conclusion. For he caused it to be hammered into Buckinghams head, That, whensoever the king or his brother, should haue able yeares to exercise their power; they would take a most seuer reuenge of that curelesse wrong, offered to their Vncle and Brother, Riuer and Grey.

But this was not his manner of reasoning with Hastings, whose fidelity to his Masters Sonnes was without suspect: and yet the Duell, who neuer dissuades by impossibility, taught him to try him. And so hee did. But when hee found by Catesby, who sounded him, that he was not for dable; He first resolved to kill him sitting in counsell: wherein hauing sayled with his sword; He set the Hangman upon him, with a weapon of more weight. And because nothing else could moue his appetite; He caused his head to be stricken off, before he ate his dinner. A greater iudgement of GOD, than this upon Hastings, I haue neuer obserued in any storie. For the selfe same daie that the Earle Riuer, Grey, and others, were (without trial of Law, or offence giuen) by Hastings aduice executed at Pomfret: I say Hastings him-selfe in the same daie, and (as I take it) in the same houre, in the same law-lesse manner, had his head stricken off in the Tower of London. But Buckingham lived a while longer; and with an eloquent oration perswaded the Londoners to elect Richard for their king. And hauing receiued the Earldome of Hereford for reward, besides the high hope of marrying his daughter to the Kings onely sonne; after many grievous vexations of mind, and vnfortunate attempts, being in the end betrayed and deliuered up by his trustiest seruant; He had his head seuered from his body at Salisbury, without the trouble of any of his Peeres. And what success he had Richard him-selfe after all these mischiefes and murders, policies, and counter-policies to Christian religion; and after such time, as with a most mercilesse hand he had pressed out the breath of his Nephews and Natural Lords; other than the prosperity of so short a life, as it tooke end, ere him-selfe could well looke ouer and discerne it: the great outcry of innocent blood, obtaining at GODS hands the effusion of his; who became a spectacle of shame and dishonor, both to his friends and enemies.

This cruell King, Henry the seauenth cut off; and was therein (no doubt) the immediate instrument of GODS iustice. A politique Prince hee was

if

if euer there were any, who by the ingine of his wisdom, beat downe and ouerturned as many strong oppositions both before and after hee were the crowne as euer King of England did: I say by his wisdom, because as hee euer left the raines of his affections in the hands of his profit, so hee alwaies wayed his vnder takings by his abilities, leaving nothing more to hazard than so much as cannot be denied it in all humane actions. Hee had well obserued the proceedings of Loys the eleuenth, whom hee followed in all that was royall or royal like, but hee was farre more iust, and begun not their processes whom hee hated or feared by the execution, as Loys did.

Hee could neuer indure any mediation in rewarding his seruants, and therein exceeding wise, for what so euer him-selfe gaue, he him-selfe receiued backe the thanks and the loue, knowing it well that the affections of men (purchased by nothing so redde as by benefits) were traynes that better became great Kings, than great subiects. On the contrary, in what so euer hee greened his subiects, he wisely put it off on those, that he found fit ministers for such actions. How-so-euer, the taking off, of Stanles head, who set the Crowne on his, and the death of the young Earle of Warwick, some to George D. of Clarence, flows, as the successe also did, that hee held somewhat of the errors of his Ancesters, for his possession in the first line ended in his grand children, as that of Edward the third and Henry the fourth had done.

Now for King Henry the eight: if all the pictures and Patternes of a mercilesse Prince were lost in the World, they might all againe be painted to the life, out of the story of this King. For how many seruants did hee aduance in haste (but for what vertue no man could suspect) and with the change of his fancy ruined againe; no man knowing for what offence? To how many others of more desert gaue hee abundant flowres from whence to gather hony, and in the end of Haruest burnt them in the Hue? How many wines did hee cut off, and cast off, as his fancy and affection changed? How many Princes of the blood (whereof some of them for age could hardly crawl towards the block) with a world of others of all degrees (of whom our common Chronicles haue kept the accompt) did hee execute? yea, in his very death-bed, and when hee was at the point to haue giuen his accompt to GOD for the abundance of blood already spilt: Hee imprisoned the Duke of Norfolk the Father; and executed the Earle of Surrey the sonne, the one, whose desertings he knew not how to value, hauing neuer omitted any thing that concerned his owne honour, and the Kings cruice; the other, neuer hauing committed any thing worth of his least displeasure: the one exceeding valiant and aduised; the other no lesse valiant than learned, and of excellent hope. But besides the sorrowes which heeaped vpon the Fatherlesse, and widows at home: and besides the cruaine enterprises abroad, wherein it is thought that hee consumed more Treasure, than all our victorious Kings

The Preface.

Kinges did in their seuerall Conquests: what causelesse and cruell warres did hee make vpon his owne Nephew King Iames the first? What Lawes and Wills did hee deuise, to establish this Kingdome in his owne issues? vsing his sharpest weapons to cut off, & cut downe those branches, which sprang from the same roote that him-selfe did. And in the end (not withstanding these his so many irreligious prouisions) it pleased GOD to take away all his grace, without increase; though, for themselves in their seuerall kindes, all Princes of eminent vertue. For these wordes of Samuell to Agag King of the Amalikites, haue bene verified vpon many others: As thy sword hath made other women childlesse: so shall thy mother be childlesse among other women. And that blood, which the same King Henry affirmed, that the cold aire of Scotland had frozen vpon in the North, GOD hath diffused by the sunshine of his grace: from whence His Maiesty now liuing, and long to liue, is descended. Of whom I may say it truly, That if all the malice of the world were infused into one eie: yet could it not discern in His life, euen to this daie, any one of those foule spots, by which the Consciences of all the forenamed Princes (in effect) haue bene defiled; nor any droppe of that innocent blood on the sword of his iustice, with which the most that fore-went him, haue stayned both their hands and fame. And for this Crowne of England; it may truly be a ronne. That hee had receiued it euen from the hand of GOD, and had stayed the time of putting it on, howsoeuer he were prouoked to hasten it: That Hee neuer took reuenge of any man, that sought to put him beside it. That Hee refused the assistance of Her enemies, that wore it long, with as great glory as euer Prince did. That his Maiesty entred not by a breach; nor by blood; but by the Ordinary gate, which his owne right set open; and into which, by a generall loue and Obedience, Hee was receined. And howsoeuer His Maiesties preceeding title to this Kingdome, was preferred by many Princes (witness the Treaty at Cambray in the yeare, 1559) yet hee neuer, pleased to dispute it, during the life of that renowned Lady his Pradeecessor; no, nor withstanding the iniury of not being declared Heire, in all the time of Her long raigne.

Neither ought wee to forget, or neglect our thankfullnesse to GOD for the uniting of the Northern parts of Brittain to the South, to wit of Scotland to England, which though they were sutured but by small brookes and hunkes, yet by reason of this long continued warre, and the cruelties exercised vpon each other, in the affection of the Nations, they were infinitely sutured. This I say is not the least of Gods blessings which His Maiesty hath brought with him vnto this Land: No, put all our petty greeniances together, and heap them vp to their height, they will appeare but as a Mole-hill compared with the Mountaine of this concord. And if all the Historians since iden; haue acknowledged the uniting of the Red-Rose, and the White, for the greatest happinesse (Christian Religion excepted) that euer this Kingdome receiued from GOD, certainly the peace betwene the two Lions of gold and gules, and the making them one, doth by many degrees exceede the former; for by it, besides the sparing of our british blood, heretofore and during the difference so often vs abundantly shed, the state of England is more assured, the Kingdome more inable to recover her auient honor and rights, and by it made more inuincible, than by all our former alliances, practices, policies and conquests. It is true that hereof we do not yet finde the effect. But had the Duke of Parma in the yeare 1588, ioyned the army which hee commanded, with that of Spaine, and landed it on the south coast; and had his Maiesty at the same time declared himselfe against vs in the north: it is easie to diuine what had become of the liberty of England, certainly we would then without murmur haue brought this vnion a farre greater praise than it hath since cost vs.

It is true, that there was neuer any Common weale or Kingdome in the world, wherein no man had cause to lament. Kings line in the world and not aboue it. They are not infinit to examine euery mans cause, or to reline euery mans wares. And yet in the latter, (though to his owne preiudice) His Maiesty hath had more compassion of other mens necessities, than of his owne Coffers. Of whome it may be said, as of Salomon Dedit Deus Salomoni laritudinem Cordis: Which if other men doe not vnderstand with Pineda, to be ment by Liberality, but by Latitude of knowledge; yet may it bee better spoken of His Maiesty, than of any King that euer England had; who as well in Diuine, as Humane vnderstanding, hath exceeded all that fore-went him, by many degrees.

I could say much more of the Kings Maiesty, without flatterie: did I not feare the imputation of presumption, and withall suspect, that it might befall these papers of mine, (though the losse were little) as it did the Pictures of Queene Elizabeth, made by vnskilfull and common Painters; which by her owne Commandement, were knockt in peeces and cast into the fire. For ill Artists, in setting out the beauty of the externall; and weake writers, in describing the vertues of the internall; doe often leaue to posterity, of well formed faces a deformed memory; and of the most perfect and Princely minaes, a most defectiue representation. It may suffice, and there needs no other discourse, if the honest Reader but compare the cruell and turbulent passages of our former Kings, and of other their Neighbour. Princes (of whome for that purpose I haue inserted this breife discourse) with His Maiesties temperate, reuerend, and liberal disposition: I say, that if the honest Reader weigh them iustly, and with an euen hand; and withall but bestow euery deformed child on his true Parent, He shall finde, that there is no man that hath so iust cause to complaine, as the King him-selfe hath.

Now

The Preface.

Now as we haue told the successe of the trumperies and cruelties of our owne Kings, and other great personages: so we finde, that GOD is euery where the same GOD. And as it pleased him to punish the usurpation, and unnatural cruelty of Henry the first, and of our third Edward, in their Children for many generations: so dealt He with the sonnes of Loys Debonaire, the sonne of Charles the great, or Charlemaine. For after such time as Debonaire of France, had torne out the eyes of Bernard his Nephew, the sonne of Pipen, the eldest sonne of Charlemaine, and heire of the Empire; and then caused him to die in prison, as did our Henry to Robert his eldest brother: there followed nothing but murders upon murders, poisoning, imprisonments, and ciuill warre; till the whole race of that famous Emperour was extinguished.

And though Debonaire, after he had rid himselfe of his Nephew by a violent death; and of his Bastard Brothers by a ciuill death (having inclosed them with sure guard, all the daies of their liues, within a Monasterie) held him selfe secure from all opposition: Yet GOD raised up against him (which hee suspected not) his owne sonnes, to vex him, to invade him, to take him prisoner, and to depose him; his owne sonnes, with whome (to satisfie their ambition) hee had shared his estate, and giuen them Crownes to wear, and Kingdomes to gouerne, during his owne life. Yea his eldest sonne Lothaire (for hee had foure, three by his first wife, and one by his second; to wit, Lothaire, Pipen, Loys, and Charles) made it the cause of his deposition; That he had vsed violence towards his Brothers and Kinsmen; and that he had suffered his Nephew (whome hee might haue deliuered) to be slaine, eo quod, saith the Text, fratribus et propinquis violentiam intulerit, et nepotem suum, quem ipse liberare poterat, interfici permisit. Because he vsed violence to his Brothers and Kinsmen, and suffered his Nephew to be slaine whom he might haue deliuered.

Yet did hee that which few Kings doe; namely, repent him of his cruelty. For among many other things, which hee performe in the Generall Assemblies of the States, it follows. Post hæc autem palam se errasse confessus, & imitatus Imperatoris Theodosii exemplum, penitentiam spontaneam suscepit, tam de his, quam quæ in Bernardum proprii nepotem gesserat. After this hee did openly confesse him-selfe to haue erred, and following the example of the Emperour Theodosius hee vnder-went voluntary penance, as well for his other offences, as for that which hee had done against Bernard his owne Nephew.

This hee did: and it was praise-worthy. But the blood that is vnjustly spilt, is not againe gathered vp from the ground by repentance. These Medicines, ministred to the dead, haue but dead rewards.

The Preface.

This King, as I have said, had foure Sonnes. To Lothaire his eldest he gave the Kingdome of Italy; as Charlemaine, his Father, had done to Pepin the Father of Bernard, who was to succeed him in the Empire. To Pepin the second sonne he gave the Kingdome of Aquitaine: to Loys, the Kingdome of Baviere: and to Charles, whome hee had by a second wife, called Iudith, the remainder of the Kingdome of France. But this second wife, being a Mother-in-law to the rest, perswaded Debonaire to cast his sonne Pipen out of Aquitaine; thereby to greaten Charles; which, after the death of his sonne Pipen, he prosecuted to effect, against his Grandchild bearing the same name. In the meane while, being invaded by his sonne Loys of Baviere, he dies for greife.

Debonaire dead: Loys of Baviere, and Charles afterwards called the bald, and their Nephew Pipen of Aquitaine, ioyne in league against the Emperour Lothaire their eldest Brother. They fight neare an Auxerre the most bloody battle that ever was stroken in France: in which, the marvellous losse of Nobility, and men of warre, gave courage to the Saracens to invade Italie; to the Hunnes, to fall upon Almaine; and the Danes, to enter upon Normandy. Charles the Bald by treason seizeth upon his Nephew Pipen, kills him in a Cloyster, Carloman rebels against his Father Charles the Bald, the Father burnes out the eyes of his sonne Carloman; Baviere invades the Emperour Lothaire his Brother, Lothaire quies the Emperour, hee is assailed and wounded to the heart by his owne conscience for his rebellion against his Father, and for his other cruelties, and dies in a Monestarie. Charles the Bald the Uncle oppresseth his Nephewes the sonnes of Lothaire, hee usurpeth the Empire to the prejudice of Loys of Baviere his elder Brother, Baviere's armies and his sonne Carloman are beaten, hee dies of grieffe, and the Tyrer Charles is poisoned by Zedechias a Jew his Physician, his sonne Loys le Beque dies of the same drinke Beque had Charles the simple, and two Bastards, Loys and Carloman, they rebell against their Brother, but the eldest breakes his Neck, the younger is slaine by a wild Bore, the sonne of Baviere had the same ill destiny and brake his neck by a fall out of a Window in sporting with his companions Charles the grosse becomes Lord of all that the sonnes of Debonaire held in Germanie, wherewith not contented, hee invades Charles the simple, but being forsaken of his Nobility, of his wife, and of his understanding, hee dies a distracted begger. Charles the simple is held in Wardship by Eudes Maior of the Pallace, then by Robert the Brother of Eudes, and lastly being taken by the Earle of Vermandois, hee is forced to die in the prison of Veron: Loys the sonne of Charles the simple breakes his Neck in Chasing a Wolfe, and of the two sonnes of this Loys, the one dies of poison, the other dies in the prison of Orleans, after whome Hugh Capet, of another race, and a stranger to the French, makes him-selfe King.

These

The Preface.

These miserable ends had the issues of Debonaire: who after hee had once apparelled iniustice with authority, his sonnes and successours tooke up the fashion; and wore that Garment so long without other promission, as when the same was torne from their shouldiers, every man despiied them as miserable and naked beggars. The wretched successe they had, (saith a learned French-man) shewes, que en ceste mort il y avoit plus du fait des hommes que de Dieu, ou de la iustice: that in the death of that Prince, to wit of Bernard the sonne of Pepin, the true heire of Charlemaine, men had more meddling, than either GOD, or Iustice had.

But to come nearer home; it is certaine that Francis the first, One of the worthiest Kings (except for that fact) that ever the French men had, did neuer enioy him-selfe; after hee had commended the destruction of the Protestants of Mirandol and Cabrieres, to the Parliament of Prouence, which poore people were there-upon burnt, and murdered; men, women, and children. It is true, that the said King Francis repented him-selfe of the fact, and gave Charge to Henry his sonne, to doe iustice upon the Murderers; threatening his sonne with GODS iudgments, if he neglected it. But this unreasonable care of his, GOD was not pleased to accept for payment. For after Henry him-selfe was slaine in sport by Montgomery; we all may remember what became of his foure sonnes, Francis Charles, Henry, and Hercules. Of which although three of them became Kings, and were married to beautifull and vertuous Ladies: Yet were they, one after another, cast out of the world, without stock or seed. And not-withstanding their subtilty, and breach of faith, with all their Massacres, upon those of the religion, and great effusion of blood; the Crowne was set on his head, whom they all laboured to dissolve; the Protestants remaine more in number than ever they were; and hold to this day more strong citties than ever they had.

Let us now see if GOD be not the same GOD in Spaine, as in England and France. Towards whom we will looke no further backe than to Don Pedro of Castile: in respect of which Prince, all the Tyrants of Sicill, our Richard the third, and the great Euan Vasilowick of Moscouia, were but pettie ones: this Castilian, of all Christian and Heathen Kings, having bene the most mercilesse. For besides those of his owne blood and Nobility which hee caused to be slaine in his owne Court and Chamber, as Sancho Ruis the great Master of Calatrava, Ruis Gonfales, Alphonso Tello, and Don Iohn of Arragon, whom he cut in peeces and cast into the streets, denying him Christian buriall: I say besides these, and the slaughter of Gomes Manriques, Diego Peres, Alphonso Gomes, and the great commander of Cattile; He made away the two Infants of Arragon his Cousen-germans, his brother Don Frederick, Don Iohn de la Cerde, Albuquerque, Nuges de Guzmá, Cornel, Cabrera, Tenorio, Mendes de Toledo.

The Preface.

de Toledo, Gutiere his great Treasurer, and all his Kindred; and a world of others. Neither did he spare his two youngest brothers, innocent Princes: whom after hee had kept in close prison from their Cradles, till one of them had lived sixteene yeares, and the other foureteene; hee murdered them there. Nay hee spared not his Mother, nor his wife the Lady Blanch of Bourbon. Lastly as hee caused the Archbishop of Toledo, and the Deane, to be killed of purpose to enioy their treasures: so did he put to death Mahomet Aben Alhamar King of Barbary, with seauen and thirty of his Nobilitie; that came vnto him for succour, with a great summe of money, to leuy (by his fauour) some companies of souldiers to returne withall. Yea, he would needs assist the Hangman with his owne hand, in the execution of the old King; in so much as Pope Urban declared him an enemy both to GOD and Man. But what was his end? Having bene formerly beaten out of his Kingdome, and re-established by the valour of the English Nation, led by the famous Duke of Lancaster. He was stabbed to death by his younger Brother the Earle of Aſtramara, who dispossessed all his Children of their inheritance; which, but for the Fathers iniustice and cruelty, had neuer bene in danger of any such thing.

If we can parallel any man with this King, it must be Duke Iohn of Burgoigne: who, after his traitorous murder of the Duke of Orleans, caused the Constable of Armagnac, the Chancelour of France, the Bishops of Constance, Bayeux, Eureux, Senlis, Saintes, and other religious and reuerend Church-men, the Earle of gran Prè, Hector of Chartres, and (in effect) all the Officers of iustice, of the Chamber of Accompts, Treasurers, and Request, (with sixteene hundred others to accompany them) to be suddenly and violently slaine. Hereby, while he hoped to gouerne, and to haue maistred France: He was soone after stricken with an axe in the face, in the presence of the Dauphin; and, without any leisuere to repent his misdeeds, presently slaine. These were the Louers of other mens miseries: and miserie found them out.

Now for the Kings of Spaine, which liued both with Henry the seventh, Henry the eight, Queene Mary, and Queene Elizabeth; Ferdinand of Arragon was the first: and the first that layd the foundation of the present Austrian greatness. For this King did not content himselfe to hold Arragon by the usurpation of his Ancestor; and to fasten therevnto the Kingdome of Castile and Leon, which label his wife held by strong hand, and his assistance from her owne Neece the Daughter of the last Henry: but most cruelly and craftily, without all colour or pretence of right, hee also cast his owne Neece out of the Kingdome of Nauarre; and, contrary to faith, and the promise that hee made to restore it, fortified the best places, and so wasted the rest, as there was no meanes left for any army to invade it. This King I say, that betrayed also Ferdinand and Frederick Kings

The Preface.

Kings of Naples, Princes of his owne blood, and by double alliance tied vnto him; sold them to the French: and with the same Army, sent for their succour vnder Gonsaluo, cast them out; and shared their Kingdome with the French; whom afterwards he most shamefully betrayed.

This his wife and politique King, who sold Heaven and his owne Honour, to make his sonne, the Prince of Spaine, the greatest Monarch of the world: saw him die in the flower of his yeares, and his wife great with childe, with her vntimely birth, at once and together buried. His eldest daughter married vnto Don Alphonsus Prince of Portugall, beheld her first husband breake his neck in her presence, and being with childe by her second, dyed with it. A iust iudgement of GOD vpon the race of Iohn, father to Alphonsus, now wholly extinguished: who had not onely left many disconsolate Mothers in Portugall, by the slaughter of their children; but had formerly slaine with his owne hand, the sonne and onely comfort of his Aunt the Lady Beatrix, Duchesse of Viseo. The second Daughter of Ferdinand, married to the Arch-duke Philip; turned foole; and died mad and deprived. His third daughter, bestowed on King Henry the eight, he saw cast off by the King: the mother of many troubles in England; and the mother of a Daughter, that in her unhappy Reale shed a world of innocent blood; lost Callice to the French; and died heart-broken without increase. To conclude: all those Kingdomes of Ferdinand haue maisters of a new name; and, by a strange family are gouerned and possessed.

Charles the fifth, sonne to the Arch-duke Philip, in whose vaine enterprises vpon the French, vpon the Almans, and other Princes and States, so many multitudes of Christian souldiers, and renowned Captaines, were consumed: who gaue the while a most perillous entrance to the Turkes, and suffered Rhodes, the Key of Christendome, to be taken; was in conclusion chased out of France, and in a sort out of Germany; and left to the French, Mentz, Tòule, and Verdun, places belonging to the Empire; stole away from Insprug; and sealed the Alpes by torch-light, pursued by Duke Maurice, having hoped to swallow up all those dominions, wherein hee conuoluted nothing saue his owne disgraces. And hauing, after the slaughter of so many Millions of men, no one foot of ground in eyther: Hee crept into a Cloyster, and made himselfe a Pensioner of an hundred thousand Duckets by the yeare to his sonne Philip, from whom he very slowly receiued his meane and ordinary maintenance.

His sonne againe King Philip the second, not satisfied to hold Holland and Zeland, (wrested by his ancestors from laqueline their lawfull Princess) and to possess in peace many other Provinces of the Netherlands: persuaded by that mischieuous Cardinal of Grauuile, and other Romish Tyrants; not onely forgot the most remarkable seruices, done to his Father the Emperour by the Nobilitie of those countries; nor onely forgot the present, made him upon his entrie, of forty millions of Florens, called the Nouale aide; nor onely forgot, that hee had twice most solemnly sworne to the Generall States, to maintaine and preserve their ancient rights, privileges, and customes, which they had enjoyed vnder their thirty and five Earles before him, Conditionall Princes of those Prouinces: but beginning first to constrain them, and enthrall them by the Spanish Inquisition, and then to impouerish them by many new deuised and intolerable impositions; Hee lastly, by strong hand and maine force, attempted to make him-selfe not onely an absolute Monarch ouer them, like vnto the Kings and Soueraignes of England and France; but Turke-like, to tread vnder his feet all their Nationall and fundamentall Lawes, Priviledges, and ancient Rights. To effect which, after he had easily obtained from the Pope a Dispensation of his former Oathes (which Dispensation was the true cause of all the warre and bloodshed since then) and after he had tryed what hee could performe, by diuiding of their owne Nobilitie, vnder the government of his base sister, Margaret of Austria, and the Cardinall Granuile; Hee employed that most mercilesse Spaniard Don Ferdinand Aluarez of Toledo, Duke of Alua, followed with a powerfull army of strange Nations: by whom he first slaughtered that renowned Capitaine the Earle of Egmont, Prince of Gauare; and Philip Montmorency Earle of Horn: made away Montigue, and the Marquis of Bergues; and cut off in those sixe yeares (that Alua gouerned) of Gentlemen and others, eightene thousand and sixe hundred, by the hands of the Hangman, besides all his other barbarous murders and massacres. By whose ministry when hee could not yet brings his affaires to their wished ends, hauing it in his hope to worke that by sublety, which hee had failed to performe by force; Hee sent for gouernour his bastard brother Don Iohn of Austria; a Prince of great hope, and very gracious to those people. But hee, vsing the same Papall aduantage that his predecessors had done: made no scruple to take Oath vpon the Holy Euangelists, to obserue the treaty made with the Generall States; and to discharge the Low Countries of all Spaniards, and other strangers, therein garrisoned. Towards whose Pay and Passport, the Netherlands strained them-selues to make payment of sixe hundred thousand pounds. Which monies received, He suddenly surprised the Citadells of Antwerp and Nemeures: not doubting (being vsuspected by the States) to haue possessed him-selfe of all the massing places of those Prouinces. For whatsoeuer hee ouertly pretended. He held in secret a contrary counsell with the Secretary Elcouedo, Rhodus, Barlemont, and others, Ministers of the Spanish tyranny; formerly practised, and now againe intended. But let vs now see the effect and end of this periuice, and of all other the Dukes cruelties. First, for him-selfe; after hee had murdered so many of the Nobilitie; executed (as aforesaid) eightene thousand sixe hundred

in

in sixe yeares; and most cruelly slaine Man, Women, and Child, in Mecklin, Zuphen, Naerden, and other places: and after hee had consumed sixe and thirty millions of treasure in sixe yeares: notwithstanding his Spanish want, That hee would suffocate the Hollanders in their owne butter-barrells, and milke-tubbs. He departed the country no otherwise accompanied, than with the curse and detestation of the whole Nation; leaving his Masters affaires in a tenfold worse estate, than hee found them at his first arrival. For Don Iohn, whose haughty conceits of him-selfe ouer-came the greatest difficulties; though his iudgement were ouer-weake to mannage the least: what wonders did his faerefull breach of faith bring forth, other than the King his brothers searouse and distrust; with the vtimately death that seized him, euen in the flower of his youth. And for Elcouedo his sharpe-witted Secretarie, who in his owne imagination had conquered for his Master both England and the Netherlands; being sent into Spaine vpon some new proiect, He was at the first arrival, and before any access to the King, by certaine Ruffians appointed by Anthony Peres (though by better warrant than his) rudely murdered in his owne lodging. Lastly, if wee consider the King of Spaines carriage, his counsaile, and successe in this businesse; there is nothing left to the memory of man more remarkable. For hee hath paid aboue an hundred Millions, and the liues of aboue foure hundred thousand Christians, for the losse of all those countries; which, for beauty, gaue place to none; and for revenue, did equal his VVest Indies: for the losse of a nation, which most willingly obeyed him; and who at this day, after forty yeares warre, are in despite of all his forces become free Estate, and farre more rich and powerfull, than they were, when hee first beganne to impouerish and oppresse them.

Oh by what plots, by what forswearings, betrayings, oppressions, imprisonments, tortures, paysonings, and vnder what reasons of State, and politique subteltrie, haue these forenamed Kings, both strangers, and of our owne Nation, pulled the vengeance of GOD vpon them-selues, vpon theirs, and vpon their prudent ministers! and in the end haue brought those things to passe for their enemies, and serue an effect so directly contrary to all their owne counsailes and cruelties; as the one could neuer haue hoped for them-selues; and the other neuer haue succeeded; if no such opposition had euer bene made. GOD hath said it and performed it euer: Perdam sapientiam sapientum, I will destroy the wisdom of the wile.

But what of all this? and to what end doe we lay before the eyes of the liuing, the fall and fortunes of the dead: seeing the world is the same that it hath bin; and the children of the present time, will still obey their parents? It is in the present time, that all the wits of the world are exercised. To hold the times we haue we hold all things lawfull; and either we hope to hold them for euer; or at least wee hope, that there is nothing after them to be hoped for.

For

The Preface.

For as wee are content to forget our owne experience, and to counterfeite the ignorance of our owne knowledge, in all things that concerne our selues; or perfwade our selues, that GOD hath giuen vs letters patents to pursue all our irreligious affections, with a non obstante: so wee neither looke behind vs what hath bene, nor before vs what shall be. It is true, that the quantitie which wee haue, is of the body: wee are by it ioyned to the earth: wee are compounded of earth; and wee inhabit it. The Heauens are high, farre off, and vnsearchable: we haue sense and feeling of corporall things; and of eternall grace, but by reuelation. No meruaile then that our thoughts are also earthly: and it is lesse to be wondred at, that the words of worthless men cannot cleanse them; seeing their doctrine and instruction, whose vnderstanding the Holy Ghost vouchsafed to inhabit, haue not performed it. For as the Prophet Elai cryed out long agoe, Lord, who hath beleueed our reports? And one of doubt, as Elai complained then for him selfe, and others: so are they lesse beleueed, every day after other. For although Religion, and the truth thereof, be in euery mans mouth, yea in the discourse of euery woman; who for the greatest number are but Idols of vanitie: what is it other than an vniuersall dissimulation? Wee professe that wee know GOD: but by workes wee deny him. For Beatitude doth not consist in the knowledge of diuine things, but in a diuine life: for the Diuells know them better than men. Beatitude non est diuinorum cognitio, sed vita diuina. And certainly there is nothing more to be admired; and more to be lamented, than the priuate contentions, the passionate dispute, the personall hatred, and the perpetuall warre, massacres, and murders; for Religion among Christians: the discourse whereof hath so occupied the World, as it hath well neare driuen the practise thereof out of the world. Who would not soone resolute, that tooke knowledge but of the religious disputations among men, and not of their liues which dispute, that there were no other thing in their desires, than the purchase of Heauen; and that the World it selfe were but vsed as it ought, and as an Inne or place, wherein to repose our selues in passing on towards our celestiall habitation? when on the contrary, besides the discourse and outward profession, the soule hath nothing but hypocrisie. We are all (in effect) become Comedians in religion: and while we act in gesture and voice, diuine vertues, in all the course of our liues we renounce our Persons, and the parts wee play. For Charitie, Iustice, and Truth, haue but their being in termes, like the Philosophers Materia prima.

Neither is it that wisdom, which Salomon defineth to be the Schoole-Mistresse of the knowledge of God, that hath valuation in the world: it is enough that we giue it our good word; but the same which is altogether exercised in the seruice of the World, as the gathering of riches chiefly; by which we purchase and obtaine honour, with the many respects which attend it.

These

The Preface.

These indeed be the markes, which (when wee haue bent our consciences to the highest) wee all shooe at. For the obtaining whereof it is true, that the care is our owne; the care our owne in this life, the perill our owne in the future: and yet when wee haue gathered the greatest abundance, wee our selues enioy no more thereof, than so much as belongs to one man. For the rest, Hee that had the greatest wisdomes; and the greatest abilitie that euer man had, hath told vs what this is the use: VVhen goods increafe (saith Salomon) they also increafe that eateth them; and what good cometh to the Owners; but the beholding thereof with their eyes? As for those that deuour the rest, and follow vs in faire weather: they againe forsake vs in the first tempest of misfortune, and flee away before the Sea and Winde; leaving vs to the matie of our destinies. Of these, among a thousand examples, I will take but one out of Maister Dannet, and vs his owne words: VVhilest the Emperour Charles the first, after the resignation of his Estates, layed at VVulsting for winde, to carry him his last iourne into Spaine; Hee conferred on a time with Seldius, his brother Ferdinands Embassadour, till the deepe of the night. And when Seldius should depart: the Emperour calling for some of his seruants, and no bodie answering him (for those that attended vpon him, were some gone to their lodgings, and all the rest a sleepe) the Emperour tooke vp the candle him selfe, and went before Seldius to light him downe the staires; and so did, notwithstanding all the resistance that Seldius could make. And when Hee was come to the staires foot, Hee said thus vnto him: Seldius, remember this of Charles the Emperour, when hee shall be dead and gone, That Him, whom thou hast knowne in thy time enuironed with so many mighty Armies; and Guards of souldiours, thou hast also seene alone, abandoned, and forsaken; yea euen of his owne domestickall seruants, &c. I acknowledge this change of Fortune to proceed from the mighty hand of GOD; which I will by no meanes goe about to withstand.

But you will say that there are some things else, and of greater regard than the former. The first, is the reuerend respect that is held of great men, and the Honour done vnto them by all sorts of people. And it is true indeed: provided, that an inward loue for their iustice and piety, accompany the outward worship giuen to their places and power; without which what is the applause of the Multitude, but as the outcrie of an Heard of Animals, who without the knowledge of any true cause, please themselves with the noyse they make? For seeing it is a thing exceeding rare, to distinguish Vertue and Fortune: the most impious (if prosperous) haue euer bene applauded; the most vertuous (if vnprosperous) haue euer bene despised. For as Fortunes man rides the Horse, so Fortune her selfe rides the Man. Who, when hee is descended and on foote: the Man taken from his Beast, and

Fortune

The Preface.

Fortune from the Man; a base groomer beates the one, and a bitter contempt spurnes at the other, with equall libertie.

The second, is the greening of our posterity, and the contemplation of their glory whom wee leave behinde vs. Certainly, of those which concerne that their soules departed take any comfort therein, is maxime said of them, which Lactantius spake of certaine Heathen Philosophers, quod sapientes sunt in re sua. For when our spirits immortall shall be once seperate from our mortall bodies, and disposed by GOD: they remaineth in them no other ioy of their posteritie which succedeth, than there doth of pride in that stone, which sleepeth in the Wall of a Kings Palace; nor any other sorrow for their powerie, than there doth of shame in that, which beareth vp a Beggars cottage.

Nesciunt mortui, etiam sancti, quid agunt viui, etiam eorum filij, quia anima mortuorum rebus viuientium non interfuit. The dead though holy, know nothing of the living, no, not of their owne children: for the soules of those departed, are not conuerfant with their affaires that remaine. And if wee doubt of Saint Augustines, Iob 1. 14. 21.

wee cannot of Iob; who saith vs; That wee know not if our sonnes shall be honourable: neither shall we vnderstand concerning them, whether they shall be of low degree. Which Ecclesiastes also confirmeth: Man walketh in a shadow, and disquieteth him-selfe in vaine: hee heapeth vp riches, and cannot tell who shall gather them. The liuing (saith hee) know that they shall die, but the dead know nothing at all: for who can shew vnto man, what shall be after him vnder the Sunne?

Eccle. 5. 12.

Hee therefore accompteth it among the rest of worldly vanities, to labour and trauaile in the world, not knowing after death, whether a foole or a wise man should enioy the fruits thereof: which made mee (saith hee) endeavour euery to abhorre mine owne labour. And what can other men hope, whose blessed or sorrowfull estates after death GOD hath reserved? mans knowledge lying but in his hopes, seeing the Prophet Esai confessed of the elect, That Abraham is ignorant, of vs, and Irael knowes vs not. But hereof wee are assured, that the long and darke night of death: (of whose following day we shall neuer behold the dawne, till his returne that hath triumphed ouer it) shall couer vs ouer, till the world be no more. After which, and when we shall againe receive Organs glorified and incorruptible, the fears of Angellike affections: in so great admiration shall the soules of the blessed be exercised, as they cannot admit the mixture of any second or lesse ioy nor any returne of foregone and mortall affection towards friends, kindred, or children. Of whom whether wee shall retaine any particular knowledge, or in any sort distinguish them: no man can assure vs; and the wisest men doubt. But on the contrary, If a diuine life retaine any of those faculties, which the soule exercised in a mortall body: wee shall not at that time so diuide the ioyes of Heauen, as to cast any part thereof on the memory of

of their felicities which remaine in the World. No; be their estates greater than euer the World gaue, wee shall by the difference knowe vnto vs) euen detest their consideration. And whatsoeuer comfort shall remaine of all forepast, the same will consist in the charity, which we exercised liuing: and in that Pietie, Justice, and firme Faith, for which it pleased the infinite mercy of GOD to accept of vs, and receiue vs. Shall wee therefore value honour and riches at nothing? and neglect them, as vnecessary and vaine? Certainly no. For that infinite wisdom of GOD, which hath distinguished his Angells by degrees: which hath given greater and lesse light and beauty, to Heauenly bodies: which hath made differences betwene beasts and birds: created the Eagle and the Flye, the Cedar and the Shrub: and among stones, given the fairest tincture to the Rubie, and the quickest light to the Diamond; hath also ordained Kings, Dukes or Leaders of the people, Magistrates, Iudges, and other degrees among men. And as honour is left to posteritie, for a marke and ensigne of the vertue and vnderstanding of their Ancestors: so, seeing Siracides preferreth Death before Beggerie: and that titles, without proportionable estates, fall vnder the miserable succour of other mens pittie; I accompt it foolishnesse to condemne such a care: Provided, that worldly goods be well gotten, and that wee raise not our owne buildings out of other mens ruines. For as Plato doth first preferre the perfection of bodily health; secondly, the forme and beauty; and thirdly, Diuitias nulla fraude quaesitas: so Hieremie cries, VVoe vnto them that erect their houses by vnrighteousnesse, and their chambers without equitie: and Esai the same, VVoe to those that spoyle and were not spoyled. And it was out of the true wisdom, of Salomon, that hee commandeth vs, not to drinke the wine of violence; not to lie in wait for blood; and not to swallow them vp aliue, whose riches we couet: for such are the wayes (saith hee) of euery one that is greedy of gaine.

And if wee could afford our selues but so much leisure as to consider, That be which hath most in the world, hath in respect of the world, nothing in it: and that be which hath the longest time lent him to liue in it, hath yet no proportion at all therein, setting it either by that which is past, when we were not; or by that time which is to come, in which we shall abide for euer: I say, if both, to wit, our proportion in the world, and our time in the world, differ not much from that which is nothing; it is not out of any excellency of vnderstanding, that wee so much prize the one, which hath (in effect) no being: and so much neglect the other, which hath no ending: concerning those mortall things of the world, as if our soules were therein immortall, and neglecting those things which are immortall, as if our selues after the world were but mortall.

The Preface.

Rich man thinke all fooles, that cannot equall his abundance; the Reuenger esteeme all negligent, that haue not trodden downe their opposites; the Politician, all grosse, that cannot merchandize their faith: Yet when wee once come in sight of the Port of death, to which all winde drue vs; and when by letting fall that fatal Anchor, which can neuer be weighed againe, the Navigation of this life takes end: T hen it is I say, that our owne cogitations (those sad and seuer cogitations, formerly beaten from vs by our Health and Felicitie) returne againe, and pay vs to the vttermost for all the pleasing passages of our liues past. It is then that wee crie out to GOD, for mercie; then, when our selues can no longer exercise cruelty towards others: and it is onely then, that wee are stricken through the soule with this terrible sentence; That GOD will not be mockt. For if according to Saint Peter, The righteous scarcely be saved: and that GOD spared not his Angels: where shall those appeare, who, hauing serued their appetites all their liues, presume to thinke, that the seuer Commandements of the All-powerfull GOD were giuen but in sport; and that the short breath, which wee draw when death presseth vs, if wee can but fashion it to the sound of Mercy (without any kinde of satisfaction or amends) is sufficient? O quam multi, saith a reuerend Father, Cum hac spe ad aternos labores & bella descendunt: I confesse that it is a great comfort to our friends, to haue it said, that we ended well: for we all desire (as Balaam did) to die the death of the righteous. But what shall wee call a disesteeming, an apposing, or (indeed) a mocking of GOD: if those men doe not appose him, disesteeme him, and mocke him, that thinke it enough for GOD, to aske him forgiveness at leisure, with the remainder and last drawing of a malicious breath? For what doe they otherwise, that die this kinde of well-dying, but say vnto GOD as followeth? Wee beseech thee O GOD, that all the fulltooles, for swearings, and treacheries of our liues past, may be pleasing vnto thee: that thou wilt for our sakes (that haue had no leisure to doe any thing for thine): change thy nature (though impossible) and forget to be a iust GOD; that thou wilt loue iniuries and oppressions, call ambition wisdom, and charitie foolishnesse. For I shall preiudice my sonne (which I am resolued not to doe) if I make restitution; and confesse my selfe to haue bene miust, (which I am too proud to doe) if I deliuer the oppressed. Certainly, these wise worldlings haue either found out a new GOD; or haue made One; and in all likelihood, such a Leaden One, as Lewis the eleventh wore in his Cappe; which, when he had caused any that he feared, or hated, to be killed, he would take it from his bead and kisse it: beseeching it to pardon him this one euill act more, and it should be the last, which (as at other times) hee did; when by the practise of a Cardinall and a falsified Sacrament, hee caused the Earle of Armagnack to be stabbed to death; mockeries indeed fit to be vsed towards a Leaden, but not towards the euery-living GOD. But of this composition are all the deuout louers of the World, that they feare all that is durcleffe and ridiculous: they feare the plots and practises of their opposites, and their very whisperings: they feare the opinions of men which bear but vpon shadowes: they flatter and forsake the prosperous and vnprosperous; be they friends or Kings: yea they dwe under water, like Ducks, at euery pebble stone, that's but throwne towards them by a powerfull hand: and on the contrary, they shew an obstinate and Giant-like valour, against the terrible iudgements of the All-powerfull GOD: yea they shew themselves Gods against GOD, and slaues towards men; towards men whose bodies and consciences are alike rotten.

Now for the rest: If wee truly examine the difference of both conditions; to wit, of the rich and mighty, whom wee call fortunate; and of the poore and oppressed, whom wee account wretched: wee shall finde the happinesse of the one, and the miserable estate of the other, so tied by GOD to the very instant, and both so subiect to enterchange (witness the sodaine downfall of the greatest Princes, and the speedy rising of the meanest persons) as the one hath nothing so certaine, whereof to boast; nor the other so vncertaine, whereof to bewaile it selfe. For there is no man so assured of his honour, of his riches, health, or life; but that hee may be deprived of either or all, the very next houre or day to come. Quid vespere vehat, incertum est, VVhat the euening will bring with it, it is vncertaine. And yet wee cannot tell (saith Saint Iames) what shall be to morrow. To day hee is set vp; and to morrow hee shall not be found: for hee is turned into dust, and his purpose perisheth. And although the aire which compasseth aduersitie, be very obscure: yet therein wee better discern GOD, than in that shining light which enuironeth worldly glorie; through which, for the clearenesse thereof, there is no vantage which escapeth our sight. And let aduersitie seeme what it will; to happy men, ridiculous, who make themselves merry at other mens misfortunes; and to those vnder the crosse, grievous: yet this is true, That for all that is past, to the very instant, the portions remaining are equall to either. For be it that wee haue liued many yeares, and (according to Salomon) in them all wee haue reioyced; or be it that wee haue measured the same length of daies, and therein haue euery more sorrowed: yet looking backe from our present being, we finde both the one and the other, to wit, the ioy and the woe, sailed out of sight; and death, which doth pursue vs and hold vs in chase, from our infancie, hath gathered it. Quicquid atatis retro est, mors tenet: VVhat-so-euer of our age is past, death holds it. So as who-so-euer hee be, to whom Fortune hath bene a seruant, and the Time a friend: let him but take the accompe of his memory (for wee haue no other keeper of our pleasures past) and truly examine what it hath re-served eyther of beauty and youth, or fore-gone delights; what it hath saved that it might last, of his dearest affections, or of what-euer else the amorous Spring-time gaue his thoughts of contentment, then vnualueable; and hee shall finde that all the art which his elder yeares haue, can draw no other vapour out of these dissolutions, than heauy, secret, and sad sighes. Hee shall finde nothing remaining, but those sorrowes, which grow up after our fast-springing youth; ouer-take it, when it is at a stand; and ouer-top it vntoerly, when it beginsnes to wither: in so much as looking backe from the very instant time, and from our now being; the poore, diseased, and captiue creature, hath as little Ience of all his former miseries and paines; as hee, that is most blest in common opinion, hath of his fore-passed pleasures and delights. For what-so-euer is cast behinde vs, is iust nothing: and what is to come, deceitfull hope hath it. Omnia quæ euentura sunt, in incerto iacent. Only those few blacke Swannes I must except: who hauing had the grace to value worldly vanities at no more than their owne price; doe, by retaining the comfortable memory of a well acted life, behold death without dread, and the graue without feare; and embrace both, as necessary guides to endlesse glory.

For my selfe, this is my consolation, and all that I can offer to others, that the sorrowes of this life, are but of two sorts: whereof the one hath respect to GOD; the other, to the World. In the first wee complaine to GOD against our selues, for our offences against him; and confesse, Et tu iustus es in omnibus quæ venerunt super nos, And thou O Lord art iust in all that hath befallen vs. In the second wee complaine to our selues against GOD: as if hee had done vs wrong, either in not giuing vs worldly goods and honours, answering our appetites: or for taking them againe from vs hauing had them; forgetting that humble and iust acknowledgement of Iob, The Lord hath giuen, and the Lord hath taken. To the first of which Saint Paul hath promised blessednesse; to the second, death. And out of doubt hee is either a foole or vngratefull to GOD, or both, that doth not acknowledge, how meane so-euer his estate be, that the same is yet farre greater, than that which God oweth him: or doth not acknowledge, how sharpe so-euer his afflictions be, that the same are yet farre lesse, than those which are due vnto him. And if an Heathen wise man call the aduersities of the world but tributa viuendi, the tributes of liuing: a wise Christian man ought to know them, and beare them, but as the tributes of offending. He ought to beare them man-like, and resolutely; not as those whining souldiours doe, qui gementes sequuntur imperatorem,

For seeing God, who is the Author of all our tragedies, hath written out for vs, and appointed vs all the parts we are to play: and hath not, in their distribution, beene partiall to the most mighty Princes of the world; That gaue vnto Darius the part of the greatest Emperour, and the part of the most miserable begger, a begger begging water of an Enemy, to quench the great drought of death; That appointed Baiazet to play the Gran Signior of the Turkes in the morning, and in the same day the Foot-toole of Tamerlane (both which parts Valerian had also plaid, being taken by Saporess) that made Belliarus play the most victorious Captaine, and lastly the part of a blinde beggar; of which examples many thousands may be produced: why should other men, who are but as the least wormes, complaine of wrongs? Certainly there is no other account to be made of this ridiculous world, than to resolve, That the change of fortune on the great Theater, is but as the change of garments on the lesse. For when on the one and the other, every man weares but his owne skin; the Players are all alike. Now if any man, out of weaknesse, prise the passages of this world otherwise (for saith Petrarch, Magni ingenij est reuocare mentem a sensibus) it is by reason of that unhappy fantasie of ours, which forgets in the braines of Man all the miseries (the corporall excepted) whereunto he is subiect: Therein it is, that Misfortune and Aduersitie worke all that they worke. For seeing Death, in the end of the Play, takes from all, whatsoeuer Fortune or Force takes from any one: it were a foolish madnesse in the shipwracke of worldly things, where all sinkes but the Sorrow, to saue it. That were, as Seneca saith, Fortunæ succumbere, quod tritius est omni fato, to fall vnder Fortune, of all other the most miserable destinie.

But it is now time to sound a retreat; and to desire to be excused of this long pursuit: and withall, that the good intent, which hath moued me to draw the picture of time past (which wee call Historie) in so large a table, may also be accepted in place of a better reason.

The examples of diuine prouidence, every where found (the first diuine Histories being nothing else but a continuation of such examples) haue perswaded me to fetch my beginning from the beginning of all things; to wit, Creation. For though these two glorious actions of the Almighty be so neare, and (as it were) linked together, that the one necessarily implyeth the other: Creation, inferring Prouidence (for what father forsaeketh the childe that he hath begotten?) and Prouidence presupposing Creation) Yet many of those that haue seemed to excell in worldly wisdom, haue gone about to disioyne this coherence; the Epicure denying both Creation and Prouidence, but granting that the world had a Beginning; the Aristotelian granting Prouidence, but denying both the Creation and the Beginning.

Now although this doctrine of Faith, touching the Creation in time (for by Faith we vnderstand, that the world was made by the word of God) be too weighty a worke for Aristotles rotten ground to beare vp, vpon which he hath (notwithstanding) founded the Defences of Fortresses of all his Verball Doctrine: Yet that the necessity of infinite power, and the worlds beginning, and the impossibility of the contrary euen in the iudgement of Natural reason, wherein hee beleueed, had not better informed him, it is greatly to be marrailed at. And it is no lesse strange, that those men which are deformed of knowledge (seeing Aristotle hath failed in this maine point; and taught little other than termes in the rest) haue so retrenched their mindes from the following and ouertaking of truth; and so absolutely subiected themselves to the law of those Philosophicall principles; as all contrary kinde of teaching, in the search of causes, they haue condemned either for phantasticall, or curious. But doth it follow, that the positions of Heathen Philosophers, are vndoubted grounds and principles indeed, because so called? Or that ipsi dixerunt, doth make them to be such? certainly no. But this is true, That where naturall reason hath built any thing so strong against it selfe, as the same reason can hardly assaile it, much lesse batter it downe: the same in euery question of Nature, and finite power, may be approued for a fundamentall law of humane knowledge. For saith Charron in his booke of Wisdom, Tout proposition humaine a autant d'autorité que l'autre, si la raison n'en fait la difference; Euery humane proposition hath equall authoritie, if reason make not the difference, the rest being but the fables of principles. But thereof how shall the ypright and vnpartiall iudgement of man giue a sentence, where opposition and examination are not admitted to giue in euidence. And to this purpose it was well said of Lactantius, Sapientiam sibi adimunt, qui sine vlllo iudicio inuenta maiorum probant, & ab alijs pecudum more ducuntur: They neglect their owne wisdom, who without any iudgement approve the inuention of those that fore-went them; and suffer themselves, after the manner of Beasts, to be led by them. By the aduantage of which slouth and dulnesse, ignorance is now become so powerfull a Tyrant: as it hath set true Philosophie, Physick, and Diuinity, in a Pillory; and written ouer the first, Contra negantem Principia; ouer the second, Vertus specifica; and ouer the third, Ecclesia Romana.

But for my selfe, I shall neuer be perswaded, that GOD hath shewt vp all light of Learning within the lanthorne of Aristotles braines: or that it was euer said vnto him, as vnto Eldras, Accendam in Corde tuo Lucernam intellectu: that GOD hath giuen inuention but to the Heathen; and that they onely haue invaded Nature, and found the strength and bottom thereof; the same Nature hauing consumed all her store, and left nothing of price to after-ages. That these and these be the causes of these and these effects, Time hath taught vs; and not reason: and so hath experience, without Art. The Cheese-wife knoweth it as well as the Philosopher, that sower Rennet doth coagulate her milke into a curd. But if wee aske a reason of this cause, why the sowernesse doth it? whereby it doth it? and the manner how? I thinke that there is nothing to be found in vulgar Philosophie, to iustifie this and many other like vulgar questions. But man to couer his ignorance in the least things, who cannot giue a true reason for the Grasse vnder his fesse, why it should be greene rather then red, or of any other colour; that could neuer yet discover the way and reason of Natures working, in those which are farre lesse noble creatures than himselfe; who is farre more Noble than the Heauens themselves: Man (saith Salomon) that can hardly discern the things that are vpon the Earth, and with great labour finde out the things that are before vs; that hath so short a time in the world, as hee no sooner begins to learne, than to die; that hath in his memory but borrowed knowledge; in his vnderstanding, nothing truly; that is ignorant of the Essence of his owne soule, and which the wisest of the Naturalists (if Aristotle be hee) could neuer so much as define; but by the Action and effect, telling vs what it workes (which all men know as well as hee) but not what it is, which neither hee, nor any else, doth know, but GOD that created it; (for though I were perfect, yet I know not my soule, saith Iob.) Man say, that is but an Idiot in the next cause of his owne life, and in the cause of all the actions of his life: will (notwithstanding) examine the Art of GOD in creating the World; of GOD, who (saith Iob) is so excellent as wee know him not; and examine the beginning of the worke, which had end before Man kinde had a beginning of being. Hee will disable GODS power to make a world, without matter to make it of. He will rather giue the moethes of the Aire for a cause; cast the worke on necessity or chance; bestow the honour thereof on Nature; make two powers, the one to be the Author of the Matter, the other of the Forme; and lastly, for want of a worke-man, haue it Eternal. which latter opinion Aristotle, to make himselfe the Author of a new Doctrine, brought into the World: and his Sectatours haue maintained it; parati ac coniuati, quos sequuntur, Philosophorum animis inuictis opiniones tueri. For Hermes, who lived at once with, or soone after, Moses, Zoroaster, Musæus, Orpheus, Linus, Anaximenes, Anaxagoras, Empedocles, Melissus, Pherecydes, Thales, Cleantes, Pythagoras, Plato, and many others (whose opinions are exquisitely gathered by Steuchius Eugubinus) found in the necessity of inuincible reason, One eternal and infinite Being, to be the Parent of the vniuersall. Horum omnium sententia quamuis sit incerta, eodem tamen spectat, vt Prouidentiam vnā esse consentiant: siue enim Natura, siue Æther, siue Ratio, siue mens, siue fatalis necessitas, siue diuina Lex, idem esse quod a nobis dicitur Deus: All these mens opinions (saith Lactantius) though vncertaine, come to this; That they agree vpon one Prouidence; whether the same be Nature, or light, or Reason, or vnderstanding, or destinie, or diuine ordinance; that it is the same which we call GOD. Lakes; doe at last finde, and fall into the great Ocean: so after all the searches that humane capacitie hath; and after all Philosophicall contemplation and curiositie; in the necessitie of this infinite power, all the reason of man ends and dissolues it selfe.

Euang. l. 7. c. 8.

As for others; and first touching those, which conceine the matter of the World to haue been eternall; and that God did not create the World ex nihilo, but ex materiâ præexistente: the Supposition is so weake, as is hardly worth the answering. For (saith Eusebius) Mihi videntur qui hoc dicunt, fortunam quoque Deo annexere, They seeme vnto me, which affirme this, to giue part of the work to God, and part to Fortune: in so much as if God had not found this first matter by chance; Hee had neither beene Author, nor Father, nor Creator, nor Lord of the Vniuersall. For were the Matter or Chaos, eternall: it then followes, That either this supposed Matter did sit it selfe to Gods; or God, accommodate himselfe to the matter. For the first; it is impossible; that things without sense could proportion themselves to the Workmans will. For the second; it were horrible to conceine of God, That as an Artificer be applyed himselfe, according to the proportion of Matter which he lighted vpon.

But let it be supposed, That this matter had beene made by any Power, not Omnipotent, and infinitely wise: I would gladly learne how it came to passe, that the same was proportionable to his intention, that was Omnipotent and infinitely wise; and no more, nor no lesse, than seru'd to receive the forme of the Vniuersall. For, had it wanted any thing of what was sufficient; then must it be granted, That God created out of nothing so much of new matter, as seru'd to finish the worke of the World: Or had there beene more of this matter, than sufficed; then God did dissolue and annihilate, what soeuer remained and was superfluous. And this must euery reasonable soule confesse, That it is the same worke of God alone, to create any thing out of nothing, And by the same art and power, and by none other, can those things, or any part of that eternall matter, be againe changed into Nothing; by which those things, that once were nothing, obtained a beginning of being.

Again, to say that this matter was the cause of it selfe; this, of all other, were the greatest idiosme. For, if it were the cause of it selfe at any time; then there was also a time when it selfe was not: at which time of not being, it is easie enough to conceine, that it could neither produce it selfe, nor any thing else. For to be, and not to be, at once, is impossible. Nihil autem seipsum præcedit, neq; seipsum componit corpus. There is nothing that doth præcede it selfe, neither doe bodies compound themselves.

For the rest; Those that saie this matter to be eternall, must of necessitie confesse, that Infinite cannot be separate from Eternitie. And then had infinite nite matter left no place for infinite forme, but that the first matter was finite, the forme which it receiued proues it. For conclusion of this part; who-so-euer will make choyce, rather to beleene in eternal deformitie, or in eternall dead matter, than in eternall light and eternall life: let eternall death be his reward. For it is a madnesse of that kinde, as wretched reames to expresse it. For what reason of man (whom the curse of presumption hath not stupified) hath doubted, That infinite power (of which wee can comprehend but a kind of shadow, quia comprehensio est intra terminos, qui infinito repugnant) hath anything wanting in it selfe, either for matter or forme; yea for as many worlds (if such had beene GODS will) as the Sea hath sands? For where the power is without limitation; the worke hath no other limitation, than the workmans will. Tea Reason it selfe findes it more easie for infinite power, to deliuer from it selfe a finite world, without the helpe of matter prepared; than for a finite man, a foole and dust, to change the forme of matter made to his hands. They are Dionysius his words, Deus in vna existentia omnia præhabet: and againe, Esse omnium est ipsa Diuinitas, omne quod videt, & quod non videt; to wit, causaliter, or in better reames, non tanquam forma, sed tanquam causa vniuersalis. Neither hath the world vniuersall closed vpon all of GOD: For the most parts of his workes (saith Siracides) are hid. Neither can the depth of his wisdom be opened, by the glorious worke of the world: which neuer brought to knowledge all it can; for then were his infinite power bounded, and made finite. And hereof it comes; That we seldome entitle GOD the all-shewing, or the all-willing; but the all-mighty, that is, infinitely able.

But now for those, who from that ground, That out of nothing nothing is made, inferre the Worlds eternitie; and yet not so saluage therein, as those are, which giue an eternall being to dead matter: It is true, if the word (nothing) be taken in the affirmative; and the making, imposed vpon Naturall Agents and finite power; That out of nothing, nothing is made. But seeing their great Doctor Aristotle him-selfe confesseth, quod omnes antiqui decreuerunt quasi quoddam rerum principium, ipsumq; infinitum, That all the ancient decrees a kinde of beginning, and the same to be infinite: and a little after, more largely and plainly, Principium eius est nullum, sed ipsum omnium cernitur esse principium, ac omnia completi ac regere: it is strange that this Philosopher, with his followers, should rather make choyce out of fallshood, to conclude falsely; than out of truth, to resolute truly. For if wee compare the world Vniuersall, and all the vnumerable Orbes of Heauen, and those merueilous bodies of the Sunne, Moone, and Starres, with ipsum infinitum: it may truly be said of them all, which him-selfe affirmeth of his imaginary Materia prima, That they are neither quid, quale, nor quantum; and therefore fore to bring finite (which hath no proportion with infinite) out of infinite (qui destruit omnem proportionem) is no wonder in GODS power. And therefore Anaximander, Melissus, and Empedocles, call the world vniuersall, but particulam vniuersitatis and infinitatis, a parcell of that which is the vniuersalitie and the infinitie it selfe; and Plato, but a shadow of GOD. But the other, to proue the worlds eternitie, vtgeth this Maxime, That, A sufficient and effectuall cause being granted, an answerable effect thereof is also granted: inferring, that GOD being for euer a sufficient and effectuall cause of the world, the effect of the cause should also haue beene for euer; to wit, the world vniuersall. But what a strange mockery is this in so great a Maister, to confesse a sufficient and effectuall cause of the world, (to wit, an almighty GOD) in his Antecedent; and the same GOD to be a GOD restrained in his conclusion; to make GOD free in power, and bound in will; able to effect, vnable to determine; able to make all things, and yet vnable to make choyce of the time when? For this were impiously to resolve of GOD, as of naturall necessitie; which hath neither choyce, nor will, nor vnderstanding; which cannot but worke matter being present, as fire, to burne things combustible.

Again he thus disputeth, That every Agent which can worke, and doth not worke: if it after-ward worke, it is either thereto moued by it selfe, or by some-what else; and so it passeth from power to Act. But GOD (saith he) is immouable, and is neither moued by him-selfe, nor by any other; but being alwaies the same, doth alwaies worke: Whence he concludeth, if the world were caused by GOD, that hee was for euer the cause thereof; and therefore eternall. The answer to this is very easie, For that GODS performing in due time that, which hee euer determined at length to performe, doth not argue any alteration or change, but rather constancie in him. For the same action of his will, which made the world for euer, did also with-hold the effect to the time ordained. To this answer, in it selfe sufficient, others adde further, that the patterne or Image of the World may be said to be eternall: which the Platonicks call, spiritualem mundum; and doe in this sort distinguish the Idæa and Creation in time. Spirituallis ille mundus, mundi huius exemplar, primumque Dei opus, vita æquali est Architecto; fuit semper cum illo, eritque semper. Mundus autem corporalis, quod secundum opus est Dei, decessit iam ab opifice ex parte vna, quia non fuit semper; retinet alteram, quia fit semper futurus. That representatiue, or the intentionall world (say they) the famplar of this visible world, the first worke of GOD, was æqually ancient with the Architect; for it was for euer with him, and euer shalbe. This materiall world, the second worke or creature of GOD, doth differ from the worker in this, That it was not from euerlasting, and in this it doth agree, that it shall be for euer to come.

The

The Preface.

The first point, That it was not for euer, all Christians confesse: The other they vnderstand no other-wise, than that after the consummation of this World, there shalbe a new Heauen and a new Earth, without any new creation of matter. But of these things wee need not here stand to argue: though such opinions be not vnworthy the propounding; in this consideration, of an eternall and vchangeable cause, producing a changeable and temporall effect. Touching which point Proclus the Platonist disputeth, That the compounded essence of the World (and because compounded, therefore disposable) is continued, and knit to the Diuine Being, by an individuall and inseperable power, flowing from diuine vnitie; and that the Worlds naturall appetite of GOD sheweth, that the same proceedeth from a goodnesse and vnderstanding diuine; and that this vterre, by which the World is continued and knit together, must be infinite, that it may infinitely and euerlastingly continue and preserue the same. Which infinite Vertue, the finite World (saith hee) is not capable of, but receiue it from the diuine infinite, according to the temporall Nature it hath, successiue every moment by little and little; euen as the whole Materiall World is not altogether: but the abolished parts are departed by small degrees, and the parts yet to come, doe by the same small degrees succeed; as the shadow of a tree in a Riuer, seemeth to haue continued the same a long time in the water, but it is perpetually remed, in the continuall ebbing and flowing thereof.

But to returne to them, which denying that euer the World had any beginning, withall denie that euer it shall haue any end; and to this purpose affirme, That it was neuer heard, neuer read, neuer sene, no not by any reason perceived, that the Heauens haue euer suffered corruption; or that they appeare any way the Elder by continuance; or in any sort other-wise than they were; which had they beene subiect to finall corruption, some change would haue beene discerned in so long a time: To this it is answered, That the little change as yet perceived, doth rather proue their newnesse, and that they haue not continued so long; than that they will continue for euer as they are. And if coniecturall arguments may receive answer by coniectures: it then seemeth that some alteration may be found. For either Aristotle, Plinie, Strabo, Beda, Aquinas, and others, were grossely mistaken: or else those parts of the world, lying within the burnt Zone, were not in elder times habitable, by reason of the Sunnes heat; neither were the Seas, vnder the Equinoctiall, navigable. But wee know by experience, that those Regions, so situate, are filled with people, and exceeding temperate; and the Sea, ouer which wee Navigate, passable enough. Wee read also many Histories of deluges: and how that in the time of Phaeton, diuers places in the world were burnt vp, by the Sunnes violent heat.

The Preface.

But in a Word, this obseruation is exceeding feeble. For we know it for certaine, That stone-walls, of matter molding and friable, haue stood two, or three thousand yeares: that many things haue bene digged v^p out of the earth, of that depth, as supposed to haue bene buried by the generall flood; without any alteration either of substance or figure, yea it is belieued, and it is very probable, that the gold which is daily found in Mines, and Rocks, vnder ground, was created together with the Earth.

And if bodies elementary, and compounded, the eldest times haue not invaded and corrupted: what great alteration should wee looke for in Celestiall and quintessentiall bodies? And yet wee haue reason to thinke, that the Sunne, by whose helpe all Creatures are generate, doth not in these latter Ages assist Nature, as here-to-fore. We haue neither Gyants, such as the eldest world had: nor mighty men, such as the elder world had; but all things in generall are reputed of lesse vertue, which from the Heauens receive vertue. Whence, if the nature of a Preface would permit a larger discourse, wee might easily fetch store of prooffe; as that this world shall at length haue end, as that once is had beginning.

And I see no good answer that can bee made to this objection: If the World were eternall; why not all things in the World Eternall? If there were no first, no cause, no Father, no Creator, no incomprehensible wisdom, but that every Nature had bene a-like eternall; and Man more rationall than every other Nature: Why had not the eternall reason of Man, provided for his eternall being in the World? For if all were equal: why not equal conditions to all? why should heavenly bodies live for euer; and the bodies of Men rot, and die?

Again, who was it that appointed the Earth to keepe the center, and gaue Order that it should hang in the Aire: that the Sunne should trauaile betweene the Tropicks, and neuer exceed those bounds, nor faile to performe that Progresse once in every yeare: the Moone to liue by borrowed light: the first Starres (according to common opinion) to be fastned like Naitles in a Cart-wheele; and the Planets to wander at their pleasure? Or if none of these had power ouer other: was it out of Charity and Loue, that the Sunne by his perpetuall trauaile within those two Circles, hath visited, giuen light vnto, and reioined all parts of the Earth, and the Creatures therein, by turnes and times? Out of doubt, if the Sunne haue of his owne accord kept this course in all eternitie: He may iustly be called eternall Charity, and euermouring Loue. The same may be said of all the Stars: who being all of them most large and cleare fountaines of vertue and operation, may also be called eternall vertues: the Earth may

maybe called eternall patience; the Moone, an eternall borrower and begger; and Man of all other the most miserable, eternally mortall. And what were this, but to beleue againe in the old Play of the gods? Tea in more gods by Millions, than ever Hesiodus dreamt of. But in steed of this, mad follie, wee see it well enough with our feeble and mortall eyes: and the eyes of our reason discern it better; That the Sunne, Moone, Starres, and the Earth, are limited, bounded, and constrained: themselves they haue not constrained, nor could. Omne determinatum causam habet aliquam efficientem, quæ illud determinauerit, Euery thing bounded hath some efficient cause, by which it is bounded.

Now for Nature; As by the ambiguity of this name, the schoole of Aristotle hath both commended many errors vnto vs, and sought also thereby to obscure the glory of the high Moderator of all things, shining in the Creation, and in the gouerning of the World: So if the best definition be taken out of the second of Aristotles phisicks, or primo de Cælo, or out of the fifth of his Metaphisicks; I say that the best is but nominal, and seruing onely to difference the beginning of Naturall motion, from Artificial: which yet the Academics open better, when they call it A Seminary strength, infused into matter by the Soule of the World: and giue the first place to Prouidence, the second to Fate, and but the third to Nature. Prouidentia (by which they vnderstand GOD) dux & caput; Fatum, medium ex prouidentia prodians; Natura postremum. But be it what hee will, or be it any of these (GOD excepted) or participating of all: yet that it hath choice or vnderstanding (both which are necessarily in the cause of all things) no man hath avowed. For this is vnanswerable of Laërtius, Is autem facit aliquid, qui aut voluntatem faciendi habet, aut scientiam; Hee onely can be said to be the doer of a thing, that hath either will or knowledge in the doing it.

But the will and science of Nature, are in these words truly exprest by Ficinus: Potest vbiq; Natura, vel per diuersa media, vel ex diuersis materijs, diuersa facere: sublata vero mediorum materiarumque diuersitate, vel vnicum vel similitum operatur, neque potest quando adest materia non operari; It is the power of Nature by diuersity of meanes, or out of diuersity of matter, to produce diuers things: but taking away the diuersity of meanes, and the diuersity of matter, it then workes but one or the like worke; neither can it but worke, matter being present. Now if Nature made choice of diuersity of matter, to worke all these variable workes of Heauen and Earth, it had then both vnderstanding and will; it had counsaile to beginne; reason to dispose; vertue and knowledge to finish; and power to gouerne: without which, all things had bene but one and the same: all of the matter of Heauen; or all of the matter of Earth. And if we grant Nature this will, and this vnderstanding, this counsaile, reason, and power: Cur Natura potius quam Deus nominetur? Why should wee then call such a cause rather Nature, than God? God, of whom all men haue notion, and giue the first and bighest place to Diuine power: Omnes homines notionem deorum habent, omnesq; summum locum diuino cuidam nuntini assignant. And this I say in short; that it is a true effect of true reason in man (were there no authority more binding than reason) to acknowledge and adore the first and most sublime power. Vera Philosophia, est ascensus ab his quæ fluunt, & oriuntur, & occidunt, ad ea quæ vere sunt, & semper eadem: True Philosophy, is an ascending from the things which flow, and rise, and fall, to the things that are for euer the same.

For the rest, I do also account it not the meanest, but an impiety monstrous, to confound God and Nature: be it but in tearmes. For it is God, that only disposeth of all things according to his owne will; and maketh of one Earth, Vessels of honor and dishonor. It is Nature that can dispose of nothing, but according to the will of the matter wherein it worketh. It is God, that commandeth all: It is Nature that is obedient to all. It is God that doth good vnto all, knowing and louing the good hee doth: It is Nature, that secondarily doth also good, but it neither knoweth nor loueth the good it doth. It is God, that hath all things in himselfe: Nature, nothing in it selfe. It is God, which is the Father, and hath begotten all things: It is Nature, which is begotten by all things; in which it liueth and laboureth; for by it selfe it existeth not. For shall we say, that it is out of affection to the earth, that heavenly things fall towards it? Shall wee call it Reason, which doth conduct euery Riuer into the salt Sea? Shall we tearme it knowledge in fire, that makes it to consume combustible matter? If it be Affection, Reason, and Knowledge in these by the same Affection, Reason, and Knowledge it is, that Nature worketh. And therefore seeing all things worke as they doe, (call it by forme, by Nature, or by what you please) yet because they worke by an impulsions, which they cannot resist; or by a faculty, infused by the sepreme power: we are neither to wonder at, nor to worship, the faculty that worketh, nor the Creature wherein it worketh. But herein lyes the wonder: and to him is the worship due, who hath created such a Nature in things, and such a faculty, as neither knowing it selfe, the matter wherein it worketh, nor the vertue and power which it hath; doth yet worke all things to their last and vttermoſt perfection. And therefore euery reasonable man, taking to himselfe for a ground that which is granted by all Antiquity, and by all men truly learned that euer the world had; to wit, That there is a power infinit, and eternall (which also necessary doth proue vnto vs, without the helpe of Faith; and Reason, without the force of Authoritie) all things doe as easily follow which haue bene delivered by diuine letters, as the waters of a running Riuer doe successively pursue each other from the first fountaines.

This

The Preface.

This much I say it is, that Reason it selfe hath taught vs: and this is the beginning of knowledge. Sapiencia præcedit, Religio sequitur: quia prius est Deum scire, consequens colere; Sapientia goes before, Religion follows: because it is first to know God, and then to worship him. This Sapientia Plato calleth, absoluti boni scientiam, The science of the absolute good: and another, scientiam rerum primarum, sempiternarum, perpetuarum. For Faith (saith Iſidore) is not extorted by violence, but by reason and examples perswaded: fides nequaquam vi extorquetur; sed ratione & exemplis suadetur. I confesse it, that to enquire further, as of the essence of God, of his power, of his Art, and by what meane He created the world: Or of his secret iudgement, and the causes; is not an effect of Reason: Sed cum ratione insaniant, but they grow mad with reason, that inquire after it: For as it is no shame nor dishonor (saith a French Author) de faire arrest au but qu'on nasceu surpasser, For a man to rest himselfe there, where he finds it impossible to passe on further: so whatsoeuer is beyond, and out of the reach of true reason, it acknowledgeth it to be so; as understanding it selfe not to be infinite, but according to the Name and Nature it hath, to be a Teacher, that best knows the end of his own Art. For seeing both Reason and Necessity teach vs (Reason, which is pars diuini spiritus in corpus humanū mēti) that the world was made by a power infinite; and yet how it was made, it cannot teach vs: and seeing the same Reason and Necessity make vs know, that the same infinit power is euery where in the world; and yet how euery where, it cannot informe vs: our beleefe hereof is not weakened, but greatly strengthened, by our ignorance; because it is the same Reason that tels vs, That such a Nature cannot be said to be God, that can be in all conceived by man.

I haue bene already ouer-long, to make any large discourse either of the parts of the following Story, or in mine owne excuse: especially in the excuse of this or that passage; seeing the whole is exceeding weak and defective. Among the greatest, the vsuable diuision of the bookes, I could not know how to excuse, had I not bene directed to enlarge the building after the foundation was laid, and the first part finished. All men know that there is no great Art in the diuiding euently of those things, which are subiect to number and measure. For the rest, it ſutes well enough with a great many Bookes of this age, which speake too much, and yet say little; Ipſi nobis furto subducimur, We are stolen away from our selues, setting a high price on all that is our owne. But hereof, though a late good Writer, make complaint, yet shall it not lay hold on me, because I beleene as hee doth; that who so thinkes himselfe the wisest man, is but a poore and miserable ignorant. Those that are the best men of war, against all the vanities and fooleries of the World, doe alwaies keepe the strongest guards against themselves, to defend them from themselves, from selfe loue, selfe estimation, and selfe opinion.

Generally

The Preface.

Generally concerning the order of the worke, I have onely taken counsaile from the Argument. For of the Assyrians, which after the downefall of Babel take up the first part, and were the first great Kings of the World, there came little to the view of posteritie: some few enterprises, greater in fame than faith, of Ninus and Semiramis excepted.

It was the story of the Hebrewes, of all before the Olympiads, that overcame the consuming disease of time; and preserved it selfe, from the very cradle and beginning to this day: and yet not so entire, but that the large discourses thereof (to which in many Scriptures wee are referred) are no where found. The Fragments of other Stories, with the actions of those Kings and Princes which bot up here and there in the same time, I am driven to relate by way of digression: of which we may say with Virgil.

Apparent rari nantes in gurgite vasto;
They appeare here and there floating in the great gulf of time.

To the same first Ages doe belong the reports of many Inventions therein found, and from them derived to vs; though most of the Authors Names, have perished in so long a Navigation. For those Ages had their Lawes; they had diuersity of Government; they had Kingly rule; Nobilitie, Politie in warre, Navigation; and all, or the most of needfull Trades. To speake therefore of these (seeing in a generall Historie we should have left a great deale of Nakednesse, by their omission) it cannot properly be called a digression. True it is that I have also made many others: which if they shall be layd to my charge, I must cast the fault into the great heape of humane error. For seeing wee digresse in all the wayes of our liues: yea, seeing the life of man is norbing else but digression; I may the better be excused, in writing their liues and actions. I am not altogether ignorant in the Lawes of Historie, and of the Kindes.

The same hath bene taught by many; but by no man better, and with greater breuitie, than by that excellent learned Gentleman Sir Francis Bacon. Christian Lawes are also taught vs by the Prophets and Apostles; and every day preacht vnto vs. But wee still make large digressions: yea the teachers themselves doe not (in all) keepe the path which they point out to others.

For the rest; after such time as the Persians had wrested the Empire from the Chaldeans, and had raised a great Monarchie, producing Actions of more importance then were else-where to be found: it was agreeable to the Order of Story, to attend this Empire; whilest it so florished, that the affaires of the nations adioyning had reference there-vnto. The like obseruance was to be vsed towards the fortunes of Greece, when they againe began to get ground vpon the Persians, as also towards the affaires of

Rome

The Preface.

Rome, when the Romans grew more mighty then the Greekes.

As for the Medes, the Macedonians, the Sicilians, the Carthaginians, and other Nations, who ressele the beginnings of the former Empires, and afterwards became but parts of their composition and enlargement: it seemed best to remember what was knowne of them from their seuerall beginnings, in such times and places, as they in their flourishing estates opposed those Monarchies; which in the end swallowed them up. And herein I have followed the best Geographers: who seldome giue names to those small brookes, whereof many, ioyned together, make great Rivers; till such time as they become vnited, and runne in a maine streame to the Ocean Sea. If the Phrase be weake, and the stile not euery-where like it selfe: the first, shewes their legitimation and true Parent; the second will excuse it selfe vpon the Variety of Matter. For Virgil, who wrote his Eclogues, gracili auena, vsed stronger pipes, when he sounded the warres of Aeneas. It may also be layd to my charge that I vse diuers Hebrew words in my first booke, and else-where: in which language others may thinke, and I my-selfe acknowledge it, that I am altogether ignorant: but it is true, that some of them I finde in Montanus; others in Iattaine Carester in S. Senenlis, and of the rest I have borrowed the interpretation of some of my learned friends. But say I had bene beholding to neyther, yet were it not to be wondred at, ha-ving had a eleuen yeares leasure, to attaine the knowledge of that, or of any other tongue; How-soeuer, I know that it will be said by many, I hat I might haue bene more pleasing to the Reader, if I had written the Story of mine owne times; hauing bene permitted to draw water as neare the Well-head as another. To this I answere, that who-so-euer in writing a moderne History, shall follow truth too neare the beeles, it may happily strike out his teeth. There is no Mistresse or Guide, that hath led her followers and ser- uants into greater miseries. Hee that goes after her too farre off, losseth her sight, and losseth him-selfe: and hee that walkes after her at a middle di- stance; I know not whether I should call that kinde of course Temper or Base- nesse. It is true, that I neuer trauailed after mens opinions, when I might haue made the best vse of them: and I haue now too few dayes remaining, to imitate those, that cyther out of extreame ambition, or extreame cowardise, or both, do yet (when death hath them on his shoulders) flatter the world, be- tweene the bed and the graue. It is enough for me (being in that state I am) to write of the eldest times: wherein also why may it not be said, that in speaking of the past, I point at the present, and take the vices of those that are yet li- uing, in their persons that are long since dead; and haue it laid to my charge? But this I cannot helpe, though innocent. And certainly if there be any, that finding themselves spotted like the Tigers of old time, shall finde fault with me for painting them ouer a new; they shall therein accuse themselves iustly, and me falsely.

The Preface.

For I protest before the Maieſty of GOD, That I malice no man vnder the Sunne. Impossible I know it is to please all: seeing few or none are so pleased with themselves, or so assured of themselves, by reason of their subjection to their private passions; but that they seeme diuers persons in one and the same day. Seneca hath said it, and so doe I: Vnus mihi propulo erat: and to the same effect Epicurus, Hoc ego non multis fed tibi; or (as it hath since lamentably fallen out) I may borrow the resolution of an ancient Philosopher, Satis est vnus, Satis est nullus. For it was for the seruice of that inestimable Prince Henry, the successe hope, and one of the greatest of the Christian World, that I undertooke this Worke. It pleased him to peruse some part thereof, and to pardon what was amisse. It is now left to the world without a Maister: from which all that is presented, hath received both blowes and thanks. Eadem probamus, eadem reprehendimus: hic exitus est omnis iudicii, in quo lis secundum plures datur. But these discourses are idle. I know that as the charitable will iudge charitably: so against those, qui gloriantur in malitia, my present aduersity hath disarmed me. I am on the ground already; and therefore haue not farre to fall: and for rising againe, as in the Naturall priuation there is no recession to habit; so it is seldome seene in the priuation politique. I doe therefore for-beare to stile my Readers Gentle, Courteous, and Friendly, thereby to beg their good opinions, or to promise a second and third volume (which I also intend) if the first receiue grace and good acceptance. For that which is already done, may be thought enough; and too much: and it is certaine, let vs claw the Reader with neuer so many courteous phrases; yet shall wee ever more be thought fooles, that write foolishly. For conclusion; all the hope I haue lies in this, That I haue already found more vngentle and vncourteous Readers of my Lowe towards them, and well-deseruing of them, than euer I shall doe againe. For had it bene otherwise, I should hardly haue had this leisure, to haue made my selfe a foole in print.

THE CONTENTS OF THE CHAPTERS, PARAGRAPHES,

AND SECTIONS, OF THE FIRST BOOKE OF THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORIE OF
THE WORLD.

CHAPTER I.

Of the Creation, and Preseruation of the World.

¶ I. That the invisible God is scene in his Creatures.

¶ II. That the wisest of the Heavens, whose authoritie is not to bee despised, haue acknowledged the World to haue bene created by God.

¶ III. Of the meaning of In principio, Gen. 1.1.

¶ IIII. Of the meaning of the words [Heauen and Earth.] Gen. 1.1.

¶ V. That the substance of the waters, as mixt in the bodie of the Earth, is by Moyses vnderstood in the Word [Earth:] and that the Earth, by the Attributes of Informed and Void, is described as the Chaos of the ancient Heathen.

¶ VI. How it is to bee vnderstood, that the Spirit of God moued vpon the waters: and that this is not to be searched curiously.

¶ VII. Of the Light created, as the material substance of the Sunne: and of the nature of it, and difficultie of knowledge of it: and of the excellencie and vse of it: and of motion, and heat annexed vnto it.

¶ VIII. Of the Firmament, and of the waters aboue the Firmament: and whether there bee any Crustalline Heauen, or any Primum Mobile.

¶ IX. A conclusion, repeating the summe of the workes in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The creation of matter; The forming of it; The finishing of it.

¶ X. That Nature is no Principium per se; nor Forme, the giuer of being: and of our ignorance, how second causes should haue any proportion with their effects.

¶ XI. Of Fate, and that the Stars haue great influence: and that their operations may diuersly be preuented or furthered.

¶ XII. Of Prescience.

¶ XIII. Of Providence.

¶ XIIIII. Of Predetermination.

¶ XV. Of Fortune: and of the reason of some things that seeme to bee by Fortune, and against Reason and Providence.

CHAP.

The Contents

CHAP. II.

Of Mans estate in his first Creation; and of Gods rest.

¶ I.
OF the Image of God according to which Man was first created.

¶ II.
Of the intellectual minde of Man, in which there is much of the Image of God: and that this Image is much deformed by sinne.

¶ III.
Of our base and fraile bodies: and that the care thereof should yeeld to the immortal Soule.

¶ IIII.
Of the Spirit of life which God breathed into Man in his Creation.

¶ V.
That Man is (as it were) a little world: with a digression touching our mortalitie.

¶ VI.
Of the free power, which Man had in his first Creation to dispose of himselfe.

¶ VII.
Of Gods ceasing to create any more: and of the cause thereof, because the uniuersall created was exceeding good.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradise.

¶ I.
That the seat of Paradise is greatly mistaken: and that it is no maruile that men should erre.

¶ II.
A recitall of strange opinions touching Paradise.

¶ III.
That there was a true locall Paradise, Eastward, in the Countrie of Eden.

¶ IIII.
Why it should bee needfull to intreat diligently of the place of Paradise.

¶ V.
That the Flood hath not utterly defaced the markes of Paradise, nor caused Hills in the Earth.

¶ VI.
That Paradise was not the whole Earth, as some haue thought, making the Ocean to bee the fountaine of those foure Riuer.

¶ VII.
Of their opinion which make Paradise as high as the Moone: and of others which make it higher then the middle Region of the Ayre.

¶ VIII.
Of their opinion that seat Paradise under the Equinoctiall: and of the pleasant habitation under those Climates.

Of the change of the names of places: and that besides that Eden in Coelestria, there is a Countrie in Babylon, once of this name, as is proued out of Esay 37. and Ezech. 27.

¶ X.
Of diuers other testimonies of the Land of Eden: and that this is the Eden of Paradise.

¶ XI.
Of the difficultie in the Text, which seemeth to make the foure Riuer to rise from one streame.

¶ XII.
Of the strange fertilitie and happinesse of the Babylonian Soyle, as it is certaine that Eden was such.

¶ XIII.
Of the Riuier Pison, and the Land of Hailah.

¶ XIIIII.
Of the Riuier Gehon, and the Land of Cush: and of the ill translating of Ethiopia for Cush. 2. Chron. 21. 16.

¶ XV.
A conclusion, by way of repetition of some things spoken of before.

of the first Booke.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the two chiefe Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

¶ I.
That the Tree of Life was a materiall Tree: and in what sense it is to be taken, that Man by his eating the forbidden fruit, is made subiect to death.

¶ II.
Of Becanus his opinion, that the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica.

¶ III.
Of Becanus his not unwitty allegorizing of the storie of his Ficus Indica.

¶ IIII.
Of the name of the Tree of Knowledge of good and euill: with some other notes touching the storie of Adams sinne.

CHAP. V.

Of diuers memorable things betweene the fall of Adam, and the Flood of Noah.

¶ I.
OF the cause, and the reuenge of Cains sinne: and of his going out from God.

¶ II.
Of Cains dwelling in the Land of Nod: and of his Citie Enoch.

¶ III.
Of Moses his omitting sundry things concerning Cains Generation.

¶ IIII.
Of the diuersities in the Ages of the Patriarchs, when they begat their children.

¶ V.
Of the long lues of the Patriarchs: and some of late memorie.

¶ VI.
Of the Patriarchs deliuering their knowledge by Tradition: and that Enoch writ before the Flood.

¶ VII.
Of the men of renouue before the Flood.

¶ VIII.
That the Giants, by Moses so called, were indeed men of huge bodies: as also diuers in later times.

CHAP. VI.

Of Idolatrous corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanishing in the World: and of the Reliques of Truth touching these ancient times, obscurely appearing in Fables and old Legendes.

¶ I.
That in olde corruptions wee may find some signes of more ancient truth.

¶ II.
That the corruptions themselves were very ancient: as in the Family of Noah, and in the old Egyptians.

¶ III.
That in proceesse of time these lesser errors drew on greater, as appeareth in the grosse Superstitions of the Egyptians.

¶ IIII.
That from the Reliques of ancient Records among the Egyptians and others, the first Idols and Fables were inuented: and that the first Iupiter was Cain; Vulcan, Tubalcain, &c.

¶ V.
Of the three chiefe Iupiters; and the strange storie of the third.

The Contents

§. VI.
Of Cham, and other wicked ones, whereof some gat, some affected the name of Gods.

§. VII.
That the wiser of the ancient Heathen had farre better opinions of God.

§. VIII.
That Heathenisme and Iudaisme, after many wounds, were at length about the same time vnder Iulian miraculously confounded.

Of the last refuges of the Devil to maintaine his Kingdom.

CHAP. VII. Of Noahs Floud.

§. I.
OF Gods fore-warning: and some humane testimonies: and some doubting touching the truth of Noahs Floud.

§. II.
Of the floud in the time of Ogyges: and that this was not Noahs Floud.

§. III.
Of Deucalions floud: and that this was not Noahs Floud: nor the Vmbri in Italie areminant of any vniuersall floud.

§. IIII.
Of some other Records testifying the vni-uersall floud: and of two ancient Deluges in Egypt: and of some elsewhere.

§. V.
That the Floud of Noah was supernaturall, though some say it might haue beene foreseene by the Starres.

§. VI.
That there was no need of any new Creation of matter to make the vniuersall Floud:
and what are Cataracte Coeli, Gen. 7. v. 11.

§. VII.
Of some remainder of the memorie of Noah among the Heathen.

§. VIII.
Of sundrie particulars touching the Arke:
as the place where it was made; the matter;
fashion; and name.

That the Arke was of sufficient capacitie.

§. X.
That the Arke rested vpon part of the Hill Taurus (or Caucasus) betwene the East Indies and Scythia.

A Preterition of some questions lesse materiall: with a note of the use of this question, to find out the Metropolis of nations.

§. II.
A proposall of the common opinion, that the Arke rested vpon some of the Hills of Armenia.

§. III.
The first Argument against the common opinio. They that came to build Babel, would haue come sooner, had they come from so neere a place as Armenia.

§. IIII.
The second Argument; That the Easterne people were more ancient in populositie, and in all humane glorie.

§. V.
The third Argument; From the wonder-full resistance which Semiramis found in the East-Indies.

§. VI.
The fourth Argument; From diuers considerations in the person of Noah.

§. VII.
Of the senselesse opinion of Annius the Commenter vpon Berosus, that the Arke rested vpon Montes Caspij in Armenia; and yet vpon Gordiaei, which are three hundred miles distant also in Armenia, and yet in Scythia.

§. VIII.
The fift Argument; The Vine must grow naturally neere the place where the Arke rested.

Answer to an obiection out of the words of the Text, The Lord scattered them from thence vpon the face of the whole Earth.

§. X.
An answer to the obiection from the name of Ararat, taken for Armenia: and the height of the Hills there.

§. XI.
Of Caucasus, and diuers farre higher Hills than the Armenian.

§. XII.
Of diuers incongruities, if in this Story
we should take Ararat for Armenia.

§. XIII.

of the first Booke.

§. XIII.
Of the contrarie situation of Armenia to the place noted in the Text: and that it is not miswrite, that the same ledge of Hills running from Armenia to India, should keep the same name all along, and euen in India, be called Ararat.

§. XIIIII.
Of the best Vine naturally growing on the South-side of the Mountaines Caucasi, and toward the East Indies: and of other excellencies of the soyle. §. XV.
The conclusion, with a briefe repeating of diuers chiefe points.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the first planting of Nations after the Floud: and of the Sonnes of Noah; Sem, Ham, and Iaphet, by whom the Earth was reseeded.

§. I.
Whether Shem and Ham were elder then Iaphet.

§. II.
Of diuers things that in all reason are to bee presumed, touching the first planting of the world, as that all Histories must yeeld to Moses: that the world was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and that the knowne great Lords of the first Ages, were of the issue of Ham.

§. III.
Of the Isles of the Gentils in Iaphets portion: of Berosus his too free placing Gomer the sonne of Iaphet in Italie; and another of Iaphets sonnes Tubal in Spaine: and of the antiquitie of longuague Navigation.

§. IIII.
Of Gog and Magog, Tubal, and Mesech, seated first about Asia the lesse, out of Ezechiel, Chap. 38. 39.

§. V.
Against the fabulose Berosus his Fiction,
That the Italian Ianus was Noah.

§. VI.
That Gomer also and his Sonne Togorma, of the Posteritie of Iaphet, were first seated about Asia the lesse: and that from thence they spread Westward into Europe;
and Northward into Sarmatia.

§. VII.
Of Iauan the fourth sonne of Iaphet; and of Melch, of Aram, of Methech of Iaphet.

§. VIII.
Of Afcanex and Riphath, the two elder sonnes of Gomer.

Of the foure sonnes of Iauan: and of the doubte signification of Tharhis, either for a proper name, or for the Sea.

§. X.
That the seat of Chush, the eldest sonne of Ham, was in Arabia, not in Ethiopia: and of strange Fables, and all translations of Scripture, grounded vpon the mistaking of this point.

§. I.
Of Iosephus his Tale of an Ethiopesse; wife to Moles, grounded on the mista-king of the seat of Chush.

§. II.
A dispute against the Tale of Iosephus.

§. III.
Chush is confounded for Ethiopia. Ezech. 29. 10.

§. IIII.
Another place of Ezechiel, chap. 30. v. 9.
in like manner mistaken.

§. V.
A place, Esay 48. v. 1 in like manner corrupted by taking Chush for Ethiopia.

§. VI.
That vpon the like mistaking, both Torhaka in the Story of Senacherib, and Zora in the Story of Ag, are mistakenly made Ethiopians.

§. VII.
A farther exposition of the place, Esay 48. 1.

§. XI.
Of the Plantation and Antiquities of Agypt.

The Contents

† I.
That Mizraim the chiefe Planter of Egypt, and the rest of the sonnes of Ham, were seated in order one by another.

† II.
Of the time, about which the name of Egypt began to be knowne: and of the Egyptians Lunarie yeeres, which made their Antiquities seeme the more fabulous.

† III.
Of certaine vaine assertions of the Antiquitie of the Egyptians.

† IIII.
Against Pererius; That it is not unlikely, but that Egypt was peopled within two hundred yeeres after the Creation; at least that both it, and the most parts of the world, were peopled before the Flood.

† V.
Of some other reasons against the opinion of Pererius.

† VI.
Of the words of Moses, Genes. 10. v. lti. whereupon Pererius grounded his opinion.

† VII.
A conclusion, resolving of that which is most likely, touching the Egyptian Antiquities: with some list of Phut, another sonne of Ham, which peopled Lybia.

† XII.
Of the eleuen sonnes of Canaan, the fourth sonne of Ham.

† I.
Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan; with the names of his eleuen sonnes.

† II.
Of the portions of Zidon and Heth.

Part of the Historie of the

CHAPTER I.

Of the Time of the birth of Abraham : and of the use of this question, for the ordering of the storie of the Assyrian Empire.

Of some of the successors of Semiramis : with a briefe transition to the question, about the Time of the birth of Abraham.

A proposall of reasons or arguments, that are brought to prove Abraham was borne in the yeere 292. after the Flood, and not in the yeere 352.

The answer to one of the objections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one journey out of Mesopotamia into Canaan; and it, after his Fathers death.

The answer to another of the objections proposed, shewing that it was not unlikely, that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirtieth yeere.

The answer to two more of the objections, shewing that we may have certaintie of Abrahams age from the Scripture, though we make not Abraham the eldest sonne : and that there was great cause, why in the storie of Abraham his two brethren should be referred.

That the naming of Abraham first of the three Brethren, Gen. II. v. 26 doth not prove that hee was the eldest : together with diuers reasons, proving that Abraham was not the eldest sonne of Terah.

A conclusion of this dispute, noting the Authors on both sides : with an admonition, that they which shorten the times, make all ancient stories the more improbable.

Of the time of the birth of Abraham : and of the use of this question, for the ordering of the storie of the Assyrian Empire.

of the second Booke.

Of VIII.

A computation of the times of the Assyrians and others, grounded upon the times noted in the storie of Abraham.

Of IX.

That Amraphel, one of the foure Kings whom Abraham overthrew, Gen. 14. may probably be thought to have bene Ninias the sonne of Ninus.

Of X.

Of Arioch, another of the foure Kings : and that Ellas, whereof hee is said to have bene King, lyes betwene Coelesyria, and Arabia Petrea.

Of XI.

Of Tidal, another of the foure Kings.

Of XII.

That Chedorlaomer, the chiefe of the foure Kings, was not of Assyria, but of Persia : and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impayed.

Of XIII.

That it is not improbable, that the foure Kings had no Dominion in the Countries named, but that they had elsewhere with their Colonies planted themselves, and so retained the names of the Countries whence they came : which if it be so, we neede not to say that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble our selves with many other difficulties.

CHAP. II.

Of the Kings of Egypt from the first peopling of it after the Flood, to the time of the deliury of the Israelites from thence.

A briefe of the Names and Times of the first Kings of Egypt : with a note of the causes of difficultie in resolving of the truth in these points.

That by the account of the Egyptian Dynasties, & otherwise, it appears that Chams reign in Egypt began in the yeere after the Flood 191.

That these Dynasties were not diuers families of Kings, but rather successions of Regents, oft-times many under one King.

Of Cham, and his sonne Mizraim, or Ofliris.

Of the time when Ofliris reigne ended : and that Jacob came into Egypt in the time of Orus, the sonne of Ofliris.

Of Typhon, Hercules Ægyptius, Orus, and the two Scelotres, successively reigning after Mizraim : and of diuers errors about the former Scelotres.

Of Busris, the first Oppressor of the Israelites : and of his successor Queene Thermutis, that took up Moyses out of the Water.

Of the two brethren of Queene Thermutis : and what King it was, under whom Moyses was borne : and who it was that persecuted in the Red Sea.

CHAP. III.

Of the deliury of Israel out of Egypt.

Of the time of Moyses birth : and how long the Israelites were oppressed in Egypt.

Of diuers Cities and Places in Egypt, mentioned in this storie or elsewhere in the Scripture.

Of the time of the birth of Abraham : and of the use of this question, for the ordering of the storie of the Assyrian Empire.

§. X.
A proposall of nine other points to be considered; with a touch of the five first.

§. XI.
Of the sixt point, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the Old and New Testament.

§. XII.
Of the rest of the points proposed.

§. XIII.
Of the seuerall Commandements of the Decalogue: and that the difficultie is not in respect of the Commandements, but by our defaults.

§. XIIIII.
If there were not any Religion, nor Iudgement to come, yet the Decalogue were most necessarie to be obserued.

§. XV.
Of humane Law, written and vnrwritten.

§. XVI.
That only the Prince is exempt from humane Lawes, and in what sort.

That the invisible God is seene in his Creatures.

40 O D, whom the wisest men acknowledge to bee a Power vnesseable, and Vertue infinite, a Light by abundant claritie invisible, an Vnderstanding, which it selfe can onely comprehend, an Essence eternall and spirituall, of absolute purenesse and simplicitie, was, and is pleased to make himselfe knowne by the worke of the World: in the wonderfull magnitude whereof, (all which hee imbraceth, filleth, and sustainerh) wee behold the Image of that glorie, which cannot be measured, and withall that one, and yet vniuersall Nature, which cannot bee defined. In the glorious Lights of Heaven; wee perceiue a shadow of his diuine Countenance; in his mercifull prouision for all that liue, his manifold goodnesse: and lastly, in creating and making existent the world vniuersall, by the absolute art of his owne word, 50 his Power and almightinesse, which Power, Light, Vertue, Wisdome, and Good-

Of the meaning of the words Heauen and Earth.

Genesis 2. 1.

THe vniuersall matter of the world (which Moses comprehendeth vnder the names of Heauen and Earth) is by diuers diuerly vnderstood: for there are that conceiue, that by those wordes, was meant the first matter, as the Peripatetikes vnderstand it, to which, S. Augustine and Istodorus seeme to adhere. Fecisti mundum (saith S. Augustine) de materia informi, quam fecisti de nullare, pend nullam rem: (that is) Tbou hast made the world of a matter without forme; which matter thou madest of nothing, and being made, it was little other then nothing.

But this potentiall and imaginary materia prima, cannot exist without forme. Peter Lombard, the Schoole-men, Beda, Lytanus, Comestor, Tostatus and others, affirme, that it pleased God first of all to create the Emphyrean Heauen: which at the succeeding instant (saith Beda and Strabo) hee filled with Angels. This Emphyrean Heauen Steuchius Euegubinus calleth Diuine claritie, and vncreated: an error, for which hee is sharply charged by Pererius, though (as I conceiue) he rather failed in the sublequent, when he made it to be a place, and the seat of Angels, & iust Soules, then in the former affirmation: for of the first, That God liueth in eternall light, it is written; My soule, praise thou the Lord, that covereth himselfe with light: and in the Reuelation; And the Citie hath no neede of Sunne, neither of the Moone to shine in it: for the glory of God did light it. And herein also John Mercer vpon Genesis differeth not in opinion from Euegubinus: for as by Heauen created in the beginning, was not meant the inuisible or supercelestiall, so in his iudgement, because it was in all eternitie, the glorious seat of God himselfe, it was not necessary to be created; Quem mundum supercelestem meo iudicio creari (saith MERCER) non erat necesse.

But as Moses forbore to speake of Angels, and of things inuisible, and incorporate, for the weakenes of their capacities, whom he then cared to informe of those things, which were more manifest, (so wit) that God did not only by a strong hand deliuer them from the bondage of Egypt, according to his promise made to their forefathers: but also that he created, and was the sole cause of this aspeetable, and perceiueable Vniuersall; so on the other side I dare not thinke, that any supercelestiall Heauen, or whatsoever else (not himselfe) was increate and eternall: and as for the place of God before the world created, the finite wisdom of mortall men hath no perception of it, neither can it limit the seat of infinite power, no more then infinite power it selfe can be limited: for his place is in himselfe, whom no magnitude else can containe: How great is the House of God (saith BARUCH) how large is the place of his possessions! it is as great, and hath no end, it is high and vnmesurable.

But leauing multiplicitie of opinion, it is more probable and allowed, that by the wordes, Heauen and Earth, was meant the solid matter and substance, as well of all the Heauens, and Orbes supernall, as of the Globe of the Earth and Waters, which cohered it ouer; (so wit) that very matter of all things; materia, Chaos, possibilis, sue posse fieri: Which matter (saith Caluin) was so called; quod totius mundi semen fuerit: Because it was the seed of the Vniuersall: an opinion of ancient Philosphers long before.

That the substance of the waters, as mixt in the body of the earth, is by Moses vnderstood in the word Earth: and that the Earth, by the attributes of vnformed and void, is described, as the Chaos of the ancient Heathens.

M*OSES* first nameth Heauen and Earth (putting waters but in the third place) as comprehending waters in the word Earth, but afterwards hee nameth them apart, when God by his Spirit began to distinguish the confused Masse, and (as Basil saith) preparare naturam aque ad fructum vitam; to prepare the nature of water to a vitall fruitfulness.

For vnder the word Heauen, was the matter of all heavenly bodies, and nature expressed: and by the name of Earth and Waters, all was meant, whatsoever is vnder the Moone, and subiect to alteration. Corrupt feedes bring forth corrupt plants; to which the pure heauens are not subiect, though subiect to perishing. They shall perish (saith David) and the heauens shall vanish away like smoke, saith Esay. Neither were the waters the matter of Earth: for it is written, Let the waters vnder the heauens be gathered into one place, and let the dry land appeare: which prooueth that the dry land was mixt and couered with the waters, and not yet distinguished; but no way, that the waters were the matter or feede of the Earth, much lesse of the Vniuersall. In illo die Domine terram fundasti, Thou, O Lord, in the beginning hast founded the Earth: and againe, The Earth was couered with the Deepe (meaning with waters) as with a garment, saith David. And if by naturall arguments it may be prooued, that water by condensation may become earth, the same reason teacheth vs also, that earth rarified may become water: water, aire, fire; and so on the contrary, Deus ignis substantiam per aerem in aquam conuertit, God turneth the substance of fire, by aire, into water. For the Heauens and the Earth remained in the same state, in which they were created, as touching their substance, though there was afterwards added multiplicitie of perfection, in respect of beuty and ornament. Celum vero & terra in statu creationis remanserunt, quantum ad substantiam, licet multiplex perfectio decoris & ornatus eis postmodum superaddita est. And the word which the Hebrewes call Maim, is not to be vnderstood according to the Latine translation simply, and as specificall water; but the same more properly signifieth liquor. For (according to Montanus) Est autem Maim liquor geminus, & hoc nomen propter verborum penuriam, Latina lingua plurali numero aquas fecit. For Maim (saith he) is a double liquor, (that is, of diuers natures) and this name or word the Latines wanting a voice to expresse it, call it in the Plural, Aguas, Waters.

This Masse, or indigested matter, or Chaos created in the beginning, was without forme, that is, without the proper forme, which it afterwards acquired, when the Spirit of God had separated the Earth, and digested it from the waters: And the earth was void: that is, not producing any creatures, or adorned with any plants, fruites, or flowers. But after the Spirit of God had moued vpon the waters, and wrought this indigested matter into that forme, which it now retaineth, then did the earth budge forth the herbe, which seedeth seeds, and the fruitfull tree according to his kinde, and God saw that it was good; which attribute was not giuen to the Earth, while it was confused, nor to the Heauens, before they had motion, and adornment. God saw that it was good: that is, made perfect: for perfection is that, to which nothing is wanting. Et 50 perfecti Dei perfecti sunt opera, the workes of the perfect God, are perfect.

From this lump of imperfect matter had the ancient Poets their inuention of Demogorgon: HESIODVS and ANAXAGORAS the knowledge of that Chaos, of which Onid:

§. VI.

How it is to be understood that the Spirit of God moued upon the waters, and that this is not to be searched curiously.

After the creation of Heauen and Earth, then voide and without forme, the Spirit of God moued vpon the waters. The Seuenty Interpreters vse the word super-ferebat, moued vpon or ouer: incubabat, or fovebat (saith Hierome) out of Basil; and Basil out of a Syrian Doctor; Equidem non in tam tibi, sed viri cuiusdam Syri sententiam recenseo (saith Basil) which wordes incubare or seuer importing warmth, hatching, or quickning, haue a speciall likenesse. Verbum translatum est ab anibus pulitici sui incubantibus, quæmuis spiri-tuali, & planè inenarrabili, non autem corporali modo; The word is taken of birds hatching their yong, not corporally, but in a spiritual and vnexpressible manner.

Some of the Hebrewes conuert it to this effect, Spiritus Dei volitabat, The Spirit of God did flatter: the Chaldaean Paraphrast in this sense, uentus à conspectu Dei sufflatus, or as other vnderstand the Chaldaean, flabat, pellebat, remouebat: the wind from the face of God did blow vnder, drine, or remoue, or did blow vpon, according to the 147. Psalme.
He caused his winde to blow, and the waters increase: but there was yet no winde nor exhalation: Arias Montanus in these wordes, Et spiritus Elohim Aeracebat, id est, efficaciter motuans, confouens, ac agitans super facies gemini liquoris; The Spirit of God effectually and often mouing, keeping warme, and cherishing, quickning and stirring vpon the face of this double liquor. For he maketh foure originals, whereof three are agents, and the last passive and materiall, to wit, causa, which is the diuine goodnesse: lecti, which is, fiat, sine erit, let it be, or it shall be. Qua vox verbo Dei prima prolata fuit:
which voice (saith he) was the first that was uttered by the word of God. The third Spiritus Elohim, the Spirit of God, id est, vis quædam diuina, agilis ac præsens per omnia pertingens, omnia compens, that is, a certaine diuine power, or strength euery where, al-lue and extending, and stretching through all, filling and finishing all things. The fourth he calleth Materia, id est, materia ad omnem rem consensendam habilis; matter apt to become euery thing. For my selfe I am resolu'd (Cum Deus sit supernaturale omni ratione, Seeing God is in all reason above reason) that although the effects which follow his won-derfull wayes of working, may in a measure be perceived by mans vnderstanding, yet the manner and first operation of his diuine power cannot be conceiued by any minde, or spirit, compassed with a mortall body. Animalis homo qua Dei sunt non percipit: For my thoughts (saith the Lord in Esa) are not your thoughts, neither are your wayes my wayes. And as the world hath not knowne God himselfe: so are his wayes (according to S. Paul) past finding out. Orighen says, the world hath not knowne thee, saith CHRIST. And therefore, whether that motion, vitality and operation, were by incubation or how else, the manner is onely knowne to God, Quomodo in omnibus sit rebus vel per essentiam, vel per potentiam, intellectus noster non capit; For how God (saith S. Augustine, speaking of his Vbiuicque) is in all things, either by essence, presence, or power, our vnderstanding cannot comprehend. Nihil inter Deum hominem distaret: si consilia, & dispositiones illius materiam æternæ, cogitatio assequeretur humana: There would be no difference betwene God and Man, if mans vnderstanding could conceiue the counsels

counsels and disposing of that eternall Maiestie; and therefore to be ouer-curious in fear-ching how the all-powerfull Word of God wrought in the creation of the World or his all-piercing and operative Spirit distinguishing, gave forme to the matter of the Vniuersall, is a labour and search like vnto his, who not contented with a knowne and late foord, will presume to passe ouer the greatest Riuier in all parts, where he is ignorant of their depths: for so doth the one lose his life, and the other his vnder-standing. We behold the Sunne, and enioy his light, as long as we looke towards it, buttenderly, and circumspectly: we warme our selues safely, while we stand neere the fire; but if we seeke to outface the one, to enter into the other, we forth with become blinde or burnt.

But to eschew curiositie: this is true, that the English word (moued) is most proper and significant: for of motion proceedeth all production, and all whatfoeuer is effected. And this omnipotent Spirit of God, which may indeede be truly called, Principium motus, and with Miracula, vis causæ efficientis, The force of the efficient cause, Saint Augustine sometimes taketh for the holy Ghost; sometime for a winde or breath, Sub nomine Spiritus, vnder the name of a Spirit, which is sometimes so taken:
or for virtualis creatura, for a created virtuality: Terullian and Theodoret call it also a breath or winde: Mercurius nameth it, Spiritum tenuem intelligibilem, a pure or thine intelligible spirit: ANAXAGORAS, mentem: TOSTATVS, voluntatem or mentem 20 Dei, The will and minde of God; which mens, Plato in Timæo, maketh animam mundi,
The soule of the world: and in his first Booke de Republica, he calleth it the law of Heauen; in his Epistles, the leader of things to come, and the presence of things past. But as Cy-prius wrote of the Incarnation of CHRIST our Sauour, Mens deficit, vox silet, & non mentantur, sed etiam Angelorum: My minde faileth, my voice is silent, and not mine onely, but euen the voer of Angels: so may all men else lay in the vnderstanding, and viterance of the wayes and workes of the Creation; for to him (saith Nazianzenus) there is not one substance by which he is, and another, by which he can, Sed consubstantiale illi est, quicquid eius est, & quicquid est, whatsoeuer attribute of him there is, and whatsoeuer he is, it is the very same substance that himselfe is.

30 But the Spirit of God which moued vpon the waters, cannot be taken for a breath or winde, nor for any other creature, separate from the infinite actiue power of God, which then formed and distinguished, and which now sustainerth, and giueth continuance to the Vniuersall. For the Spirit of the Lord filleth all the world; and the same is it which maintaineth all things, saith SALOMON. If thou send forth thy Spirit, (saith DAVID) they are created: And GREGORIE, Deus (sua præsentia) esse, et omnibus rebus esse, ita quod, si se rebus subtraheret, sicut de nihilo facta sunt omnia, sic in nihi-lum defluerent vniuersa; God giueth being to all things, by being present with all things, so as if he should withdraw himselfe from them, then, as of nothing the world was made, it would againe fall away and vanish into nothing. And this working of Gods Spirit in all 40 things, Virgil hath exprest excellently:

*Principio calum acterræ, camposq; liquentes, Lucentemq; globum Luna, Titanique, æthera, Spiritus intus alit: totamq; insula per artem,
Mens agitat molem, & magno se corpore miscet.*

The Heauen, the Earth, and all the liquid Mayne,
The Moones bright Globe, and Starres Titanian,
A Spirit within maintaines: and their whole Masse,
A Minde, which through each part infused doth passe, Fashiones, and workes, and wholly doth transpierce
All this great Body of the Vniuerse.

And this was the same Spirit, which moued in the Vniuersall, and thereby both distinguished and adorned it. His Spirit hath garnished the Heauens, saith Iob. So Heavens, the Earth, the Waters, all confuted, and afterward, the Waters congregated, the Earth made dry land, and the Heavens distinguished from both, and beautified. And therefore the Earth, as it was earth, before it was vncouered, and before it was called Aride, or dry land; and the Waters were waters, before they were congregated, and called the Sea, though neither of them perfect, or enriched with their vertuall formes: so the Sunne, although it had not his formall perfection, his circle, beauty, and bounded magnitude till the fourth day, yet was the substance thereof in the first day (vnder the name of Light) created; and this Light formerly dispersed, was in the same fourth day vnted, and set in the Firmament of Heauen: for to Light created in the first day, God gaue no proper place or fixation; and therefore the effects named by Anticipation, (which was to separate day from night) were precisely performed, after this Light was congregated, and had obtained life and motion. Neither did the wisdom of God finde cause why it should moue (by which motion, dayes and nights are distinguished) till then: because there was not yet any Creature produced, to which, by mouing, the Sunne might giue light, heat, and operation.

But after the Earth (distinguished from waters) began to budde forth the budde of the herbe, &c. God caused the Sunne to moue, and (by interchange of time) to visite euery part of the inferior world; by his heat to stirre vp the fire of generation, and to giue aduinity to the feedes of all natures: For, as a King, which commandeth some goodly building to be erected, doth accommodate the same to that vse and end, to which it was ordained; so it pleased God (saith Procopius) to command the Light to be; which by his all-powerfull word he approoued, and approving it, disposed thereof, to the vse and comfort of his future Creatures.

But in that it pleased God to aske of Iob, By what way is the light parted, and where is the way where light dwelleth? wee thereby know that the nature thereof falleth not vnder mans vnderstanding; and therefore let it suffice, that by Gods grace we enjoy the effects thereof. For this light is of the treasure of God (saith ESDRAS). And those which inhabit the Heavens, we only know the essence thereof. Nihil ignotum in celo, nihil notum in terra: Nothing unknowne in Heauen, nothing perfectly knowne on earth. Res vera sunt in mundo inuisibilibus, in mundo visibilibus vmbra rerum: Things themselves are in the inuisible world, in the world visible, but their shadowes. Surely, if this light be not spirituall, yet it approacheth neerer vnto spirituality; and if it haue any corporality, then of all other the most subtile and pure; for howsoeuer, it is of all things scene, the most beautifull, and of the swiftest motion, of all other the most necessary and beneficiall. For it ministrereth to men, and other creatures, all celestiall influences; it dissipeth those sad thoughts and sorrowes, which the darknesse both begetteth and maintaineth; it discovereth vnto vs the glorious workes of God, and carrieth vp with an Angelicall swiftnesse, our eyes vnto Heauen, that by the sight thereof, our mindes being informed of his visible maruailes, may continually trauaile to surmount these percelued Heavens, and to finde out their omnipotent cause and Creatour. Cognitio non quiescit in rebus creatis: Our knowledge doth not quiet it selfe in things created. Et ipsa lux facit, ut cetera mundi membra digna sint laudibus, cum suam bonitatem & decorem omnibus communicet: It is the light, (saith S. AMBROSE) that maketh the other part of the world so worthy of praise, seeing that it selfe communicateth its goodness and beauty vnto all: of which Ouid out of Orpheus:

*Ille ego sum, qui longum metior annum,
Omnis qui video, per quem videt omnia mundus, Mundus oculis.*

The world discernes it selfe, while I the world behold,
By me the longest yeeres, and other times are told,
I the worlds eye.

Lastly,

Lastly, if we may behold in any creature, any one sparke of that eternall fire, or any farre-off dawning of Gods glorious brightnesse, the same in the beauty, motion, and vertue of this light may be perceived. Therefore was God called lux ipsa, and the light, by Hermes named lux sancta, and Christ our Sauour laid to bee that Light, which lighteneth euery man that cometh into the world. Yet in respect of Gods incomprehensible sublimitie, and puritie, this is also true, that God is neither a minde, nor a Spirit of the nature of other Spirits; nor a light, such as can be discerned. Deus profecto non mens est, at uerò ut sit mens causa est, nec spiritus, sed causa qua spiritus extat, nec lumen, sed causa qua lumen existit. God (saith HARNES in PCEMANDRO) certainly is not a minde, but the cause that the minde hath his being; nor spirit, but the cause by which every spirit is; nor light, but the cause by which the light existeth.

So then the Masse and Chaos being first created, void, darke, and informed, was by the operative Spirit of God, pierced and quickened, and the Waters having now received Spirit & motion, resolved their thinner parts into Aire, which God illightened: the Earth also by being contiguous, and mixt with waters (participating the same diuine vertue) brought forth the budde of the herbe that feedeth feede, &c. and for a meane and organ, by which this operative vertue might be continued, God appointed the light to be vnted, and gaue it also motion and heat, which heat caused a continuance of those feuerall species, which the Earth (being made fruitful by the Spirit) produced, and with motion begate the time and times succeeding.

¶ VIII.

Of the Firmament, and of the waters above the Firmament: and whether there be any crystalline Heauen, or any Primum mobile.

Frer that the Spirit of God had moued vpon the waters, and light was created, God said, Let there be a Firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it separate the waters from the waters: that is, those waters which by rarification and euaporation were ascended, and those of the Earth and Sea.

But these waters separate about this extension, which the Latine Translation calleth firmamentum, for expansum (for so Vatablus, Pagninus, and Iunius turne it) are not the crystalline Heavens, created in the imaginations of men; which opinion Basilus Magnus calleth a childish supposition, making in the same place many learned arguments against this fancie. For the waters above the Firmament, are the waters in the Aire above vs, where the same is more solid and condense, which God separated from the nether waters by a Firmament, that is, by an extended distance and vast space: the wordes Raguis, which Montanus writeth Rakiagh, and Shamajim, being indifferently taken for the Heauen & for Aire, and more properly for the Aire & ether, then for the Heavens, as the best Hebraicis vnderstand them, quo suprema actenus ab infimis crassis diducta, intersectaq; distant, for that whereby the supreme and thinnest bodies were placed in distance, being severed and cut off from low and grosse matters: and the waters above the Firmament, exprest in the word Majim, are in that tongue taken properly for the waters above the Aire, or in the vppermost Region of the same.

And that the word Heauen is vsed for the Aire, the Scriptures euery-where witness, as in the blessings of Ioseph, and in the 104. Psalm. * By these springs shall the fowle of the Heauen dwell; and in Sodom and Gomorrah it rained brimstone and fire out of the Heavens; and in Isaies blessing to IACOB, God grieue thee therefore of the dew of Heauen; and in Deuteronomie the 11. But the land whither you goe to possess it, is a land, that drinketh water of the raine of Heauen; and in Iob, Who hath ingendred the frosts of Heauen; and in S. MATTHEW, Behold the Fowles of Heauen, for they sowe not.

So as in all the Scriptures of the old Testament throughout, is the word Heaven very often vsed for aire, and taken also hyperbolically for any great height, as, Let vs build vs a Tower, whose toppe may reach to Heauen, &c. And in this very place Basila a-uoucheth, that this appellation of Heauen for the Firmament, is but by way of similitude: his owne wordes be these; *Et vocauit Deus firmamentum caelum. Haec appellatio alijs quidem proprie accommodatur, huius autem nunc ad similitudinem; And God called the firmament Heauen: This appellation (saith Basil) is properly applyed to another (that is, to the Starry Heauen) but to this, (that is, to the Firmament diuiding the waters) it is impossi- by similitude: and if there were no other prooffe, that by the Firmament was meant the Aire, and not the Heauen, the wordes of Moses in the eighth Verse, conferred with the same word Firmament in the twentieth Verse, makes it manifest: for in the eighth Verse it is written, that God called the Firmament, which diuided waters from waters, Heauen; and in the 20. Verse hee calleth the Firmament of Heauen, Aire, in these wordes: And let the foules fite vpon the earth in the open firmament of Heauen; and what vie there should bee of this ycie, or cristalline, or waterie Heauen, I conceiue not, except it be to moderate and temper the heat, which the Firmament mobile would otherwise gather and increase: though in very truth, in stead of this helpe, it would adde an vnmeasurable greatnesse of circle, whereby the swiftnesse of that first Moueable would exceede all possibilitie of beleefe. Sed nemo tenetur ad impossibilia; but no man ought to be held to impossibilities; and saith it selfe (which furremeth the height of all humane reason) hath for a forcible Conduiter, the Word of Truth, which also may be called lumen omnis rationis & intellectus, the light of all reason and vnderstanding. Now that this supposed first Moueable, turneth it selfe so many hundred thousand miles in an instant (seeing the Scriptures teach it not) let those that can beleue mens imaginations, apprehend it, for I can not: but of these many Heauens, let the Reader that desireth satisfaction, search Orotius, and of this waterie Heauen, Basilius Magnus in his Hexam. sol. 40. 41. &c. and Matth. Beroldus, his second Booke, and sixt Chapter. For my selfe, I am perfwaded, that the waters, called, The waters aboue the Heauens, are but the cloudes and waters ingendred in the vppermost Aire.*

§. I X.

A conclusion repeating the summe of the workes in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The creation of matter, The forming of it, The finishing of it.

O conclude, it may be gathered out of the first Chapter of Genesis, that this was the order of the most wise God in the beginning, and when there was no other nature, or being, but Gods incomprehensible eternitie. First, hee created the matter of all things: and in the first three daies he distinguished & gaue to euery nature his proper forme; the forme of lenitie to that which ascended, to that which descended, the forme of grauitie: for he separated light from darkenesse, diuided waters from waters and gathered the waters vnder the Firmament into one place. In the last three dayes, God adorned, beautified, and replenished the world: he set in the Firmament of Heauen, the Sunne, Moone, and Starres; filled the Earth with Beasts, the Aire with Fowle, and the Sea with Fish, giuing to all that haue life; a power generatiue, thereby to continue their Species and kindes; to Creatures vegetatiue and growing, their seeds in themselves; for hee created all things, that they might haue their being: and the generations of the world are preferred.

That Nature is no Principium per se; nor forme the giver of being: and of our ignorance, how second causes should haue any proportion with their effects.

N O for this working power, which wee call Nature, the beginning of motion and rest, according to Aristotle, the same is nothing else, but the strength and facultie, which God hath infused into euery creature, hauing no other selfe-abilite, then a Clocke, after it is wound vp by a mans hand, hath. These therefore that attribute vnto this facultie, any first or sole power, haue therein no other vnderstanding, then such a one hath, who looking into the Sterne of a Ship, and finding it guided by the Helme and Rudder, doth ascribe some absolute vertue to the piece of wood, without all consideration of the hand, that guides it, or of the iudgement, which also directeth and commandeth that hand; forgetting in this and in all else, that by the vertue of the first act, all Agents worke whatsoever they worke: Fortute primi actus agunt agentia omnia quicquid agunt: for as the minde of man seeth by the Organ of the eye, heareth by the eares, and maketh choice by the will: and therefore we attribute light to the eye, and hearing to the eares, &c. and yet it is the minde only, that giueth abilitie, life, and motion to all these his instruments and Organs; so God worketh by Angels, by the Sunne, by the Starres, by Nature, or infused properties, and by men, as by severall organs, several effects; all second causes whatsoever, being but instruments, conduits, and pipes, which carrie and disperse what they haue receiued from the head and fountaine of the Vniuersall. For as it is Gods infinite power, and euery-where-presence (compassing, embracing, and piercing all things) that giueth to the Sunne power to draw vp vapours, to vapours to bee milde cloudes, cloudes to containe raine, and raine to fall: so all second and instrumentall causes, together with Nature it selfe, without that operative facultie which God gaue them, would become altogether silent, vertuelesse, and dead: of which excellently Orpheus; Per te virescunt omnia, All things by thee spring forth in youthfull Greene. I enforce not these things, thereby to annihilate those variable vertues, which God hath giuen to his creatures, animate and inanimate, to heavenly and earthly bodies, &c. for all his workes in their vertues prayse him: but of the manner how God worketh in them, or they in or with each other, which the Heathen Philosophers, and those that follow them, haue taken on them to teach: I say, there is not any one among them, nor any one among vs, that could euer yet conceiue it, or expresse it, euer enrich his own vnderstanding with any certaine truth, or euer edifie others (not foolish by selfe-flatterie) therein. For (sayth Lactantius, speaking of the wisdom of the Philosophers) 40 si facultas inueniende veritatis hinc sinito subiaceret, aliquando esset inuenta; cum vero tot temporibus, tot ingenijs in eius inquisitione contritis, non sit comprehensa, apparet nullam ibi esse sapientiam, If in this studie (sayth hee) were meanes to find out the truth, it had ere this bene found out: but seeing it is not yet comprehended, after that so much time, and so many wits haue bene worne out in the inquiry of it, it appeareth, that there is no wisdom there to be had. Nam si de vna re precisa scientia haberetur, omnium rerum scientia necessario haberetur: If the precise knowledge of any one thing were to bee had, it should necessarily follow, that the knowledge of all things were to bee had. And as the Philosophers were ignorant in Nature, and the wayes of her working: so were they more curious, then knowing, in their first matter and Physicall forme. For if their first matter 50 had any being, it were not then the first matter: for, as it is the first matter, it hath only a power of being, which it altogether leaueth, when it doth subsist. And seeing it is neither a substance perfect, nor a substance inchoate, or in the way of perfection, how any other substance should thence take consence, it hath not bene taught, neither are these formes (sayth a learned Authour) any thing, si ex ea exprimantur potentia, Natura enim creat omnia, mata providentia & potestate divina, proinde nihil est, sed de seipso sapientia 3. cap. 28.

Cyprianus de demon. 12. lib. 5.

potentia, quæ nihil est. Again, how this first matter should be subiectum formarum, and passive, which is vnderstood to precede the forme, it is hard to conceiue: for to make forme which is the cause, to be subsequent to the thing caused (to wit, to the first matter) is contrary to all reason, diuine and humane: only it may be said, that originally there is no other difference between matter & forme, then between heat and fire, of which the one cannot subsist without the other, but in a kind of rationall consideration. Leaving therefore these Riddles to their Louers, who by certaine scholasticall distinctions wrest and pervert the truth of all things, and by which Aristotle hath laboured to proue a false eternitie of the World, I thinke it farre safer to asseme with Saint AUGUSTINE, That all species and kinds are from God, from whom, 10 what soeuer is natural procedeth, of what kind or estimation soeuer, from whence are the seeds of all formes, and the formes of all seeds and their motions; A quo est omnis species, & quæ est omnis forma, forme seminum, motus seminum atq; formarum. And thus much Auerois is forced to confesse. For all formes (sayth he) are in primo motore; which is also the opinion of Aristotle in the twelfth of his Metaph. and of Albertus vpon Dionysius.

Of Fate; and that the Starres haue great influence: and that their operations may diuersly be prevented or furthered.

NOW, as of Nature, such is the dispute and contention concerning Fate or Destinie, of which the opinions of those learned men that haue written thereof, may be safely receiued, had they not thereunto annexed and fastened an inuitable necessitie, and made it more generall, and vniuersally powerfull then it is; by giuing it Dominion ouer the mind of man, and ouer his will; of which Ouid and Lucretius.

Cic. de fat.

An error of the Chaldeans, and after them of the Stoicks, the Pharisees, Priscilianists, the Bardisants, and others, as Basil, Augustine, and Thomas haue obserued: 40 but, that Fate is an obedience of second causes to the first, was well conceiued of Hermes, and Apuleius the Platonist. Plotinus out of the Astronomers calleth it a disposition from the acts of celestiall Orbes, vnnchangeably working in inferior bodies, the same being also true enough, in respect of all those things, which a rationall mind doth not order nor direct. Plotinie, Seneca, Democritus, Epicurus, Chrysippus, Empedocles, and the Stoicks, some of them more largely, others more strictly, ascribe to Fate a binding and inuitable necessitie; and that it is the same which is spoken and determined by God (quod de vnoquoque nostrum fatus est Deus) and the definite lot of all liuing. And certainly it cannot be doubted, but the Starres are instruments of farre greater vse, then to giue an obscure light, and for men to gaze on after Sun-set: it being manifest, that the diuersitie of seasons, the Winters and Summers, more hot and cold, are not so vncertaind by the Sunne and Moone alone, who alway keepe one and the same course, but that the Starres haue also their working therein.

And if we cannot denie, but that God hath giuen vertues to Springs, and Fountaines, taines, to cold earth, to plants and Stones, Minerals, and to the excrementall parts of the basest liuing creatures, why should wee rob the beautifull Starres of their working powers; for seeing they are many in number and of eminent beauty and magnitude, we may not thinke, that in the treasury of his wisdom who is infinite, there can be wanting (euen for euery Starre) a peculiar vertue and operation; as euery herbe, plant, fruit, and flower, adorning the face of the Earth hath the like. For as these were not created to beautifie the earth alone, and to couer and shadow her dustie face, but otherwise for the vse of man and beast, to feed them and cure them: so were not those vncountable glorious bodies set in the Firmament, to no other end, 10 then to adorne it, but for instruments and organs of his diuine prouidence, so far as it hath pleased his iust will to determine. Origen vpon this place of Genesis, Let there be light in the Firmament, &c. affirmeth that the Starres are not causes (meaning per chance binding causes) but are as open Bookes, wherein are contained and set downe all things whatsoever to come; but not to be read by the eyes of humane wisdom: which latter part I beleue well, and this saying of Syracus withall: That there are Ecc. 1. 3. 2. 3. hid yet greater things then these bee, and wee haue seene but a few of his workes. And though, for the capacitie of men, we know somewhat yet in the true and vttermost vertues of herbes and plants, which our selues sow and yet, and which grow vnder our feet, we are in effect ignorant; much more in the powers and working of celestiall bodies: for hardly (sayth SALOMON) can we discern the things that are vpon the earth, and with great labour find we out those things that are before vs: who can then inuestigate the things that are in Heauen? Multum est de rebus celestibus aliquid cognoscere: Aristotle. It is much to know a little of heavenly things. But in this question of Fate, the middle course is to be followed, that as with the Heathen we doe not bind God to his creatures, in this supposed necessitie of destinie, so on the contrary we doe not rob those beautifull creatures of their powers and offices. For had any of these second causes deposed God of his prerogative, or had God himselfe constrained the minde and will of man to impious acts by any celestiall inforcements, then sure the impious excuse of some were iustificable; of whom Saint AUGUSTINE: Impia peruersitate in ma- Aug. ad. super 30 is facta rectissime reprehendendis ingerunt accusandum potius auctorum syderum, quam commissorum scelerum. Where we reprehend them of cull deads, they againe with wicked peruerseesse urge, that rather the Author and Creatour of the Starres, then the doer of the euill is to be accused.

But that the Stars and other celestiall bodies incline the will by mediation of the sensitive appetite, which is also stirred by the constitution and complexion, it cannot be doubted. Corpora celestia (sayth DAMASCENE) constituent in nobis habitus, complexionis, & dispositiones, The heavenly bodies (sayth he) make in vs habits, complexionis, & dispositiones: for the bodie (though Galen inforce it further) hath vndoubtedly a kind of drawing after it the affections of the minde, especially bodies strong in humour, and mindes weake in vertues: for those of cholericke complexion are subiect to anger, and the furious effects thereof; by which they suffer themselves to be transported, where the minde hath not reason to remember, that passions ought to be her Vassals, not her Masters. And that they wholly direct the reasonlesse minde I am reuolued: For all those which were created mortall, as birds, beasts, and the like, are left to their naturall appetites, ouer all which, celestiall bodies (as instruments and Executioners of Gods prouidence) haue absolute dominion. What we should iudge of men, who litle differ from beasts, I cannot tell: for as he that contendeth against those inforcements, may easily master or resist them: so whoeuer shall neglect the remedies by vertue and pietie prepared, putteth himselfe altogether vnder the power 50 of his sensuall appetite; Vincitur fatum si resistas, vincit si contempseris: Fate will be overcome, if thou resist it, if thou neglect it, it conuereeth.

But that either the Starres or the Sunne haue any power ouer the minds of men immediately, it is absurd to thinke, other then as afore said, as the same by the bodies temper may be effected. Lumen solis ad generationem sensibilibus corporum confert, &c. Aug. de ciuit. Dei. lib. 5.

ad vitam ipsam mouet, & nutrit, & auget, & perfect: The light of the Sunne (sayth Saint AVGVSTINE) helpeth the generation of sensible bodies, moueth them to life, and nourisheth, augmenteth, and perfecteth them: yet still as a Minister, not as a Master: Bonus quidem est Sol, in ministerio, non imperio; The Sunne is good to serue, not to sway (saith S. And Saint AVGVSTINE: Deus regit inferiora corpora per superiora; God ruleth the bodies below by those above, but he auoucheth not, that superiour bodies haue rule ouer mens minds, which are incorporeall.

But howsoever wee are by the Starres inclined at our birth, yet there are many things both in Nature and Art, that encounter the same, and weaken their operation: and Aristotle himselfe confesseth, that the Heauens doe not alwayes worke their effects in inferiour bodies, no more then the signes of raine and wind doe alwayes come to passe: And it is diuers times sene, that paternall vertue and vice hath his counter-working to these inclinations. Est in lucentia patrum virtus; In the young off-spring the Fathers vertue is, and so the contrary, patrum vitia: and herein also there is often found an enterchange; the Sonnes of virtuous men, by an ill constellation become inclinable to vice, and of vicious men, to vertue.

Egregia est soboles, scelerato nata parente.

A worthy sonne is borne of a wicked father.

But there is nothing (after Gods reserved power) that so much setteth this art of influence out of square and rule, as education doth: for there are none in the world so wickedly inclined, but that a religious instruction and bringing vp may fashion anew, and reforme them; nor any so well disposed, whom (thereines being left loose) the continuall fellowship and familiaritie, and the examples of dissolute men may not corrupt and deforme. Vessels will euer retaine a sauour of their first liquor: it being equally difficult eyther to cleanse the mind once corrupted, or to extinguish the sweet sauour of vertue first received, when the mind was yet tender, open, and easily seasoned; but where a fauourable constellation (allowing that the Stars incline the will) and a vertuous education doe happily arriue, or the contrary in both, thereby it is that men are found to exceeding vertuous or vicious, Heaven and Earth (as it were) running together, and agreeing in one: for as the seedes of vertue may by the art and husbandry of Christian counsaile produce better and more beautifull fruit, then the strength of selfe-nature and kind could haue yeilded them; so the plants apt to grow wild, and to change themselves into weeds, by being set in a soyle suitable, and like themselves, are made more vnsauoury and filled with poyson. It was therefore truly affirmed, Sapiens adiunabit opus astrorum, quemadmodum agricola terre naturam, A wise man assisteth the worke of the Starres, as the Husbandman helpeth the nature of the soyle. And Ptolomie himselfe confesseth thus much, Sapiens, & omnia sapientia medici dominabuntur astris, A wise man, and the ominous art of a wise Physician shall preuaile against the Starres. Lastly, wee ought all to know, that GOD created the Starres, as he did the rest of the vniuersall, whose influences may be called his reserved and vnwritten Lawes. But let vs consider how they binde: euen as the Lawes of men doe; for although the Kings and Princes of the world haue by their Lawes decreed, that a Thiefe and a murderer shall suffer death; and though their Ordinances are daily by Iudges and Magistrates (the Starres of Kings) executed accordingly, yet these Lawes doe not deprive Kings of their naturall or religious compassion, or bind them without prerogative, to such a seuer execution, as that there should be nothing left of libertie to iudgement, power, or conscience: the Law in his owne nature being no other then a deafe Tyrant. But seeing that it is otherwise, and that Princes (who ought to imitate God in all they can) doe sometimes for causes to themselves knowne, and by mediation, pardon offences both against others and themselves, it were then impious to take that power and libertie from God himselfe, which which his Substitutes enioy; God being mercy, goodnesse, and charitie it selfe. Otherwise that example of Prayer by our Saviour taught; And let vs not bee led vnto temptation, but deliuer vs from euill, had beene no other but an expence of words and time; but that God (which only knoweth the operation of his owne creatures truly) hath assured vs, that there is no inclination or temptation so forcible, which our humble Prayers and desires may not make frustrate, and breake asunder: for were it (as the Stoicks conceiue) that Fate or Destinie, though depending vpon eternall power, yet being once ordered and disposed, had such a connexion and immutable dependencie, that God himselfe should in a kind haue shut vp himselfe therein: How miserable then were the condition of men (sayth Saint AVGVSTINE) left altogether without hope!

And if this strength of the Starres were so transfer'd, as that God had quitted vnto them all dominion ouer his creatures; be he Pagan or Christian that so beleueeth, the only true God of the one, and the imaginary gods of the other would thereby be depoyled of all worship, reuerence, or respect.

And certainly, GOD which hath promised vs the reward of wel-doing, which Christ himselfe claimed at the hands of the Father, (I haue finished the worke which thou gapest mee to doe.) And the same God, who hath threatned vnto vs the sorrow and torment of offences, could not contrary to his mercifull nature be so vnjust, as to bind vs ineuitably to the Destinies, or influences of the Starres, or subiect our soules to any imposed necessitie. But it was well sayd of Plotinus, that the Stars were significant, but not efficient, giuing them yet something lesse then their due: and therefore as I doe not consent with those, who would make those glorious creatures of God vertuelesse: so I think that we derogate from his eternal and absolute power and providence, to ascribe to them the same dominion ouer our immortall soules, which they haue ouer all bodily substances, and perishable natures: for the soules of men, louing and fearing God, receiue influence from that diuine light it selfe, whereof the Sunnes claritie, and that of the Stars is by Plato called but a shadow. Lumen est umbra Dei, & Deus est lumen luminis; Light is the shadow of Gods brightnesse, who is the light of light: But to end this question, because this Destinie, together with Providence, Prescience, and Predelination are often confounded, I thinke it not impertinent to touch the difference in a word or two, for every man hath not obserued it, though all learned men haue.

¶ XII.

Of Prescience.

Prescience, or fore-knowledge (which the Greekes call Prognosis, the Latines præcognitio, or prescientia) considered in order and nature (if we may speake of God after the manner of men) goeth before Providence: for God fore-knew all things, before hee had created them, or before they had being to be cared for; and Prescience is no other then an infallible fore-knowledge. For whatsoever our selues fore-know, except the same be to succede accordingly, it cannot be true that we fore-know it. But this Prescience of God (as it is Prescience only) is not the cause of any thing futurely succeeding: neither doth Gods fore-knowledge impose any necessity, or binde. For in that we fore-know that the Sunne will rise, and set; that all men borne in the world shall die againe; that after Winter, the Spring shall come; after the Spring Summer and Harvest, and that according to the seuerall seedes that we sow, we shall reape seuerall sorts of graine, yet is not our fore-knowledge the cause of this, or any of these: neither doth the knowledge in vs binde or constrain the Sunne to rise and set, or men to die; for the causes (as men perswade themselves) are otherwise manifest and knowne to all. The eye of man (saith BOETIVS) beholdeth those things subiect to sense,

sense, as they are; the eye seeth that such a beast is a horse, it seeth men, trees, and houses, &c. but our seeing of them (as they are) is not the cause of their so being, for such they bee in their owne natures. And againe out of the same Authour: Divina providentia rebus generandis non imponit necessitatem, quia si omnia euenirent ex necessitate, premia bonorum, & poena malorum periret; Divine providence (sayth he) imposeth no necessitie upon things that are to exist, for if all came to passe of necessitie, there should neither be reward of good, nor punishment of euill.

§. XIII.

Of Providence.

OW Providence (which the Greekes call Pronoia) is an intellectuall knowledge, both fore-seeing, caring for, and ordering all things, and doth not onely behold all past, all present, and all to come, but is the cause of their so being, which Prescience (simply taken) is not: and therefore Providence by the Philosophers (saith Saint Augustine) is deuuided into Memory, Knowledge, and Care: Memory of the past, Knowledge of the present, and Care of the future; and we our selues account such a man for provident, as remembering things past, and obseruing things present, can by iudgement, and comparing the one with the other, provide for the future, and times succeeding. That such a thing there is as Providence, the Scriptures euery-where teach vs, Moses in many places, the Prophets in their Predictions: Christ himselfe and his Apostles assure vs hereof; and, besides the Scriptures, Hermes, Orpheus, Euripides, Pythagoras, Plato, Plotinus, and (in effect) all li-men acknowledge the Providence of God: at therein, as they refuse not to accompany diseases; nor thun any perill whatsoeuer, ent it selfe.

God therefore, who is euery-where present, who filleth the Heauens and the Earth, whose eyes are vpon the righteous, and his countenance against them that doe euill, was therefore by Orpheus called, oculus infinitus, an infinite eye, beholding all things, and cannot therefore be esteemed as an idle looker on, as if he had transferred his power to any other: for it is contrary to his owne Word: Gloriam meam alteri non dabo: I will not give my glory to another. No man commandeth in the Kings presence, but by the Kings direction; but God is euery-where present, and King of Kings. The example of Gods vniuersall Providence is seene in his creatures. The Father prouideth for his children: beasts and birds, and all liuing for their young ones. If Providence be found in second Fathers, much more in the first and vniuersall: and if there be a naturall louing care in men, and beasts, much more in God, who hath formed this nature, and whose Diuine loue was the beginning, and is the bond of the vni-uersall: Amor diuinus verum omnium est principium, & vinculum vniuersi (saith PLATO).

God therefore who could only be the cause of all, can onely provide for all, and suitayne all; so as to absolute power; to euery-where presence; to perfect goodnesse; to pure and diuine loue; this attribute and transcendent habilitie of Providence is only proper and belonging.

§. XIII.

Of Predestination.

OW for Predestination; we can difference it no otherwise, from Providence and Prescience, then in this, that Prescience only fore-seeth: Providence fore-seeth and careth for, and hath respect to all creatures, euen from the brightest Angels of heauen, to the vnworthiest wormes of the earth, and Predestination (as it is vied specially by Diuines) is only of men, and yet not of all to men belonging, but of their saluation properly, in the common vse of Diuines, or perdition, as some haue vied it. Yet Peter Lombard, 20 Thomas, Berneſius Theologus, and others, take the word Predestination more strictly, and for a preparation to felicitie: diuers of the Fathers take it more largely sometimes: among whom S. Augustine speaking of two Cities, and two Societies, vseth these wordes, *Quarum est vna, que predestinata est in aeternum regnare cum Deo, altera aeternum supplicium subire cum Diabolo; whereof one is it, which is predestinated to reigne for euer with God, but the other is to vndergoe eueraſting torment with the Deuill: for according to NONIVS MARCELLVS, destinare est preparare; and of the same opinion are many Protestant writers, as Caluyn, Beza, Buchanan, Dimes, and such like: and as for the manifold questions hereof arising, I leaue them to the Diuines; and why it hath pleased God to create some vessels of honor, and some of dishonor, I will 30 answere with Gregorie, who saith, Qui in factis Dei rationem non videt, infirmitatem suam considerans, cur non videt, rationem videt; He that seeth no reason in the actions of God, by consideration of his owne infirmitie perceiueſt the reason of his blindness. And againe with S. AUGVSTINE, *Occulta esse causa potest, inuisa esse non potest; Hidden the cause of his Predestination may be, vniust it cannot be.

Of Fortune: and of the reason of some things that seeme to be by fortune, and against Reason and Providence.

ASTLY, seeing Destinie or Necessitie is subſequent to Gods prouidence, and seeing that the Starres haue no other dominion, then is before spoken, and that Nature is nothing, but as Plato calleth it, Dei artem, vel artificium Dei Organum; The art, or artificial Organ of God, and CVSANVS, Diuini precepti instrumentum; The instrument of the diuine precept: we may then with better reason reiect that kinde of Idolatrie, or God of fooles, called Fortune or Chance: a Goddesse, the most reuerenced, and the most reuiled of all o-
 50 ther, but not ancient; for Homer maketh her the Daughter of Oceanus, as Pausanias witnesseth in his Messenians. The Greekes call her tyche, signifying a relatiue being, or betiding, so as before Homer, time this great Lady was scarce heard of; Hesiodus, who hath taught the birth and beginning of all these counterfait gods, hath not a word of Fortune: yet afterward shee grew so great and omnipotent, as from Kings

Athenians:

cry out vpon Fortune, applying to her a Verse of Æschylus, Tu me extulisti, eandem me (senio) perdidisti. 10

Longissime à Sapiencia Fors disidet, Sed multa perficit tamen similitima.

From Wisedome Fortune differs farre,
And yet in workes most likethey are.

But I will forbear to be curious in that, which (as it is commonly vnderstood) is nothing else but a power imaginarie, to which the successe of humane actions and endeouours were for their varietie ascribed; for when a manifest cause could not be giuen, then was it attributed to Fortune, as if there were no cause of those things, of which most men are ignorant, contrary to this true ground of PLATO: 2 (ibi est ortum sub Sole, cuius causa legitima non præcesserit; Nothing euer came to passe vnder the Sunne, of which there was not a iust preceding cause. But Aquinas hath herein answered in one distinction, whatsoever may be objected; for many things there are (saith he) which happen, besides the intention of the Inferior, but not besides the intention of the Superior; Præter intentionem inferioris, sed non præter intentionem superioris, (to wit) the ordinance of God; and therefore (saith MELANCHTON) Quod Poeta fortunam, nos Deum appellamus; Whom the Poets call Fortune, we know to be God, and that this is true, the Scripture in many places teacheth vs, as in the law of Murder. He that smiteth a man, and he die, shall die the death, and if a man hath not laid waite, but God hath offered him into his hands, then I will appoint thee a place whither he shall flee. Now, where the Scripture hath these wordes, God hath offered him into his hands, we say, if he hurt him by Chance: and in Deuteronomie the nineteenth, where the slipping of an Axe from the helue, whereby another is slaine, was the worke of God himselfe, we in our phrase attribute this accident to Chance or Fortune: and in the Proverbs the sixteenth, The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition thereof is of the Lord: so as that which seemeth most casuall and subiect to Fortune, is yet disposed by the ordinance of God, as all things else; and hereof the wiser sort, and the best learned of the Philosophers were not ignorant, as Cicero witnesseth for them, gathering the opinion of Aristotle and his Sectators, with those of Plato, and the Academicke to this effect, That the same power which they called animam mundi; The soule of the world, was no other then that incomprehensible wisdom, which we expresse by the name of God, governing euery being aswell in heauen as in earth; to which wisdom and power they sometime gaue the title of Necessitie or Fate, because it bindeth by inevitable ordinance: sometime, the title of Fortune, because of many effects there appeare vnto vs no certaine causes. To this effect speaketh S. Augustine in his questions vpon Genesis the first Booke: the same hath Seneca in his fourth of Benefits; which was also the doctrine of the Stoicks, of which Sect he was: For whatsoever (saith he) thou callest God, be it Nature, Fate, or Fortune, all are but one and the same, differenced by diuers termes, according as he useth, and exerciseth his power diuersly.

But it may be objected, that if Fortune and Chance were not sometimes the causes of good and euill in men, but an idle voice, whereby we expresse successe, how comes it then, that so many worthy and wise men depend vpon so many vnworthy and and emptie-headed fooles; that riches and honor are giuen to externall men, and without kernell: and so many learned, vertuous, and valiant men weare out their liues in poore and dejected estates. In a word there is no other inferior, or apparent cause, beside the partialitie of mans affection, but the fashioning and not fashioning of our selues according to the nature of the time wherein we liue, for whoeuer is most able, and best sufficient to discern, and hath withall an honest and open heart and louing truth, if Princes, or those that gouerne, endure no other discourte then their owne flatteries, then I say such an one, whose vertue and courage forbiddeth him to be base and a dissembler, shall euermore hang vnder the wheele, which kind of deferring well and receiuing ill, we alwayes faultily charge Fortune withall. For whoeuer shall tell any great Ma or Magistrate, that he is not iust, the Generall of an Armie, that he is not valiant, and great Ladies that they are not faire, shall neuer be made a Counsellor, a Captayne, or a Courtier. Neither is it sufficient to be wife with a wife Prince, valiant with a valiant, and iust with him that is iust, for such a one hath no estate in his prosperitie; but he must also change with the successor, if he be of contrary qualities, faile with the tyde of the time, and alter forme and condition, as the Estate or the Estates Master changeth: Otherwise how were it possible, that the most base men, and separate from all imitable qualities, could so often attayne to honor and riches, but by such an obseruant flauith course? These men hauing nothing else to value themselves by, but a counterfeit kinde of wondring at other men, and by making them beleue that all their vices are vertues, and all their dulle actions cristalline, haue yet in all ages prospered equally with the most vertuous, if not exceeded them. For according to MENANDER, Omnis insipiens arrogantia & plaufibus capitur; Every foole is wonne with his owne pride, and others flattering applause: so as whoeuer will liue altogether out of himselfe, and studie other mens humours, and obserue them, shall neuer be vnfortunate; and on the contrary, that man which prizeth truth and vertue (except the season wherein he liueth be of all these, and of all sorts of goodnesse fruitfull) shall neuer prosper by the possession or profession thereof. It is also a token of a worldly wise man, not to warre or contend in vaine against the nature of times wherein he liueth: for such a one is often the author of his owne miserie, but best it were to follow the aduice, which the Pope gaue the Bishops of that age, out of Ouid, while the Arian Heretic raged:

Dum furor in cursu est, currenti cede furori.

And if Cicero (then whom that world begat not a man of more reputed iudgement) had followed the counsaile of his brother QUINTVS, Potuisse (saith PETRARCH) in lectulo suo mori, potuisse integro caduere sepeliri; He might then haue dyed the death of nature, and bene with an vnborne and vndisseured body buried; for as Petrarch in the same place noteth: Quid stultius quam desperantem (præsertim de effectibus) litibus perpetuis implicari; What more foolish then for him that despaires, especially of the effect, so be entangled with endless contentions: Whoeuer therefore will set before him MACHIAVELLS two markes to shote at (to wit) riches, and glorie, must set on and take off a back of yron to a weake wooden Bow, that it may fit both the strong and the feeble: for as he, that first deuised to adde sayles to rowing vessels, did either so proportion them, as being fastened aloft, and towards the head of his Mast, he might abide all windes and stormes, or else he sometime or other perished by his owne inuention: so that man which prizeth vertue for it selfe, & cannot endure to hoile and strike his failles, as the diuers natures of calmes & stormes require, must cut his failles, and his cloth, of meane length and breadth, and content himselfe with a slow and sure nauigation, (to wit) a meane and free estate. But of this dispute of Fortune, and

Of this Image and similitude of God, there is much dispute among the Fathers, Schoole-men, and late Writers: Some of the Fathers conceive, that man was made after the Image of God, in respect chiefly of Empire & Dominion, as S. Chrysostome, Ambrose, and some others: which Saint Ambrose denyeth to the woman in these words, Et sicut Deus unus, ab eo fieret homo unus, & quomodo ex Deo uno omnia, ita ex uno homine omne genus esset super faciem totius terra: Unus igitur unum fecit, qui unitatis eius habere imaginem; That as God is one, one man might be made by him, and that in what manner all things are of one God, likewise of one man the whole kinde should be upon the face of the whole earth: Therefore he being one made one, that should haue the Image of his unitie. But whereas it is gathered out of the following wordes of the same Verse, that man was after the image of God in respect of rule and power, it is written Dominamini in the plurall number, and let them rule over the fish in the Sea, &c. and therefore cannot the woman be excluded. Others conceiue, that man is said to be after the image of God in respect of his immortall soule only, because as God is inuisible, so the soule of man is inuisible, as God is immortall and incorporeall, so is the soule of man immortall and incorporeall; and as there is but one God which governeth the world, so but one soule which governeth the body of man; and as God is wholly in euery part of the world, so is the soule of man wholly in euery part of the body: Anima est tota in toto, & tota in qualibet parte; The soule is wholly in the whole body, and wholly in euery part thereof, according to Aristotle; though Chalcidius, and other learned men denie that doctrine; which that it is otherwise then potentially true, all the Aristotelians in the world shall neuer proue. These and the like arguments doe the Iewes make (saith Tostatus) and these resemblances, betwene the infinite God, and the finite Man.

The Schoole-men resemble the Minde or Soule of Man to God, in this respect especially; because that as in the Minde there are three distinct powers, or faculties, (to wit) Memorie, Vnderstanding, and Will, and yet all these, being of reall differences, are but one minde: so in God there are three distinct persons, the Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost, and yet but one God. They also make the Image and Similitude diuers; and againe, they distinguish betwene imaginem Dei, and ad imaginem Dei, and spinne into small threds, with subtile distinctions, many times the plainenesse, and licentious of the Scriptures: their wits being like that strong water, that eateth through and dissolueth the purest gold. Victorinus also maketh the image of God to be substantiall, but not the similitude: sed in substantia uero qualitas declarationum; A word-declaring qualitie in the substance. Out of which wordes, and that which followeth, it is infer'd, that as the image and similitude doe greatly differ: so the sinnefull soule doth not therefore leaue to be the image of God; but it hath not his similitude, except it be holy and righteous. S. Augustine also against Adimantus the Manichee affirmeth, that by sinne, the perfection of this image is lost in man, and 30 in his Retractions maintayneth the same opinion, and also affirmeth that the Similitude is more largely taken, then the Image.

But howsoever the Schoole-men and others distinguish, or whatsoeuer the Fathers conceiue, sure I am that S. Paul maketh the same sense of the image, which Victorinus doth of the similitude, who saith: As we haue borne the image of the earthly, so shall we beare the image of the heavenly; and it cannot be gathered out of the Scriptures, that the wordes image and similitude were vsed but in one sense, and in this placethe better to expresse each other; whatsoever Lombard hath said to the contrary. For God knows, what a multitude of meanings the wit of man imagineth to himselfe in the Scriptures, which neither Moses, the Prophets, or Apostles, euer conceiued. Now as S. Paul vseth the word (image) for both: so S. Iames vseth the word 40 (similitude) for both in these wordes: Therewith blisse we God euen the Father, and Iam. 3. 9: therewith curse we Men, which are made after the similitude of God: Howsoever therefore S. Augustine seemeth, out of a kinde of elegancy in writing, to make some difference, as where he writeth, Consecratur imaginem in aeternitate, similitudinem in moribus inueniri; We confesse that this image is found in eternitie, but his similitude in manners, that is, in the spirituall dispositions and qualities of the minde, yet thus he elsewhere speaketh plainly: Quasi uero postea esse imago aliqua in qua similitudo non sit: si aut. 1. 3. 9. enim omnino similis non est, proculdubio nec imago est; As if (saith he) there could be any image, where the similitude is not: no, out of doubt, where there is no likeness, there is no 50 image. The very wordes of the Text make this most manifest, as, Let vs make man in our image, according to our likeness: which is, Let vs make man in our image, that he may be like vs; and in the next Verse following, God himselfe maketh it plaine, for there he vseth the word (image) only, as thus: God created the man in his image, in the image of God created he him. And to take away all dispute or ambiguity, in the first first Verse of the fifth Chapter, the word (similitude) is used againe by it selfe, as, In the day that God created ADAM, in the likenesse of God made he him. And this similitude S. Paul Colos. the third, calleth the image. Put on (saith he) the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him, that created him. And in Siracides it is written, He made them according to his image. Now if we may beleue S. Paul before Peter Lombard and other Schoole-men, then it is as manifest as wordes can make it, that the image and similitude is but the same, for S. Paul vlieth both the words directly in one sense. For they turned the glorie of the incorruptible God, to the similitude of the image of a corruptible man.

Zanchius laboureth to proue, that man was formed after the image of God, both 1^o in body and minde: Nulla pars in homine que non fuerit huiusce imaginis particeps, No part in a man (saith he) which was not participating Gods image: for God said, Let us make man according to our owne image. But the soule alone is not man, but the Hypostasis or whole man compounded of body and soule. The body of man (saith he) is the Imago of the world, and called therefore Microcosmus; but the Idea and exemplar of the world was first in God, so that man, according to his body must needs be the image of God. Against which opinion of this learned man, his owne obiection seemeth to me sufficient, where he allegeth, that it may be said, that Moses spake by the figure Synecdoche, as when a man is called a mortall man, yet is not the whole man mortall, but the body only: so when God said, Let vs make man after our image, he meant 2^o the soule of man, and not the body of earth and dust: Male dictus qui deitatem ad hominis lineamentum refert (saith S. AUGUSTINE), Cursed is he that referreth the Deities of God to the lineaments of mans body. Deus enim non est humane forme particeps, neque corpus humanum diuine (saith PHILE) God is not partaker of humane forme, nor humane body of the forme diuine: The Hebrew word for image is Tselem, which significth a shadow or obscure resemblance: in imagine pertransit homo; Man passeth away in a shadow: Let vs then know and consider, that God, who is eternal and infinite, hath not any bodily shape or composition, for it is both against his Nature & his Word; an error of the Anthropomorphite, against the very essence and Maiestie of God.

Surely Cicero, who was but a Heathen, had yet a more diuine vnderstanding then 3^o these grosse Heretikes: Ad similitudinem Dei propius accedebat humana virtus, quam figura; The vertue which is in man (saith he) came neerer the similitude of God, then the figure. For God is a spirituall substance, inuisible, and most simple; God is a iust God: God is Mercifull: God is Charitie it selfe, and (in a word) Goodnesse it selfe, and none else simply good. And thus much it hath pleased God himselfe to teach vs, and to make vs know of himselfe. What then can be the shadow of such a substance, the image of such a nature, or wherein can man be said to resemble his vnexogitable power and perfectnesse? certainly, not in dominion alone: for the Dewill is said to be the Prince of this world, and the Kingdome of Christ was not thereof, who was the true and perfect image of his Father: neither, because man hath an immortall 4^o soule, and therein the faculties of Memorie, Vnderstanding, and Will, for the Devils are also immortall, and participate those faculties, being called Dæmones, because scienter of Knowledge and subtilty; neither because we are reasonable creatures, by which we are distinguished from beasts: for who haue rebelled against God? who haue made Gods of the vilest beasts, of Serpents, of Cats, of Owles, yea, euen of shamefull parts, of lusts and pleasures, but reasonable men? Yet doe I not condemne the opinion of S. Chrysostome and Ambrose, as touching dominion, but that in respect thereof, man was in some sort after the image of God, if we take Dominion, such as it ought to be, that is, accompanied with Iustice and Pietie: for God did not only make man a Ruler and Governour over the Fishes of the Sea, the Fowles of Heauen 5^o (or of the aire) and ouer the Beasts of the Field; but God gaue vnto man a dominion ouer men, he appointed Kings to gouerne them, and Iudges, to iudge them in equitie. Neither doe I exclude Reason, as it is the abilitie of Vnderstanding. For I doe not conceiue, that Demus did therefore call man, the image of God, because he was animale rationale only; but that he vnderstood it better, with SYRILLA: Imago mea est homo, recte am rationem habens: Man, that is ended with right reason, is (said to) resemble God, (that is) by right reason to know and confesse God his Creatour, and the same God to serue, loue, and obey: and therefore said Saint Augustine (who herein came nearer the Truth) fecit Deus hominem ad imaginem & similitudinem suam in mente God made man, in respect of the intellectu, after his owne Image and similitude; and REXNERIVS; Homo, quod habet mentem, factus est ad imaginem Dei, Man was made after the Image of God, in minde, or in that he had a minde.

p. II.

Of the intellectuall mind of man, in which there is much of the Image of God: and that this Image is much deformed by Sinne.

BUT Mens is not taken here for anima physica, according to Aristotle, which is forma, vel natura hominis: The forme or nature of man; but this facultie or gift of God, called Mens, istaken for prima vis animi, the principal strength of the minde, or soule, cuius actus est perpetua veritatis contemplatio; whose act, exercise, or office, is the perpetual contemplation of 20 *truth; and therefore it is also called intellectus diuinus, intellectus contemplatiuus, & Panauder. anima contemplatiua, A diuine vnderstanding, and an intellectu or minde contemplatiue. Est autem mens nostra (saith CYSANVS) vis comprehendendi, & totum virtuale ex omnibus comprehendendi virtutibus compositum: Our intellectuall minde (saith hee) is a power of comprehending, euen the whole, that is in this kind powerfull, compounded of all the powers of comprehension: vnto which Mercurius attributeth so much (if his meaning accompany his words) that he esteemeth it to be the very essence of God (which was also the error of the Manichees and others) and no otherwife separate from God (saith hee) then the light from the Sunne: for this Mens or vnderstanding (saith MERCV- 30 RIUS) est Deus in hominibus: Is God in men, or rather (and which I take to be his meaning) is the image of God in man. For as the Sunne is not of the same essence or nature with the diuine light, but a body illightned, and an illumination created; so is this Mens or vnderstanding in men, not of the essence of Gods infinite vnderstanding, but a power and facultie of our soules the purest; or the lumen anime rationalis, by the true and eternall light illightned. And this Mens others call animam animam, The soule of the soule, or with S. Augustine, the eye of the soule, or receptacle of Sapience and diuine knowledge, *qua a uenore sapientia tanquam ducem sequitur, which followeth after the loue of sapience as her guide (saith Phile) betweene which and reason, betweene which and the minde, called anima, betweene which and that power which the La- 40 tines call animus, there is this difference. Reason is that facultie by which wee iudge and discourse; Anima, by which we liue. Hereof it is said, Anima corpus animat, id est, uiuificat, anima, or the soule is that which doth animate the body, that is, gueseth it life: for death is the separation of body and soule; and the same strength (saith Phile) which God the great Director hath in the World, the same hath this Animus, or mind, or soule in man. Animus, is that, by which wee will and make election; and to this Basil agreeeth, which calleth this Mens, or diuine vnderstanding, *perspicacem anime partem, the perceiving part of the minde, or the light by which the Soule discerneth: dormientium mens, non anima, sopitur, & in furiosis mens extinguatur, anima manet, in men that sleep it is this (mens) for vnderstanding, and not the minde or soule, which resteth, during 50 which time it is but habituall in wise men, and in mad men this (mens) is extinguished, and not the Soule: for mad men doe liue, though distracted.

Therefore this word being often used for the Soule giuing life, is attributed abusiuely to mad men, when wee say that they are of a distracted minde, in stead of a broken vnderstanding, which word (mind) we vse also for opinion, as, I am of this mind, or that minde: and sometimes for mens conditions or vertues, as hee is of an honest minde, or, a man of a iust minde: sometimes for affection, as I doe this for my mindes sake; and Aristotle sometimes veth this word (Mens) for the phantasie, which is the strength of the imagination: sometimes for the knowledge of principles, which we haue without discouise: oftentimes for Spirits, Angels and Intelligences: but as it is vled in the proper signification, including both the vnderstanding agent & possible, it is described to be a pure, simple, substantiall act, not depending vpon matter, but hauing relation to that, which is intelligible, as to his first object: or more at large thus; a part or particle of the Soule, whereby it doth vnderstand, not depending vpon matter, nor needing any organ, free from passion comming from without, and apt to bee discouered, as, eternall from that which is mortall. Hereof excellently

MERCURIVS: Anima est imago mentis, mens imago Dei. Deus menti praest, mens anima, anima corporis; The Soule (meaning that which giueth life) is the Image of this vnderstanding, or Mens, and this (Mens) or vnderstanding is the Image of God. God is President or Ruler over this vnderstanding, this vnderstanding ouer the Soule, and this Soule ouer the bodie. This diuision and distinction out of the Platonikes and Peripatetikes, I leaue to the Reader to iudge of. That, Mens humana hath no need of any organ,

Lib. 9. cap. 5

Zanch. de op. Dei. part. 2. lib. 1. cap. 2.

Marcellus Ficinus in his ninth Booke of the Soules immortallitie laboureth to proue. Zanchius doth not differ from Ficinus in words, for (sayth hee) ad facultatem intelligentem exercendam non eget Mens organum, tanquam medio, per quod intelligat, quantum 20 ergo obiecto in quod intuetur, & ex quo intelligentiam concipiat: hoc autem obiectum sunt phantasmata, seu verum a sensibus perceptarum simulachra ad phantasia prolata. To exercise the facultie of vnderstanding, the mind of man (sayth hee) needeth no instrument, as a means, by which it may vnderstand: but it needeth an object, whereon to looke, and whence to conceive the act of vnderstanding. This object are the phantasies, or the resemblances of things received from the sense, and carried to the phantasie: But in effect his conclusion seemeth to carry a contrarie sense, when he maketh the Phantasie, in representing the object to the vnderstanding, to be a corporall Organum; neither can it be vnderstood to be an Organum of any thing, but of the vnderstanding. And he addeth that the resemblance of things in mans imagination, are to his vnderstanding and minde, as 30 colours are to the sight: whence it so followeth, that the imagination or phantasie it selfe is to the facultie of vnderstanding, as the eye is to the facultie of seeing, and as this is an Organum: so that. Of this question, How the Mind in all her actions maketh vse of the body, and hath communion with the body, I referre the Reader to a most graue and learned Discourse in the last Reply of Master Doctor Bifson, late Bishop of Winchester, vnto Henry Jacob. Howsoever the Truth be determined, wee must conclude, that it is neither in respect of reason alone, by which wee discouise, nor in respect of the minde it selfe, by which wee liue, nor in respect of our soules simply, by which wee are immortal, that we are made after the Image of God. But most safely may wee resemble our selues to God, in mente, and in respect of that pure facultie which is neuer separate from the contemplation and loue of God. Yet this is not all. 40

For Saint Bernard maketh a true difference betweene the nature and faculties of the Minde or Soule, and betweene the infusion of qualities, endowments and gifts of grace, wherewith it is adorned and enriched, which, being added to the nature, essence, and faculties, maketh it altogether to be after the Image of God, whose words are these: Non propterea imago Dei est, quia sui meminit Mens, sed, intelligit & diligit (which was also the opinion of Saint AUGUSTINE) sed quia potest meminisse, intelligere ac diligere eum a quo facta est, (that is) The minde (or Mens) was not therefore the 50 Image of God, because it remembereth, vnderstandeth, and loneth it selfe, but because it can remember, vnderstand, and loue God, who created it. And, that this Image may be deformed and made vnprofitable, heare BASIL: Homo ad imaginem & similitudinem Dei factus est, peccatum vero imaginis huius pulchritudinem deformauit: & inutilem reddidit; dum animam corruptis concupiscentie affectibus immergit: Man was made after the Image and similitude of God, but Sinne hath deformed the beautie of this Image, and made it it vnprofitable by drawing our minds into corrupt concupiscentie.

It is not therefore (as aforesaid) by reason of Immortallitie, nor in Reason, nor in Dominion, nor in any one of these by it selfe, nor in all these ioyned, by any of which, or by all which wee resemble, or may be called the shadow of God, though by reason and vnderstanding, with the other faculties of the Soule, we are made capable of this print; but chiefly, in respect of the habit of Originall righteousnesse, most perfectly infused by God into the mind and Soule of man in his first Creation. For it is not by nature, nor by her liberallitie, that wee were printed with the scale of Gods Image (though Reason may be faid to be of her gift, which ioyned to the soule 10 is a part of the Essentiall constitution of our proper Species) but from the bountifull grace of the Lord of all goodnesse, who breathed life into Earth, and continued within the Truncke of Dust and Clay, the inimitable habilitie of his owne Iustice, Pietie, and Righteousnesse.

Gen. 5. 22.

So long therefore (for that resemblance which Dominion hath) doe those that are powerfull retain the Image of God, as according to his Commandements they exercise the Office of Magistracy to which they are called, and sincerely walke in the wayes of God, which in the Scriptures is called, walking with God; and all other men 20 so long retain this Image, as they feare, loue, and serue God truly, (that is) for the loue of God alone, and do not bruite and detache his Seale by the weight of manifold and voluntary offences, and obstatinate finnes. For the vniust minde cannot bee after the Image of God, seeing God is Iustice it selfe; The bloud-thirstie hath it not; for God is Charitie, and mercie it selfe: Falshood, cunning practice, and ambition, are properties of Sathan; and therefore cannot dwell in one soule, together with God; and to bee thort, there is no likelihood betweene pure light and blacke darknesse, 2. Cor. 6. 14. betweene beautie and deformitie, or betweene righteousnesse and reprobation. And though Nature, according to common vnderstanding, haue made vs capable by the power of reason, and apt enough to receiue this Image of Gods goodnesse, which the sensuall soules of beasts cannot perceiue; yet were that aptitude naturall more inclinable to follow and imbrace the false and durelesse pleasures of this Stage-play 30 World, then to become the shadow of God by walking after him, had not the exceeding workmanship of Gods wisdom, and the liberallitie of his mercy, formed eyes to our soules, as to our bodies, which, piercing through the impurie of our flesh, behold the Highest Heavens, and thence bring Knowledge and Object to the Mind and Soule, to contemplate the euer-during glory, and termelesse ioy, prepared for those, which retain the Image and similitude of their Creator, preferring vn- defiled and vnrent the garment of the new man, which, after the Image of God, is created in Righteousnesse, and true Holinesse, as saith Saint Paul. Now, whereas it is thought by some of the Fathers, as by Saint Augustine, with whom Saint Ambrose 3. Cor. 3. 9. S. Ambrose. ioyneth, that, by sinne, the perfection of the Image is lost, and not the Image it selfe; 40 both opinions by this distinction may be well reconciled (to wit) that the Image of God, in man, may be taken two wayes; for eyther it is considered, according to natural gifts, and consisteth therein: namely to haue a reasonable and vnderstanding nature, &c. and in this sense, the Image of God is more lost by sinne, then the very reasonable or vnderstanding nature, &c. is lost: (or sinne doth not abolish and take away these naturall gifts) or, the Image of God is considered, according to supernaturall gifts, namely, of Diuine grace, and heavenly glory, which is indeed the perfection and accomplishment of the naturall Image; and this manner of similitude and Image of God, is wholly blotted out and destroyed by sinne.

The external man God formed out of the dust of the Earth, or according to the signification of the word, Adam of Adamath, of red Earth, or, ex limo terra, out of the slime of the Earth, or a mixed matter of Earth and Water. Non ex qualibet humo sed ex ghaphar adamath (ideff) ex pinguisima & mollissima: Not that God made an Image or Statue of Clay, but 10 out of Clay, Earth or dust God formed and made flesh, blond, and bone, with all parts of man. That Man was formed of Earth and Dust, did Abraham acknowledge, when in humble feare he called vnto God, to saue Sodome: *Let not my Lord now be angry, if I speake, I, that am but dust and ashes: And in these houses of Clay, whose foundation is in the dust, doe our soules inhabit, according to Job, and though our owne eyes doe euery where behold the fudden and relentless assaults of Death, and Nature assureth vs by neuer-failing experience, and Reason by infallible demonstration, that our times vpon the Earth haue neither certaintie nor durabilitie, that our Bodies are but the Anduiles of paine and diseases, and our Minds the Hiuies of vnnumbred cares, and sorowes, and passions: and that (when we are most glorified) wee are but those painted posts, against which Enuie and Fortune direct their Darts; yet such is the true unhappinesse of our condition, and the darke ignorance, which couereth the eyes of our vnderstanding, that wee only prize, pamper, and exalt this Vassall and Slaue of Death, and forget altogether (or only remember at our cast-away leasure) the imprisoned immortall Soule, which can neyther dye with the Reprobate, nor perith with the mortall parts of vertuous men: seeing Gods Iustice in the one, and his goodnesse in the other is exercised for euermore, as the euer-living subiects of his reward and punishment. But when is it that we examine this great account? neuer while wee haue one vanitie left vs to spend: we plead for Titles, till our breath faile vs; digge for Riches, while our strength enableth vs; exercise malice, while wee can reuenge; 30 and then, when Time hath beaten from vs both youth, pleasure, and health, and that nature it selfe hateth the house of old age, we remember with Job, that *wee must goe the way from whence we shall not returne, and that our bed is made ready for vs in the darke; And then I say, looking ouer-late into the bottome of our conscience (which Pleasure and Ambition had locked vp from vs all our liues, we behold therein the fearful Images of our actions past, and withall, this terrible inscription: That God will bring euery worke into iudgement, that man hath done vnder the Sunne.

But what examples haue euer moued vs; what perswasions reformed vs; or what threatnings made vs afraid? we behold other mens Tragedies plaied before vs, wee heare what is promised and threatened: but the worlds bright glorie hath put out the eyes of our minds; and these betraying lights, (with which we only see) doe neither looke vp towards themselves ioyes, nor downe towards endless sorrowes, till wee neither know, nor can looke for anything else, at the worlds hands. Diseases, famine, enemies, in vs no change haue wrought,
What erst we were, we are; still in the same snare caught:
No time can our corrupted manners mend,
In Vice we dwell, in Sinne that hath no end.

But let vs not flatter our immortall soules herein: for to neglect God all our liues, and know that we neglect him, to offend God voluntarily, and know that we offend him, casting our hopes on the Peace, which we trust to make at parting, is no other then a rebellious presumption, and (that which is the worst of all) euen a contemptuous laughing to scorne, and deriding of God, his Lawes and Precepts. *Frangit sperant, qui sic de misericordia Dei sibi blandiuntur; They hope in vaine, sayth BERNARD, Bern. in Ps. Of the Spirit of life, which God breathed into man, in his Creation.

IN this frame and carcassee God breathed the breath of life; and the man was a liuing soule: (that is) God gaue to a Body of earth and of corruptible matter, a Soule spirituall and incorruptible; not that God had any such bodily instruments as men vse, but God breathed the Spirit of life and immortallitie into man, as he breatheth his grace daily into such as loue and feare him. The Spirit of God (saith E. 1. 14. in 10. 8) hath made 10

*me, and the breath of the Almighty hath giuen me life: In qua sententia (saith RABANVS) vitanda est paupertas sensus carnalis, ne forte putemus Deum, vel manibus corporis de viuere formasse corpus hominis, vel faucibus aut labijs suis inspirasse in faciem formati, ut viuere possit, & spiraculum vitæ habere: Nam & Propheta cum ait, Manus tue fecerunt me, &c. Tropica hac locutione magis quam propria (ideff) iuxta consuetudinem, qua solent homines operari, loquutus est: In which sentence (saith he) the boggerness of carnall sense is to bee auoided, lest perhaps we should thinke, eyther that God with bodily hands made mans body of slime, or breathed with tawes or lips vpon his face (being formed) that hee might liue, and haue the spirit of life: for the Prophet also when he saith, Thy hand: hunc made me, (saith 30 this Tropically, rather then properly (that is) according to the custome which men vse in wor- king. Quantum est periculi hys, qui Scripturas sensu corporis legunt? In what danger are they that read the Scriptures in a carnall sense? By this breath was infused into man both life and soule; and therefore this (Soule) the Philosophers call *Animam, quæ viuitificat corpus, & animat. Which doth animate, & giue life to the body. The inspiration of the Almighty giueth vnderstanding, saith Job; and this Spirit, which God breathed into man, which is the reasonable soule of man, returneth againe to God that gaue it, as the body returneth vnto the Earth, out of which it was taken, according to Ecclesiastes: And dust shall returne to the Earth, out of which it was taken, and the spirit shall returne to God that gaue it. Neither is this word (spirit) vually otherwise taken in the Scriptures, then for the soule; as when Stephen cryed vnto God: Domine, suscipe spiritum meum; Lord Iesus, 40 receive my spirit: and in Saint Iohn, And Iesus bowed his head, and gaue up the Ghost, (which was) that his life and soule left his body dead. And that the immortall soule of man differeth from the soules of beafts, the manner of the creation maketh manifest: for it is written, Let the waters bring forth in abundance euery creeping thing; and let the Earth bring forth the liuing thing, according to his kind, the best of the Earth, &c. But of Man it is written, Let vs make man in our owne Image, &c. and further, that the Lord breathed in his face the breath of life. Wherefore, as from the Water and Earth were those creatures brought forth, and thence receiued life: so shall they againe be dissolved into the same first matter, whence they were taken: but the life of breath euerlasting, which God breathed into man, shall according to Eccle- 50 siastes, returne againe to God that gaue it,

MA

AN thus compounded and formed by God, was an abstract or modell, or briefe Storie of the Vniuersall: in whom God concluded the Creation, and worke of the World, and whom he made the last and most excellent of his Creatures, being internally endued with a diuine vnderstanding, by which he might contemplate and serue his Creator, after whose Image hee was formed, and endued with the powers and faculties of reason and other abilities, that thereby also he might gouerne and rule the World, and all other Gods creatures therein. And whereas God created three sorts of liuing natures, (to wit) Angelicall, Rationall, and Brutall; giuing to Angels an intellectuall, and to Beasts a sensuall nature, hee vouchsafed vnto Man, both the intellectuall of Angels, the sensitiue of Beasts, and the proper ratiouall belonging vnto man; and therefore (saith GREGORY NAZIANZENE:) Homo est vtriusq[ue] naturæ vinculum, Man is the bond and chaine which tyeth together both natures: and because in the little frame of mans body there is a representation of the Vniuersall, and (by allusion) a kind of participation of all the parts thereof, therefore was man called Microcosmos, or the little World. Deus igitur hominem factum, velut alterum quendam mundum in breui magnum, atq[ue] exiguo totum interris statuit, God therefore placed in the Earth the man whom hee had made, as it were another World, the great and large World in the small and little World: for out of the Earth and Dust was formed the flesh of Man, and therefore heaue and lumpish; the bones of his body wee may compare to the hard Rockes and Stones, and therefore strong and durable; of which Ouid:

From thence our kind hard-hearted is, enduring paine and care, Approuing, that our bodies of a stonie nature are,

His bloud, which disperseth it selfe by the branches of veines through all the bodie, may be resembled to those waters, which are carried by brookes and riuers ouer all the Earth; his breath to the Aire, his naturall heate to the inclosed warmth, which the Earth hath in it selfe, which stirred vp by the heate of the Sunne, assisteth Nature in the speedier procreation of those varieties, which the Earth bringeth forth: Our radicall moisture, Oile, or Balsamum (whereon the naturall heat feedeth and is maintained) is resembled to the fat and fertilitie of the Earth; the haire of mans bodie, which adorne or ouer-shadowes it, to the grasse, which covereth the vpper face and skin of the Earth; our generatiue power, to Nature, which produceth all things; our determinations, to the light, wandering and vnstable clouds, carried euery where with vncertaine winds; our eyes, to the light of the Sun and Moone, and the beauty of our youth, to the flowers of the Spring, which, either in a very short time, or with the Suns heat dry vp, and wither away, or the fierce pusses of wind blow them from the stalkes; the thoughts of our mind, to the motion of Angels; and our pure vnderstanding (formerly called Mens, and that which alwaies looketh vpwards) to those intellectuall natures, which are alwaies present with God; and lastly, our immortall soules while they are righteous) are by God himselfe beautified with the title of his owne Image and similitude. And although, in respect of God, there is no man iust, or good, or righteous: for in Angelis deprebensa est stultitia, Behold, hee found folly in his Angels, (saith Iob) yet with such a kind of difference, as there is betweene the substance, and the shadow, there may be found a goodnesse in man: which God being pleased to accept, hath therefore called man, the Image and similitude of his own righteousness.

Iob. 4. 18.

In this also is the little World of man compared, and made more like the Vniuersall (man being the measure of all things; Homo est mensura omnium rerum, saith Aristotle and Pythagoras) that the foure Complexions resemble the foure Elements, and the seuen Ages of man the seuen Planets: Whereof our Infancie is compared to the Moone, in which wee see only to liue and grow, as Plants; the second Age to Mercurie, wherein we are taught and instructed; our third Age to Venus, the dayes of loue, desire, and vanitie; the fourth to the Sunne, the strong, flourishing, and beautiful age of mans life; the fifth to Mars, in which wee seeke honor and victorie, and in which our thoughts trauaile to ambitious ends; the sixth Age is ascribed to Iupiter, in which wee begin to take account of our times, iudge of our felices, and grow to the perfection of our vnderstanding; the last and seuenth to Saturne, wherein our dayes are sad and ouer-cast, and in which we finde by deare and lamentable experience, and by the losse which can neuer be repayed, that of all our vaine passions and affections past, the sorrow only abideth: Our attendants are sicknesses, and variable infirmities; and by how much the more we are accompanied with plentie, by so much the more greedily is our end desired, whom when Time hath made vnfoolish to others, wee become a burthen to our felices: being of no other vse, then to hold the riches wee haue, from our Successors. In this time it is, when (as afore said) we, for the most part, and neuer before, prepare for our eternall habitation, which we passe 20 on vnto, with many sighes, grones, and sad thoughts, and in the end, by the workmanhip of death, finish the sorrowfull businesse of a wretched life, towards which we alwaies trauaile both sleeping and waking: neither haue those beloued companions of honor and riches any power at all, to hold vs any one day, by the promises of glorious entertainments; but by what crooked path focuer wee walke, the same leadeth on directly to the house of death: whose doores lye open at all houres, and to all persons. For this tyde of mans life, after it once turneth and declineth, euer runneth with a perpetuall Ebbe and falling Streame, but neuer floweth againe: our Lease once fallen, springeth no more, neither doth the Sunne or the Summer adorne vs againe, with the garments of new Leaues and Flowers.

For if there were any bayting place, or rest, in the course or race of mans life, then, according to the doctrine of the Academikes, the same might also perpetually be mainmaintayned; but as there is a continuance of motion in naturall living things, and as the sap and iuyce, wherein the life of Plants is preferred, doth euermore ascend or descend: so is it with the life of man, which is alwayes either encreasing towards ripeness and perfection, or declining and decrealing towards rottenness and dissolution.

¶ VI.

Of the free power, which man had in his first creation, to dispose of himselfe.

THese be the miseries which our first Parents brought on all mankind, vnto whom God in his creation gaue a free and vnconstrayned will, and on whom he bestowed the liberall choice of all things, with one only prohibition, to trie his gratitude and obedience. God set before him, a mortall and immortal Life, a Nature celestiall and terrene, and (indeed) God gaue man to himselfe, to be his owne guide, his owne workman, and his owne painter, that he might frame or describe vnto himselfe what he pleased, and make election of his owne forme. God made man in the beginning (saith SIRACIDES) and left him in the hands of his owne counsaile. Such was the liberalltie of God, and mans felicitie: whereas beasts, and all other creatures reasonlesse brought with them into the world (saith Lucilius) and that euen when they first fell from the bodies of their Dammes, the nature, which they could not change; and the supernall Spirits or Angels were from the beginning, or loone after, of that condition, in which they remaine in perpetuall eternitie. But (as aforesaid) God gaue vnto man all kinde of feedes and grafts of life (to wit) the vegetatiue life of Plants, the sensuall of Beasts, the rationall of Man, and the intellectuall of Angels, wherof which soener he tooke pleasure to plant and cultiue, the same should futurely grow in him, and bring forth fruit, agreeable to his owne choice and plantation. This freedome of the first man Adam, and our first Father, was anigmatically described by Alepius Atheniensis 30 (saith Mirandula) in the person and fable of Proteus, who was said, as often as he pleased, to change his shape. To the same end were all those celebrated Metamorphoses among the Pythagorians, and ancient Poets, wherein it was sayned, that men were transformed into diuers shapes of beasts, thereby to shew the change of mens conditions, from Reason to Brutalltie, from Vertue to Vice, from Meeknesse to Crueltie, and from Iustice to Oppression. For by the liuely image of other creatures did those Ancients represent the variable passions, and affections of mortall men; as by Serpents, were signified Deceiuers; by Lyons, Oppressors, and cruell men; by Swine, Men giuen ouer to lust and sensualltie; by Wolves, rauening and greedie Men; which also S. Matthew resemblen to false prophets, Which come to you in sheeps clothing, but inwardly they are rauening Wolves, by the images of fiones and stocks, foolish and ignorant men, by Vipers, vngratefull men: of which S. Iohn Baptist, O yee generation of Vipers, &c.

¶ VII.

Of Gods ceasing to create any more: and of the cause thereof, because the vniuersall created was exceeding good.

IN this worke of Man, God finished the creation; not that God laboured as a man, and therefore rested: for God commanded, and it was finished, Cui voluisse est fecisse; With whom, to will is to make, saith Beda. Neither did God so rest, that he left the world made, and the creatures therein to themselves: for my Father worketh to this day (saith Christ) and I worke; but God

God rested, (that is) he created no new species or kindes of creatures, but (as aforesaid) gaue vnto man a power generatiue, and so to the rest of liuing creatures, and to Plants and Flowers their seedes in themselves; and commanded man to multiply and fill the earth, and the Earth and Sea to bring forth creatures according to their severall kindes: all which being finished, God saw that his workes were good; not that before knew not, and comprehended not the beginning and end before they weres for God made every Plant of the field before it was in the Earth, but he gaue to all things which he had created the name of good, thereby to teach men, that from so good a God there was nothing made, but that which was perfect good, and from whose simple puritie and from so excellent a cause, there could proceede no impure or imperfect effect. For man hauing a free will and liberall choyce, purchased by disobedience his owne death and mortalitie, and for the crueltie of mans heart, was the earth afterward cursed, and all creatures of the first age destroyed: but the righteous man Noah, and his familie, with those creatures which the Arke contained, referred by God to replenish the earth.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradise.

¶ I.

That the seate of Paradise is greatly mistaken: and that it is no maruaile that men should erre.

CONCERNING the first habitation of man we reade, that the Lord God planted a Garden, Eastward, in Eden, and there he put the man whom he made, GEN. 2. 6. Of this seate and place of Paradise, all ages haue held dispute; and the opinions and iudgements haue been in effect, as diuers, among those that haue written vpon this part of Genesis, as vpon any one place therein, seeming most obscure: some there are, that haue conceived the being of the terrestriall Paradise, without all regard of the worlds Geographie, and without any respect of East and West, or any consideration of the place where Moses wrote, and from whence he directed (by the quarters of the heauens) the way how to finde out and iudge, in what Region of the world this garden was by God planted, wherein he was exceeding respectiue and precise. Others, by being themselves ignorant in the Hebrew, followed the first interpretation, or trusting to their owne iudgements, vnderstood one place for another; and one error is so fruitfull, as it begetteth a thousand Children, if the licentiousnesse thereof be not timely restrayned. And thirdly, those Writers which gaue themselves to follow and imitate others, were in all things so obseruant Sectators of those Masters, whom they admired and beleueed in, as they thought it safer to condemne their owne vnderstanding, then to examine theirs. For (saith Vadius in his Epistle of Paradise) Magnos errores (magnorum virorum auctoritate persuasi) transmissimus; We passe over many grosse errors, by the authoritie of great men led and perswaded. And it is true, that many of the Fathers were farre wide from the vnderstanding of this place. I speake it not, that I my selfe dare presume to censure them, for I reuerence both their learning learning and their pietie, and yet not bound to follow them any further, then they are guided by truth: for they were men; Et humanum est errare. And to the end that no man should be proud of himselfe, God hath distributed vnto men such a proportion of knowledge, as the wisest may behold in themselves their owne weakness: Nullumqum dedit omnid Deus; God neuer gave the knowledge of all things to any one. S. Paul confesse that he knew not, whether he were taken vp into the third heauen in the flesh, or out of the flesh; and Christ himselfe acknowledgeth thus much, that neither Men, nor Angels knew of the latter day; and therefore, seeing knowledge is infinite, it is God (according to S. Iude) who is only wise. Sapientia vbi inuenitur? (saith Io. 1.) but where is wisdom found? and where is the place of vnderstanding? man knoweth not the price thereof, for it is not found in the Land of the living. And therefore seeing God found folly in his Angels, mens iudgements (which inhabit in houses of clay) cannot be without their mistakings: and so the Fathers, and other learned men excusable in particulars, especially in those whereupon our saluation dependeth not.

¶ II.

A recitall of strange opinions, touching Paradise.

NOW touching Paradise, first it is to be enquired, whether there were a Paradise, or no? or whether Moses description were altogether mytical, and allegoricall? as Origen, Philo, Fran. Georgius, with others haue affirmed, and that vnder the names of those foure Riues, Pison, Gehon, Hiddekel, and Perath. The tree of life, and the tree of Knowledge, there were deliuered vnto vs other mysteries and significations; as, that by the foure Riues were meant the foure Cardinal vertues, Iustice, Temperance, Fortitude, and Prudence, or (by other) Oyle, Wine, Milke, and Honny. This Allegoricall vnderstanding of Paradise by Origen diuulged, was againe by Franciscus Georgius receiued (saith Sixtus Senensis) whose triuolous imaginations Sixtus himselfe doth fully and learnedly answer, in the 34. Annotation of his fitt Booke, fol. 338. the last Edition.

Amb. de Parad.

S. Ambrose also leaned wholly to the Allegoricall construction, and set Paradise in the third heauen, and in the vertues of the minde. Et in nostro principali, which is, as I conceiue it, in mente, or in our soules: to the particulars whereof he alludeth in this sort. By the place or garden of Paradise, was meant the soule or minde; by Adam, Ment, or Vnderstanding; by Eue, the Senle; by the Serpent, Delectation; by the Tree of good and euill, Sapience; and by the rest of the Trees, the vertues of the minde, or in the minde planted, or from thence springing. Notwithstanding all which, vpon the first of the Corinthians, cap. 6. he in direct wordes alloweth both of a celestiall and terrestriall Paradise; the one, into which S. Paul was rapt; the other, into which Adam was put by God. Aug. Chrysostomus was of opinion, that a Paradise had beene, but that there was not now any marke thereof on the earth: the same being not onely defaced, but withall the places now not so much as existing. To which Luther seemeth to adhere.

The Manichees also vnderstood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth; to which opinion Vadianus inclineth, as I conceiue his wordes in two seuerall places. First, vpon this: Fill the earth, GEN. 10. Of which he giueth this iudgement. Hoc ipso etiam quod dixit, Replete terram, dominamini vniuersis animantibus, subicite terram, clarissime docet, totam terram extantem, & omnigenis (vt tum erat) fructibus constam, sedem & hortum illud ADAM, & posteritatis futuræ fuisse; These wordes (saith he) in which God said, Bring forth fruit and multiply, and fill the earth, and subdue it, and rule over every creature, doe cleerly shew, that the vniuersall earth set or filled with all sorts of fruits (as then it was) was the garden and estate of ADAM, and of his future posteritie. And afterward he acknowledgeth the place, out of the Acts the 17. Apostolus ex vno sanguine guine omne genus humanum adeo factum docet, ut habitarent super vniuersam faciem terre: tota igitur terra Paradisus ille erat; The Apostle (saith he) teacheth, that God hath made of one blood all mankind, to dwell ouer all the face of the earth: and therefore all the earth (saith he) was that Paradise. Which coniectures I will answer in order. Goropius Becanus differeth not much from this opinion, but yet he acknowledgeth that Adam was first planted by God in one certaine place, and peculiar Garden; which place Goropius findeth neere the Riuier of Arcsinus, in the confines of India.

Tertullian, Bonauenture, and Durandus, make Paradise vnder the Aequinoctiall, and Possellus, quite contrarie, vnder the North pole: the Chaldeans also for the most part, and all their Sectators, followed the opinion of Origen, or rather Origen theirs, who would either make Paradise a figure, or Sacrament only, or else would haue it located out of this sensible world, or rayled into some high and remote Region of the Aire. Strabus, and Rabanus, were both sicke of this vanitie, with Origen, and Philo: so was our venerable Beda, and Pet. Comestor, and Moses Barcephas the Syrian, translated by Masius. But as Hopkins sayes of Philo Iudeus, that he wondred, Quo malo genio affectus; By what euill Angell he was blowne vp into this error: so can I not but greatly maruaile at these learned men, who so grossly and blindly wandered; seeing Moses, and after him the Prophets, doe so plainly describe this place, by the Region, in which it was planted, by the Kingdomes and Prouinces bordering it, by the Riues which watered it, and by the points of the Compasse vpon which it lay, in respect of India, or Canaan.

Neuimagus also, vpon Beda, De naturæ verum, beleueneth that all the Earth was taken for Paradise, and not any one place. For the whole Earth (saith he) hath the same beaue adscribed to Paradise. He addeth, that the Ocean was that Fountayne, from whence the foure Riues, Pison, Gehon, Tigris, and Euphrates, had their beginning: for he could not thinke it possible, that these Riues of Ganges, Nilus, Tigris, and Euphrates, (whereof the one ranne through India, the other through Egypt, and the other two through Mesopotamia and Armenia) could rise out of one Fountayne, were it not out of the Fountayne of the Ocean.

¶ III.

That there was a true locall Paradise Eastward, in the Countrie of Eden.

O the first therefore, that such a place there was vpon the earth, the words of Moses make it manifest, where it is written, And the Lord God planted a garden Eastward in Eden, and there he put the man whom he had made. And howsoever the vulgar translation, called Hieronymus translation, hath conuerted this place thus, Plantauerat Dominus Deus Paradisum voluptatis à principio; The Lord God planted a Paradise of pleasure from the beginning; putting the word (pleasure) for Eden, and (from the beginning) for Eastward: It is manifest, that in this place Eden is the proper name of a Region. For what sense hath this translation (saith our Hopkins, in his Treatise of Paradise) that he planted a garden in pleasure, or that a Riuer went out of pleasure to water the garden? But the seuentie Interpreters call it Paradisum Edenis, the Paradise of Eden, and so doth the Chaldean Paraphrast truly take it for the proper name of a place, and for a Neome appellative; which Region in respect of the fertilitye of the soile, of the many beautifull Riues, and goodly Woods, & that the trees (as in the Indies) doe alwaies keepe their leaues, was called Eden, which signifieth in the Hebrew, pleasantness or delicacie, as the Spaniards call the Countrie opposite to the Isle of Cuba, Florida: and this is the mistaking, which may end the dispute, as touching the double sense of the word, that as Florida was a Countrie, so called for the flourishing beautie thereof, so was Eden a Region called pleasure, or delicacie, for the pleasure, or delicacie: and as Florida signifieth flourishing: so Eden signifieth pleasure, and yet both are the proper names names of Countries; for Eden being the proper name of a Region (called Pleasure in the Hebrew) and Paradise being the choice seat of all that Region, Paradise was truly the Garden of Eden, and truly the Garden of Pleasure.

Gen. cap. 3.

Now, for Eastward, to translate it, from the beginning, it is also contrarie to the translation of the Septuagint; to the ancient Greeke Fathers, as Basil, Chrysostome, Theodoret, Gregorie; and to the Rabbins, as Ramban, Rabbi Salomon, R. Abraham, and Chimebi; and of the Latines, Seuerinus, Damascenus, &c. who plainly take Eden for the proper name of a Region, and let the word (Eastward) for ab initio: for Damascenus owne wordes are these, Paradisus est locus Dei manibus in Eden ad Orientem mirabiliter constructus; Paradise is a place, maruailously planted by the hands of God, in Eden, to ward the East.

And after all these Fathers, Guilhelmus Parisiensis, a great learned man, and Sixtus Senensis, of later times, doe both vnderstand these wordes of Eden, and of the East, contrarie to the vulgar translation; Parisiensis, as indifferent to both, and Sixtus Senensis, directly against the vulgar: of which these are their owne wordes: After this I will beginne to speake of Paradise terrestriall, which God planted from the beginning, or Eastward, &c. Post hac incipiam loqui de Paradiso terrestri, quem plantasse Deum ab initio vel ad Orientem, &c. And then Senensis; *Moses enim clarissime prodit, Paradisum à Deo constum in regione terre Orientalis, quæ dicitur Heden: Heden autem esse proprium nomen apparet ex quarto capite Gen. ubi legitur CHAM habitasse ad Orientalem plagam Eden; For Moses (saith he) doth shew most cleerely, that Paradise was planted of God in a Region of the East Countrey, which is called Heden: but that Heden is a proper name, it appeareth by the fourth Chapter of Genesis, where we reade, that CHAM dwelt on the East border of Heden. PERRIUS endeavoureth to qualifie this translation: for this particule (saith he) ab initio, is referred to all the time of the creation, and not to the very first day; alleging this place of Christ, that although the Deuill was said to be a man-slayer from the beginning, yet that was meant but after the sixth day. But surely, as I thinke (referring my selfe to better iudgement) the Deuill was from the instant of this fall a man-slayer in disposition, though he had not whereon to practise till mans creation. And for conclusion, S. Hierome (if that be his translation) aduise himselfe better in the end of the third Chapter of Genesis, conuerting the word (Eden) by (ante) and not (à principio) as, God did set a Cherubin before the Garden of Eden; Collocauit Deus ante Paradisum voluptatis Cherubin; and Pererius himselfe acknowledged, that this is the true sense of this place, precisely taken, according to the Hebrew. Posuit à parte Orientali horti Heden, Cherubin; He set on the East-side of the Garden of Heden, Cherubin. BECANVS affirmeth, that the Hebrew word (Be) significeth (with) aswell as (in) and so the Text beareth this sense; That God planted a Garden with pleasure (that is to say) full of pleasure. But Becanus followeth this construction, only to the end, to finde Paradise vpon the Riuer of Acefinis: for there he hath heard of the Indian Fig-tree in great abundance, which he supposeth to be the tree of Knowledge of good and euill, and would therefore draw Paradise to the Fig-tree: which conceit of his I will answer hereafter.*

Now, because Paradise was seated by Moses toward the East, thence came the custome of praying toward the East, and not by imitation of the Chaldeans: and therefore all our Churches are built East and West, as to the point where the Sunne riseth in March, which is directly ouer Paradise (saith Damascenus;) affirming, that we alwayes pray towards the East, as looking towards Paradise, whence we were cast out; and yet the Temple of Salomon had their Priests and Sacrifices, which turned themselves in their seruice and diuine ceremonies, alwayes toward the West, thereby to auoid the superstition of the Aegyptians and Chaldeans.

But because East and West are but in respect of places; (for although Paradise were East from India, yet it was West from Persia) and the seruing of God is euery where in the world, the matter is not great which way we turne our faces, so our hearts stand right, other than this, that we who dwell West from Paradise, and pray turning turning our selues towards the East, may remember thereby to beseech God, that as by Adams fall we haue lost the Paradise on Earth: so by Christs death and passion we may be made partakers of the Paradise celestiall, and the Kingdome of Heauen. To conclude, I conceiue, that there was no other myserie in adding the word (East) to Eden by Moses, then to shew, that the Region of Eden, in which Paradise was, lay Eastward from India and Canaan: for the Scriptures alwayes called the people of those Nations, the Sonnes of the East, which inhabited Arabia, Mesopotamia, Chaldaea, and Persia: of which Ouid:

Eurus ad Auroram, Nabataean, regna recessit, Persidag, & radijs iuga subdita matutinis.

The East wind with Aurora hath abiding Among th' Arabian, and the Persian Hills, Whom Phœbus first salutes at his vp-rising.

And if it be objected, that Micemie the Prophet threatening the destruction of Iherusalem, doth often make mention of Northerne Nations, it is to be noted, that the North is there named, in respect of those Nations that followed Nabuchodonosor, and of whom the greatest part of his Armie was compounded; not that Babylon it selfe stood North from Iherusalem, though inclining from the East toward the North.

Now to the difference of this Translation, Peter Comestor giueth best satisfaction: for he vseth the word, From the beginning, that is, from the first part of the world, (à principio) id est (saith hee) à prima orbis parte, and afterward hee affirmeth, that (à principio, and ad Orientem) haue the same signification; From the beginning and Eastward is all one, à principio id est quod ad Orientem.

But to returne to the proofe of this place, and that this Story of Mankind was not Allegoricall, it followeth in the Text of the second Chapter and ninth Verse in these words: For out of the ground made the Lord God to grow euery Tree pleasant to the sight, and good for meate, &c. so as first it appeared that God created Adam elsewhere, as in the World at large, and then, put him into the Garden: and the end why, is exprest: that hee might dress it and keepe it; Paradise being a Garden or Orchard filled with Plants, and Trees, of the most excellent kinds, pleasant to behold, and (withall) good for meate: which proueth that Paradise was a terrestriall Garden, garnished with Fruits, delighting both the eye and taste. And to make it more plaine, and to take away all opinion of Allegoricall construction, hee affirmeth that it was watered and beautified with a Riuer; expressing also the Region, out of which this Riuer sprang, which he calleth Heden; and that Heden is also a Countrey neere vnto Charan in Me-

40 sopotamia, Ezechiel witnesseth.

But to all these Cabalists, which draw the Truth and Story of the Scriptures into Allegories, Epiphanius answereth in these wordes: Si Paradisus non est sensibilis, non est citian sens, si non est sens, non est flumen, si non est flumen, non sunt quatuor principia, non Pison, non Gehon, non Tigris, nec Euphrates, non est ficus, non folia, non comedit Eva de arbore, non est ADAM, non sunt homines, sed veritas iam fabula est, & omnia ad Allegoria reuocantur: If Paradise be not sensible, then there was no fontaine, and then no Riuer; if no Riuer, then no such foure heads or branches, and then not any such Riuer as Pison, or Gehon, Tigris, or Euphrates, no such Fig-tree, or fruit, or leanes, Eve then did not eat of the fruit, neither was there any ADAM, or any man, the truth was but a Fable, and all things effect-50 mea are called backe into Allegories. Words to the same effect hath Saint Hierome vpon DANIEL: Conticebant eorum deliramenta, qui vmbra & imagines in veritate sequentes, ipsam conantur euertere veritatem, ut Paradisum & flumina, & arbores patient Allegoria Legimus debere subnuere, Let the dotages of them bee silent, who following shadowes and images in the Truth, endeavour to subuert the Truth it selfe, and thinke that they ought to bring Paradise, and the Rivers and the Trees under the rules of Allegorie.

Furthermore, by the continuation and order of the Storie is the place made more manifest. For God gave Adam free libertie to eate of every Tree of the Garden, (the Tree of knowledge excepted) which Trees Moses in the ninth verse saith that they were good to eate; meaning the fruit which they bare. Besides, God left all beasts to Adam to be named, which he had formerly made; and these beasts were neither in the third Heauen, nor neere the Circle of the Moone, nor beafts in imagination: for if all these things were Enigmati- cally or Mytically, the same might also bee said of the creation of all things. And Ezechiel speaking of the glory of the Assyrian Kings vseth this speech: All the Trees of Eden, which were in the Garden of God, enuied him, which is proueth both Eden, and Paradise therein seated to bee terrestriall: for the Prophets made no imaginary comparisons. But Moses wrote plainly, and in a simple stile, fit for the capacities of ignorant men, and he was more large and precise in the description of Paradise, then in any other place of Scriptures, of purpose to take away all scruple from the incredulitie of future ages, whom he knew (out of the gift of Prophecie) to be apt to fabulous inuentions, and that if he had not described both the Region and the Riuers, and how it stood from Canaan, many of the vnbeleeing Israelites, and others after them, would haue misconstrued this Storie of Mankind. And is it likely, there would haue beene so often mention made of Paradise in the Scriptures, if the same had beene an Utopia? For we find that the Valley, wherein Sodom and Gomorrha stood, (sometimes called Pentapolis, of the five principall Cities therein) was before the destruction (which their vnnatural sinne purchased) compared to the Paradise of the Lord, and like to the Land of Egypt toward Zoar; In like manner was Isaie resembled to the Paradise of God, before the Babylonians walked it: which proueth plainly, that Paradise it selfe exceeded in beautie and fertilitye, and that these places had but a resemblance thereof: being compared to a seat and soyle of farre exceeding excellencie.

Besides, whence had Homer his inuention of Alcinous Gardens, as Iustin Martyr noteth, but out of Moses his description of Paradise? Gen. 2. and whence are their prayes of the Elisian fields, but out of the Storie of Paradise? to which also appertaine those Verses of the Golden Age in Ouid:

Vix erat aeternum, placidus, repentibus auris Mulcebant Zephyri uates sine semine flores.

The ioyfull Spring did euer last,
And Zephyrus did breed
Without the helpe of seed
Sweet flowers by his gentle blast.

And it is manifest, that Orpheus, Linus, Pindarus, Hesiodus, and Homer, and after him, Ouid, one out of another, and all these together with Pythagoras and Plato, and their Sectarours, did greatly enrich their inuentions, by venting the stolne Treasures of Diuine Letters, altered by prophane additions, and disguised by poetical conuersions, as if they had beene conceived out of their owne speculations and conceptions.

But besides all these testimonies, if we find what Region Heden or Eden was; if we proue the Riuier that ranne out of it, and that the same afterwards was diuided into foure branches; together with the Kingdomes of Manila and Cash, and that all these are Eastward from Canaan, or the Desarts of the Amoritae, where Moses wrote, I then conceiue, that there is no man that will doubt, but that such a place there was. And yet I doe not exclude the Allegoricall sense of the Scripture; for aswell in this there were many figures of Christ, as in all the old Testament throughout: the Storie being directly true notwithstanding. And to this purpose (saith Saint Augustine)

Tres

Tres sunt de Paradiso generales sententiae: una est eorum, qui tantummodo corporaliter Paradisum intelligi volunt: alia eorum, qui spiritualiter tantum (id est) Ecclesiam: tertia eorum, qui utroque modo Paradisum accipiunt, (that is) There are three opinions of Paradise: the one of those men, which will haue it altogether corporal: a second of those which conceiue it altogether spiritual, and to be a figure of the Church: the third of those, which take it in both senses; which third opinion Saint Augustine approoueth, and of which Suidas giueth this allowable iudgement: Quemadmodum homo sensibilis, & intelligibilis simul conditus erat: sic & huius sanctissimum nuncus, sensible simul & intelligibile, & duplici specie est praeformatum, (that is) A man was created at one time both sensible and intelligible: so was this holy Grove or Garden to be taken both wayes, and endued with a double forme.

§. IIII.

Why it should be needfull to intreat diligently of the place of Paradise.

BUT it may be objected, that it is needlesse, and a kind of curiositie to enquire so diligently after this place of Paradise, and that the knowledge thereof is of little or no vse. To which I answer, that there is nothing written in the Scriptures, but for our instruction; and if the truth of the Storie be necessary, then by the place proued, the same is also made more apparent. For if we should conceiue that Paradise were not on the Earth, but lifted vp as high as the Moone; or that it were beyond all the Ocean, and in no part of the knowne World, from whence Adam was sayd to waite through the Sea, and thence to haue come into Iudas, (out of doubt) there would be few men in the World, that would giue any credit vnto it. For what could seeme more ridiculous then the report of such a place? and besides, what maketh this feare of Paradise so much disputed and doubted of, but the conceit that Pisbon should bee Ganges, which watereth the East India, and Schon, Nilus, which enricheth Egypt; and these two Riuers so far distant, as (except all the World were Paradise) these streames can no way be comprized therein?

Secondly, if the birth and workes, and death of our Sauour, were said to haue beene in some fuch Countrey, of which no man euer heard tell, and that his Miracles had bene performed in the Ayre, or no place certainly knowne: I assure my selfe, that the Christian Religion would haue taken but a slender roote in the minds of men: for times and places are approued witness of worldly actions.

Thirdly, if we should relye, or giue place to the iudgements of some Writers vpon this place of Genesis (though otherwife for their doctrine in general, they are worthy of honour and reuerence) I say that there is no fable among the Grecians or Aegyptians more ridiculous: for who would beleuee that there were a piece of the World so set by it selfe and separated, as to hang in the Ayre vnder the Circle of the Moone? or who so doltish to conceiue, that from thence the foure Riuers of Ganges, Nilus, Euphrates, and Tigris, should fall downe, and runne vnder all the Ocean, and rise vp againe in this our habitable World, and in those places where they are now found? Which lest any man thinke, that I enforce or straine to the world, these are Peter Comestor owne words. Est autem locus amoenissimus, longo terra & maris tractu a nostra habitabili Zona secretus, aduocatus, ut vix ad Lunarem globum attingat, &c. (that is) It is a most pleasant place, cuered from our habitable Zone by a long tract of Land and Sea, elevated so, that it reacheth to the Globe of the Moone.

And Moses Barcephas vpon this place writeth in this manner: Deinde hoc quoque responsum volumus, Paradisum multo sublimiore positum esse regione, atq. hac nostra exte- terra, eog. fieri, ut illic per precipitium delabantur fluij tanto cum impetu, quantum verbis exprimere non possis; eog. impetu impulsu praesig. sub Oceani vada rapinuntur, vnderius sus prosilant ebulliant q. in hoc a nobis culto orbe: which haue this sense: Furthermore

(sayth

(sayth he) we giue this for an answer, that Paradise is sit in a Region farre rayed about this part which wee inhabit; whereby it comes to passe, that from thence these Riuers fall downe with such a headlong violence, as words cannot expresse; and with that force so impelled and prest, they are caried vnder the deepe Ocean, and doe againe arise and boyle vp in this our habitable World: and to this he addeth the opinion of Ephram, which is this. Ephram dicit Paradisum ambire terram, atq; ultra Oceanum ita positum esse, ut totum terrarum orbem ab omni circumdet regione, non aliter atq; Luna orbis Lunam cingit, (which is) That Paradise doth compass or embrace the whole Earth, and is so set beyond the Ocean Sea, as it enuiroth the whole Orbe of the Earth on every side, as the Orbe of the Moon doth embrace the Moon. To the end therefore that these ridiculous expositions and opinions doe not bring question vnto Truth it selfe, or make the same subiect to doubts or disputes, it is necessarie to discouer the true place of Paradise, which God in his wisdom appointed in the very Naele of this our World, and (as Melanchton saies) in parte terrae meliore, in the best part thereof, that from thence, as from a Centre; the Vniuersall might be filled with people and planted; and by knowing this place, wee shall the better iudge of the beginning of Nations, and of the Worlds inhabitation: for neere vnto this did the Sonnes of Noah also disperse themselves after the Flood, into all other remote Regions and Countries. And if it be a generous desire in men, to know from whence their owne forefathers haue come, and out of what Regions and Nations, it cannot be displeasing to vnderstand the place of our first Ancestor, from whence all the freames and branches of Mankind haue followed and beene deduced. If then it doe appeare by the former, that such a place there was as Paradise, and that the knowledge of this place cannot be vnprofitable, it followeth in order to examine the severall opinions before remembred, by the Truth it selfe; and to see how they agree with the sense of the Scripture, and with common reason, and afterward to prouoe directly, and to delineate the Region in which God first planted this delightfull Garden.

§. V.

That the Flood hath not utterly defaced the markes of Paradise, nor caused Hills in the Earth.

N^o first, whereas it is supposed by Aug. Clysamenis, that the Flood hath altered, deformed, or rather annihilated this place, in such sort, as no man can find any marke or memory thereof: (of which opinion there were others also, ascribing to the Flood the cause of those high Mountaines, which are found on all the Earth ouer, with many other strange effects) for my owne opinion, I thinke neither the one nor the other to be true. For although I cannot deny, but that the face of Paradise was after the Flood withered, and growne old, in respect of the first beautie: (for both theages of men, and the nature of all things Time hath changed) yet if there had beene no signe of any such place, or if the soile and fcare had not remained, then would not Moses, who wrote of Paradise about 850. yeeres after the Flood, haue described it so particularly, and the Prophets long after Moses would not haue made so often mention thereof. And though the very Garden it selfe were not then to beee found, but that the Flood, and other accidents of time made it one common field and pasture with the Land of Eden, yet the place is still the same, and the Riuers still remaine the same Riuers. By two of which (neuer doubted of) to wit, Tigris, and Euphrates, wee are sure to find in what longitude Paradise lay; and learning out one of these Riuers, which afterward doth diuide it selfe into foure branches, wee are sure that the partition is at the very border of the Garden it selfe. For it is written, that out of Eden went a Riuer to water the Garden, and from thence it was diuided and became into foure heads: Now whether the word in the Latine Translation (Inde) from thence, be referred to Eden it selfe, selfe, or to Paradise, yet the diuision and branching of those Riuers must bee in the North or South side of the very Garden (if the Riuers runne as they doe, North and South) and therefore these Riuers yet remaining, and Eden manifestly knowne, there could be no such defacing by the Flood, as is supposed. Furthermore, as there is no likelihood, that the place could be so altered as future ages know it not, so is there no probability, that either these Riuers were turned out of their courses, or new Riuers created by the Flood which were not, or that the Flood (as aforesaid) by a violent motion, when it began to decrease, was the cause of high Hills, or deepe Vallies. For what descent of waters could there bee in a Sphericall and round bodie, wherein there is nor high nor low? seeing that all violent force of waters is eyther by the strength of winde, by descent from a higher to a lower, or by the ebbe or flood of the Sea. But that there was any winde (whereby the Seas are most enraged) it appeareth not, rather the contrary is probable: for it is written, Therefore God made a winde to passe vpon the Earth, and the waters ceased. So as it appeareth not, that vntill the waters stanke, but there was any winde at all, but that God afterward, out of his goodnesse, caused the winde to blow, to dry vp the abundant slime and muddle of the Earth, and make the Land more firme, and to cleanse the Ayre of thicke vapours and vnholosome mists; and this we know by experience, that all downe-right raines doe euer more disfigure the violence of outrageous winds, and beat downe, and leuell the swelling and mountainous billow of the Sea: for any ebbs and floods there could be none, when the waters were equal and of one heighth ouer all the face of the Earth, and when there were no Indraughts, Bayes, or Gulfs to receiue a Flood, or any descent, or violent falling of waters in the round forme of the Earth and waters, as aforesaid: and therefore it seemeth most agreeable to reason, that the waters rather flood in a quiet calme, than that they moued with any raging or ouer-bearing violence. And for a more direct proofe that the Flood made no such destroying alteration, Ioseph. auoweth that one of those pillars erected by Seth, the third from Adam, was to beee seene in his dayes, which Pillars were set vp about 1426. yeeres before the flood, counting Seth to be an hundred yeeres old at the erection of them, and Ioseph. himselfe, to haue liued some 40. or 50. yeeres after Christ: of whom although there be no cause to beleene all that he wrote, yet that, which hee auouched of his owne time, cannot (without great derogation) be called in question. And therefore it may be possible, that some foundation or ruine thereof might then be seene. Now that such Pillars were rayed by Seth, all Antiquitie hath auowed. It is also written in Berosus (to whom although I giue little credit, yet I cannot condemne him in all) that the Citie of Enoch built by Cain, about the Mountaines of Libanus, was not defaced by length of time: yea the ruines thereof Annius (who commented vpon that inuented Fragment) saith, were to be seene in his dayes, who liued in the Raigne of Ferdinand and Isabella of Castile; and if these his words bee not true, then was hee exceeding impudent. For, speaking of this Citie of Enoch, hee concludeth in this sort: Cuius maxima & ingentis molis fundamenta visuntur, & vocatur ab incolis regionis, Citius Cain, ut nostri mercatores, & peregrini referunt; The foundation of which huge Masse is now to be seene, and the place is called by the people of that Region, the Citie of Cain, as both our strangers and Merchants report. It is also auowed by Pomponius Mela, (to whom I giue more credit in these things) that the Citie of Ioppa was built before the Flood, ouer which Cephus was King: whose name with his Brother Phineus, together with the grounds and principles of their Religion, was found grauen vpon certaine Altars of stone; and it is not vnpossible, that the ruines of this other Citie, called Enoch by Annius, might be seene, though founded in the first Age: but it could not be of the first Citie of the World, built by Cain, the place, rather then the time, denying it.

Gen. 1. 10.

And to prouoe directly, that the flood was not the cause of Mountaines, but that there were Mountaines from the Creation it is written, that the waters of the flood ouerflowed by fiftene Cubits the highest Mountaines. And Masius Damasenus speaking of the the Flood, writeth in this manner. *Et supra Minyadam excelsus mons in Armenia (qui Baris appellatur) in quo confingentes multos sermo est diluuij tempore liberator, And vpon Minyada there is an high Mountaine, in Armenia (called Baris) vnto which (as it is said) that many fled in the time of the Deluge, and that they saued themselves thereon. Now although it is contrary to Gods Word, that any more were sated then eight persons (which Mais doth not auaunch, but by report) yet it is a testimonie, that such Mountaines were before the Flood, which were afterwards, and euer since, knowne by the same names; and on which Mountaines it is generally receiued that the Arke rested: but vntruely, as I shall prouue hereafter. And againe it appeareth, that the Mount Sion (though by another name) was knowne before the Flood: on which the Talmudists report, that many Giants saued themselves also; but (as Annus saith) without all authoritie, eyther Diuine or Humane.*

Gen. 8. 11.

Lastly, it appeareth that the Flood did not so turne vp side-downe the face of the Earth, as thereby it was made past knowledge, after the waters were decreased, by this that, when Noah sent out the Dove the second time, she returned with an Olive leaf in her mouth, which (hee had pluckt, and which (vntill the Trees were discouered) hee found not: for otherwise hee might haue found them floating on the water; a manifest proofe, that the Trees were not torne vp by the rootes, nor swamme vpon the waters, for it is written: solum Olina, raptum or decerptum, a leafe pluckt, (which is) to take from a Tree, or to reare off. By this it is apparent, (there being nothing written to the contrarie) that the Flood made no such alteration, as was supposed, but that the place of Paradise might be seene to succeeding Ages, especially vnto Moses, by whom it pleased God to teach the truth of the Worlds Creation, and vnto the Prophets which succceeded him: both which I take for my warrant, and to guide me in this Discouerie.

§. VI.

That Paradise was not the whole Earth, as some haue thought: making the Ocean to be the fountaine of those foure Rivers.

His conceit of Aug. Chylamenus being answered, who only giueth his opinion for reason, I will in a few words examine that of the Manichees, of Neuionagus, Vadianus, Goropius Becanus, and all those that vnderstood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth. But in this I shall not trouble the Reader with many words, because by those places of Scripture formerly remembred, this Vniuersalitie will appeare altogether improper. The places which Vadianus alleageth, Bring forth fruit and multiply, fill the Earth and subdue it, rule ouer every Creature, &c. with this of the Acts, and hath made of one blood all Mankind, to dwell on all the face of the Earth, doe no way proue such a generalitie: for the World was made for man, of which he was Lord and Governour, and all things therein were ordained of God for his vse: Now although all men were of one and the same fountaine of blood originally; and Adams Posteritie inhabited in procelle of time ouer all the face of the Earth; yet it disproueth in nothing the particular Garden, assigned to Adam, to dresse and cultiue, in which he liued in so blessed a estate before his transgression. For if there had beene no other choice, but that Adam had bin left to the Vniuersall; Moses would not then haue sayd, Eastward in Eden, seeing the World hath nor East nor West, but respectiue. And to what end had Angell of God bene set to keepe the East-side, and entrance into Paradise after Adams expulsion, if the Vniuersall had bene Paradise? for then must Adam haue bene chased also out of the World. For if All the Earth were Paradise, that place can receiue no better confutation then this, That Adam was driuen out of the World into the World, and out of Paradise into Paradise, except we should beleue with Metrodorus, that there were infinite Worlds. Which to denie; bee thinke all one, as to affirme, firmly, That in so large a field, as the vniuersall, there should grow but one thistle. NOVIOMAGVS vpon Beda, seemeth to belee by this, that it was vnpossible for those three Riueres, Ganges, Nilus, and Euphrates (which water three portions of the World so farre distant) to rise out of one Fountayne, except the Ocean be taken for the Well, and the World for the Garden.

And it is true, that those foure Riueres, being so vnderstood, there could be no coniecture more probable; but it (shall plainly appeare, that Pisyon was fallily taken for Ganges, and Gebon fallily for Nilus; although Ganges be a Riuer by Hindlabia in India, and Nilus runne through Ethiopia. The Senenite write Chus for Ethiopia, and therefore by the errors of the Manichees, and the mistakings of Neuionagus, Goropius, and Vadianus, with others, are made manifest. Yet was their coniecture farre more probable, then that of Ephram, Cyrillus, and Abanasius: That Paradise was seated farre beyond the Ocean Sea, and that Adam waded through it, and at last came toward the Countrey, in which he was created, and was buried at Mount Caluwy, in Iherusalem. And certainly, though all those of the first Age were of great stature, and so continued many yeeres after the flood, yet Adams shin-bones must haue containyd a thousand fadomes, and much more, if he had forded the Ocean; but this opinion is so ridiculous, as it needes no argument to disproue it.

Of their opinion, which make Paradise as high as the Moone: and of others, which make it higher than the middle Region of the ayre.

Hardly, whereas Beda saith, and as the Schoole-men affirme, Paradise to be a place, altogether remoued from the knowledge of men (locus a cognitione hominum remotissimus) and Bacephas conceiued, that Paradise was farre in the East, but mounted aboue the Ocean, and all the Earth, and neere the Orbe of the Moone (which opinion, though the Schoole-men charge Beda withall, yet Peterius layes it off from Beda vpon Strabus, and his Master Rabanus); and whereas Rupertus in his Geographie of Paradise, doth not much differ from the rest, but findes it seated next or neerest heauen; It may seeme, that all these borrowed this doctrine out of Plato, and Plato out of Socrates; but neither of them (as I conceiue) well vnderstood: who (vndoubtedly) tooke this place for heauen it selfe, into which the foules of the blessed were carried after death.

True it is, that these Philosophers durst not for feare of the Arcopagites (in this and many other diuine apprehensions) set downe what they beleued in plaine termes, especially Plato: though Socrates in the end suffered death, for acknowledging one onely powerfull God; and therefore did the Deuill himselfe doe him that right, as by an Oracle, to pronounce him the wisest man. Infinite Martyr affirmeth, that Plato had read the Scriptures; and S. Augustine gaue this iudgement of him, as his opinion, that (few things changed) he might be counted a Christian. And it seemeth to me, that both Terrentian and Eusebius conceiue, that Socrates, by that place aforesaid, meant the celestiall Paradise, and not this of Eden. Solinus, I grant, reporteth, that there is a place exceeding delightfull and healthfull, vpon the top of Mount Atho (called Aerobonos) which being aboue all clouds of rayne, or other inconuenience, the people (by reason of their many yeeres) are called Macrobioi (that is) Long-lived. A further argument is vsed, for prooffe of the height of this place, because therein was Enoch preferred from the violence of the flood: approved by Isidore, and Peter Lombard; in which place also Terrentian conceiued, that the blessed foules were preferred till the last iudgement; which trenant, and Infinite Martyr also beleued. But this opinion was of all Catholike Diuines reproued, and in the Florentine Conncell damned; of which S. Augustine more modestly gaue this iudgement.

iudgement. Sicut certum est ENOCH & ELIAS nunc vivere: ita ubi nunc sunt, an in Paradiso an alibi, incertum est; (that is) As it is certayne that ENOCH and ELIAS doe now live: so where they now live, in Paradiso or elsewhere, it is uncertayne. But Barcephas gives a third cause, though of all other the weakest. For (saith he) it was necessarie that Paradise should be set at such a distance and height, because the foure Rivers (had they not fallen so precipitate) could not have had sufficient force to have thrust themselves vnder the great Ocean, and afterwards have forced their passage through the earth, and have risen againe in the farre distant Regions of India, Aegypt, and Armenia.

These strange fancies and dreames have beene answered by diuers learned men this long since, and lately by Hopkins and Pererius writing vpon this subiect; of whose arguments I will repeat these few: for to vie long discourse against those things, which are both against Scripture and Reason, might rightly be iudged a vanitie in the Answerer, not much inferior to that of the Inuenter.

It is first therfore alledged, that such a place cannot be commodious to live in: for being set so neere the Moone, it had beene too neere the Sunne, and other heavenly bodies. Secondly, because it must have beene too ioynt a Neighbour to the Element of fire. Thirdly, because the aire in that Region is so violently moued, and carried about with such swiftnesse, as nothing in that place can consist or haue abiding. Fourthly, because the place betweene the Earth and the Moone (according to Ptoleme and Alfraganus) is seuentene times the Diameter of the Earth, which makes by a grosse account about one hundred and twentie thousand miles. Hereupon it must follow, that Paradise, being raised to this height, must haue the compass of the whole earth for a Basis & foundation. But had it been so raised, it could hardly be hidden from the knowledge, or eyes of men: seeing it would deprive vs of the Sunnes light, all the fore-part of the day, being seated in the East, as they suppose. Now, to fortifie the former opinions, Tostatus addeth this, that those people which dwell neere those falls of waters, are deafe from their infancie, like those which dwell neere the Catadupa, or ouer-falls of Nilus. But this I hold as fayned. For I haue scene in the Indies, far greater water-falls, than those of Nilus, and yet the people dwelling neere them, are not deafe at all. Tostatus (the better to strengthen himselfe) citeth Basil and Ambrose together: to which PERERIVS, Sed ego hac apud BASILIUM & AMBROSIVM in eorum scriptis, quae nunc exstant, nusquam me legere memini; But I doe not remember (saith he) that I euer read those things, either in BASIL or AMBROSE.

But for the bodies of Enoch and Elias, God hath disposed of them according to his wisdom. Their taking vp might be into the celestiall Paradise, for ought we know. For although flesh and blood, subiect to corruption, cannot inherit the Kingdome of heauen, and the seede must rot in the ground before it grow, yet we shall not all die (saith S. PAUL) but all shall be changed: which change, in Enoch and Elias, was easie to him that is Almighty. But for the rest, the Scriptures are manifest, that by the flood all perished on the earth, sauing eight persons, and therefore in the terrestriall Paradise they could not be.

For Tostatus his owne opinion, who soared not altogether so high as the rest, but beleued that Paradise was rayed above the middle Region of the aire, and twentie cubits above all Mountaines, that the flood did not therefore reach it: (which Scotus and other later Schoole-men also beleued; for, say they, there were no sinners in Paradise, and therefore no cause to ouerwhelme it:) this is also contrarie to the expresse letter of the Scripture: which directly, and without admitting of any distinction teacheth vs, that the waters ouer-flowed all the mountaynes vnder heauen. And were it otherwise, then might we as well giue credit to Masius Damasus, and the Thalmudists, who affirme, that there were of the Giants that saued themselves on the Mountaine Baris, and on Sion. But to helpe this, Scotus, being (as the rest of the Schoole-men are) full of distinctions, saith; That the waters stood at Paradise, as they did in the Red Sea, and at Jordan; and as the flood was not naturall, so was Paradise faued by by miracle. And Thomas Aquinas qualifieth this high conceit with this supposition; That it was not beleued, that Paradise was so feared, as Beda and others seeme to affirme in wordes, but by Hyperbole and comparatiuely, for the delicacie and beautie so resembled. But this I dare auow of all those Schoole-men, that though they were exceeding wittie, yet they better teach all their Followers to shift, then to resolute, by their distinctions. Wherefore not to stay long in answering this opinion of Tostatus, I confesse that it is written, that the Mountaynes of Olympus, Athos, and Atlas, ouer-reach and surmount all windes and clouds, and that (notwithstanding) there is found on the heads of the Hills both springs and fruits; and the Pagan Priests, sacrificing on these Mountaine tops, do not find the ashes (remaining of their sacrifices) blownethence, nor thence waith off by raines, when they returne: yet experience hath resolved vs, that these reports are fabulous, and Plinie himselfe (who was not sparing in the report of wonders) auoweth the contrarie. But were it granted, yet the height of these Mountaynes is far vnder the supposed place of Paradise; and on these selfe Hills the ayre is so thinne (saith S. Augustine, whom herein I miltrust) that it is not sufficient to beare vp the body of a bird, hauing therein no feeling of her wings, or any sensible resistance of ayre to mount her selfe by.

§. VIII.

Of their opinion that seate Paradise vnder the Aequinoctiall: and of the pleasant habitation vnder those Climates.

Hose which come neerer vnto reason, finde Paradise vnder the Aequinoctiall line, as Tertulian, Bonaventure, and Laudandus iudging, that there vnder might be found most pleasure, and the greatest fertilitye of soile: but against it Thomas Aquinas objecteth the disemperate heate, which he supposeth to be in all places so directly vnder the Sunne; but this is farre from it, in which Paradise was; and because there is no part of Euphrates, Tigris, or Ganges vnder it, (Ganges being one of the foure Rivers, as they suppose) yet this conceit of disemper, (being but an old opinion) is found to be very vntue, though for the coniecture not to be condemned, considering the age when those Fathers wrote, grounded chiefly on this: that whereas it appeared, that euery Countrey, as it lay by degrees neerer the Tropick, and so toward the Aequinoctiall, did so much the more exceede in heate; It was therefore a reasonable coniecture, that those Countreies which were situated directly vnder it, were of a disemper vnhabitable: but it seemeth that Tertulian conceiued better, and so did Auicenne, for they both thought those habitable enough; and though (perchance) in those dayes it might be thought a fantasticall opinion (as all are which goe against the vulgar) yet we now finde, that if there be any place vpon the earth of that nature, beaurie, and delight, that Paradise had, the same must be found within that supposed vnhabitable burnt Zone, or within the Tropicks, and neerest to the line it selfe. For hercof experience hath informed Reason, and Time hath made those things apparent, which were hidden and could not by any contemplation be discovered. Indeepe it hath so pleased God to provide for all liuing creatures, wherewith he hath filled the world, that such inconueniences which we contemplate a farre off, are found by tryall and the witness of mens traualles, to be so qualified, as there is no portion of the earth made in vaine, or so as a fruitlesse lump to fashion out the rest. For, God himselfe (saith Isaie) that formed the earth and made it, he that prepared it, he created it not in vaine, he formed it to be inhabited. Now we finde that these hottest Regions of the world, seated vnder the Aequinoctiall line, or neere it, are so refreshed with a daily gale of Easterly winde (which the Spaniards call the Brize, that doth euermore blow strongest in the heate of the day, as the downe-right beames of the Sunne cannot so much master it, that there is any inconuenience or distemperate heate found thereby. Secondly, the nights are so cold, fith, and equal, by reason of the entire interposition of the earth, as (for those places which my selfe haue seene, neere the Line and vnder it) I know no other part of the world of better, or equall temper: Onely there are some tracts, which by accident of high Mountaynes are barr'd from this aire and fresh wind, and some few sandie parts without trees, which are not therefore so best inhabited as the rest; and such difference of soiles we finde also in all other parts of the World. But (for the greatest part) those Regions haue so many goodly Riuer, Fountaynes and little Brookes, abundance of high Cedars, and other stately trees casting shade, so many sorts of delicate fruits, euer bearing, and at all times beautified with blosome and fruit, both Greene and ripe, as it may of all other parts be best compared to the Paradise of Eden: the boughes and branches are neuer vnclouted and left naked, their sap creepeth not vnder ground into the roote, fearing the iniurie of the frost: neither doth Pomona at any times despise her withered husband Vertumnus, in his winter quarters and old age. Therefore are these Countries called Terra vitioles, Vitioles Countries: for Nature being liberall to all without labour, needfullie imposing no industrie or trauell, idleness bringeth forth no other fruits then vaine thoughts, and licentious pleasures. So that to conclude this part. Tertullian and those of his opinion were not deceived in the nature of the place: but Aquinas, who misliketh this opinion, and followed a worse. And (to say the truth) all the Schoole-men were grosse in this particular.

Of the change of the names of places: and that besides that Eden in Caldeya, there is a Country in Babylon, once of this name, as is proued out of Esa. 37. and Ezech. 27.

THese opinions answered, and the Region of Eden not found in any of those imaginarie worlds, nor vnder Torrida Zona; it followeth that now we discouer and finde out the seate thereof, for in it was Paradise by God planted. The difficultie of which search resteth chiefly in this, That as all Nations haue often changed names with their Masters; so are most of these places, by Moses remembered, forgotten by those names of all Historians and Geographers, as well ancient as moderne.

Besides, we finde that the Assyrians, Babylonians, Medes and Persians (Cyrus only and few other excepted) fought to extinguiish the Hebrewes. The Gracians hated both their Nation and their Religion; and the Romanes despised once to remember them in any of their stories. And as those three Monarchies succeeded each other: so did they transforme the names of all those principall Places & Cities in the East: and after them, the Turke hath sought (what he could) to extinguiish in all things, the ancient memorie of those people; which he hath subiected and intrahled.

Now besides those notable marks, Euphrates & Tigris, the better to find the way, which leadeth to the Countrey of Eden, we are to take for guides these two considerations (to wit) That it lay Eastward from Canaan & Iudea; and that it was of all other the most beautiful and fertile. First then in respect of situation, the next Countrey to Iudea Eastward was Arabia Petrea; but in this Region was Moses himselfe when he wrote: and the next vnto it Eastward also was Arabia the Desert, both which in respect of the infertility could not be Eden, neither haue any of the Arabians any such Riuer, as are exprest to run out of it: So as it followeth of necessity, that Eden must be Eastward, and beyond both Arabia Petrea, and Deserta. But because Eden is by Moses named by it selfe, and by the fertility, and the Riuer only described, we must seeke it in other Scriptures, and where it is by the additions of the neighbour Nations better described. In the Prophet I say I finde it coupled and accompanied with other adjacent Countries, in these wordes, spoken in the person of Sennacherib by Rabshakeh: Haue the gods of the Nations deliuered them, which my Fathers haue destroyed, as GOSAN, and HARAN, and RESEPH, and the children of EDEN, which were at Telassar? and in Ezechiel, where he prophesieth against the Tyrians: They of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, the Merchants of Sheba, Aflur, and Chilmad, were thy Merchants, &c.

But to auoid confusion, we must vnderstand that there were two Edens, one of which the Prophet Amos remembreth, where he diuideth Syria into three Prouinces; whereof, the first he maketh Syria Damasene, or Decapolis: the second part is that Valley called Auenis, otherwise Connallis, or the Tract of Chamath, where Assyria is ioyned to Arabia the Desert, and where Ptolemie placeth the Citie of Aueria: and the third is knowne by the name of Domus Edenis, or Caldeya, otherwise Valis, or the hollow Valley, because the Mountaynes of Libanus and Avilibanus, take all the length of it on both sides, and border it: for Coele in Greece is Causa in Latine. But this is not that Eden, which we seeke: neither doth this Prouince lye East from Canaan, but North, and so ioyneth vnto it, as it could not be vnknewne to the Hebrewes. Yet, because there is a little Citie therein called Paradise, the Iewes beleued this Caldeya to be the same which Moses describeth. For the same cause doth Hopkins in his Treatise of Paradise reprehend Beroldus, in that he confoundeth this Eden, with the other Eden of Paradise: though to giue Beroldus his right, I conceiue that he led the way to Hopkins, and to all other later Writers, saying, That he sayled in distinguishing these two Regions, both called Eden: and that he altogether misvnderstood two of the foure Riuer (to wit) Pison and Gehon, as shall appeare hereafter. Now to finde out Eden, which (as Moses teacheth vs) lay Eastward from the Deserts, where he wrote, after he had passed the Red Sea; we must consider where those other Countries are found, which the Prophet I say and Ezechiel ioyneth with it. For (saith Esaiah) Gosan, Haran, and Reseph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telassar. Also Ezechiel ioyneth Haran with Eden, who, together with those of Sheba, Aflur, and Chilmad, were the Merchants that traded with the Citie of Tyre, which was then (saith Ezechiel) the Mart of the people for many Isles. And it hath euer beene the custome, that the Persians conueyed their merchandise to Babylon, and to those Cities vpon Euphrates, and Tigris, and from thence transported them into Syria, now Soria, and to the Port of the Mediterrane Sea: as in ancient times to the Citie of Tyre, afterward to Tripoly, and now to Aleppo, from whence they imbarque them at the Port of Alexandretta, in the Bay of Isicus, now Laias. So, Ezechiel in the description of the magnificence of Tyre, and of the exceeding trade that it had with all the Nations of the East, as the onely Mart-towne of that part of the world, reciteth both the people, with whom they had commerce, and also what commodities euerie Countrey yielded: and hauing counted the severall People and Countries, he addeth the particular trade, which each of them exercised: They were thy Merchants (saith the Prophet) in all sorts of things, in sayments of blue silke, and of bordered workes, fine linnen, corall and pearle: and afterwards speaking of the Merchants of Sheba and Raamah, and what kindes they traded, he hath these wordes: The Merchants of Sheba and Raamah were thy Merchants, they occupied in thy Fayres, with the chiefe of all Spices, and with all precious stones and gold. Now these be indeed the riches which Persia and Arabia Felix yeeld: and because Sheba and Raamah are those parts of Arabia, which border the Sea, called the Persian Gulfe, therefore did those Nations both vent such Spice, sweet Gummes, and Pearles, as their owne Countries yeilded, and (withall) hauing trade with their Neighbours of India, had from them also all sorts of spices, and plenty of gold. The better to conuey these commodities to that great Mart of Tyre, the Shebas or Arabians entred by the mouth of Tigris, and from the Citie of Teredon (built or enlarged by Nabuchodonozor, now called Balsara) thence thence sent vp all these rich merchandises by boate to Babylon, from whence by the body of Euphrates, as farre as it bended Weltward, and afterward by a branch thereof, which reacheth within three dayes iourney of Aleppo, and then ouer Land they past to Tyre, as they did afterward to Tripoly (formerly Hieropolis) and thence to past to Tyre, as aforelaid. Now the Merchants of Canneh, which Ezechiel ioyneith Alexandretta, as aforelaid. Now the Merchants of Canneh, which Ezechiel ioyneith with Eden, inhabited farre vp the Riuer, and receiued this trade from Arabia & India, besides those proper commodities which themselves had, and which they receiued out of Persia, which bordered them. S. Hierome vnderstandeth by Canneh, Seleucia, which is seated vpon Euphrates, where it breaketh into foure heads, and which tooke that name from Seleucus, who made thereof a magnificent Citie. Hieronymus thinks it to be Ctesiphon, but Ctesiphon is seated downe low vpon Tigris, and Canneh cannot be on that side, I meane on the East-side of Tigris, for then were it out of the Valley of Shinar. Plinie placeth the Schenite vpon Euphrates, where the fame beginneth to be foordable, which is toward the border of Syria, after it leaueth to be the bound of Arabia the Desart, & where the Riuer of Euphrates reflecteth from the Desart of Palmirena: for these people of Canneh (afterward Schenite) inhabited both borders of Euphrates, stretching themselves from their owne Citie of Canneh in Shinar Weltward along the banks of Euphrates, as farre as the Citie of Thapsacus, where Ptoleme appointed the Foords of Euphrates: which also agreeth with the description of the Schenite by Strabo, whose wordes are these: Mercatoribus ex Syria Seleuciam & Babyloniam cunctibus iter est per Schenitas; The Merchants which traueile from Syria to Seleucia and Babylon, take their way by the Schenites. Therefore those which take Canneh for Charan, doe much mistake it. For Charan, to which Abraham came from Ur in Chaldea (called by God) standeth also in Mesopotamia, not vpon Euphrates it selfe, but vpon the Riuer of Chaboras, which falleth into Euphrates: and the Merchants of Charan are distinctly named with those of Canneh in Ezechiel (as) they of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, the Merchants of Sheba, Albur, and Chilmad were thy Merchants. Wherefore Charan which is sometime called Charre, and Haran, and Aran, is but the fame Charan of Mesopotamia; and when it is writteu Aran, then it is taken for the Region of Mesopotamia: or Aran fluminis, the Greeke word (Mesopotamia) importing, a Countre betwene Riuers: for Mes in Greeke, is Medius in Latine, and Potamos, fluminis; and when it is writteu Haran or Aran, it is then taken for the Citie it selfe, to which Abraham came from Ur (as aforelaid.) For Strabo in the description of Arabia, giueth that Tract of Land from the borders of Calefryia, to the edge of Mesopotamia, to the Schenite, who also inhabited on both sides of Euphrates, and were in after-ages accounted of these Arabians which inhabite Batañes, and the North part of the Desarts, stretching themselves toward the vnhabited Solitude of Palmirena, which lyeth betwene Syria, and Arabia the Desart. So as these of Canneh lay in the very high-way from Babylon to Tyre, and were Neighbours (indifferent) to Charan and to Eacn: and therefore they are by the Prophet Ezechiel coupled together, They of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, &c. But S. Hierome made a good interpretation of Canneh, or Chalne, by Seleucia: for Seleucia was anciently called Chalanne (witnesseth Appian;) and so Rabanus Maurus calleth it in his Commentaries vpon Genesis: the name by time and mixture of languages being changed from Chalne or Canneh, to Chalanne: of which name there are two other Cities, standing in Triangle with Seleucia, and almost the next vnto it, (as) Thelbe-canne, and Mann-canne, the one a little to the West of Seleucia, and the other opposite vnto it, where these Riuers of Tigris and Euphrates are readie to ioyne. Therefore, which of these the ancient Canne was, (being all three within the bound of the Valley Shinar) it is vncertaine; but it is a note as well of the importance of the place, as of the certayne lease thereof, that so many other Cities did retayne a part of the name in so many ages after. Neither is it vnlikely, that these additions of Thelbe and Mann to the word Canne, were but to make difference betwene the East and the West, or the greater and the lesse Canne, or betwene Canne the old, and the new: which additions to distinguish Cities by, are ordinary in all the Regions of the world.

Now

Now of the other Citie ioyne with Eden, as Haran or Charan, S. Hierome on the Iudges speaketh thereof in these wordes: Cunq; reuertentur, peruenient ad iud. 3. Charan, qua est in medio itinere contra Nininum, undecima die; When they returned, they came to Charan, (which is the mid-way against Ninine) the eleventh day.

This Citie is by the Martyr Stephen named Charan (speaking to the high Priest:) Ye Men, Brethren, and Fathers, hearken: The God of glorie appeared to our Father ABRAHAM, while he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charan. But the fate of this Citie is not doubted of: for it is not only remembred in many Scriptures, but, withall, exceeding famous for the death and ouerthrow of Crasus the Romaine, who for his insatiabable greedinesse was called Gorgas auraritis; The gulfe of avarice. Whereof Lucan:

Affrias Latio maculauit sanguine Carras,

Lucan, li. 1055

With Roman blood th' Assyrian Carre he defild.

But this Citie Canne or Chalne is made manifest by Moses himselfe, where it is written of NIMROD: And the beginning of his Kingdome was Babel, and Erecb, and Acad, and Chalne, in the Land of Sinaar, or Shinar: where Moses (the worth the first composition of the Babylonian Empire, and what Cities and People were subiect vnto Nimrod, all which lay in the said Valley of Shinar or neere it; and this Valley of Shinar is that Tract, afterwards called Babylonia and Chaldea, into which also Eden stretcheth it selfe. Chaldea, Babylonia, Sinaar, idem sunt (saith COMESTOR.) Three names of one Countre: which Region of Babylonia tooke name of the Tower Babel, and the Tower, of the confusion of tongues. And that Shinar was Babylonia, it is proved in the eleventh Chapter of Genesis, in these wordes: And as they went from the East, they found a Playne in the Land of Shinar, and there they abode: in which Playne Babylon was built (as aforelaid.)

Now Shinar being Babylonia, and Canneh, in the first beginning of Nimrod's greatness, and before he had subdued any strange, or farre-off Nations, being one part of his Dominion, and also named by Moses to be in Shinar, it proueth, that Canneh ioyneith to Babylonia; which also Ezechiel coupleth with Eden, and (further) affirmeth, that those of Eden were also the Merchants, which traded with the Tyrans; and Esey in the threats of Sennacherib against Hierusalem (with other Nations that Sennacherib vaunted that his Fathers had destroyed) nameth the children of Eden which were at Telaasar. But before I conclude where Eden it selfe lyeth, it is necessarie to describe those other Countreies, which Ezechiel ioyneith therewith in the places before remembred, as, those of Sheba and Raamah. It is written in Genesis the tenth: *Moreover Cus, the sonnes of Ham were CUSH, &c. And the sons of CUSH were SHEBA, and HAVILAH, and SABTAR, & RAAMAH, &c. And the sons of RAAMAH were SHEBA, &c. and anon after, CUSH begat NIMROD: so as Sheba was the grand-child of CUSH, and Nimrod the sonne of CUSH, whose elder brother was Sheba: though some there are that conceiue to the contrary, that Nimrod was the elder in valour and understanding, though not in time and precedence of birth; who inhabited that part of Shinar, where Babel was built, afterwards Babylonia. His brother Raamah or Regma tooke that part adioyning to Shinar, toward the Sea side and Persian Gulfe (called afterward Raama and Sheba, by the Father and his Sonnes, which possessed it.) For (saith EZECHIEL) the Merchants of Raamah and Sheba were thy Merchants, they occupied in thy Faues with the chiefe of all spices, and all precious stones, and gold. So as Sheba was that Tract of Countre, which parteth Arabia Deserta from Arabia Felix, and which ioyneith to the Sea where Tigris and Euphrates fall out, and render themselves to the Ocean. This part, and the confining Countre Strabo calleth Catabaria, where the best Myrrhe and Frankincense is gathered; which people haue an interchange or trade with Elans, lying on*

hood of Ninive; and that it is the famous Selucia Parthorum. The Nestorian Christians in their former Epistle, call it Attur in these words: Ex omnibus Ciuitatibus & pagis quas sunt circum Ciuitatem Mosal (hoc est) Attur in uicinia Ninive; Of all the Cities and townes which are about the Citie of Mosal (that is) Attur in the neighbourhood of Ninive. As also Niger acknowledgeth Ctefphon, a Citie thereabout to be called Assur (which is the same as Attur, after the Dialect of those Nations, which change Sh into T.) Neither is it much that he should mistake Ctefphon (which is not farre off Selucia) for Selucia, to be Assur. By this then wee may come somewhat neere the end of our purpose. For the Ile of Eden, which lyeth in the brest of Tigris, is but twelue miles from Mosal, and that ancient Citie, which Ptoleme and Tacitus call Nimue,¹³ and the Scriptures Ninue, Phisfratu, and Simcon Sethi, Mofala, and Iohn Lean Mosal, others Mosse, (though it bee not the same with Mosal) is set but a little higher vpon the same riuer of Tigris, neere Mosal: so that wee are like to finde this Ile of Eden here-about. For the same Andreas Masius, which placeth it about Mosal, makes it to be belowe Mofin chepha, which is vpon the same riuer of Tigris.

The onely difficultie is this, that some perhaps may thinke, that the words of the Nestorian in both their Epistles, speake not of any Ile in Tigris, called the Ile of Eden, but of an Ile in Tigris, a riuer of Eden. But this sence of their words in my opinion seemeth the more vnp probable. And yet if this were the meaning here, we haue a testimonye from the learned of those parts, that not onely Euphrates, but also Tigris was a riuer of Eden, and that the name of Eden in those parts is not yet quite worne out, though the Region hath bene subiect to the same change, that all other kingdomes of the world haue bene, and hath by conquest, and corruption of other languages, receiued new and differing names. For the South part of Eden, which stretcheth out Euphrates, was after the flood called Shinar, and then of the tower of Babel, Babylonia; and the North part of Eden is that Tract of Mesopotamia, Assyria, and Armenia, which embraceth both the banks of Tigris, betwene Mount Taurus, and Selucia. And of this Region of Eden, that ancient ETHICVS maketh mention, (not that latter ETHICVS, discipule of CALLINICVS, otherwise by PLUTARCH and ATHENÆVS called ISTRIS, who liued in Egypt in the reigne of PHILADELPHVS, but another of a farre higher and remoter time) the same being made Latine out of Greeke by S. HEROME. And though by corruption of the ancient copie it bee written in ETHICVS, Adonis for Edenis; yet Adonis being a riuer of Phenicia, cannot be vnderstood to be the Region named by ETHICVS. For ETHICVS makes it a Countrey, and not a riuer, and ioyneth it with Mesopotamia and Aethiopia, calling the land of CHVS Aethiopia, after the Vulgar, and Septuagint. And lastly, the Riuer which watereth the Regions (sayth ETHICVS) falleth into the Gulfe of Persia: which Riuer hee calleth Armodius, for Tigris; Tigris being but a name imposed for the swiftnesse thereof. And out of Armenia both Tigris and Euphrates haue their originall: for out of Eden came a riuer, or riuers, to water the Garden, both which Riuers (to wit) Tigris and Euphrates, come out of Armenia, and both of them traueleth Mesopotamia, Regions first of all knowne by the name of Eden for their beautie and fertilitie. And it is very probable, that Eden contained also some part of Armenia, and the excellent fertilitie thereof in diuers places, is not worthe the name of Eden. For in some part thereof (sayth STRABO) the leaues are alwayes greene, and therefore therein a perpetuall Spring. Also STEPHANS de uerbis mentioneth the Citie of Adana vpon Euphrates: and the name of Eden was in vse in Amos time, though he speake not of Eden in the East, but of Eden in Calesyria. But to the end I may not burden the Readers patience with too long a discourse, it may suffice to know, that Euphrates and Tigris (once ioyned together, and afterward separate) are two of those foure heads, into which these Riuers which are said to water the Garden of Paradise, were diuided: whose courses being knowne, Eden, (out of which they are said to come) cannot be vnknowne. Now that Hiddekel and Perath were Tigris and Euphrates, it is agreed by all: for the Sentencie and all others others conuert Perath by Euphrates: & Hiddekel Tigris omnes exponunt: and all men vnderstand Hiddekel by Tigris (sayth VATABLE.) And because that which I haue sayd of the Ile of Eden, shall not bee subiect to the censure of selfe-inuention, I haue heere-vnder set downe the words out of the two generall Epistles of the Nestorians, as Masius (ad verbum) hath conuerted them into Latine. The occasion of those Letters and Supplications to the Pope were, that the Nestorian Christians which inhabit Mesopotamia, Assyria, Persia, and Babylonia, and haue to this day (at least in Queene Mariet time they had) fifteene Churches in one Citie, called Selucia Parthorum, or Masfel vpon the Riuer of Tigris, hauing no sufficient authoritie to chooſe themselves a Patriarch (which cannot be done without foure or three Metropolitan Bishops at least) sent to the Bishop of Rome in the yeere of Christ 1552. (as aforesaid) a Petition to obtaine allowance vnto such an election as themselves had made: hauing three hundred yeere before that vpon the like defect, sent one Martius thither to bee confirmed; and in this negotiation they made knowne to the Bishop of Rome the state of the Christian Church in those parts: for vpon the death of their Patriarch (who of a couetous desire to enrich himselfe had forborne to institute Metropolitane Bishops, when the places fell void) they all assembled themselves together to consult of the Church-gouernment. And because all the Patriarchs for 100. yeeres had bene of one house and family to the preiudice of the Church, and that there yet remained one Bishop of the same Stocke and Kindred, who aspired to the same dignitie, which his Predecessours had held, the rest of the Professours refused to allow him. Vpon which occasion, and for the choice of a Gouernour more sufficient, the Teachers in all the Churches assembled themselves. The words of the generall Epistle to the Pope are these, about the middle of the said Epistle: verum nos non acceptimus neq. proclamamus ipsum, sed subito conuenimus ex omnibus locis Orientalibus; & ex omnibus Ciuitatibus & Pagis quas sunt circum Ciuitatem Mosel (hoc est) Attur, in uicinia Ninive, ex Babylonia, ex Charrha, ex Arbella, ex Insula que est in medio Tigris, fluminis Eden, ex Tauris Persie, ex Nisibi, &c. which is: But wee did neither accept of this man, neither pronounced him: but suddenly we assembled our selues out of all parts of the East, and out of all the Cities and Villages which are about Mosel (or Attur) neighbouring Ninue, and out of Babylon, Carra, Arbella, and out of the land which lyeth in the middle of Tigris, a Riuer of Eden, or rather, out of the Ile of Eden, which lyeth in the Riuer Tigris. And in a second Epistle at the same time sent, they vse these words: Neq. super sunt apud nos Metropolitani, quorum est ordinare Catholicum, sed solum pauci Episcopi, Episcopus Arbela, Episcopus Salmasti, Episcopus Adurbeigan, eni vestigio conuenimus in Insulam, que est intra Tigrim flumen, Eden, fecimusq. compactum inter nos, &c. (which is) Neither are there remaining among vs any Metropolitan Bishops to whom it belongs to ordaine a Patriarch, but onely a few Bishops, as the Bishop of Arbela, the Bishop of Salmastus, and the Bishop of Adurbeigan but loe, we assembled speedily in the land Eden, which is in Taurus: and agreed betwene our selues, &c.

Now this land of Eden Masius describeth with other places; which being well conceiued, the Nestorian Epistles, and the state of the Church may bee in those parts (sayth he) the better vnderstood. And after hee hath distinguished the foure sorts of Christians in those parts of the World, and in the South part of Africa, which hee calleth Nestorians, Iacobites, Maronites, and Coptis, hee goeth on in these words: Mos, audita illius morte, concurrebat turbulento in illam quam modo dixi Tigris Insulam, que duodecim circiter passuum millibus supra Mosal posita, decem fere millia passuum suo ambitu continet, muris undiq. cincta, & a paucis alijs quam Christianis hominibus habitata: which is, Now hearing of the death of the Patriarch, (as those that came to Rome) reported they ran tumultuously together into that land of Tigris or Eden before spoken of, which land is situated about 12. miles above Mosel, containing very neere ten miles in compasse, and euery where inclosed with a wall, inhabited by a few other men than Christians. And afterward he maketh a recapitulation of the Christian Churches; among the rest he addeth the Ile of Eden by the name of Geserta, Insula Tigris: sive Geserta.

Furthermore, describing the Citie of Hosam-cepha, or Fortis Petra, he placeth it supra pradiam Tigris insulam rupi aspera impositam; Above the foresaid land of Tigris, being seated on a steepe rocke. Of this land of Geserta, Andrew Thevet maketh mention in his tenth booke of his generall Cosmographie in these wordes: Geserta ou Gesire est au milieu de la riviére du Tigre, & pense que c'est une terre des plus fertiles de toute l'Asie; Geserta or Gesire is in the middle of Tigris, the soile the most fertile of all Asia.

By this we see that the ancient name of Eden liueth, and of that Eden, which lieth Eastward from Arabia Petrea, and the Desart where Moses wrote, and that Eden which bordereth Charran according to Ezechiel, and that Eden which is seated according to the assertion of the said Prophet, and ioyned with those Nations of Reseph, Canneh, and Charran, and the rest which traded with the Tyrans, and is found at this day in the parting of the two Regions of Assyria and Babylonia, where the Edenites in Thelassar were garrisoned to resist the Assyrians, whose displantation Sennacherib vaunted of (as aboue written) and lastly, the same Eden, which embraceth Tigris, and looketh on Euphrates; two of the knowne Riueres of those foure, which are by all men ascribed to Paradise.

Þ. XI.

Of the difficultie in the Text, which seemeth to make the foure Riueres to rise from one streame.

BVt it may be objected, that it is written in the Text, That a Riuer went out of Eden, and not Riueres, in the Plurall, which scruple Matthæus Beroaldus hath thus answered in his Chronologie: The Latine Translation (saith he) hath these wordes: *Et fluius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis ad irrigandum Paradisum, qui inde diuidebatur in quatuor capita: Que verba melius consentiunt cum re narratione, & eiusdem explicatione, si ita reddatur. Et fluius erat egrediens ex Edene, (hoc est) fluius procedebat ex Edene regione ad irrigandum pomarium, & inde diuidebatur, & erat in quatuor capita: which is, And a Riuer went out of the place of pleasure to water Paradise, and thence was diuided into foure heads: which wordes (saith Beroaldus) doe better agree with the narration and explication of the place, if they be thus translated: And a Riuer was going forth of Eden (that is) Riueres went forth, and ran out of the Region of Eden to water the Orchard, and from thence it was diuided, and they became foure heads. The Tigurine differs from the Vulgar or Latine, for it conuerts it thus: Et fluius egrediebatur de delicijs; And a Riuer went out of pleasure, in stead of Eden; and the Latine addeth the word locus, or place, Et fluius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis; And a Riuer went out of the place of pleasure: and so the word (place) may rightly be referred to Eden, which was (of all other) a Region most delightfull and fertile; and so also the word (inde) and thence was diuided, hath reference to the Countrey of Eden, and not to the Garden it selfe.*

And for the word (Riuer) for Riueres, it is vsuall among the Hebrewes: for it is written: Let the earth bud forth the bud of the herbe, that seedeth seeds, the fruitfull tree, &c. Here the Hebrew vseth the Singular for the Plurall, Herbe and Tree, for Herbes and Trees; and againe, we eate of the fruit of the tree, in stead of (trees): And thirdly, The man and his wife hid themselves from the presence of God; In medio ligni Paradisi; In the middle of the tree of the Garden, for (trees). And of this opinion is David Kimhi, and Vatablus, who vpon this place of Genesis say, that the Hebrewes doe often put the Singular for the Plurall, as ilud, for unumquodq; illorum, and he giueth an instance in this question it selfe, as, A Riuer (for Riueres) went out of Eden.

And this answer out of diuers of the learned, may, not without good reason, be giuen to the objection, That Moses speaketh but of one Riuer, from which the heads should diuide themselves. Howbeit I denie not, but with as good (and perhaps better) reason, we may expound the foure heads, to be foure notable passages into famous Countries. And so we may take the word (Riuer) Verse the tenth for one Riuer (to wit) Euphrates, as this name comprehendeth all the branches thereof. For this Riuer, after he is past the place, where we suppose Paradise to haue bene, diuides it selfe, and ere long yeeldeth foure notable passages into severall Countries, though not all the way downe streame, (for this is no where in the Text) where it is noted, that following the Riuer downward, there is conueynance into the Countries named in the Text, though part of the way to one of the Countries (to wit, to Assyria) were vp Tigris.

To this end the Text speaking of Hiddekel, as it riseth from the Riuer of Eden, doth not say it compasseth or watheth the whole Region of Assyria, (as it had vseth this phrase of Pison and Gehon) but that it runneth toward Assyria. The first branch Pison, is Nahar-maleba, (by interpretation) Balsim, or flumen regium, which runneth into Tigris vnder Apamia, whence ariseth the name of Pasi-tigris, (as it were) Piso-tigris. This leadeth to the Land of Hauila or Susiana. The second branch Gehon, is that which in Historians is Nabar-jares, or Narrages, for Nabar-ragas: both which names signifie flumen derivatum (a Riuer deriued) also Acacarus, quasi Ranofus, by reason of the froggie Fennes which it maketh: this Gehon leadeth to the first seate of Chus, about the borders of Chaldea and Arabia, and it is lost at length in the Lakes of Chaldea. The third branch, Hiddekel, may be expounded the vpper streame of Pison, or Balsim, which runneth into Hiddekel properly so called (that is, into Tigris) about Selenucia, where it sheweth a passage vp Tigris into Assyria: where, because at length it is called Hiddekel, or Tigris, having before no knowne proper name, the Text in this place calleth it Hiddekel from the beginning. The fourth Peraib or Euphrates, so called per excellentiam, being the body of the Riuer Euphrates, which runneth through Babylon and Otriv. But, be it a Riuer or Riueres, that come out of Eden, seeing that Tigris and Euphrates are noted in the Text, there can be no doubt, but that Paradise was not farre from these Riueres: for that Peraib in Moses is Euphrates, there can be no question; and (indeede) as plaine it is that Hiddekel is Tigris. For Hiddekel goeth (saith Moses) Eastwards towards Assur, as we finde, that Tigris is the Riuer of Assyria proprie dicta, whose chiefe Citie was Ninive, as in Genesis the tenth it is written: That out of that Land (to wit) Babylonia, Nimrod went into Assur, and builded Ninive, which was the chiefe Citie of Assyria.

And as for the kinde of speech here vset in the Text, speaking of foure heads; though the heads of Riueres be (properly) their Fountaynes, yet here are they to be vnderstood, to be spoken of the beginning of their diuision from the first streame. Caput aque (saith VLPRIANVS) illud est, unde aqua nascitur; sex fonte nascitur fons; si ex flumine, vel ex loco prima initia, &c. If the beginning of the water be out of a Fountayne, then is the Fountayne taken for the head: if out of a Lake, then the Lake; and if from a maine Riuer any branch be separate and diuided, then where that branch doth first bound it selfe with new bankes, there is that part of the Riuer, where the branch forsaketh the mayne streame, called the head of the Riuer.

Þ. XII.

Of the strange fertilitie and happinesse of the Babylonian Soile, as it is certayne that Eden was such.

IT may also be demanded, whether this Region of Eden, by vs described, be of such fertilitie and beautie, as Eden the seate of Paradise was: which if it be denied, then must we also consider, that there was no part of the earth, that retaineth that fertilitie and pleasure, that it had before the curse: neither can we ascribe the same fruitfulness to any part of the earth, nor the same vertue to any plant thereon growing, that they had before before the flood; and therefore this Region of Eden may be now no such flourishing Countrey, as it was when it was first created in his perfection. Yet this I finde written of it: First in Herodotus, who was an eye-witnesse, and speaketh of the very place it selfe, for the Ile of Eden is but twelue miles or thereabout from Ninive, and so from Mosul. Ex Euphrate exiens in Tigrim, alterum flumen, iuxta quod Vrbis Ninus sita erat. Hac regio, omnium quas non vidimus, optima est. &c. Where Euphrates runneth out into Tigris, not farre from the place where Ninus is seated, This Region, of all that we haue seene, is most excellent; and he addeth afterward: Cerevis autem fructu procreando adeo ferax est, ut nunquam non ferè ducentis reddat. &c. (that is) it is so fruitfull in bringing forth Corne, that it yeldeth two hundred fold: The leaves of Wheate and Barley being to almost foure fingers broad: As for the height of Millet and Sefame, they are even in length like unto trees, which although I know to be true, yet I forbear to speake hereof, well knowing, that those things which are reported of this fruitfullnesse, will seeme very incredible to those, which neuer were in the Countrey of Babylon. They haue commonly in all the Countrey Palme-trees growing of their owne accord, it is most of them bearing fruit, out of which they make both meates, and wine, and honny, ordering them as the Fig-trees. Thus farre Herodotus.

To this Palme-tree so much admired in the East India, Strabo and Niger adde a fourth excellencie, which is, that it yeldeth bread; Ex quibus panem, & mel, & vinum, & acetum conficiunt; Of which these people make bread, wine, honny, and vineger. But Antonius the Eremita findeth a fifth commoditie, not inferior to any of those foure, which is, that from this selfe-fame Tree there is drawne a kind of fine flaxe, of which people make their garments, and with which in East India they prepare the cordage for their ships; and that this is true, Athanasius in the life of Antonius the Eremita, confesseth, saying: That he receiued a garment made thereof from the Eremita himselfe, which he brought with him out of this Region. So therefore those Trees, which the East Indies so highly esteeme and so much admire (as indeede the Earth yeldeth no plant comparable to this) those Trees (I say) are in this vpper Babylon, or Region of Eden, as common as any Trees of the field. Sant etiam (saith STRABO) pascim per omnem regionem Palme sua sponte nascentes; There are of Palmes ouer all the whole Region, growing of their owne accord. Of this place Quintus Curtius maketh this report: Enitibus à parte laua Arabia odorum fertilitate nobilis, regio campestris interest inter Tigrim & Euphratem, iacentem ubere & pinguis solo, ut à pastore pellit pecora dicantur, ne satietas perimat; (that is) As you traueile on the left hand of Arabia (famous for plenty of sweet odors) there lieth a Champaigne Countrey placed betwene Tigris and Euphrates, and so fruitfull and fat a soile, that they are said to drine their Cattell from the pasture, lest they should perishe by satietie. Bis in anno segetes Babylonij sciant; The Babylonians cut their Corne twice a yeere (saith Niger.) And as Countreys generally are more fruitfull to the Southward, then in the Northern parts: so we may iudge the excellencie of this by that report which Strabo maketh of the South part of Armenia, which is the North border of Eden, or a part thereof; his wordes be these in the Latine: Tota enim hac regio frugibus & arboribus abundat mansuetis, itemq; semper virentibus; This Region aboundeth with pleasant fruits, and trees, alwaies greene: which witnesseth a perpetuall Spring, not found elswhere but in the Indies only, by reason of the Sunnes neighbourhood, the life and stirre vp of nature in a perpetuall actiuitie. In briefe, so great is the fertilitie of the ground, that the people are contrayned twice to mow downe their Corne-fields, and a third time to eate them vp with sheep: which husbandrie the Spaniards wanting in the Valley of Mexico, for the first fortie yeeres, could not make our kind of Wheate beare seeds, but it grew vp as high as the trees, and was fruitlesse. Besides, those fields are altogether without weedes (saith Plinie) who addeth this singulartie to that soile, That the second yeere the very stubble (or rather falling downe of the feedes againe) yeldeth them a harvest of Corne without any further labour: his wordes are these: Perbiatis tantis sunt, ut sequenti anno sponte restitulis fiat seges.

Of the River Pison, and the land of Haulab.

After the discouerie of Eden, and the testimonies of the fertilitie thereof, it resteth to proue that Pison and Gehon are branches of Tigris, and Euphrates. For that the knowledge and certaintie of these two Riuers should trouble so many wise men, it is strange to me, seeing necessitie it selfe (Tigris and Euphrates being knowen) findeth them out: for Euphrates or Tigris, or both be that river or riuers of Eden, which water Paradise, which river or riuers Moses witnesseth afterward, diuided into foure heads, whereof the one is called Pison, the other Gehon, &c. Could there be a stranger fancie in the world, then when we finde both these (namely) Tigris and Euphrates in Assyria and Mesopotamia, to seeke the other two in India and Egypt, making the one Ganges, and the other Nilus? Two Riuers as farre distant, as any of fame knowe or discouered in the world: the Scriptures making it so plaine, that these Riuers were diuided into foure branches, and with the Scriptures, Nature, Reason and Experience bearing witnesse. There is no errour, which hath not some slipperie and bad foundation, or some appearance of probability, resembling truth, which when men (who studie to be singular) finde out, (straining reason according to their fancies) they then publish to the world matter of contention, and jangling: not doubting but in the variable deformitie of mens minde, to find some partakers or sectatours, the better by their helpe to nurse and cherish such weak babes, as their owne inuentions haue begotten.

But this mistaking (and first for the river of Pison) seemeth to haue growne out of the not-distinguishing of that Region in India, called Haulab, from Hamilab, which adioyneth to Babylonia, afterward knowne by the name of Susiana. For Haulab vpon Tigris tooke name from Haulab the sonne of Cush; and Hamilab in India, from Hamilab the sonne of Israhel, the one remembered by Moses in the description of Paradise, Gen. 10. 7. the other where Moses setteth downe the generations of Nosh, and his sonnes after the flood. For the sonnes of Cush were Seba, Haulab, Sabitah, and Raamah, and the sonnes of Israhel were Ophir, and Hamilab, &c. of which latter (to wit) of Ophir and Haulab the sonnes of Israhel, that Iland of Ophir, (whence Salomon had gold) and Hamilab adioyning had their names. Now because Ganges is a great and a famous Riuier of the East India, and Haulab a Countrey of the same, and is situated vpon Ganges, hence it came that Ganges was taken for Pison, which Riuier is laid by Moses to water the land of Haulab. Or perhaps it was supposed that those foure Riuers, named by Moses, must of necessitie be foure of the greatest in the world; whence (supposing that Ganges was the next great and famous riuier after Tigris & Euphrates) they chose out this Riuier to make one of the foure. And yet certainly there is another Riuier, 10. 19. whom in these respects they should rather haue chosen then Ganges; for the Riuier Indus on this side India, for beautie, for neernesse, & for abilitie, giueth no way place to Ganges, but exceedeth it in all. And how can any reasonable man conceiue, that Ganges can be one of the foure heads, seeing Indus commeth betwene it and Tigris? and betwene Tigris and Indus is all that large Empire of Persia, consisting of many Kingdomes. And againe, farther toward the East, and beyond Indus, are all those ample Dominions of India intra Gangem, which lie betwene those two proud Riuers of Indus and Ganges, now called the Kingdomes of Mogor. So as if Indus bee not accounted for any of the foure, because it is removed from Tigris by all the breadth of Persia, then how much lesse Ganges, which falleth into the Ocean, little lesse then 50 fortie degrees to the Eastward of Indus? Surely whosoever readeth the storie of Alexander, shall finde, that there is no riuier in Asia, that can exceede Indus. For Hysdaspis was of that breadth and depth, as Alexander thereon in great Gallies transported himselfe, and the greatest part of his armie, and in saying down that branch of Indus, found it so large and deepe, and by reason thereof so great a billow, as it endangered his his whole Fleete, which was ready to bee swallowed vp therein: Hydaspes (as aforesaid) being but one of many branches of Indus, comparable to it, and as great as it, having besides this, the Rivers of Coas, of Susius, Acefines, Adrius, (otherwise Hiratus, Hipidus, and Zaradrius, all which make but one Indus, and by it are swallowed vp with all their children and companions, which being all incorporate and made one streame, it crosseth athwart Asia, and then at Cambala vistrerth the Ocean Sea.

Gen. 2. 15.

But because Pison, which compasseth Hauilab, as also Gebon, which watereth Cush, must some where be ioyned with the rest in one body, or at least be found to proceed out of the same Countrey of Eden, out of which the other two heads doe proceede, out of doubt they cannot either the one or the other, bee Ganges, or Nilus: for Nilus riseth in the vtmost of the South, and runneth Northward into the Mediterranean Sea; and the River Ganges riseth out of the mountaine Imaus, or (as others will haue it) Concasus, which diuides the Northerne Sythia from India, and runneth from North to South into the Indian Ocean. And as for Perath and Hiddikel (that is, Euphrates and Tigris) the one of them is begotten in Armenia, neere Georgiana or Iberia, the other not farre off in the same Armenia, by the Gordian mountaines, so as Ganges, who onely trauielleth in her owne India, and Nilus through Ethiopia and Egypt, neuer saw the land of Eden, or ioyned themselves in one Channell, either with themselves, or with either of the other; and therefore could not at any time from thence bee separated, or diuided into foure heads or branches, according to Moses.

Gen. 2. 15.

Therefore the River Pison, which enricheth Hauilab, is the same which by ioyning it selfe with Tigris, was therefore called Piso-tigris, or Piso-tigris, of Pison and Tigris, which River watereth that Hauilab, which Hauilab the sonne of Cush gaue name vnto, and not Hauilab of India, so called of Hauilab the sonne of Isctan, who inhabited with his brother Ophir in the East. And this Hauilab of the Cushites hath also Gold, Bdellium, and the Onyx stone. This Bdellium is a tree, of the bigneffe of an Oliue, whereof Arabia hath great plenty, which yeeldeth a certaine gumme, sweete to smell to, but bitter in taste, called also Bdellium. The Hebrewes take the Load-stone for Bdellium. Beroaldus affirmeth, that Bdela in Hebrew signifieth 30 Pearle: so doth Engubinus, and Hierome calls it Oleaster: be it what it will, a tree bearing gumme, or Pearle: Hauilab, or Susiana hath plenty of both. Now this Countrey of Susiana or Hauilab stretcheth it selfe toward the North, as farre as the Altars of Hercules, and from thence imbraceth all that Tract of land Southward, as farre as the Persian Gulfe, on the East side thereof: from which East side had the Shebans (which traded with the Citie of Tyre, according to Ezekiel) their great plenty of gold, which Strabo also witnesseth, as was shewed before.

The Greekes had a conceit, that Pison was Danubius: the Rabbines take it for Nilus. Aben-ezra (sayth Hopkins) out of Rabbi Sanda tranlateth Pison into Nilus: But Nilus findeth the same impossibility that Ganges doth: and Danubius hath the Sea of Hellefont and all Asia the lesse, betwene it and Tigris. Now Pison, which runneth through Hauilab or Susiana, doth to this day retaine some signe of this name; for where it and Tigris embrace each other vnder the Citie of Apamia, there doe they agree of a ioyned and compounded name, and are called Piso-tigris. And it is strange vnto me, that from so great antiquitie there should bee found remaining any resembling found of the first name: for Babylon it selfe, which dwelleth so neere these rivers, is by some writers knowne by the name of Bandus, as, by Postellus, by Cassiodorus, of Baldach: by Barius, of Bagdad; and of Bougedor, by Andrew Theuer; and yet all those that haue lately scene it, call it Bagdet. To this river of Pison, Ptolome indeed with many others giue the name of Bassius, or Regius, and Gehan they terme 50 Nihar-fares and Murfas, and Naar-fares. So is Euphrates, neere the Spring and fontaine, by Strabo and Plinie called Pisicrates: by Iunius Puckerab, out of the Hebrew, (that is) The profusion, or coming forth of Euphrates: where it breaketh through the mountaine Taurus, it takes the name of Omyra. Plinarch calls it Adades and Zaranda: the that the Hebrewes Parath, (sayth Ar. Montanus): Pagninus, Perath: Iosephus, Phorath, Eucorin, Zozanius: Ammianus, Chalymicus: Gisilanus, and Colinutius terme it Cobar: which Ezekiel calleth Chebar; but this is but a branch of Euphrates. The Affryans know it by the name of Armalchar, or Nabor Malcha; but now commonly it is called Perat.

The same confusion of names hath Tigris, as Diglito, and Diglati, Seitax, and Solax: of the Hebrewes it was called Hiddikel: now of the inhabitants Tegil.

But Mercer vpon Genesis conceiueth rightly of these riuers: for Euphrates and Tigris (sayth he) streame into foure branches, two of which keepe their ancient names, and the other two are called Pison and Gebon. The reason, why these two riuers ioyned in one (below Apamia) lose their names, and are called Piso-tigris, and the memorie of Euphrates extinguihed, is, because the best part of Euphrates running through the channell of Gebon, sinketh into the Lakes of Chaldea, not farre from Per, the Citie of Abraham, and fall not intirely into the Persian Sea, as Tigris accompanied with Pison doth.

This error that Pison was Ganges, was first broched by Iosephus, (whose fieldes, though they be fertile, yet are they exceeding full of weeds) and other men (who take his authoritie to be sufficient in matter of description, whereupon depended no other important consequence) were not curious in the examination thereof. For Epiphanius, Augustine, and Hierome, take this for currant; whereof it followed, that as Pison was transported into the East India, to find out Hauilab: so was Gebon drawne into Africa, to compass Ethiopia. But if Hauilab, whereof Moses speaketh in the description of Paradise, be found to be a Region, adjoining to Babylon on the one side, and Cush (which is falsly interpreted Ethiopia) fastened to it on the other side, wee shall not neede then to worke wonders (that is) to impose vpon men the transportation of riuers, from one end of the world to the other, which (among other vses) were made to transport men. Now it was in the valley of Shinar, where Cush the sonne of Ham first late downe with his sonnes Shebah, Hauilab, Sabtah, Raamah, Nimrod, &c. and of Hauilab, the sonne of Cush, did that Region take name, which Pison compasseth; and the land (called Cush) which Gebon watereth, tooke name of Cush himselfe. For as the sonnes of Isctan, Ophir and Hauilab, seated themselves as neere together as they could in India, so did the sonnes of Cush in Shinar or Babylonia, where Nimrod built Babel: for Hauilab or Cbauilab was first Chusea of Cush; then Chusa, Susa, and Susian.

From this Hauilab vnto the Deserts of Sur, did the Israelites and Amalechites possesse all the interiack Countries: for Saul smote the Amalechites from Hauilab to Sur: which Sur, the Chaldean Paraphrast conuerteth Hagra, and Hagra bordereth the red Sea; but this was not meant from Sur vpon the red Sea, to Hauilab in the East India, for Saul was no such traualer or Conquerour, and therefore Hauilab must be found neerer home, where the sonnes of Ismael inhabited, and which Countrey Saul wasted: for Amalek and the Amalechites posselt that necke of Countrey, between the Persian Sea, and the red Sea; Hauilab being the extreme of the one towards the East, and Sur of the other, towards Egypt and the West, leauing that great body of Arabia felix towards the South, and they spred themselves with the Midianites and Edumaeans, from the East part, or backe side of the Holie Land, to the bankes of Euphrates, comprising the best parts of Arabia Petraea, and Deserta.

§. XIII.

Of the River Gehon and the Land of Cush: and of the ill translating of the Æthiopia for Cush, 2. CHRON. 21. 16.

NOW, as Hanilah in the East India drew Pison so farre out of his way thither, so I say did Cush (being by the Senentie translated Æthiopia) force Gehon into Ægypt. For Cush being taken for Æthiopia by the Greekes, whom the Latines followed, Gehon consequently was esteemed for Nilus. But Æthiopian are, as much, as blacke or burnt faces, whose proper Countrie is called Thebaides, lying to the Southward of all Ægypt. And although there be many other Regions of *Æthiopian*s, and far South in Africa, yet those of Thebaides are those so often remembred in the Ægyptian stories, and out of which Nation they had many times their Kings of Ægypt: all which *Æthiopian*s are very neere, or else directly vnder the Equinoctiall line, which is very farre from that land inhabited by the Chusites; who are neither blacke of colour, nor in any sort neighbouring Torrida Zona. But this Translation of the Septuagint, Pererius doth qualifie in this manner: There are (saith he) two Æthiopia's, the East, and the West: and this diuision he findeth in Strabo, out of Homer. Now because there is no colour to make Chus Æthiopia in Africa, Pererius will make Chus and the Land of the Chusites to (which is Arabia Petraea, and a part of Arabia the Happy, with the Region of Madian) to be the East Æthiopia.

Now if it be granted, that Cush and the Land of the Chusites, be that Tract from Sur to Hanilah, according to the Scriptures: Habitauit ISMAEL ab Hanilah v q Sur, que respicit Ægyptum in occidentibus Affryis; ISMAEL dwelt from Hanilah unto Sur, that is towards Ægypt, as thou goest toward Affryia; The same sufficeth to proue that Gehon cannot be Nilus, but a River which watereth Cush, and not Æthiopia. But this place of Scripture, Habitauit ISMAEL, &c. hath this sense: Ismael dwelt from Hanilah, which is the way of Affryia, or the Countrie bordering Affryia; and Sur, which lyeth toward Ægypt, which is as much to say, as, The Issues of Ismael (whereof there 30 were twelve Princes) whom God had promised to make a great people, inhabited all those Regions between the border of Ægypt and Affryia. And that they were (according to the word of God) so increased and multiplied, it well appeared, when Zearab the Chusite, which others call Tharantia, brought an Armie of ten thousand thousand against Afa King of Inda. Which Armie came not out of Æthiopia beyond Ægypt; for that had beene a strange progresse for such a multitude, as ten hundred thousand, hauing so mightie a King as the King of Ægypt, betwene Palestina and Æthiopia. But these were the Chusites, Amalechites, Madianites, Ismaelites, and Arabians. For it is written, that after Afa (strengthened by God) had defeated this world of an Armie, he in following his victorie tooke some of the Cities of King 40 Zearab round about, as Gerar. Now that Gerar is a Citie of the *Æthiopian*s, it cannot be suspected: for these be the wordes of the Scripture disprouing it: And ABRAHAM departed thence toward the South Countrie, and dwelt betwene Cadish and Sur, and joyned in Gerar: Now Sur is that part, vpon which Moses and the Ismaelites first set their feete after they passed the Red Sea, where the Amalechites in Rephidim set on them, supposing that they had beene wearie, and vnable to resist. Again, in the storie of Isaac it is written: Wherefore ISAC went to ABIMELECH, and the Philistims unto Gerar: and I am sure Abimelech and the Philistims were no *Æthiopian*s. And lastly, Moses himselfe, where he describeth the bounds of Canaan, hath these wordes: Then the border of the Canaanites was from Syden, as then commeth to Gerar: for Syden was the 50 Frontier of Canaan towards the North, and Gerar by Gazah towards the South. But indeede, howfoeuer Pererius doth with an honest excuse salue his Translation of Chus for Æthiopia, yet it appeareth plainly, that the Septuagint and Iosephus did altogether misvnderstand this place. And first, for Homer's East and West Æthiopia, they they are both found elsewhere. For Plinie in his fifth Booke and eighth Chapter, citeth Homer for an Authour, of these two *Æthiopia*s. But the East Æthiopia is that which compasseth Nilus to the South of Ægypt, and is the South border thereof; now a part of the Empire of the Abyssynes, vnder Prefter Iohn; And the West Æthiopia is that, which ioyneth it selfe with the River Niger, which we call Senega and Gambra: for these abouts are these *Æthiopian*s called Pereris, Naraites, with diuers other names, which Plinie numbred. But all these are in Africa, and beyond the Deserts Plin. 5. c. 8. thereof, sayth Plinie out of Homer, Agrippa, and Isba; which Regions indeede (I mean that of Niger, and that of Prefter Iohn, and the Troglodytes) lye due East and West. But as for Cush and the Region of the Ismaelites, &c. they are extended directly North from that Æthiopia, which is beyond Ægypt. Now, that Iosephus was exceeding grosse herein, it appeareth by that fiction, which hee bath of Moses when he serued Pharao, in the warres against the *Æthiopian*s: for in that (to make Chus, Æthiopia) hee transporteth Madian by miracle ouer the Red Sea, and beyond all Ægypt, and setteth it in Æthiopia, as shall be shewed more at large in the Chapter of the Worlds Plantation. Again, that Gehon was improperly translated Nilus, Pererius confesseth, and layeth it rather to the corruption of the Greeke Copie, than otherwise. And whereas the Septuagint haue conuerted this place of the Prophet HEREMIE; And what hast thou now to doe in the way of Ægypt, to drinke the water of Ni- l. 2. v. 18. lus? Quid tibi vis in via Ægypti, ut bibas aquam Gehon? to this faith PERERIVS, pre- fecto Hebraice ibi non est vox Gehon, sed Sichor, que significat nigrum & turbidum; Truly (saith PERERIVS) the word Gehon in this place, is not found in the Hebrew, but Sichor, which significeth blacke and troubled water.

Furthermore, this is a manifest and vnanswerable argument, that Chus was ill taken for Æthiopia. Moses married the Daughter of Iethro, Prince and Priest of Madian, whom both the Greeke and Latine call a Madianite, and not Æthiopian, as (with Iosephus) The Genens conuers it, though it helps it a little with a marginal note. Now it is without dispute, that Zipporah was of the Countrie of Madian, which is that part of Arabia Petraea, bordering the Red Sea; for it is written in the second of Exodus, that MOSES fled from PHARAO into the Land of Madian, and sate downe by a Well, &c. and againe, in the third of Exodus; when MOSES kept the sheepe of IEHRO his father in law, Priest of Madian, &c. Indeed, these four Nations are euerie where mixt in the Scriptures, because they dwell confusedly together (to wit) the Madianites, the Ismaelites, the Amalekites, and the Chusites, which were all in one generall word, Arabians, and in the Scriptures sometimes called by one of those names, and sometimes by another, as in Gen. 37. v. 25. 27. & 28. that Ioseph was sold to the Ismaelites; and in the same Chapter, v. 36. it is written, that the Madianites sold Ioseph to Putiphar, Pharao's Steward. The Genens in a marginal note (to auoid this confounding of the Nations) say, that Moses wrote according to their opinion, who tooke the Madianites and Ismaelites to be all one. But Moses wrote not after any mans opinion, he wrote the truth, and these were all Arabians, and so in this very place it appeareth by their merchandise, which they brought with them, when they bought Ioseph: for their Camels were laden with Spicery and Balme, and Myrre, which are the Trades of Arabia felix: from whence chiefly, and from the East India, all the World is serued with Myrre and Frankincense; and their Spices they received from the East side of the Arabian Gulfe, as aforesaid. And in the 39. Chapter it is said: That Putiphar bought Ioseph of the Ismaelites, which the Chaldean Paraphrast in the same place calleth Arabians. Now, to make this the more manifest, it is written in the sixth of Judges; That when Israel had sown, then came vp the Madianites, and the Amalekites, and they of the East, and came vpon them: they of the East, were Arabians of the Desert; so as where before in the buying of Ioseph, the Madianites and the Ismaelites were confused, here the Madianites and Amalekites are made one Nation. For in the prosecution of the Story of Gedeon, the Madianites only are named, as comprehending both Nations; and in the eight Chapter, v. 24. these Nations are all called Ismaelites, and and neyther Medianites nor Amalekites. As when Gedeon desired, that every man would give him the golden eare-rings, which they had taken after the victory against Zebab and Zalmunna, Kings of Arabia, amounting to 1700. shickles of gold, it is written: For they had golden eare-rings, because they were Ismaelites. And these Ismaelites were a great and valiant Nation, and cuer in action of warre. Manus eius contra omnes, & manus omnium contra eum; His hand (sayth God of ISRAEL) shall bee against all men, and every mans hand against him. Of these Ismaelites came the Mahometan Arabians, though some Writers thinke Mahomet to be of the Schenite. And these Ismaelites, which inhabit chiefly in Cedar, and the Desarts of Sur and Pharan (saith Iosephus) vse poyson vpon their Arrowes, as the Indians doe. Towards the South-east are the Adianites, and Chusites; and beyond them, towards the Desarts of Arabia, the Amalekites; and all are one Nation, and all Arabians.

Lastly, the ill translation of Ethiopia for Chus, is among other places, made most apparent, in the second of Chronicles, in these wordes: So the Lord stirred up against IEHORAM, the spirit of the Philistines, and the Arabians, which confine the Ethiopi, so Hierome reads it: the Genuea translation bath it, which were besides the Ethiopi. Now, how farre it is off betwene the Philistines, and the Negros, or the Ethiopi, so very man that looketh in a Map may iudge. For the Philistines and Arabians doe mixe and ioyne with the Land of the Chusites, and are distant from Ethiopia about two and thirtie, or three and thirtie degrees, and therefore not their next Neighbours; but all Egypt, and the Desarts of Sur and Pharan, are betwene them. So as this place of the second of Chronicles, should have bene translated in these wordes: So the Lord stirred up against IEHORAM, the spirit of the Philistines, and the Arabians, which confine and border vpon the Chusites, who indeed are their next Neighbours. * Nulla superest dubitatio quin Ethiopia in Sacris literis sit Arabia propinqua; There remaineth no doubt (sayth STEVCHVS) but Ethiopia in the Scriptures, is taken for that Country, which ioyneeth to Arabia.

Now may we thinke it is probable, or possible, that Moses could bee ignorant of Nilus? No, he knew it, no living man so well, and therefore would neuer have named Gehon, for Nilus, or Nilus for Gehon. Surely, if Moses had meant Nilus, when he named Gehon, he would have called the River (into which he was cast vpon Reeds, and preferred by God, working compassion in the Daughter of Pharao) a River of Egypt, wherein he was borne and bred, and wrought so many Miracles. Besides, the River of Nilus is often named in the Scriptures, but neuer by the name of Gehon. And if Moses had told the Israelites, that Nilus had bene a River of Paradise, they might iustly have thought, that hee had derided them: for they had liued there all dayes of their liues, and found no such Paradise at all, nor any memory, or speech thereof; except wee shall beleue the Paradise of Hesperides, where (sayth Plinie) there was nothing found in his time, but wild Oliues in stead of golden Apples. But Nilus is twice called Siehor, once in Egypt, and once in the Prophet Hieremie; and yet in those places it is not said to be a River of Ethiopia, but of Egypt. For in a word, the Israelites had neuer any communion or affaires with the Ethiopi, nor any intelligence, or trade, beyond Egypt, to the South; but the Enemies which they had on the South, and East-parts, were these Nations of the Chusites, Philistines, Ismaelites, Amalekites, and Medianites: who being often gouerned by many little Kings, or Regals, were distinguished in names, according to the Fathers and Heads of those Nations; but in one generall name were all Arabians. On the North-side of Canaan, they were afflicted with the Caldeyrians, with the Magegians, Tubalines, and others their adherents; and thirdly within themselves, the Nations, which remained of the ancient Canaanites, held the strongest Cities vpon the Sea-coast (as) Tyre, Sidon, Acon, Gaza, and many others: yea, Hierusalem it selfe was with-held from Israel (from the dayes of Moses, even vnto the time of Dauid) by the Iebusites.

That which now remaineth of most difficultie is, that it doth not appeare, that any part of Gehon watereth that part of Arabia the stonie, which the Chusites inhabit-ted in the times of the Kings of Israel: and in this Desart it was that Matt. Beraldu lost himselfe in seeking out Paradise: for hee was driuen (to my vnderstanding) to create two Riuer, and call them Gehon, and Pison: to the end that the one might water Chus, and the other Hauilah, for I finde none such in verum natura, as hee hath described: by which Riuer hee also includeth within Paradise, euen Arabia the Desart.

And as he well proued that Pison was not Ganges, nor Gehon, Nilus: so where to find them else, where it seemeth he knew not. Certainly this River of Gehon, which he maketh to fall into the Mediterran at Gaza, and whose Springs hee findeth farre East in Arabia, is but imaginary: for the Current by Gaza is but a small streame, rising betwene it and the Red Sea, whose head from Gaza is little more then twentie English myles, as shall appeare hereafter. But questionable, hence it comes that many were mistaken. They all considered of the habitations of the Chusites, as they were planted when the state of Israel stood, and when it flourished, being then their neere Neighbours, and neuer looked backe to the first seates and plantation of Chus. For after the Flood, Chus and his children neuer reited, till they found the Valley of Shinar, in which, and neere which himselfe with his sonnes first inhabited, HAVILAH tooke the River-side of Tigris chiefly on the East, which after his owne name he called HAVILAH, (now Susiana;) Ramab, and Sheba farther downe the 10 River, in the entrance of Arabia felix. NIMROD feasted himselfe in the best of the Valley, where he built Babel, whereof that Region had afterwards the name of Babylonia. Chus himselfe and his brother MIZRAIM first kept vpon Gehon, which fallth into the Lakes of Chaldea, and in proceesse of time, and as their people increased, they drew themselves more Welterly towards the Red or Arabian Sea: from whence MIZRAIM past oner into Egypt, in which Tract the Chusites remained for many yeeres after. Now because there could bee no such River found in Arabia the stonie, which they might entitle Gehon, they translated Chus Ethiopia, and Gehon, Nilus. And if we doe examine this mistaking by example, wee shall the better perceiue it as it was. For let vs suppose, that BRUTE, or whosoever else that first peopled this 30 land, had arriued vpon the River of Thames, and calling the land after his name BRITANNIA, it might be said that Thames or Tems was a river, that watered Britannia: and when afterwards in proceesse of time, the same BRUTE had also discovered and conquered Scotland, which he also entituled by the same name of Britannia, after-ages might conclude that Scotland was no part thereof, because the river of Tems is not found therein. Or let vs suppose that EVROPA, the daughter of the King of Tyre in Phoenicia, gaue the name to Europe, according to Ilerodotus, and that the first discoverers thereof arriued in the mouth of some river in Thrace, which then watered as much of Europe, as hee first discovered, (shall wee in like sort resolute, that France, Spaine, and Italy, &c. are no parts of Europe, because that River is not found 40 in them, or any of them?) In like manner was it said by Moses in his description of Gehon, that it watered the whole land of Chus; but not the whole land which the Chusites should or might in future time conquer, people, and inhabit, seeing in after-ages they became Lords of many Nations, and they might (perchance) haue bene Masters in time, (as the Saracens which came of them were) of a great part of the world. For (though the Babylonian Empire, which tooke beginning in NIMROD the sonne of CHUS, consisted at the first but of foure Cities. (to wit) Babel, Erech, Acad, and Chalne, yet wee finde, that his Successours within a few yeeres after commounded all the whole world in effect: and the fame of Babel consumed the memorie of Chus. For of this Tower of Confusion did all that land take the name of Babylonia: and the greatnesse of that Empire founded by NIMROD a younger sonne, obscured the name and nation of his father CHUS in those parts, vntill they crept farther off, and in places not yet entituled, and farther from the Babylonian Empire, where the Chusites retained their names, which also they fastned to the Soile and Territorie by themselves afterwards inhabited and held. And we may not thinke, that CHVS or any of his could in haste creepe through those desert Regions, which the length of 130. yeares after the flood had (as it were) fortified with thickets, and permitted every bulsh and briar, reede and tree to ioyne themselves (as it were) into one maine body and Forrest. For if wee looke with iudgement and reason into the worlds plantation, we shall finde, that every family seated themselves as neere together as possible they could; and though necessitie enforced them, after they grew full of people, to spread themselves, and creepe out of Shinar or Babylonia, yet did they it with this aduice, as that they might at all times resort, and succour one another by riuer, the fields being then (without all doubt) impassable. So NIMROD, who out of wit and strength vsurped dominion over the rest, sate downe in the very confluence of all those riuers, which watered Paradise: for thither it was to which the greatest troupes of NOAH'S children repaired; and from the same place whence Mankinde had his beginning, from thence had they againe their increase. The first Father of men ADAM, had therein his former habitation. The second Father of Mankinde NOAH, began from thence his dispersion.

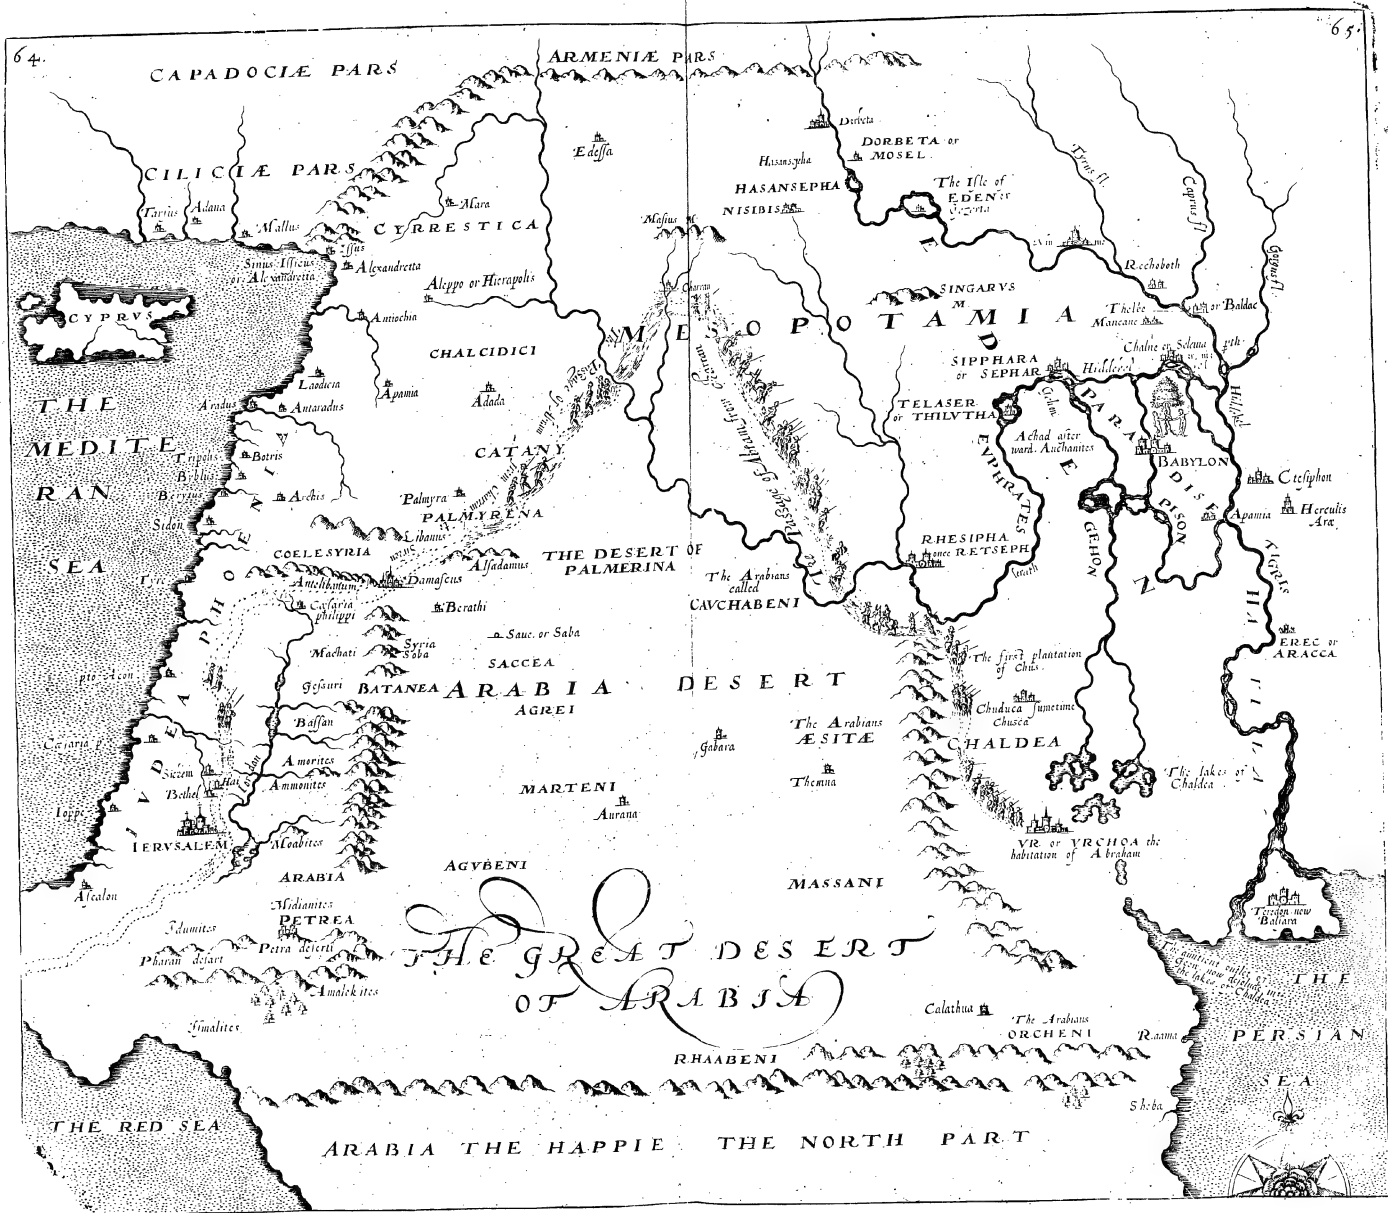

Now as NIMROD the yongest, yet strongest, made his choice of Babel (as aforesaid) which both Tigris and Euphrates cleansed and enriched; so did HAVILAH place himselfe vpon Piso-tigris: RAAMAH and his sonne SHERA farther downe vpon the same Riuer, on the Sea-coast of Arabia: CHVS himselfe vpon Gehon, the fairest branch of Euphrates. And when they began to spread themselves farther off, yet they alwayes fastened themselves to the Riuer's sides: for Ninive, Charran, Reseph, Canneh, &c. in Chaldea, and the other first-peopled Cities were all founded vpon these Navigable Riuer, or their branches, by which the one might giue succour and assistance to the other, as is already often remembered.

§. XV.

A conclusion by way of repetition of something spoken of before.

BV now to conclude this dispute, it appeareth to mee by the testimonies of the Scriptures, that Paradise was a place created by God, and a part of this our Earth and habitable World, seated in the lower part of the Region of Eden, afterward called Aram fluuiorum, or Mesopotamia, which taketh into it also a portion of Shinar and Armenia: this Region standing in the most excellent temper of all other, (to wit) 35. degrees from the Aequinoctiall, and 55. from the North-pole: in which Climate the most excellent Wines, Fruits, Oyle, Graine of all sorts are to this day found in abundance. And there is nothing that better proueth the excellency of this sayd soyle and temper, then the abundant growing of the Palme-trees, without the care and labour of man. For wherein fouer the Earth, Nature, and the Sunne can most vaunt, that they haue excelled, yet shall this Plant be the greatest wonder of all their workes: this Tree alone giueth vnto man what fouer his life beggeth at Natures hand. And though it may bee said, that these Trees are found both in the East and West Indies, which Countries are also blessed with a perpetuall Spring and Summer, yet, lay downe by those pleasures and benefits the fearefull and dangerous Thunders and Lightnings, the horrible and frequent Earthquakes, the dangerous diseases, the multitude of venomous beasts and wormes, with other inconueniences, and then there will be found no comparison betwene the one and the other.

What other excellencies this Garden of Paradise had, before God (for mans ingratitude and crueltie) cursed the Earth, we cannot iudge; but I may safely thinke, that by how much Adam exceeded all liuing men in perfection, by being the immediate workmanship of God, by so much did that chosen and particular Garden exceed all parts of the Vniuersall World, in which God had planted (that is) made to grow grow the Trees of Life, of Knowledge; Plants only proper, and becoming the Paradise, and Garden of so great a Lord.

The summe of all this is, That whereas the eyes of men in this Scripture haue beene dimme-sighted (some of them finding Paradise beyond our knowne World: some, about the middle Region of the Ayre: some, eleuated neere the Moone: others, as farre South as the Line, or as farre North, as the Pole, &c.) I hope that the Reader will be sufficiently satisfied, that these were but like Castles in the Ayre, and in mens fancies, vainly imagined. For it was Eastward in Eden (sayth Moses) Eastward, in respect of Iudaea, that God planted this Garden, which Eden wee find in the Prophets where it was, and whereof the name (in some part) remaineth to this day. 10. A River went out of Eden to water this Garden, and from thence diuided it selfe into foure branches; and we find that both Tigris and Euphrates swimming through Eden, doe ioyn in one, and afterward taking wayes apart, doe water Chus and Hauilah, according to Moses: the true seates of Chus and his Sonnes then being in the Valley of Shinar, in which Nimrod built Babel. That Pison was Ganges, the Scripture, Reason, and experience teach the contrary: for that which was neuer ioyned, cannot bee diuided, Ganges, which inhabiteth India, cannot bee a branch of the Rivers of Eden; That Gebon was Nilus, the same distance maketh the same impossibilitie, and this River is a greater stranger to Tigris and Euphrates, then Ganges is: for although there 20 are betweene Tigris and Ganges about foure thousand miles, yet they both rise in the same quarter of the World; but Nilus is begotten in the Mountaines of the Moone, almost as farre off as the Cape of good hope, and falleth into the Mediterran Sea: and Euphrates distilleth out of the Mountaines of Armenia, and falleth into the Gulfe of Persia: the one riseth in the South, and trauaileth North: the other riseth in the North, and runneth South, threescore and three Degrees the one from the other. In this leafe following, I haue added a Chorographical description of this terrestrial Paradise, that the Reader may thereby the better conceiue the preceding Discourse; and this is the reward I looke for, that my labours may but receiue an allowance suspended, vntill such time, as this description 30 of mine be reprobued by a better.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the two chiefe Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

§. I.

That the Tree of Life was a materiall Tree: and in what sense it is to be taken, that man by his eating the forbidden fruit, is made subiect to death.

OR eating the forbidden fruit of the Tree of Knowledge was Adam driven out of Paradise, in exilium vite temporalis, into the banishment of temporal life, sayth Beda. That these Trees of Life and Knowledge were materiall Trees (though Figures of the Law and of the Gospell) it is not doubted by the most religious and learned Writers: although the wits of men, which are so volatile, as nothing can fix them, and so slippery, as nothing can fasten them, haue in this also deliuered to the World an imaginarie doctrine.

The Tree of Life (say the Hebrewes) hath a plural construction, and is to be vnderstood, Lignum vitarum, The Tree of liues, because the fruit thereof had a proprietie, to preferue both the growing, sensitiue, and rational life of man; and not only (but for Adams transgression) had prolonged his owne dayes, but also giuen a durefull continuance to all posteritie; and that, so long, as a bodie compounded of Elements could last.

Barthol. 2. 1. 174.

And although it is hard to thinke, that flesh and bloud could bee immortall, but that it must once perish and rot, by the vnchanged Law of God imposed on his creatures, Man (notwithstanding) should haue enjoyed thereby a long, healthfull, and vngriued life: after which (according to the opinion of most Diuines) hee should haue bene translated, as Enoch was. And as before the Flood, the dayes of men had the long measure of eight hundred or nine hundred yeeres; and soone after the flood, of two hundred yeeres and vpwards, euen to five hundred: so if Adam had not disobeyed Gods first and easie Commandement, the liues of men on Earth might haue continued double, treble, or quadruple to any of the longest times of the first age, as many learned men haue conceiued. Chrysostome, Rupertus, Tostatus, and others were of beliefe, that (but for Adams fall and transgression) Adam and his Posteritie had bene immortall. But such is the infinite wisdom of God, as he foresaw that the Earth could not haue contained Mankind; or else, that Millions of soules must haue bene vngenerated, and haue had no being, if the first number, wherewith the Earth was replenished, had abode thereon for euer: and therefore that of Chrysostome must bee vnderstood of immortalitie of bodies, which should haue bene translated and glorified.

But of what kind or Species this Tree of Life was, no man hath taken on him to teach: in which respect many haue conceiued, that the same was not materiall, but a meere Allegorie, taking their strength out of Salomon, where Wisdom is compared to the Tree of Life, and from other places, where also Christ is called the Tree of Life, and out of the Apocalypsis, I will giue to him that ouercometh, to eat of the Tree of Life, which is in the Paradise of God. But to this place Saint Augustine answers may suffice, (which is) That the one doth not exclude the other, but that, as there was a terrestriall Paradise, so there was a celestiall. For although Agar and Sara were Figures of the Old, and New Testament, yet to thinke that they were not Women, and the Maid and Wife of Abraham, were meere foolishnesse. And so in this place the sense of the Scripture is manifest. For God brought out of the earth euery tree faire to sight, and sweet to taste; the tree also of Life in the midst of the garden: which sheweth, that among the trees, which the Earth by Gods commandement produced, the tree of Life was one, and that the fruit thereof was also to be eaten. The report of this Tree was also brought to the ancient Poets: for as from the indigested matter or Chaos, Hesiodus, Homer, Ouid, and others, steale the inuention of the created world; so from the Garden of Paradise, they tooke the Plat-forme of the Orchard of Alcinous, and another of the Hesperides: and from the tree of Life, their Nectar and Ambrosia; for Nectar, according to Suidas, signifieth making young, and Ambrosia, immortalitye; and therefore said to be the meate and drinke of the gods.

§. II.

Of Becanus his opinion, that the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica.

NOW for the Tree of Knowledge of good and euill, some men haue presumed farther, especially Goropius Becanus, who giueth himselfe the honour to haue found out the kinde of this Tree, which none of the Writers of former times could euer ghesse at, whereat Goropius much maruaileth. But as he had an inuentiue braine, so there neuer liued any man, that beleued better thereof, and of himselfe. Surely, howeuer his opinion may be valued, yet he vsurpeth the praise due to others, at least if the inuention be at that price at which he setteth it. For Moses Barcephas fastened on this coniecture about sixe hundred yeeres before Becanus was borne: and Barcephas himselfe referreth the inuention to an antiquitie more remote, citing for his Author Phloxenus Maburgensis, and others, whose very wordes Goropius vseth, both concerning the Tree, and the reasons wherewith he would induce other men to that beliefe. For Moses Barcephas in his Treatise of Paradise (the first Part and fol. 49.) saith, That the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica; The Indian Fig-tree, of which the greatest plentie (saith Becanus) are found vpon the banks of Aceffines, one of the Riues which falleth into Indus, where Alexander built his Fleet of Gallies in, or neere the Kingdome of Porus.

This Tree beareth a fruit of the bignesse of a great peaze, or (as Plinie reporteth) somewhat bigger, and that it is a tree, sempet serens; Always planting it selfe; that it spreadeth it selfe so farre abroad, as that a troupe of horsemen may hide themselves vnder it. Strabo saith, that it hath branches bending downward, and leaues no lesse then a shield. Arisobolus affirmeth, that fiftie horsemen may shaddeu themselves vnder one of these trees. Onesicritus raiseth this number to foure hundred. This tree (saith Theophrastus) exceedeth all other in bignesse, which also Plinie and Onesicritus confirme: to the trunk of which, these Authors giue such a magnitude, as I shame to repeat. But it may be, they all speake by an ill-vnderstood report. For this Indian Fig-tree is not so rare a plant, as Becanus conceiueth, who because he found it no where else, would needs draw the garden of Paradise to the Tree, and set it by the Riuer Aceffines. But many parts of the world haue them, and I my selfe haue seene twentie thousand of them in one Valley, not farre from Paria in America. They grow in moist grounds, and in this manner: After they are first shot vp some twentie or thirtie foote in length (some more, some lesse, according to the soyle) they spread a very large top, hauing no bough nor twigge in the trunk or stemme: for from the vtmost end of the head branches there issueth out a gunnie inuice, which hangeth downe-ward like a cord or sinew, and within a few Moneths reacheth the ground; ground; which it no sooner toucheth but it taketh roote, and then being filled both from the top boughes, and from his owne proper roote, this cord maketh it selfe a Tree exceeding hastily. From the vtmost boughes of these yong Trees there fall againe the like cordes, which in one yeere and lesse (in that World of a perpetuall spring) become also trees of the bignesse of the nether part of a lance, and as straight, as arte or nature can make any thing, casting such a shade, and making such a kinde of groue, as no other Tree in the world can doe. Now one of these trees considered with all his yong ones, may (indeede) throwd foure hundred or foure thousand horsen, if they please; for they couer whole Vallies of ground where these trees grow neere the Sea-banke, as they doe by thousands in the inner part of Trinidad.¹⁰ The cordes which fall downe ouer the bankes into the Sea, shooting alway downward to hinder roote vnder water, are in those Seas of the Indies, where Oylters breed, intangled in their beds, so as by pulling vp one of these cordes out of the Sea, I haue seene five hundred Oylters hanging in a heape thereon; whereof the report came, that Oylters grew on trees in India. But that they beare any such huge leaues, or any such delicate fruit, I could neuer finde, and yet I haue trauailed a dozen miles together vnder them: but to returne to Goropius Becanus. This tree (saith he) was good for meate and pleasing to the sight, as the tree of Knowledge of good and euill is described to be.

Plin. l. 12. c. 5.

Secondly, this tree hauing so huge a trunk (as the former Authors report, and so Becanus beleueth) it was in this tree that Adam and Eue hid themselves from the presence of God, for no other tree (saith he) could contayne them. But first it is certayne, that this Tree hath no extraordinarie magnitude, as touching the trunk or stemme, for among ten thousand of them it is hard to finde any one bigger than the rest, and these are all but of a meane size. Secondly, the wordes of Moses translated in medio ligni, are by all the interpreters vnderstood in the plural number (that is) in the midst of the trees. But his third argument (or rather the argument of Moses Barcephas, word for word) is, That when Adam and Eue found themselves naked, they made them breeches of Fig-leaues; which proueth (indeede) that either the tree it selfe was a Fig-tree, or that a Fig-tree grew neere it: because Adam being posselt³⁰ with shame, did not runne vp and downe the garden to seeke out leaues to couer him, but found them in the place it selfe; and these leaues of all other were most commodious by reason of their largenesse, which Plinie auoweth in these wordes; Latitudo foliorum peltæ effigiem Amazonie habet; The breadth of the leaues hath the shape of an Amazonian shield: which also Theophrastus confirmeth; the forme of which Targets Virgil toucheth:

Ducis Amazonidum lunatis ægmina peltis PENTHESILÆA furens.

The Amazons with Crescent-formed shield
PENTHESILÆA leads into the field.

Here Becanus desireth to be beleened, or rather threatneth vs all that reade him, to giue credit to this his borrowed discouerie, vying this confident (or rather cholerick) speech. Quis erit tam impudenter obstinatus, si hæc à nobis de sic hæc ex antiquis scriptoribus cum MOSIS narratione comparet, ut audeat dicere aliam arbores inueniri posse, quæ cum illa magis quadret? Who will be so impudently obstinate, if he compare these things which we haue reported of this Fig-tree, and out of ancient Writers deliuered, with the narration of Moses, as to dare to auow, that any other tree can be found, which doth⁵⁰ more properly answere, or agree therewith? But for my selfe, because I neither find this tree, sorting in body, in largenesse of leaues, nor in fruit to this report, I rather incline to the opinion of Philo: that the Earth neuer brought forth any of these trees, neither before nor after; but I leaue euery man to his owne beliefe, for the matter is of no

no great weight as touching his kinde: only thereby, and by the ealie Commandement by God giuen to Adam, to forbear to feede thereon, it pleased God to make tryall of his obedience: Prohibita, non propter aliam, quàm ad commendandum puræ ac simplicis Obedientia bonum; Being forbidden, not for any other respect, then thereby to commend the goodnesse of pure and simple Obedience.

§ III.

Of Becanus his not unwitting allegorizing of the Storie of his Ficus Indica.

BVt in this I must doe Becanus right, that he hath very wittily allegorized this Tree, allowing his supposition of the Tree it selfe to be true. The effects whereof, because his discourses are exceeding ample, I haue gathered in these few wordes. As this Tree (saith he) so did Man grow straight and vpright towards God, vntill such time as he had transgressed and broken the Commandement of his Creator; and then like vnto the boughes of this tree, he began to bend downward, and slouped toward the earth, which all the rest of Adams posteritie after him haue done, rooting themselves therein and fastning themselves to this corrupt world. The exceeding vmbrious-²⁰ nesse of this tree, he compareth to the darke and shaddowed life of man, through which the Sunne of iustice being not able to pierce, we haue all remained in the shaddow of death, till it pleased CHRIST to climbe the tree of the Crosse for our enlightning & redemption. The little fruit which it beareth, and which is hard to finde among so many large leaues, may be compared (saith he) to the little vertue, and vnperciued knowledge among so large vanities, which obscure and shaddow it ouer. And as this fruit is exceeding sweet, and delicate to the taste and palate: so are the delights and pleasures of the world most pleasing, while they dure. But as all those things which are most mellifluous, are soonest changed into chollier and bitterness: so are our vanities and pleasures conuerted into the bitterest sorrowes and repen-³⁰ tances. That the leaues are so exceeding large, the fruit (for such leaues) exceeding little, in this, by comparison we behold (saith he) the many cares and great labours of worldly men, their sollicitude, their outward shewes, & publike ostentation, their apparent pride and large vanities; and if we seeke for the fruit, which ought to be their vertuous and pious actions, we finde it of the bignesse of the smallest peaze; glorie, to all the world apparent; goodnesse, to all the world inuisible. And furthermore, as the leaues, body, and boughes of this Tree, by so much exceede all other Plants, as the greatest men of power and worldly abilitie surpass the meanest: so is the little fruit of such men, and such trees, rather fitting and becoming the vnworthyest Shrub, and humblest Bryar, or the poorest and basest Man, then such a flourish-⁴⁰ ing statelynesse, and magnitude. Lastly, whereas Adam, after he had disobeyed God, and beheld his owne nakednesse and shame, sought for leaues to couer himselfe withall, this may serue to put vs in minde of his and our finnes, as often as we put on our garments, to couer and adorne our rotten and mortall bodies: to pamper and maintaine which, we vse so many vncharitable and cruell practices in this world,

§. IIII.

Of the name of the tree of Knowledge of good and euill: with some other notes touching the storie of Adams sinne.

NOW, as touching the sense of this tree of Knowledge of good and euill, and what operation the fruit thereof had, and as touching the propriety of the Tree it selfe, Moses Barcephas an ancient Syrian Doctor (translated by Masius) giueth this iudgement: That the fruit of this tree had no such vertue or qualitie, as that by the tasting thereof, there was

was any such knowledge created in Adam, as if he had beene ignorant before; but as Inimus also noteth: Arbor scientia boni & mali (id est) experientia boni & mali aduentu; The Tree of knowledge of good and euill (that is) the experience of good and euill by the euent. For thus much we may conceiue, that Adam being made (according to the Hebrew phrase) by the workmanship of Gods owne hand, in greater perfection then euer any man was produced by generation, being (as it were) the created plant, out of whole feede all men liuing haue growne vp; and hauing receiued immortalitye from the breath or spirit of God, he could not (for these respects) be ignorant, that the disobaying of Gods commandement was the fearfulllest euill, and the obseruation of his Precepts the happiest good. But as men in perfect health doe (notwithstanding) conceiue, that sicknesse is grievous, and yet in no such degree of torment, as by the suffering and experience in themselves they afterwards witness: so was it with Adam, who could not be ignorant of the punishments, due to neglect and disobedience; and yet felt by the prooffe thereof in himselfe another terror then he had fore-thought, or could imagine. For looking into the glasse of his owne guiltie soule, he beheld therein the horror of Gods iudgements, so as he then knew, he feelingly knew, and had tryall of the late good, which could not be prized, and of the new purchased euill, which could not be exprest. He then saw himselfe naked both in body and minde; that is, deprived of Gods grace and former felicitie: and therefore was this tree called the tree of Knowledge, & not because the fruit thereof had any such operation, by any selfe qualitie or effect: for the same phrase is vsed in many places of the Scriptures, and names are given to Signes and Sacraments, as to acts performed, and things done. In such fort as this tree was called the tree of Knowledge, by cause of the euent (as is aforesaid) so was the Well of contention therefore called Esek, and the Well of hatred Sinath, because the Heardsmen of Isaac and Gerar contended for them; and the heape of stones, called the heape of witness, betweene Jacob and Laban, not that the stones bare witness, but for a memorie of the covenent. So Jacob called the house of God Bethel: and Hagar, the Well in the Desert, Vientis, & videntis.

But Adam being both betrayed and mastered by his affections, ambitious of a yet farther knowledge then he had perceived in himselfe, and looking but slightly (as all his issues doe) into the miseries and sorrows incident, and greatly affecting the supposed glorie which he might obtaine by tasting the fruit forbidden, he was transported and blowne forward by the gentle winde of pleasing perswasions vnwares; his progression being strengthened by the subtle arguments of Satan, who laboured to poyson mankind in the very roote, which he moystened with the liquor of the same ambition, by which himselfe perished for euer.

Berl. sem. 2. 1. 2.

But what meanes did the Deuill finde out, or what instruments did his owne subtletie present him, as fittest and aptest to worke this mischief by? euen the vnquiet vanitie of the woman; so as by Adams harkening to the voyce of his wife, contrarie to the expresse commandement of the liuing God, Mankind by that her incantation became the subiect of labour, sorrow, and death: the woman being giuen to man for a comforter and Companion, but not for a Counsellor. But because thou hast obeyed the voyce of thy wife, &c. (saith God himselfe) Cursed is the earth for thy sake, in sorrow shalt thou eate of it all thy life. It is also to be noted, by whom the woman was tempted; euen by the most vgly and vnworthy of all beasts, into whom the Deuill entered and perswaded.

Gen. 3. 17.

Secondly, what was the motiue of her disobedience? euen a desire to know what was most vnfitting her knowledge, an affection which hath euer since remained in all the posteritie of her Sexe. Thirdly, what was it that moued the man to yeeld to her perswasions? euen the same cause which hath moued all men since to the like consent, namely, an vnwillingnesse to grieve her and make her sad, lest shee should pine and be ouer-come with sorrow. But if Adam in the state of perfection, and Selomon the sonne of Dauid, Gods chosen seruant, and himselfe a man endued with the greatest wisdome, did both of them disobay their Creator, by the perswasion and for the loue they bare to a Woman, it is not so wonderfull as lamentable, that other men in succeeding ages haue beene allured to so many inconuenient and wicked practices, by the perswasions of their wiues, or other beloued Datlings, who couer ouer and shaddow many malicious purposes with a counterfeit passion of dissimulate sorrow and vnquietnesse.

CHAP. V.

Of diuers memorable things betweene the fall of ADAM, and the flood of NOAH.

S. I.

Of the cause and the reuenge of Cains sinne: and of his going out from God.

The same Pride and Ambition which began in Angels, and afterward possit Adam, Cain also inherited: for Cain (enuious of the acceptation of his Brothers prayer and sacrifice) slue him, making himselfe the first man-slayer, and his brother the first Martyr: the reuenge of which vnnaturall murder, although it pleased God to mitigate, when Cain cryed out that his punishment was greater then he could beare: For the same offence chiefly (wherewith the sonnes of Adam, as it were, vrged and prouoked God) he destroyed all mankind, but Noah and his family: for it is written.

The earth also was corrupt before God: of which in the same place Moses giueth a reason, for saith he, The earth was filled with crueltie: and anon after, God himselfe made the cause knowne vnto Noah, saying; An end of all flesh is come before me, for the earth is filled with crueltie through them, and behold, I will destroy them with the earth, or from the earth. Neither was this crueltie meant to haue beene in taking away the lines of men only, but in all sorts of Iniustice and Oppression. After this murder of

ABEL, Cain went out from the presence of the Lord, and dwelt in the Land of Nod, toward the East side of Eden: in which wordes, The going out of Cain from the presence of the Lord, is not to be vnderstood after the literal sense; God being wholly in all parts of the world: Totus in celo est, totus in terra, non alternis temporibus. sed Aug. de Ciuitat. Dei. 12. c. 19. utramq; simul; God (saith S. AVGVSTINE) is wholly in heauen, and wholly in earth, not by interchanged times, but all at once; and that this is true, Dauid witnesseth: If I be in heauen (saith DAVID) thou art there; if in hell, thou art there also: but what is meant thereby? Exiit à facie Dei (saith CHRYSOSTOME) Cain went out from the presence of the Lord (that is) he was left of God, disfaunored and bereaued of his protection.

This word Nod or Naid, S. Hierome and many others vnderstand to signifie wandering, or incertayne habitation: vexation or agitation, saith Iunius; but the Seuentie conuert it otherwise, and take Nod for the proper name of a Countie, and so doth Iosephus. But it seemeth to me, that Cain was rather a Vagabond or Wanderer in his cogitations, then any thing else, and that his thoughts and conscience had no quiet or rest, in regard of the murder committed, iustly fearing (by his owne words) the like reuenge. And whoeuer findeth me (saith Cain) shall slay me. Now that Nod or Naid was a Region wherein Cain inhabited, appeareth by the word (dwell) for dwelling signifieth an abiding: and we call those people Wanderers and Vagabonds that haue no dwelling place. And to make this dwelling and abiding more manifest, Moses teacheth in what part of the earth this his habitation was, which he affirmeth towards the East side of Eden. Secondly, it is said by Moses, that after Cain departed from the presence or fauour of God, he built a Citie, and called it by the name of his first borne, Enoch; which he sheweth that he feared to wander, and rather fought to fortifie himselfe against reuenge. Cyrillus saith, that Cain and Abel were figures of Christ, and of the Jewes; and that as Cain, after that he had slaine Abel vniuilly, had thenceforth no certayne abiding in the world: so the Jewes, after they had crucified the Sonne of God, became Runnegates: and it is true, that the Jewes had neuer since any certayne Estate, Common-weale, or Prince of their owne vpon the earth. Now this Land of Nod, Iunius taketh to be in Arabia Deserta, a Region of Nomades; but Arabis the Desart is not Eastward, or on the East part of Eden, neither are these Nomades any particular People or Nation. For all these, in what part of the world soeuer, which in old time liued by pastorage, and fed (as we call it in Ireland) vpon whet meate, without tilling of the ground, are called by the Greekes, Nomades, and by the Latines, Pastores vagi, as the Northerne Tartarians, the Cetulians, and Numidians in Africa, the ancient Brittans, and the Northerne Irish: yea, such were the inhabitants of Italie it selfe, till such time as Italus (who gaue them that name) taught them the husbandrie of tillage, vsed at this day. But the Region Eastward from Eden is that part of Affrya, called by Ptolemie, Calena, which also might be deriued of Carena, the Countie of Cain. And that Cain inhabited in those parts, it may be gathered by the first possession of his Father Adam; for thus it is written, GEN. 3. Therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the garden of Eden to till the earth whence he was taken: and in the Verse following: Thus he cast out man, &c. and as the East side of the garden of Eden he set the Cherubims: which sheweth that the entrie into Paradise was from the East, by which entrance Adam was cast out, and therefore inhabiting on that side of Paradise which was Eastward, according to the Text. Cain also in the same Region fought his dwelling place. Now, if the word Nod or Naid doe signifie profugus, that is, a fugitive, we can giue no longer time to this vncertayne habitation of Cain, then till he built the Citie of Enoch, the first of the world, which he inclosed either for his owne defence, or (as Iosephus writeth) to oppress others thereby. So as for mine owne opinion, I am resolu'd with the Septuagint, that Nod was the proper name of a Region; and for the word (vagabond) which Cain vsed of himselfe, it seemeth by the perclose of the same Verse, that (vagabond) is therein vnderstood for such an one as transileth in feare of reuengement: for whoeuer findeth me (saith Cain) shall slay me, or else (vagabond) is taken for a man without protection, and cast out from the fauour of God.

And because these Henochians, so called of the Citie Enoch, were the first societie and ciuill assembly of all other, it is likely that the same of these people (either for crueltie, strength, or other actions) liued in the memorie of Noah and his sonnes; so that that after the Flood (as there were of all sorts of natures, some vertuously, some impiously disposed, and euery actiue minde setting before it whom to follow or imitate) those people, which delighted in crueltie and oppression tooke on them their names whole natures they most liked and allowed; of whom these Henochians were not the least. Perchance the place it selfe where Enoch stood before the Flood, and whereof the Monuments might remaine (as the pillars or the foundation of Ioppe) did gaue occasion to the Planters of that place to call themselves by the same names: for of those Henochians there were many Nations in the borders of Pontus, and Colchis in Iberia, Segdiana, and Bactria, and of the same name many Mountaines, as those which are otherwise called Coraxici. And seeing that it is hard to find out the truth of these things, which the most aged Time hath couered over or defaced, we may (according to the counsaile of Plato) exceedingly reioyce, and therewith satisfie our selues, if of so great and almost worne-out antiquitie, if of the eldest peoples names and Nations there remaine any print or foot-steps to Posteritie.

In  Pline*, P. Melis, Strabo, Valerius Placcus, Lucan, Stephanus, we finde those Henoches described, though diuersly written, as in Plinie, sometimes Henochi, in Mela Enochi, in Placcus Henochi, in Lucan Enochi, all which inhabit vpon the Sea Euxinus, but yet none of these are on the East side of Eden, or (according to Moses words) Eastward from Eden. For Moses, in all places where he describeth any Region, was so exceeding precise, as sometime hee vsed the word East or South without borrowing or addition, at other times with a borrowing, as Eastward or Southward, or towards the East or South. In the place of Genesis the eleuenth hee writeth the word (East) simply and directly. And as they went from the East, they found a Place in the Land of Shinar, but in this of Cain he addeth the word (towards) as, in the Land of Nod towards the East side of Eden, which may be taken, as inclining some one point or two eyther to the North or to the South of the East.

But as we may coniecture that these Nations tooke name of Enoch, the Citie of Cain, or of the Region wherein it stood, when the same was repectled after the Flood: so it is probable that these Henochi of Colchis, and other parts adioyning were not the first of that name, after the sonnes of Noah began to fill the World againe: because, had this Enoch the Citie of Cain stood in any of these parts, it had then bene seated North, and not East or Eastward from Eden. But as Plinie findeth their habitation towards Pontus, so afterwards he goeth on Eastward, till hee tracke them or trace them out to their originall. For he calleth these of Colchis (now Mengrelia) Sanni Henochi; Ptolemie Zani; beyond which an hundred and fiftie myle Eastward hee findeth another Nation of them about Iberia and Albania; and beyond these againe hee discovereth a third Nation, from whence all the rest tooke beginning, which inhabited on the West side of the Mountaines of Paro-pamisus, betwene them and the great Riuer of Oxus, which bordereth Bactria on the North side; and these Henochi are due East from the Region of Eden, and Eastward from the very Garden it selfe.

And although we cannot be assured, that these Henochi tooke name from the memory of the Citie of Enoch directly, yet because they inhabited due East from Paradise, and afterwards spread themselves Westward (as all Noahs sonnes did that came into Shinar) the coniecture is farre more probable, then that of Amnius the Fryer, who sets Henoch in Phoenicia, quite contrary to Moses word: Phoenicia from all parts of Eden being directly West.

And besides these feuerall Nations of the Henochi, Stephanus findeth a Region called Henochia, and the same also in the East, with diuers Mountaines about Bactria and Segdiana of the same name. Onely the Gracians (according to their fabulous inuentions of all things selfe) out of the word (Heniochi) which signifieth Carts or Coachmen, make these Nations to haue sprung from the Waggoners of Cassir and Pollux (to wit) Amphites and Telchius, who attended them in the enterprize of Iason into Colchis. And though I doe not deny, but that Iason with other Greekes ranged the

¶ III.

Of MOSES his emitting sundry things concerning CAINS Generation.

BV of the remembrance and testimonies of the name of the Citie of Henoch in prophane Story, thus much may suffice; Now it followeth to answere some few obiections against certaine particulars in the fourth and fifth Chapter of Genesis: against which for the first it is demanded, how it was possible for Cain (hauing no other assistance then his sonne Henoch) to performe such a worke as the building of a Citie, seeing there is thereto required so many hands, and so great a masse of all sorts of Materials? To which it is answered, that we are first to consider, That of Cain (because he was the Parent of an impious race) Moses vsleth no ample declaration; and so it best agreeth with his diuine reason, seeing that he containeth the whole Story of the first race, to which lasted by the least account, 1656. yeeres, in five short Chapters. Yet thus much may every man borrow of his owne weakest reason, That seeing it pleased God to bestow on the first generations of mens liues so long a measure, as 800. and 900. yeeres, that in such a space Cain had not want of leasure and meanes to build many such Cities as Henoch, be the capacitie answering to what other of the World focuer: for in what age of Cains life he built it, the Scriptures are silent: as of whole times, and the times of his illiues Moses had the least care. And as it was sayd of Cain, that he built a Citie: so was it sayd of Noah, that his three sonnes peopled all the World; but in both, the procelle of time required to bee vnderstood: which aduice seeing Moses vsleth where the space lesse requireth it, as knowing that hee writ the Scriptures to reasonable men, wee may easily vnderstand, that such was his meaning also in all reports of like nature. For in making but a difference betweene the birth of Abel, and oblation of Cain, he spake it in this sort, Fuit autem post dies multos or fine dictum (that is) in procelle of time, it came to passe that Cain brought an Oblation. And therefore it is in like sort to bee vnderstood of Cain, that many yeeres fore-gone, and when his people were increased, he built the Citie of Enoch or Henoch.

2. King 6.

And where it is written, as of Cain, that he built Enoch, so of Salomon, that hee employed in that worke, 150000. Labourers: for this phrase or speech is common with our selues to say, The King invaded; when hee caused an inuasion to bee made: and hee built, when hee commanded such a building. And therefore seeing wee find, that Moses had no regard to the ages, to the birth, or to the death of any of Cains illiues, it is not to be marualed at, why he also passeth ouer in a word the building of Enoch, without addition of any circumstance: for of Cain, Moses writeth in this manner: Cain also knew his wife, who conceived and bare HENOC, and hee built a Citie, and called the name of the Citie after the name of his sonne HENOC. And to HENOC was borne IRAD, and IRAD begat MEHVIAEL, and MEHVIAEL begat METHVSSEL, and METHVSSEL LAMECH.

Gen. 4. 17.

c. 6. v. 5.

Now of Seth, Moses writeth farre otherwise, and in this manner. And Seth liued 105. yeeres, and begat ENOCH, and SETH liued after hee begat ENOCH 807. yeeres, and begat Sonnes and Daughters: so as all the dayes of SETH were 912. yeeres, and hee dyed: as for the yeeres and times of the wicked, they were not numbred, in libro viuentium, sayth C. 11. But in SETH was the Church of God established, from whom Christ descended, as touching his manhood: and therefore this way and worke se walked in, and finished it with care, passing ouer the Reprobate Generation (as afore sayd). Of the Line of Adam by Cain, Moses remembreth but eight Generations, reckoning Adam for one, and of the Line of Adam by Seth ten, counting Adam also therein, as followeth:

I. ADAM.

- | | |
|----------------------------------|----------------|
| 2. Cain. | 2. Seth. |
| 3. Henoch. | 3. Enof. |
| 4. Irad. | 4. Cainan. |
| 5. Mahiuel. | 5. Mahaleel. |
| 6. Mathusael. | 6. Iared. |
| 7. Lamech, who by Ada had | 7. Henoch. |
| 8. Iubal and Tubal, and by Silla | 8. Mathusalem. |
| Tubalcain, and Noëma. | 9. Lamech, and |
| | 10. Noab. |

These be the Generations of Adam by Cain, which the Scriptures mention: but Iosephus giueth vnto Lamech threecore and seuentene Sonnes and Daughters, by his two wiues Ada, and Silla: and to these three sonnes of Lamech, Moses ascribeth the inuention of Pastorage, of Musick, and the working in Metall; for it seemeth that Iubal first gathered together, and made familiar those beasts which formerly were vtained, and brought them into Herds and Droues: Tubal inuented Musick, and Tubalcain the working in Brasse and Iron: the one being addicted to Husbandry, the other was Mechanicall, the third giuen to idleness and pleasure. In whom began these three manner degrees of Sheep-herds, Handy-crafts-men, and Musicians. And in the illiues of Seth began the Seruices of God, Diuinitie, Prophecie, and Astronomy: the children of the one beheld the Heauens, the other the Earth.

Gen. 4. 20. 21. 22.

¶ IIII.

Of the diuersities in the Ages of the Patriarchs when they begat their children.

Second scruple hath beene made, How it came to passe that the Patriarchs begat their children at so diuers Ages, as Cainan or Cenan at seuentie yeeres, Mahaleel and Enoch at threecore and five yeeres, whereas Iared begat not any of his vntill hee was 162. yeeres olde: Mathusalem begat at 187. Lamech at 182. and Noah at 500. yeeres. Now this difference hath bin the more enforced, because it cannot be coniectured, that eyther Iared, Mathusalem, or Lamech obtained from marriage out of the Religion of abstinence, seeing that Enoch, who was translated by God for his singular sanctities, begat children before hee was threecore and ten yeeres olde.

The apparent difference hereof ariseth in this, that Moses did not number the generations before the Flood precisely, according to the first begotten and eldest sonnes of the Patriarchs, but he drew downe the Line of Noah from Seth, and afterward from Noah to Abraham, by their true Ancestors, were they elder or younger as hee found them: for it is likely that Henoch was not the eldest of Iared, nor Lamech the first borne of Mathusalem, nor Noah of Lamech; neither is there any thing knowne to the contrary, but that Noah might haue had many sonnes before Shem, Ham, and Japhet; though these three were only named, and suruiuing, and which by God were referred to bee the Fathers of Mankind after the Flood; and therefore when we find Mahaleel to bee begotten by Kenan at threecore and ten yeeres who was the first sonne of Kenan, and then reckon that Mathusalem begat Lamech in the 187. yeere of his life, the difference seemeth strange, where Lamech is taken for the eldest. But Moses reiecteth all the other sonnes of Mathusalem but Lamech only, because hee was the Father of Noah as afore said.

little lesse: Also Masaniſſa of Numidia liued very long, and Dando of Ilyria. Among the Kings of Arcadia many liued three hundred yeeres (sayth Ephorus.). Hellanicus affirmeth of the Epians, that some of them liue full two hundred yeere: and so doth Diodorus Siculus of the Egyptians; and that these reports are not fabulous; Iosephus bringeth many witnessses with himselfe, as Marethon, Berosus, Mochus, Elius, Hieronymus, Egyptius, Hecataeus, Ephorus, and others. And Anthony Fume an Italian of good reputation reporteth, that in the yeere 1570. there was an Indian presented to Solyman, Generall of the Turkes Armie, who had out-liued three hundred yeeres. I my selfe knew the old Countesse of Desmond of Inchiquin in Munster, who liued in the yeere 1589. and many yeeres since, who was married in Edward the 10. Fourth this time, and held her Ioynture from all the Earles of Desmond since then; and that this is true, all the Noblemen and Gentlemen of Munster can witnessse. Straczius Cigogna, out of Torquemada Massius, and the like Authours, tellet of some that haue not only farre exceeded the terme prescribed by Epigenes; but beene repayed from the withered estate of decrepit age to fresh youth. But for length of life, if we note but the difference betweene the abilitie of men in those dayes wherein Galen the Philician liued, it may easily proue vnto vs what reeds weare in respect of those Cedars of the first age. For Galen did ordinarily let blood fixe pound weight, whereas wee (for the most part) stop at fixe Ounces. But to conclude this part, there are three things (not counting Constellations) which are the naturall causes of a long and healthfull life; (to wit) strong Parents, a pure and thin Ayre, and temperate vse of dyet, pleasure, and rest: for those which are built of rotten timber, or mouldring stone, cannot stand long vpright; on Ayre wee feed alwayes and in euery infant, and on meates but at times; and yet the heauy load of abundance, where-with we oppresse and ouercharge Nature, maketh her to linke vnwares in the mid-way; and therefore with a good constitution, a pure Ayre, and a temperate vse of those things which Nature wanteth, are the only friends and companions of a long life.

§. VI.

Of the Patriarchs deliuering their knowledge by Tradition: and that ENOCH writt before the Flood.

Fourth Scruple hath beene made, How the certaine knowledge of the Creation came to Moses, seeing there was no Storie thereof written, and if any such had beene, yet it is conceived, that all memorie of Antiquitie perished in the Vniuersall Flood.

But if we consider the curiositie and policie of elder ages, we shall find, that knowledge was the greatest treasure that men sought for, and which they also couered ⁴⁰ and hid from the vulgar sort, as Jewels of inestimable price, fearing the irreuerent construction of the ignorant and irreligious: so as whatsoever was attained vnto concerning God, and his working in nature, the same was not left to publike dispute, but deliuered ouer by heart and tradition from wise men to a posteritie equally zealous; Ex animo in animum sine litera, medio intercedente verbo: From minde to minde without Letters, by way of tradition or word of mouth. And it was thought by Eldras Origen, and Hilarius, (as Mirandula conceiueith) that Moses did not onely vpon the Mount receiue the Law from God, but withall, secretiorem & veram legis enarrationem; a more secret and true explanation of the Law; which (saith he, out of the same Authours,) hee deliuered by mouth to Iosuah, and Iosuah to the Elders: For to teach these mysteries, ⁵⁰ which hee called secretiora, to the rude multitude, were no other quam dare sanctum canibus; & inter Porcos hargere Margaritas; then to giue holy things; to Dogges, and to cast Pearles before Swine. In succeeding times this vnderstanding and wisdom began to bee written in Ciphers, and Characters, and Letters bearing the forme of beaſts, birds, and other creatures; and to be taught onely to such as serued in their Temples, and to their Kings and Priests. Of the first the Cabala of the Jewes was an imitation: the invention of the other is ascribed to Zoroaster, Mercurius, Cassius, and others; but falsely.

This Cabala importeth a Law, receiued by tradition and vnwritten. Cabala in Hebrew is receptiue in Latine, and a retaining in English. And this custome was also held by the Druids & Bards of our ancient Britaines, and of later times by the Irish Chronicles called Rymers. If then such as would seeme wisest in the vse of reason, will not acknowledge, that the storie of the Creation or beginning of all things was written by inspiration, the holy Ghost guiding the hand of Moses; yet it is manifest, that the knowledge thereof might by tradition (then vsed) be deliuered vnto him by a more certaine presumption, then any or all the testimonies which prophane antiquitie had preferred and left to their successors: which their wife men (as they terme them) did lay vp and defend from the iniurie of the time and other hazzards. For, leauing to remember that Adam instructed Seth, and Seth his children and successors, which cannot be doubted of, it is manifest, that Methusaleme liued together with Adam himselfe two hundred storie and three yeeres, and Noah with Methusaleme no lesse then five hundred yeeres: and before Noah dyed, Abraham was fiftie and eight yeeres old; from whence this knowledge by an easie and ordinary way ²⁰ might cometo Israel, and so to Moses.

But besides this tradition, it is questionlesse, that the vse of letters was found out in the very infancie of the world, proued by those prophecies written on pillars of stone and bricke by Enoch: of which Iosephus affirmeth, that one of them remayned euen in his time (meaning belike some ruine or foundation thereof) which pillars by others are ascribed to Seth. But of these prophecies of Enoch Saint Iude testifieth; and some part of his Bookes (which contayned the course of the Starres, their names and motions) were afterward found in Arabia Felix, in the Dominion of the Queene of Saba (saith Origen) of which Tertullian affirmeth that he had seene and read some whole pages. It is not therefore strange, that Moses came to the knowledge of the Creation, and storie of the first Age, seeing he might receiue it both by tradition and letters, had not the spirit of God instructed and inspired him as it did: which also his many and strange miracles (performed before he wrote the Scriptures) make more manifest.

Now for the Bookes of Enoch, howsoever some men make question of them, sure I am that Tertullian, Origen, Augustine, Beda, Pracopius, Gazetius, (with others) cite them in their writings: although Medius, for an argument to proue them vnwritten traditions, allegeth that Pope Gelasius among other the Apocryphall Scriptures (which he reiecteth) named not these of Enoch; but that whatsoever was remembered out of them, the same was deliuered by Tradition from the Jewes. But I rather thinke with Peuerius, that such a Booke there was, and that the same was corrupted after the death of the Apostles, and many things added thereunto by Hereticks, who tooke occasion vpon the antiquitie thereof, and out of that place of Michael contending with the Deuill about the body of Moses, to frame and adde thereunto many inuentions of their owne. One of the greatest arguments against these Bookes, is, that neither Philo, nor Iosephus (the most diligent searchers of Antiquitie) make mention thereof. But against it I will set this opinion of Saint Augustine, Scriptisſe quidem nonnulla diuina Enoch solum scriptum ab Adam negare non possumus: That Enoch the seventh from Adam did write diuine things we cannot denie. Now his writings which came afterwards to light, were suspected because of the antiquitie, and of fables of Giants, supposed to be begotten of Angels, and others; and by so much the more, because no such Booke was found amongst those Canonical Scriptures, kept by the diligence of the Hebrew Priests in Armaria Iudica (saith Tertullian) who yet affirmeth that this Booke might be preferred by Noah. Surely, that Enoch wrote the prophecies remembered by Iude, no man can denie; denie; how they were deliuered to posteritie I know not, whether by the seues Cabala, or by what other meanes, the same is but mans coniecture. And (certainly) by the knowledge ascribed to Noah of the motions of the Heavens, and of the Natures and coniunctions of the Starres; and afterwards to some of his sonnes, to Zoroaster, and then to Abraham, it is very probable that Noah had seene and might preferre this booke. For it is not likely, that so exquisite knowledge therein (as these men had) was suddenly inuented and found out, but left by Seth to Enoch, and by Enoch to Noah, as hath beene said before. And therefore if letters and arts were knowne from the time of Seth to Enoch, and that Noah liued with Methusalem, who liued with Adam, and Abraham liued with Noah, it is not strange (I say) to conceiue how Moses came to the knowledge of the first Age, be it by letters, or by Cabala and Tradition, had the vndoubted word of God neede of any other prooffe then selfe-authoritie.

Of the men of renoume before the flood.

OW let vs consider the relation of Moses, who nameth seuen descents of Cains children, and of Adam by Seth ten: Seth being giuen by God in stead of Abel; and of Seth was Enosh begotten, in whose time men began to professe Religion, and to offer sacrifice in publike. For although Adam instructed his children in the knowledge of God their Creator, as appeared by the sacrifice offered by Cain and Abel; yet it seemeth that after the birth of Enosh men began publicly to call on the name of the Lord, that is, they serued and praised God by Communion and in publike manner, or calling vpon the name of the Lord, and thereby were the sonnes of God or the godly distinguished from the wicked. From the birth of Enosh the sonne of Seth, to the time of Enoch the sonne of Iared, there is nothing remembered by Moses, but their owne births, the births of their sonnes, the length of their liues, and deaths. But of Enoch it is written, That he walked with God, and he was no more seene: for God tooke him away. By that, that he walked with God, was meant, that he was a iust and vpright man, and that he feared, loued, and obeyed God. For the same phrase Moses vseth of Noah. Noah was a iust and vpright man in his time, and Noah walked with God. The Sequentie conuert it, Enoch placuit Deo; Enoch pleased God. And although Aben-Ezra and others vnderstand this place, (iustit cum Deo;) select, mortuus est; God tooke him away (that is) he dyed, which (indeede) agreeth both with the phrase of the Scripture, and with our manner of speech to this day, to say, God tooke him away, when he dyed; yet the difference which Moses maketh betwene the piete of Enoch and the rest of the Patriarchs, and by omitting the word (death) which he vseth to all else, makes it manifest, that Enoch was not dissolued as the rest. For to all the rest of the Patriarchs, Moses vseth these wordes, And he dyed; but of Enoch he spake otherwise, saying only, he was missing, or he was not seene. Et non inueniebatur (saith the Epistle to the Hebrewes) quia Deus eum transiit; And he was not found, for the Lord tooke him away. In the same place it is expressely added, that he saw not death.

But whether this taking away of Enoch were not with the same kind of changing, which S. Paul promisseth, when he saith, that when the end shall come, we shall not all die, but all shall be changed, I leaue it to the learned Diuines.

After Enoch, Moses passeth ouer to Methusalem and Lamech, remembering (as of the rest) the times of their birth and death: sauing that Lamech prophesied of his sonne Noah, saying, This same shall comfort vs concerning our worke, and sorrow of our hands, as touching the earth which the Lord hath cursed. Of Noah, Moses writeth more amply, then of any of the rest of Adams children by Seth, being the last of the ten generations of the first Age, whom God (with his familie) preferred, because he was an vpright man in his time, and feared God.

But

Bar of the warre, peace, gouernement, and policie of these strong and mightie men, so able both in body and wit, there is no memorie remaining: whose stories if they had beene preferred, and what else was then performed in that newnesse of the world, there could nothing of more delights haue beene left to posteritie. For the exceeding long liues of men (who to their strength of body and naturall wits had the experience added of 800. and 900. yeeres) how much of necessitie must the same adde of wisdom and vnderstandings? Likely it is, that their works excelled all whatsoever can be told of after-times; especially in respect of this old age of the world, when we no sooner begin to know, but we begin to die; according to Hippocrates τὰς βροτῶν, ἀς λῆγαν, τὸν χρόνον, πρὸς τὸν χρόνον, ὅτι ἡ ζωὴ ἐστὶν ἡλικία, καὶ ἡ ἡλικία ἐστὶν ὁ χρόνος (which is) Life is short, Age is long and Time is headlong: And that those people of the first age performed many things worthy admiration, it may be gathered out of these words of Moses: These were mightie men, in whose time men began to build cities, and to be of renowne. But these men of renowne (whom the Scripture afterwards calleth Giants, both for strength of body and cruelty of minde) trusted so much to their owne abilities, as they forgot altogether the piete of Seth, and the wayes wherein Enoch walked: for all the imaginations of their hearts were euill, only euill, and continually euill. And this wickednesse was not only found in the illnes of Cain, but it was then vniuersall, when the children and sonnes of God (or of the godly) were corrupted and mist by their idolatrous Viues, the Daughters of Cain, or of those other men, louing themselves and the world only.

That these sonnes of God were Angels, which being taken with the beautie of women, accompanied them and begat Giants, some of the Fathers supposed, namely, Lactantius and Ensebius, misled by Iosephus: of whom I cannot doubt, but that they afterward changed their former opinions. And of this mistaking many Writers haue taken great advantage, and haue troubled themselves with large answers and very needlesse: the question being vn capable of dispute, especially since S. Chrysostome and S. Augustine haue answered it largely long agoe. For, that good and godly men were honored with the title of Gods children, it dothe neuer where appear in the Scripture; and on the contrary, to thinke that Angels, who (as Christ witnesseth) behold the face of God, (that is) alwayes attend his Commandements, should after a separation from the rest which fell with Noah, forsake the glorious presence of their Creator, and become Inubi, or Succubi, contrarie both to Nature and Grace, were more then madnesse to imagine.

§. VIII.

That the Giants by Moses so called, were indeede men of huge bodies: as also diuers in later times.

OF these Giants which Moses calleth mightie men, Goropius Becanus an Antuerpian (who thought his owne wit more Giganticall then the bodies of Nimrod or Heracles) hath written a large discourse, intituled Gigantomachia, and strained his braines to proue, that there were neuer any such men: his reasons (who neuer desires to lose time) he may finde them in the Treatises beforenamed. It is true that Cyrillus reproues the Græcian Poets for their monstrous fictions: who affirme shamelessly, That the Giants haue in elder times not only cast vpon Mountaynes vpon Mountaynes, but removed Islands out of the Sea, with like fooleries. And for that inuention of casting vpon Hills, and making warre with the Gods, no doubt but that the same was borrowed out of the storie of Nimrod, as before remembered; and euen out of this Scripture, That the Sonnes of God saw the Daughters of Men, of whom the first Giants were begotten, was that conceit taken of Orpheus and Hesiodus, That Giants were the sonnes of the Heauen and the Earth; meaning by the Heavens the sonnes of God, and by the

the Earth the Daughters of men : which verses of Orpheus are by Iohn Cassian (who hath written a witty discourse of this subject) thus changed into Latine :

Nomine caelestes illos dixere Gigantes Nati quod terrâ fuerint & sanguine cali.

From the Earth, and from thy blood, ô heaven, they came,
Whom thereupon the Gods did Giants name.

But what will not Opiniators and selfe-beleeuing men dispute of, and make doubt 10 of, if they cannot conceiue that there were in the first Age such kind of men; and of which there haue bene in all times since? Seeing the Scriptures auow the one manifestly, and common experience the other?

And for that superlatiue straying of wordes, and the meaning of them, that the name of Giants was giuen to Oppressors and Tyrants, and not to strength of body and eminent stature: such men might with better reason call them Oppressors, because they were Giants, and therefore had abilitie to oppress, then say, That they were called Giants onely, because Oppressors. For first, Moses himselfe calleth them mightie men; which sheweth a strength surpassing others: and afterwards, men of renowne, (that is) of great vnder-taking and aduenterous action. And if the 20 same stature of body, and abilitie had not bene found among diuers Nations after the generall flood, then might this place of Moses haue more willingly hardened to a dispute, and yielded to interpretation.

But besides all these famous Giants found in prophane Histories (which I will reserve to accompanie the Giants of Albion, in the storie of Britanie) the Scriptures doe cleerly and without all allegorick construction auow, That, besides Nimrod, there were found of these Giants in the time of Abraham, of Moses, of Iosua, and of Dauid; namely, the Rephaims in Asteroth; the Zuzai or Zanzummims in Elam, and the Emims, which dwelt anciently in the Land of Moab: whom Moses (for stature) compareth with the Anakims, which dwelt in Hebron; for they also were taken for Giants 30 as the Anakims: Likewise, where Moses speaketh of the Land of Ammon, he vseth these words: That also was taken for a land of Giants; for Giants dwell therein afore-times: and, whom the Ammonites call Zanzummims: a people that was great, and many, and tall as the Anakims. And these Giants called Rephaims in Asteroth and Ravnims, and the Zuzai or Zanzummims, Chedorlaomer King of Elam ouer-threw, assisted by other Kings his associates. Also the Prophet Amos found among the Ammonites men of Giantlike stature, whom he compareth to the Cedar, and whose strength to the Oaks; and the Prophet Baruch, These were the Giants famous from the beginning, that were of so great stature, and so expert in warre. Particularly it is written of Og, King of Basan, that his bed of yron was nine cubits long, and foure cubits broad: for onely 40 Og King of Basan remayned of the remnants of the Giants, who commanded the Kingdome of Basan, foure hundred yeeres after the Expedition of Chedorlaomer. Moreouer, those Discoverers and Searchers of the Land of promise (sent by Moses from Cadesbarre in Paran) made report at their returne of the great stature of those people in generall, and especially of the sonnes of Anak, in these wordes: All the people which we saw in it are men of great stature: for there we saw Giants, the sonnes of ANAK, which come of the Giants, so that we seemed in our sights like Grasse-hoppers, and so we were in their sight, (that is) the Searchers found in their owne iudgements a maruailous difference between the Anakims and themselves: in so much that the Israelites were so stricken with feare, as they rather sought and desired to returne againe into 50 Egypt, and were more willing to endure their former slavery, then to fall by the strokes of those fearefull Nations. Furthermore, the Scriptures put vs out of doubt, that Goliath the Philistine of Gath, was a Giant of sixe cubits and a span long: the Armor which he wore waighed foue thousand thickles of brasse: the thaff of his speare was like a Weauers beame, and his speare head waighed sixe hundred thickles of yron. Also in Samuel there is mention of another Goliath, surnamed Gethu, because he was of Gath: and of three other Giants; of which the first was slaine by Iehonathan, *Dauid*s Nephew, who had twelue fingers, and as many toes: a man of great stature, and his fingers were by sixes, euen foure and twentie.

Allo that was of surpassing strength, no man doubteth, who tore a Lyon as it had bene a Kid, and after the thirte of the Philistines, and (after that) a thousand more of them with a law-bone of an Asse: And lastly, he tooke the gates of Azzah, and the two Polis, and lifted them away with the barres, and put them 10 vpon his shoulders, and caried them to the top of the Mountayne before Ebron. If then it be approued by every iudgement, that both Nature and the Heauens waxe old, and that the great age of Time hath (with it selfe) infeeblid and almost worn out the vertue of all things, then I say, That as in all other kindes the Earth (before that Sinne had increased the curse and corruption) brought forth her yong ones more strong and beautifull, then it did in after-ages: so also those Giants, those mightie men, and men of renowne as farre exceeded the proportion, nature, and strength of those Giants, remembered by Moses of his owne time, and after him their successors, as the ordinarie proportion of all men in generall, loone after the flood and in times farre off, exceeded the bulkes and bodies of men which are now borne 20 in the withered quarter and Winter of the world: If therefore Giants were common in the third and fourth age, much more in the first flourishing youth and newnesse of the world.

But the wickedness (especially in crueltye and oppression) of these men was such, as God therefore by the flood gaue end to all flesh, but to the iust Noah and his family. And God repented him that he had made man, which S. Augustine thus expoundeth: Reg. enim sicut hominem, ita Deum facti sui penitet, cuius est de omnibus omnino rebus tam fixa sententia, quam certa praesentia. Sed si non utatur Scriptura talibus verbis, non se quodammodo familiaris insumit omni generi hominum, quibus vult esse consilium: ut & perterreat superbientes, & excitet negligentes, & exerceat quarentes, & 30 alit intelligentes; God (saith he) doth not repent him of any thing which he hath done: (as men vse to doe) but if the Scripture did not vse those wordes or the like, it should not (in a sort) insinuate it selfe familiarly to all sorts of men, for whom it would provide: that it might terrifie the proud, stirre up the negligent, exercise the searchers of truth, and nourish those that vnderstand.

CHAP. VI.

*Of idolatrous corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanishing in the world: and of the Reliques of Truth touching these ancient times, obscurely appearing in Fables and old

p. I.

That in old corruptions we may finde some signes of more ancient truth.

ERE before wee proceede any further, the occasion offereth it selfe for vs to consider, how the Greekes; and other more ancient Nations, by fabulous inuentions, 20 and by breaking into parts the Storie of the Creation, and by deliuering it ouer in a mystical sense, wrapping it vp mixed with other their owne trumperie, haue sought to obscure the truth thereof; and haue hoped, that after-ages, being thereby brought into many doubts, might receiue those inter-mixt discourses of God and Nature, for the inuentions of Poets and Philosophers, and not as any thing borrowed or stolne out of the bookes of God. But as a skilfull and learned Chymist can aswell by separation of visible elements draw helpfull medicines out of poyson, as poyson out of 30 the most healthfull herbs and plants (all things hauing in themselves both life and death) so, contrarie to the purposes and hopes of the Heathen, may those which seeke after God and Truth finde out euery-where, and in all the ancient Poets and Philosophers, the Storie of the first Age, with all the workes and maruailes thereof, amply and liuely exprest.

p. II.

That the corruptions themselves were very ancient: as in the family of NOAH, and in the old Egyptians.

BUT this defection and falling away from God, which was first found in Angels, and afterwards in Men (the one hauing erred but once, the other euer) as concerning mankind it tooke such effect, that thereby (the liberrall grace of God being with-drawne) all the posteritie of our first Parents were afterwards borne and bred in a world, suffering a perpetuall Eclipse of spirituall light. Hence it was that it produced plants of such imperfection and harmefull qualitie, as the waters of the generall flood could not so walk out or depure, but that the same defection hath had continuance in the very generation and nature of mankind. Yea, euen among the few sonnes of Noah, there 50 were found strong effects of the former poyson. For as the children of Sem did inherit the vertues of Seth, Enoch, and Noah; so the sonnes of Cham did possesse the vices of the sonnes of Cain, and of those wicked Giants of the first Age. Whence the Chaldeans began soone after the flood to ascribe diuine power and honor to the Creature, ture, which was only due to the Creatour. First, they worshipped the Sunne, and then the fire. So the Egyptians and Phenicians did not only learne to leaue the true God, but created twelue seuerall gods, and diuine powers, whom they worshipped; and vnto whom they built Altars and Temples. For Herodotus sayth, Duodecim Deorum nomina primos Egyptios in vsu habuisse, atq; Græcos ab illis cepisse mutatos, eosq; prius Herod. in E. vii. terpe.

as, & imagines, & templa Dijs sibi erexisse; The Egyptians (sayth he) first deuised the names of the twelue Gods, which the Greekes receiued from them, who first erected vnto themselves Altars, Images, and Temples for the Gods.

p. III.

That in proesse of time these lesser errors drew on greater: as appeareth in the grosse Superstitions of the Egyptians.

BUT as men once fallen away from vndoubted truth, doe then after wander for euermore in vices vnkowne, and daily trauaile towards their eternall perdition: so did these grosse and blind Idolaters euery Age after other descend lower and lower, and shrinke and slide downwards from the knowledge of one true and very GOD; and did not 20 thereby erre in worshipping mortall men only, but they gaue diuine reuerence, and had the same respect to Beasts, Birds, Fishes, Fowles, Winds, Earth, Water, Ayre, Fire, to the Morning, to the Euening, to Plants, Trees and Rootes, to Passions and Affections of the Minde, to Palenesse, Sicknesse, Sorrowes, yea to the most vnworthy and basest of all these. Which barbarous blasphemie, Rhodium Anaxandrides Nat. com. l. i. c. 2. derideth in this manner.

*Bouem colis, ego Deū mātto bouem.
Tu maximum Anguilam Deū putas: ego Obsoniorum credidi suauissimum.
Carnes suillas tu caues, at gaudeo
His maximè: canem colis, quem verbero
Edentem vbi deprehendo fortè obsonium.*

I sacrifice to God the Beefe, which you adore.
I broyle the Egyptian Eccles, which you (as God) implore:
You feare to eate the flesh of Swine, I find it sweet.
You worship Dogges, to beate them I thinke meet,
When they my store deuoure.

And in this manner I VVENAL.

*Porcum aut cape nefas violare aut frangere morsu:
O sanctas gentes, quibus hæc nascuntur in hortis Numina!*

The Egyptians thinke it sinne to root vp, or to bite
Their Leekes or Onyons, which they serue with holy rite:
O happy Nations, which of their owne sowing Haue store of gods in euery Garden growing!

δ. IIII.

That from the reliques of ancient Records among the Egyptians and others the first Idols and Fables were invented: and that the first IUPITER was CAIN, VULCAN, TYBALCAIN, &c.

BV r in so great a confusion of vanities, were among the Heathens themselves there is no agreement or certaintie, it was hard to finde out from what example the beginnings of these inuentions were borrowed, or after what ancient patterne they erected their building, were it not certain, that the Aegyptians had knowledge of the first Age, and of whatsoeuer was donetherein, partly from some inscriptions vpon stone or metall remaining after the Flood, and partly from Mizraim the sonne of Cham, who had learnt the fume of Cham, and Cham of his Father Noah. For all that the Aegyptians write of their ancient Kings, and date of times cannot be faied. And though other Nations after them had by imitation their Iupiters also, their Saturnes, Vulcans, and Mercuries with the rest, which S. Augustine time of Varro; Ensebius out of many prophane Historians; Cicero, Diodorus Siculus, Arnobius, and many more haue obserued, to wit, the Phoenicians, Phrygians, Cretians, Greekes, and other Nations; yet was Cain the sonne of Adam (as some very learned men conceiue) called and reputed for the first and ancient Iupiter; and Adam for the first Saturne: for Iupiter was sayd to haue inuented the founding of Cities; and the first Citie of the World was built by Cain, which he called Enoch, of whom were the Henochites before remembered. And so much may be gathered out of Plato in Protagoras, which also Higinius in his 275. Chapter confirmeth. For besides that, many Cities were founded by diuers men; Tamen primas latissimam a primo & antiquissimo Iovæ ædificatam; yet the first and largest was built by the first and most ancient Iupiter, seated in the East parts, or in India, according to that of Moses: And Cain dwelt towards the East side of Eden, &c. where also the Henochites were found after the Flood. And therefore was Iupiter by the Athenians called Poleus, a Founder of Cities, and Hercules, an Incloser or strengthener of Cities; 30 (say Ploramus and Pausanias) and that to Iupiter Mercurius there were in very many places Altars & Temples erected. And that there were Cities built before the Flood, Plato also witnesseth, as may be gathered in this his affirming, that soone after Mankind began to increase, they built many Cities; which as his meaning hee deliuereth in plaine termes, in his third Booke of Lawes: for he saith, that Cities were built an exceeding space of time before the destruction by the great Flood.

This first Jupiter of the Ethiopes was then the lame Cain, the Sonne of Adam, who marrying his owne Sister (as also Jupiter is sayd to haue done) inhabited the East, where Stephanus de verbis placeth the Citie Hemochia. And besides this Citie of Hemochi, Philo Iudeus conceiueeth that Cain built fixe others, as Maich, Jared, Tebe, Iefca, Selit and Gebat: but where Philo had this I know not. Now as Cain was the first Jupiter, and from whom also the Ethiopes had the inuention of Sacrifice: so were Iubal, Tubal and Tubalcain (Inuentors of Pastorage, Smiths-craft, and Musick) the lame, which were call'd by the ancient prophane Writers, Mercurius, Vulcan and Apollo; and as there is a likelihood of name between Tubalcain and Vulcan: so doth Augustine expound the name of Noema or Namath, the Sister of Tubalcain, to signifie Penuila, or beautiful Polynia, or pleasure; as the wife of Vulcan is sayd to be Venus, the Ladie of pleasure and beutie. And as Adam was the ancient and first Saturne, Cain the eldest Jupiter, Eua, Rhea, and Noema or Namath the first Venus: so did the Fable of the diuiding of the World betweene the three Brethren the Sonnes of Saturne arise, from the true Story of the diuiding of the Earth betweene the three Brethren the Sonnes of Noah: so also was the Fiction of those Golden Apples kept by a Dragon taken from the Serpent, which tempted Eua: so was Paradise it selfe transported out of Asia into Africa, and made the Garden of the Hesperides: the prophecies, that

Chris

Christ should breake the Serpents head, and conquer the power of Hell, occasioned by the Fables of Heracles killing the Serpent of Lisiferus, and descending into Hell, and captivating Cerberus: In out of the taking up of Henoch by God, was borrowed the conversion of their Heroes (the Inventors of Religion, and such Arts as the life of man had profit by) into Starres and Heavenly Signes, and (withall) that leaving of the World, and ascension of Atreus; of which Onid:

Ultima cœlestium terras Astræa reliquit ;
Astræa last of heavenly Wights the Earth did leave.

Ovid, Met. 1.1.

10 For although thereby the Ethniekes would vnderstand Iusticie selfe to have failed, as it is a vertue abstract, and may be considered without a person; yet as it is vsual among the ancient Poets to describe Vertues and Vices by the persons of Men and Women, as Desire by Cupid, Valour by Mars, Beaucie or Lust by Venus, so doe they also the persons of Men by like Vertues and Vices, and therefore by Iustice and Astraea, Enoch: the Iusticie and pietie of Enoch being in the same manner exprest, as that of Noah was by Moses, for Noah was sayd to be a iust man; And Noah walked with God. And of Enoch it is written, that he walked with God, and hee was no more seene: for God took him away.

Gen. 7.
Gen. 5. 22. 24.

20 From this Storice also of the first Age, and from that part where Mofes remem-breth the Giants begotten by the Sonnes of good men vpon the Daughters of the wicked (whom Mofes calleth mightie men, and men of renouwe) did they steale those wondrous great acts of their ancient Kings, and powerfull Giants; and againe their warre vnderaken againt the gods, from the building of the Towre of Babel by the Giant Nimrod, as S. Auguſtine termeth him. Which warre of their Giants Cypriellus Seuerus thus describeth:

Tentavère (nefas) olim detrudere mundo Sydera, captivūq; Iovis transferre Gigantes Imperium, & victo leges imponere caelo.

The Giants did aduance their wicked hand:
Against the Starres, to thrutt them headlong downe,
And robbing Ioue of his Imperiall Crowne,
On conquered Heauens to lay their proud command

Whereby was manifest that Nimrod purposed to raise the building of Babel, to that height, as God neither by drawing waters from the deepe, nor by any conjunction of the Starrs, thought bury them vnder the myoule of a second Flood, but that by 40 this building (if they had beene herein victorious) they would haue giuen the Law to Heauen it selfe. Also the making of Leagues, Peace and Covenants among Hea-ren Nations and Kings, confirmed by Sacrifice, whereof Virgil both in the eight and twelfth of his Aeneides hath a touch, was as it seemeth borrowed from Moses, Exodus 24. Who when he read the Booke of the Covenant, sprinkled the people with blood.

We find also many remembrances of Seth, the paternall Ancestor of Henoch and Noah; for Amemphus, the fame King of Egypt, which reigned at such time as Moses carried thence the children of Israel, (as of late some learned men mistaking his time supposed) called his Sonne and Successour Setho, of Seth, and of the fame Seth (as some men of good iudgement have granted) were the Princes of Thrace called Sethes, whereof there were many very famous. But herein was the memorie of Seth most manifestly preferred, that the Egyptians worshipped Seth, as their most ancient parent, and of the first tradition: in honour of whome they called a principall Province Sethiicia. We also finde in Bithynia the Citie of Sethia, and others of the same name elsewhere. And sure from the Egyptians did the Grecians borrow this kind of Theologie, though they scorned to acknowledge any antiquitie preceding their owne; and that they might not seeme to learne elsewhere, they gaue the same names to their owne Idols which the Egyptians did to theirs.

¶ V.

Of the three chiefest IVPITERS; and the strange Storie of the third.

BV T of all those Armies of IVPITERS remembred by the Ancients, Cicero maketh but three, because those were of most fame: which other Writers haue also done, who fought out, and laboured in their originals. The first was Iupiter, the sonne of Ether and Dies, so called, because the one had reference to his celestiall conditions (for ether is as much as shining or pure fire) the other discovered his naturall vertues, which dayes and times make more perfect, and are the witness of mens actions.

The second was said to be the sonne of Caelum or Heauen, for the same former respect; and this Iupiter was an Acadian, and King of Athens.

The third of whom all the Gracian Fables were deuised, was of Creet (now Candia) the sonne of Saturne and Ops. The name deriued from the Latine is taken of Iuuanis Pater, from the Greeke Word Zeus, it signifieth life, but somewhat strained. Boccius in his Genealogie of the gods conceiueth, that his name was borrowed from Iupiter the Planet; but whether that Starre had such a name, before the same was giuen to men, I know not. Iupiter is hot and moist, temperate, modest, honest, adcurous, liberall, mercifull, louing, and faithfull, (that is) giuing these inclinations. And therefore those ancient Kings beautified with these conditions, might be called there after Iupiter; but howsoever they were, or were not with those vertues enriched, yet, by imitation, all Kings in the eldest times assumed those Titles and Surnames: great Princes affecting as high Titles of honor and reputation in the World, (howsoever deferred) as the worthiest, that euer were, acquired by their well deservings. Ioues omnes Reges vocarunt antiqui, The Ancients called all Kings IVPITERS, as Tzetzes in his varia historia confirmeth: Reges olim Ioves vocarunt omnes: in old times all Nations called their Kings IVPITERS. But where this last and most remembred IVPITER was borne it is vncertaine. Some there are that make him of Creet: others, that hee was but sent thither by his Mother Ops or Opis, to be fostered and hidden from the furie of Titan his Vncle: because it was conditioned betweene Saturne and Titan, that Saturne being a yonger brother, and reigning (for his owne life) by Titan's permission, hee should put to death all his male children, lest the Titans might be interrupted by any of them in their succession; which agreement because Saturne performed in his first borne, it is faired that Saturne deuoured his owne children. Hereof Lycophron, thus turned into Latine:

Hand sit pinguior, Crudis sepulchrum quod sit ipse filij.

*Saturne to be the fatter is not knowne,
By being the graue and buriall of his owne.*

This composition betweene Titan and Saturne, Sybilla also witnesseth in these;
Conceptis verbis; TITAN iurare coegit SATVRNVM, de se natum ne nutriat vllum, Quo possint regnare Jouis post fata Nepotes.

Things thus agreed: Titan made Saturne sweare
No Sonne to nourish; which by reigning might Vsurpe the right of Titan's lawfull Heire.

But

But Opis the mother of Iupiter, being deliuered at once both of Iupiter and Iuno, conueied Iupiter (first called Lysianus) into Crete, as hee did afterwards his two brothers, Neptune and Pluto: where hee was brought vp in Gnosus, the chiefe Citie of that Iland, by Cressa the King, or by the Curetes, a people and Nation thereof.

Ensb. in Temp.

Other challenge him to be of Thebes, and a Thebane: others call him an Acadian: others make him of Messena. The like contention is found among the Greekes touching his education and first fostering. Some affirme, that he was fed by Hony-bees: in recompence whereof he changed their blacke coats and skins into yellow; a reward well fitting such a God: others, that he was nourished by Beares: others, by Goats: and of all these the idle Greekes haue many prettie Tales. But in the end when Titan had knowledge, that Saturne had broken his faith, he set on him, and tooke him and his wife Prisoners, whom Iupiter againe rescued and deliuered.

But lastly, the Father and the Sonne equally ambitious, the one doubted the other. Saturne being the lesse powerfull fled into Italie, and left his Kingdomes in Greece to his sonne. And although this Prince at the first purchased great honour; and for his many vertues the name of Iupiter was giuen him; yet, after he was once settled and became potent, he gaue himselfe ouer wholly to palliardize and adultery, without all respect of honour, Law, or Religion. And it is reported by such, as doe ascribe the actions of many to one Iupiter, that not therewith satisfied, hee was afterwards knowne to offend in the sinne of Sodomie with Ganimedes and others; and did not only begin with incest, marrying his owne sister Iuno, but he rauished, betrayed, stole away, and tooke by strong hand all the beautifull women borne in his time, within the limits of his owne Kingdomes, or bordering them. Among whom these hereafter written were of greatest fame, Niobe, Laodamia, and Alcmena the wife of Amphitryon, by whom he had Pelagius, Sarpedon, Argus, and Hercules: by Taygete he had Taygetus; of whom the Mountaine Taygetus tooke name, with another sonne called Saon, of whom Sauna: by Antiope he had Amphion and Zetus: by Leda Casior and Pollux, Helen and Clytemnestra: by Danae Perseus: by Iordana Deucalion: by Charme (the daughter of Eubulus) Britomartis, by Protegenia hee had Athlus the Father of Endymion; and by Io (the Daughter of Inachus) Epaphus, the Founder of Memphis in Egypt: which Epaphus married Libya, of whom that Countrey tooke name, for so the Greekes afterward called Africa. Hee rauished Agina the Daughter of Esopus, and carryed her into the Iland Oenopia or Oenotria, afterward called Agina, on whom he begat Aeacus: by Torrebia hee had Archebius and Carbius: by Ora Colaxes: he had also Dardanus by Electra, who built Dardanum, afterward Illus and Troy. Hee begat the Brothers Tulci, on Thalia, and on Garamantis Hiarbas. Hee had besides these (if they belye not their chiefe God) Phileus and Pilumnus, innentors of Bakers Craft; and I know not how many more; but I know well that hee could not be Father to all these, who were borne in Ages so farre differing. And of these his feuerall rauishments, betrayings, stealing away of mens Wiues, Daughters and Sonnes, buying of Virgins, and the like, came in all those ancient Fables of his transformations into showres of Gold, Eagles, Bulls, Birds, and Beasts; and of him, and by him (in effect) all that rabble of Gracian Forgeries. And yet did not the Greekes and Romans feare to entitle this Monster, Optimus Maximus, though Cicero in his second Booke de natura Deorum affirme, that he deserved nothing lesse, and in his Oration pro domo sua, reproceeth Clodius for his Incest, by the name of Iupiter. His buriall was in Crete (saith Luctan) Cretemenses non solum natum apud se & sepulchrum Iovem testantur, sed etiam sepulchrum eius offendunt; The Creteans or Candians doe not only know that IVPITER was borne and buried among them, but they shew his graue and sepulchre: which Epiphanius also confirmeth, for in his time there remained the Monuments of his Tombe in the Mountaine Tajlus. This Callimachus in his Hymnes also witnesseth, but as offended thereat, sayth thus;

The Creteans euer Lyars were, they care not what they say:
For they a Tombe haue built for thee, O King; that liu't alway.

Diodorus

Diod. l. 2. c. 5.

Diadorus Siculus tels by way of report from the Libyan Fables, confirmed (as hee saith) by some Greek Writers, that the originall of these gods was from the Westerne parts of Africk. For there among the Atlantida reigned one Pranus (which signifieth Heauen) called so for his great skil in Astrologie, and for his knowledge, and benefits to the people, honoured by them as a God after his death. He had by many Wives 45. Sons; but by his principall Wife Titea, hee had 17. Sons and two Daughters, all which were called after their Mothers name the Titanes. Of Titea, likewise it is said, that she for her goodnesse was canonized as a Goddesse, being dead, and called the Earth, as her Husband was called Heauen. But of all the children of Titea, her Daughter Bustea (which name founding as Queene in English; she is by the Latine Translator of Diadorus called Regina) excelling the rest as far in vertue as in yeeres, was by generall consent of her Brethren, and of the people, appointed to rule as Queene after her Fathers death, being as yet a Virgin. Shee tooke to Husband her Brother Hyperion, to whom shee bare a Sonne and a Daughter, called Sunne and Moone. The beautie and towardnesse of these children moued her Brethren to enue, and bred in them a feare of being excluded from the Succession: wherefore they tooke the Boy and drowned him in the Riuer Eridanus, now called Poe. The losse of this child caused his Sister to breake her owne necke; and the losse of both her Children made the Mother to play many mad pranks, dancing with Cymbals, after a wild fashion, in sight of all the people, before whom shee is said to haue vanished away. Ere shee dyed, her Sonne (as the Fable hath it) signified vnto her in a Dreame, that he and his Sister by the providence of God should become immortall, that also the Sunne and Moone should be called by their names, and that their death should be reuenged vpon the Murderers. According to which it is said, that the people did so call those two Planets, and withall held her selfe as a Goddesse, and termed her the great Mother, which name they had formerly giuen to her, for her motherly care in cherishing her Brethren whilst they were young. Hyperion and his Race being extinguished, the other Sonnes of Pranus diuided the Kingdome. Of these Atlas and Saturne were chiefe. Atlas reigned ouer the Countreys lying about the Mountaines, which afterward bare his name; a iust and wise Prince, deeply skilfull in Astrologie, and for inuention of the Sphere, sayd to haue supported Heauen. Hee had many Sonnes; but the principall of them called Hesperus, being of his Fathers qualities and studies, was sayd to haue bene carried away by the Winde, from the top of an high Hill in the midst of his Contemplations, and his name in honour of him, imposed by the people vpon the Morning Starre. The seuen Daughters of Atlas were also sayd to haue bene excellent Ladies, who accompanying such as came to be deified, or registered among the Worthies, brought forth Children, answerable in qualitie to those that begat them. Of these it is held, that the seuen Starres called Pleades tooke name. Saturne the Brother of Atlas reigned in Sicilia, part of Africke, and Italie. Jupiter, another of the Sonnes of Pranus, reigned in Crete; who had tenne Sonnes which hee called Curetes; he called that Land after his Wives name Idea; in which Ile he dyed, and was buried. But this Jupiter must not haue bene that great one, but Vncle to the Great Jupiter, if these Fables of the Libyans were true. Saturne (as these Libyans tell the Tale) was a great Tyrant, and fortified strong places, the better to keepe his people in subiection. His Sister Rhea was married to Hammon, who reigned in some part of Africke. Hammon louing others as well as his Wife, or better, got a Daughter, called Minerua, neere to the Riuer Triton, who thereupon was called Tritonia. Hee also begat on Amalthea a Sonne called Bacchus, whom he caused secretly for feare of his life to be brought vp at Nysa, an Land in the Riuer Triton, vnder the tuition of his Daughter Minerua, and certaine Nymphes. To Amalthea he gaue in reward a goodly Countreie, that lay on the Sea-coast, bending in forme of a horne, whence grew the Tale of Amalthea's plentifull Horne, famous among the Poets. When Rhea heard these newes, she fled from her Husband to her Brother Saturne, who not onely entertained her as a Sister, but tooke her to wife, and at her instigation made warre vpon

Hammon,

Hammon, vanquished him by assistance of the Titanes, and made him flee into Crete. The Curetes, Jupiter's children before mentioned, held the land at that time; which was new named Crete by Hammon, after the name of Crete the Kings Daughter, whom hee tooke to wife, and had with her (women as may seeme being very gracious in those times) the Kingdome. Bacchus was growne a proper young man, had found out the making of wine, the arte of planting trees, and many things else commodious for mankind, before the flight of his Mother in law. Now therefore hearing report of all that had hapned, and that Saturne was coming against him with the Titanes; he leuyed an Armie, to which the Amazons liuing not farre from Nysa, added great forces, in loue of Minerua, who was entred into their profession. So Bacchus leading the men, and Minerua the women, they set forward against Saturne, met him, ouerthrew him, and taking many of the Titanes prisoners, returned to Nysa; where pardoning the prisoners, that promised to become his true followers, he prepared for a second Expedition. In the second Expedition he behaued himselfe so well, that hee wan the loue of all the people by whom hee passed; insomuch that partly for good affection to him, partly in hatred of Saturne's rigorous gouernement, he was greatly strengthened, and the Enemie as much infeebled by daily reuolts: Comming to the Citie of Hammon, hee wan a battaile of Saturne, before the very walls. After which Saturne with his wife Rhea fled by night, setting the Towne on fire to despight Bacchus. But they were caught in their flight, pardoned by Bacchus, and kindly entreated. Saturne had a yong sonne by Rhea, called Jupiter. This child Bacchus tooke with him in a great Expedition that he made into the East countreies; and comming into Egypt, he left this Jupiter, being then a Boy, Gouernour of the Countreie; but appointed vnto him as an Ouer-seer, one Olympus, of whom Jupiter grew to be called Olympius. Whilst Bacchus trauiayled through all Nations, as far as into India, doing good in all places, and teaching many things profitable to the life of man; the Titanes had found out his Father Hammon in Crete, and began to warre vpon him. But Bacchus returned out of India, with whom Jupiter from Egypt, and his sister Minerua, together with the rest that afterwards were held as gods, ioyning all their forces, went into Crete, ouerthrew the Titanes, chased them, tooke, and slue them, and freed the world of them all. After all this, when Hammon and Bacchus were dead, they were deified; and the great Jupiter the sonne of Saturne succeeding them, reigned Lord alone ouer all the world, hauing none of the Titanes left aliue, nor any other to disturbe him. Betweene this tale of the Libyan Gods, and the Egyptian fables of Osiris, there is a rude resemblance, that may cause them both to be taken for the crooked Images of some one true historie. For the expeditions of Osiris, and of Bacchus; the warres of the Giants in the one storie, of the Titanes in the other; the Kingdome of Egypt giuen by Hercules Lybius to Orus, by Bacchus to Jupiter, the Rattles of Ipsi, and the Cymbals of Bastia, with many pettie circumstances, neerely enough resemble each other, howsoeuer not alike fitted to the right persons. Sanchoiata (as Ensebius cites him) would haue all these to be Phenicians, and is earnest in saying, That it is a true storie, and no Allegorie. Yet he makes it seeme the more allegoricall, by giuing to Pranus or Heauen for Daughters, Fate and Beautie, and the like, with addition of much fabulous matter, omitted by Diadorus, though Diadorus haue enough. To the Genealogie he addes Elius or the Sunne, as Father of Pranus, and among the children of Pranus, Iapetus, Belinus, and Dagon (whom Diadorus doth not mention by their names) giuing withall to Pranus the proper name of Terranis or Indigenis, and of Ilus to Saturne, but omitting Jupiter of Crete. The Pedigree of them is this:

Ensebius.

§. VI.

Of CHAM, and other wicked ones, whereof some gat, some affected the name of Gods.

IF Jupiter Belus, the sonne of Saturnus Babylonicus, otherwise Nimrod, it seemeth that Citero had not heard, (at least by that name) who was more ancient than any of the former three by him remembered: for long after these times were the Greekes but Salvages, if they seeke no farther off for their Gods.

But the Egyptians, even after the flood, began (somewhat before this Chaldean Iupiter) to intitle Cham, the parent of their owne Mizraim, Iupiter Chammon, or Hammon. For the Etymologie of this word (Hammon) which the Greekes deduce ab arenis; from the sands, is ridiculous (saith Peucer;) neither yet is his owne much better, better, who brings it from Hammath, which signifieth heate: because the said Temple of Iupiter Hammon was seated in Libya, where the ayre is exceeding hot and scorching. And as for the antiquitie of the latter Iupiter (among the Greekes and Romans the most renowned) it is certain that he was borne not long before the war of Troy, as by many of his honnes is made manifest; namely, Castor, Pollux, Hercules, Sarpedon, and others, which lived in that age of Primus, vnder whom, and with whom Troy was destroyed.

Peucer de

Now seeing that mortall men, and the most wicked, were esteemed immortall among the Heathen; it was not to be wondered at, that Alexander Macedon, Tyberius, Nero, Caligula, and others, fought to be numbred among them, who were as deformed monstres as the rest: For by what reason could the same Deitie be denied vnto Laurentia and Flora, which was giuen to Venus? seeing they were as notorious and famous Harlots as Ihee was.

§. VII.

That the wiser of the ancient Heathen had surer better opinions of God.

BUT that ever Pythagoras, or Plato, or Orpheus, with many other ancient and excellently learned, beleueed in any of these fooleries, it cannot be suspected, though some of them (ouer-busily) haue mixed their owne inuentions with the Scriptures: for, in punishment for their fictions, did Pythagoras hang both Homer and Hesiodus in hell, where he stayned that they were perpetually stung and pinched with Serpents. Yet it cannot be doubted, but that Homer had read ouer all the bookes of Moses, as by places stolne thence, almost word for word, may appeare; of which Iustine Martyr remembereth many in that Treatise conuerted by Mirandula. As for Plato, though he dissembled in some things, for feare of the Inquisition of the Arcopagites, yet S. Augustine hath alreadie answered for him (as before remembred) Et mirifice ipsi delectatus est, quae de vno Deo tradita fuerant; And he was greatly delighted in the doctrine of one God, saith Iustine Martyr. Now howsoeuer Lactantius pleased to reprehend Plato, because (saith he) Plato sought knowledge from the Egyptians, and the Chaldeans, neglecting the Iewes, and the bookes of Moses, Eusebius, Cyrillus, and Origen, finde reason to beleuee the contrarie, thinking that from thence he tooke the grounds of all by him written of God, or sauouring of Diuinitie: and the same opinion had S. Ambrose of Pythagoras.

But whether it were out of the same vanitie, which possesse all those learned Philosophers and Poets, that Plato also published (not vnder the right Authors names) those things which he had read in the Scriptures; or feareing the feueritie of the Arcopagites, and the example of his Master Socrates, by them put to death by poison, I cannot iudge. Iustine Martyr (as it seemeth) ascribeth it wholly to *Plato*s feare, whose wordes among many other of the same effect, are these: PLATO MOSIS mentionem facere, ob id, quod unum solum Deum docuerat, sibi apud Athenienses tutum non putauit, veritus Arcopagum; PLATO fearing the Arcopagites thought it not safe for him among the Athenians to make mention of Moses, that he taught that there is but one God. But for that Diuinitie which he hath written in TIMAEUS, id ipsum de Deo dixit quod & MOSES; He discoursed and taught the same of God (saith IUSTINE MARTYR) which Moses did. For where it pleased God by his Angell to answer Moses, Ego sum exiens (which is) I am; and, exiens misisti me ad vos; I am hath sent me vnto you, herein did Plato (saith Iustine Martyr) no otherwise differ then that Moses vsed the word (qui) and Plato the word quod: Moses enim qui exiit (inquit) PLATO quod exiit; For Moses saith, He who is; PLATO, That which is. Now of Gods incomprehensible nature, and of the difficultie either to conceiue, or expresse the same, he giue this testimonie: Genitorem Vniuersitatis tam difficile est inuenire, quam inuenitum impossibile dignè profari; It is as hard to finde out the Creator of the Vniuersall, as it is impossible, if he were found, to speake of him worthily. And what can be more agreeable to the Maiestic of Gods nature, then this propertie by Plato acknowledged? Deus bonus, & quidem, Deus causa bonorum: malorum autem omnium non causa; God is absolutely good, and so (assuredly) the cause of all that is good: but of any thing that is euill he is no cause at all: and againe, Charitas Dei fuit causa factionis mundi, & originis omnium re-rum; The loue of God was the cause of the worlds creating, and the originall of all things.

APULEIUS the Platonist: Summus Deus infinitus est, non solum loci exclusione, sed etiam natura dignitate: Et nihil est Deo similis & gratus, quam vir animo perfectio bonus; The most high God is also an infinite God, not only by exclusion of place, but by the dignitie of nature: neither is there any thing more like or more acceptable to God then a man of a perfect heart. THALES affirmed, that God comprehended all things, and that God was of all things the most ancient: Quia nunquam esse capit; Because he neuer had any beginning. ZENO, that God beheld euen the thoughts of men. Athenodorus, that therefore all men ought to be careful in the actions of their life, because God was euerwhere present, and beheld all done. But what can be more agreeable to Moses storie of the Creation, then this opinion and description of the Worlds beginning in Earipides, Scholler of Anaxagoras?

*Calum terræ, cuius forma fuit:
Sed cum fuissent abiuncta complexu mutuo,
Emergit omnis in lucem res progenita,
Arbores, aues, fere, quæq; affert mare,
Gensq; mortalium.*

Heaven and Earth one forme did beare:
But when disioyned once they were
From mutual embraces,
All things to light appeared then,
Of trees, birds, beasts, fishes, and men
The still-remayning races.

And as in Pythagoras, in Socrates, and in Plato: so we finde the same excellent vnder-standing in Orpheus, who euer-where expressed the infinite and sole power of one God, though he vse the name of Iupiter, thereby to auoid the enuie and danger of the time; but that he could attribute those things to the sonnes of men, and mortall creatures, which he doth to this Iupiter, there is no man who hath euer heard of God, that can imagine.

Nomina Deorum (saith MIRANDULA) quos ORPHEVS canit, non decipitium demonum, à quibus malum & non bonum provenit; sed naturalium virtutum diuinarumq; sunt nomina: The names of those Gods whom ORPHEVS doth sing, are not of deceiuing Deuils, from whom euill comes, and not goodnesse; but they are the names of naturall and diuine vertues. Yea, that he yet reacheth higher, and speaketh of God himselfe; this his instruction to Musæus, and the Hymne following teach vs: Respicies verò ad diu-inum hunc sermonem ei diligenter animum aduerte, intendens cordis rationis capax conceptu-culum: rectam autem ascende viam, & solum apice mundi Regem. Vnus est ex se genitus, ex eo omnia nata sunt: Ipse vero in illis versatur, nec quisquam eum intueri potest mortaliū, sed ipse nihilominus omnes intuetur.

Autogenes.

Then marking this my sacred speech, but truely lend Thy heart, that's reasons sphere, and the right way ascend,
And see the worlds sole King. First, he is simply one Begotten of himselfe, from whom is borne alone

All

All else; in which hee's still, nor could it ere befall
A mortall eye to see him once, yet he sees all.

And againe the same Author,

*IUPITER omnipotens, & primus, & vltimus idem;
IUPITER est caput & medium: IOVIS omnia munus.
IUPITER est fundamen humi & stellantis Olympi.
IUPITER & mas est, & femina nescia moris.
Spiritus est cunctis, vultu vis IUPITER ignis.
Et Pelagi radix, SOL, LVNA, est IUPITER ipse
Rex, & origo simul rerum est, & terminus idem.
Nam prius occultus, magno post numine, sacrum
Cor referans bonus in dulcem dedit omnia lucem.*

The first of all is God, and the same last is he.
God is the head and midst, yea from him all things be.
God is the Base of earth, and of the starred skie.
He is the male and female too, shall neuer die.
The spirit of all is God, the Svnne, the Moone, and what is higher.
The King, th'originall of all, of all the end.
For close in holy brest he all did comprehend, Whence all to blessed light, his wondrous power did send.

Now besides these former testimonies, that all the learned men of ancient times were not so stupid and ignorant, as the Agyptians, Grecians, and other Nations by them infected were. I will only repeat two or three other opinions, and leaue the Reader to those large and learned Collections of Iustine Martyr, Clemens, Lactan-tius, Eusebius, Engelinius, Pencer, Plessis, Danaus, and others. For Cleanthes the Stoick, being demanded of what nature God was, described him by these attributes and 30 properties: Bonus, iustus, sanctus, seipsum possidens, utilis, speciosus, optimus, severus, liber, semper commodus, tutus, gloriosus, charitas, &c. Good, iust, holy, possessing himselfe, profitable, beautifull, best, severe, free, alwayes doing good, safe without feare, glorious, and selfe-charitie. EPICURVS affirmed, that God who beheld all things, and pierced euer-where nature, was only and euer-where powerfull: agreeing with DEMOCRITVS:
Rex omnium ipse solus; He is the only King of Kings: and with Pindarus the Poet, Deus vnus, Pater, creator summus, atq; optimus artifex, qui progressus singulis diuersos seculum merita præbet; One God, the Father, the most high Creator, and best artificer, who giueth to euer-where diuers proceedings according to their deserts. This God (saith ANTISTHE-NES) cannot be resembled to any thing, and therefore not elsewhere knowne; & if in 40 patria illa perenni, cuius imaginem nullam habet: Saue onely in that euerylasting Countrey, whose image thou hast none at all. Hereof also XENOPHANES COLOPHONIUS:
Vnus Deus inter Deos & homines maximus, nec corpore, nec mente mortalibus similis; There is one God among gods and men most powerfull, neither corporally, nor mentally like unto mortals: and XENOPHON, Deus qui omnia quatit, & omnia quiescere facit, magnus potensq;, quod omnibus patet: qualis autem forma sit, nemini patet, nisi ipsi soli, qui luce sua omnia perscrutat; God who shaketh all things, and setteth all things at rest, is great and mightie, as is manifest to all: but of what forme he is, it is manifest to none, save only to him selfe, who illuminateth all things with his owne light. Finally, Plato saith: Totius rerum nature 50 causa, & ratio, & origo Deus, summus animi genitor, æternus animantium spissator, asti-dus mundi sui opifex, sine preparatione genitor, neg, loco, neg, tempore ille comprehens, cog, paucis cogitabilis, nemini effabilis; God is the cause, ground, and originall of the whole nature of things, the most high Father of the soule, the eternal preserver of living creatures, the continual framer of his world, a begetter without any propagation, comprehended neither in any place, nor time; therefore few can conceive him in thought, none can expresse what he is.

Therefore was it said by S. Hierome, Si enim cunctos Philosophorum vnicuique libros, necessesse est ut in eis reperias aliquam partem usorum Dei, ut apud PLATONEM, fabricatorem mundi, Deum: apud ZENONEM, Stolorum Principem, inferos & immortales animas, &c. If thou consider all the bookes of the Philosophers, thou canst not but finde in them some part of the Vessels of God, as in PLATO, God the Creator of the world: In ZENO Prince of the Stoicks, Hell and immortal soules, &c. And this is certayne, that if we looke into the wisdom of all Ages, we shall finde that there neuer was man of solid vnderstanding or excellent iudgement: neuer any man whose mind the arte of education hath not bended; whose eyes a foolish superstition hath not afterwarde blinded; whose apprehensions are sober, and by a pensive inspection aduised; but that he hath found by an vnresistible necessitie, one true God, and euertlasting being, all for euer causing, and all for euer sustayning; which no man among the Heathen hath with more reuerence acknowledged, or more learnedly exprest, then that Aegyptian Hermes, howsoeuer it fayled afterwarde in his posteritie: all being at length by deuillish policie of the Aegyptian Priests purposely obscured; who inuented new gods, and those innumerable, best sorting (as the Deuill perswaded them) with vulgar capacities, and fittest to keepe in awe and order their common people.

§. VIII.

That Heathenisme and Iudaisme, after many wounds, were at length about the same time vnder IULIAN miraculously confounded.

BVt all these are againe vanished: for the inuentions of mortall men are no lesse mortall then themselves. The Fire, which the Chaldeans worshipped for a God, is crept into euery mans chimney, which the lacke of fuelle starueth, water quenchereth, and want of ayre suffocaterh: Iupiter is no more vexed with Iunoes ielousies; Death hath perswaded him to chastitie, and her to patience; and that Time which hath deuoured it selfe, hath also eaten vp both the Bodies and Images of him and his: yea, their stately Temples of stone and durefull Marble. The houses and sumptuous buildings erected to Baal, can no where be found vpon the earth; nor any monument of that glorious Temple consecrated to Diana. There are none now in Phenicia, that lament the death of Adonis; nor any in Libya, Creta, Thessalia, or elsewhere, that can aske counsaile or helpe from Iupiter. The great god Pan hath broken his Pipes, Apollons Priests are become speechlesse; and the Trade of riddles in Oracles, with the Deuills telling mens fortunes therein, is taken vp by counterfeit Aegyptians, and coozening Astrologers.

But it was long ere the Deuill gaue way to these his ouer-throwes and dishonors: for after the Temple of Apollo at Delphos (one of his chiefe Mansions) was many times robbed, burnt, and destroyed; yet by his diligence the same was often enriched, repayed, and rededified againe, till by the hand of God himselfe it received the last and vtter subuersion. For it was first robbed of all the Idols and Ornaments therein by the Euboean Pirates: Secondly, by the Phlegians vtterly sackt: Thirdly, by Pyrrhus the sonne of Achilles: Fourthly, by the Armie of Xerxes: Fifthly, by the Captaynes of the Phoenices: Sixtly, by Xero, who carryed thence five hundred brazen Images: all which were new made, and therein againe set vp at the common charge. But whatsoeuer was gathered betweene the time of Nero and Constantine, the Christian Armie made spoile of, defacing as much as the time permitted them; notwithstanding all this it was againe gloriously rebuilt, and so remayned till such time as Julian the Apostate sent thither to know the successe of his Parthian enterprise, at which time it was vtterly burnt and consumed with fire from Heauen; and the image of Apollo himselfe, and all the rest of the Idols therein molten downe and lost in the earth.

The

The like successe had the Tewes in the same Italian time, when by his permission they assembled themselves to rebuild the Temple of Hierusalem: for while they were builed to lay the foundations, their buildings were ouerthrowne by an Earthquake, and many thousands of the Tewes were ouerwhelmed with the ruines, and others flaine, and scattered by Tempest and Thunder: though Am. Marcellinus report it more fauourably for the Tewes, ascribing this to the nature of that Element. For, saith hee, Alphius and the Ruler of the Prouince of Indea, being by Julian builed in the reedifying of this Temple, flaming Bals of fire issuing neere the foundation, and oft consuming the Workemen, made the enterprize frustrate.

Of the last refuges of the Deuill to maintaine his Kingdome.

Ow the Deuill, because hee cannot play vpon the open Stage of this World (as in those dayes) and being still as industrious as euer, findes it more for his aduantage to creepe into the mindes of men; and inhabiting in the Temples of their hearts, workes them to a more effectuall adoration of himselfe then euer. For whereas hee first taught them to sacrifice to Monsters, to dead stones cut into faces of Beasts, Birds, and other mixt Natures; hee now sets before them the high and shining Idoll of glorie, the All-commanding Image of bright Gold. He tels them that Truth is the Goddest of dangers and oppressions: that chastitie is the enemy of Nature; and lastly, that as vertue (in generally) is without taste: so pleasure satisfieth and delighteth euery sense: for true wisdom (sayth hee) is exercised in nothing else, then in the obtaining of power to oppress, and of riches to maintaine plentifully our worldly delights. And if this Arch-politician finde in his pupils any remorse, any feare or feeling of Gods future Iudgement, hee perswades them that God hath so great need of mens soules, that he will accept them at any time, and vpon any conditions: interrupting by his vigilant endeours all offer of timefull returne towards God, by laying those great blockes of rugged pouertie, and despised contempt in the narrow passage leading to his diuine presence. But as the minde of man hath two Ports, the one alwayes frequented by the entrance of manifold vanities; the other desolate and ouer-growne with grasse, by which enter our charitable thoughts and diuine contemplations: so hath that of death a double and twofold opening: worldly miserie passing by the one, worldly prosperitie by the other: at the entrance of the one wee find our sufferings and patience to attend vs: (all which haue gone before vs to prepare our ioyes) at the other our cruelties, couetousnesse, licentiousnesse, iniustice, and oppressions (the Harbingers of most fearefull and terrible sorrow) staying for vs. And as the Deuill our most industrious enemy was euer most diligent: so he is now more laborious then euer: the long day of Mankind drawing fast towards an euening, and the Worlds Tragedie and time neere at an end.

9. cap. 4.

But this vniuersall graue of waters, and generall Deluge hath not beene received by all: for diuine testimonies do not perswade all naturall men to those things, to which their owne reason cannot reach: Dum obnubila in obscuro veritas latet: whilst the truth lieth wrapped vp in obscuritie. Many there are who haue disputed against the vniuersality of this ouerflowing, and haue iudged that this Flood of Noah fell but on some particular places and Kingdomes: moued so to thinke, because in elder ages there haue beene many other Floods (as they suppose) of that nature. Herof Nicolas Damascenus writeth in this manner, as his words are cited by Iosephus: *Est super Minyadam excelsus mons in Armenia, qui Baris appellatur, in quo multos consurgentes sermo est diluuij tempore liberatos, & quendam simul in Arca decessum in huius vertice habuisse, lignorumque reliquias multo tempore conseruatas, qui fortasse fuit, de quo etiam Moyses Iudeorum Legistorum scribit: thus saith this Authour. There is (sayth hee) about Minyada (or the Countrey of Minya) an exceeding high Mountaine in Armenia, called Baris: on which it is reported, that many hauing fled thither, were saued in the time of the Deluge: and that one was carried in an Arke, and rested vpon the top of the Mountaine, whereon there remained a long time after certaine pieces thereof; and this might be the same, of which Moses the Law-giuer of the Iewes maketh mention. And of this opinion were the Thalimudists (sayth Annius) that many Giants saued themselves vpon Mount Sion.*

But Berofus (who after Moses was one of the most ancient, howsoeuer hee haue beene since deformed and corrupted) doth in the substance of all agree with Moses as touching the generall Flood, taking from thence the beginning of his Historie in these these words: Ante aquarum cladem famosam, qua vniuersus perijt Orbis, &c. Before that famous destruction of Waters, by which the world vniuersal perished: winneth well all, that Noah with his Wife Titea, and his three Sonnes with their Wiues (in all eight persons) were onely saued.

§. II.

Of the Flood in the time of OGYGES: and that this was not NOAH'S Flood.

BVt from the vanitie of the Greekes, the Corruptors of all truth, (sayth Lactantius) who without all ground of certaine vantage their Antiquitie, came the error first of all: who therein flattering themselves also, sought to perswade the World, that there was no Flood preceded the Flood of Ogyges, King of the Thebans in Boetia, or rather of Attica; and therefore sayth Rhodoginus; OGYGMID appellant Pœta, tanquam pernetus dixerit, ab OGYGE vetustissimo: The Poets gae the name of OGYGIA to things exceeding ancient, as of OGYGES the most ancient.

But let Ogyges be as ancient as those men can make him, yet it is manifest, that hee liued but in Iacobi time (though Eusebius makes him later, and in Moses time) and was borne 67. yeeres after him. There is also an opinion, that Ogyges was Cadmus (and then was he farre later) as Rhodoginus in the ninth Booke of his Antiquities remembreth: Sunt tamen qui in Aegypto regnasse autumant hunc: unde sit CADMVS qui in Graciam profectus Thebas condidit, a boue iugulato sic nuncupatus; quoniam Syrorum lingua bis dicitur Thebe. There are (sayth he) who thinke that this OGYGES did raigne in Egypt, whereby he should be CADMVS, who traailing into Greece built Thebes, so named of a Beefe slaine: because in the Syrian Language, a Beefe is called Thebe.

But this Flood of Ogyges fell in the yeere of the World 3440. according to Eusebius, who followed the account of the Septuagint; and the Flood of Noah in the yeere 2242. after the same account; and so there came 1200. yeeres betweene these Floods, wanting but two, though herein Eusebius was much mistaken, and corrected this opinion in his Chronologie. Now although the verie yeere and time of this ouerflowing in Achaia, or rather Attica, be not precisely set downe, but that there is a great difference among Writers, yet who soeuer makes it most ancient, finds about 500. yeeres difference betweene that and the generall Flood.

For Paulus Orosius affirms, that this tempest fell vpon the Athenians, but 1040. yeeres before Rome built. Bucholzerus sayth it was 1043. elder then Rome; which was founded (according to the same Bucholzerus) in the Worlds yeere 3219; though after the account which I follow (and whereof I will giue my reasons in the Story of Abraham) it was built in the Worlds yeere 3280. Now the generall Flood preceded the building of Rome (sayth Bucholzerus) 1563. yeeres: and the Flood of Ogyges (as before) 1043. Hence it followeth by easie calculation, that (if he place Ogyges in his true age) the difference betweene these two Floods must bee 520. yeeres, to which we (allowing 60. more) find 580. And that this of Ogyges was not the same of Noah (except we call Noah, Ogyges præsum, as some doe) it appears by this, that the Flood of Ogyges then King of Attica or Ogygia, did not extend it selfe any further then the banks of Archipelago, or the Aegean Sea. For whereas Mela, Plinie; and Solinus witness, that the Citie of Ioppe in Iudæa was founded before the Flood; and that (notwithstanding the waight of Waters) there remained on certaine Altars of stone the Title of the King, and of his Brother PHINEVS, with many of the grounds of their Religion: sure, it is no where found among prophane Historians nor in the Scriptures, that euer the Flood of Ogyges spred it selfe ouer any part of Syria, much lesse ouer all the Earth. But that it drowned both the Regions of Attica about Atheni, and that of Achaia in Peloponnesus, it is very probable. For it seemeth

Of this Flood of Ogyges was inuented the Fable of Apollo and Diana. For Latus to the Daughter of Cean, the Son of Itaw, being beloued and forced by Iupiter, and by him gotten with child, Iuno thereat enraged, permitted her (as they say) no part of the Earth to bee deliuered on; and withall caused the monstrous Serpent Python to follow and affright her, wherefoeuer shee traualled, till at length arriving at the Ile of Orygia shee was there twinned; in which shee was deliuered, first of Diana, and then of Apollo, being Twins; whereof Barlaam makes this exposition: That at such time as the Deluge (which happened in Ogyges his Raigne) ceased, out of the abundant moisture of the Earth (heat by putrefaction being thereto mixed) there were exhaled such thicke mists and fogges, that in Attica, and along the Coasts of the Aegan Sea, neyther the beames of the Sunne by day, nor of the Moone by night could pierce the Ayre, or be perceiued by the inhabitants: so as when at length (the Earth being dried, and these vapours dissipated) the Ayre began to bee cleere, and the people of Orygia espied the light of the Moone somewhat before day, and in the same morning the Sunne also appeared: fabulously (because Diana represented the Moone, and Apollo the Sunne) they were reported to bee borne in the Ile of Orygia, thereof afterwarde called Delos: which signifieth manifestation.

Plin. l. 2. c. 11.

And surely it is not improbable, that the Flood of Ogyges, being so great, as Histories haue reported it, was accompanied with much alteration of the Ayre sensibly discerned in those parts, and some vnusuall face of the Skies. Varro in his Bookes, De gente populi Romani (as he is cited by Saint Augustine) reporteth out of Castor, that so great a Miracle happened in the Starre of Venus, as neuer was seene before, nor in after-times: For the colour, the greatnesse, the figure, and the course of it, were changed. This fell out as Adrastus Cyzicenus, and Dion Neapollites, famous Mathematicians affirmed in the time of Ogyges.

*Aug. de Ciuit.
Dei, l. 1. c. 8.*

Now concerning the course of that or any other Planet, I doe not remember, that I haue any where read, of so good Astrologers flourishing among the Greekes, or else where in those dayes as were likely to make any calculation of the reuolutions of the Planets so exact, that it should need no reformation. Of the colour and magnitude, I see no reason why the difference found in the Starre of Venus should be held miraculous; considering that lesser mists and fogges, than those which covered Greece with so long darknesse, doe familiarly present our senses with as great alterations in the Sunne and Moone. That the figure should varie, questionlesse it was very strange: Yet I cannot hold it any prodigie: for it stands well with good reason, that the side of Venus which the Sunne beholds, being enlightened by him, the opposite halfe should remaine shadowed, whereby that Planet would, vnto our eyes, delcrying onely that part whereon the light falleth, appeare to bee horned, as the Moone doth seeme; if distance (as in other things) did not hinder the apprehension of our senses.

Galliens, a worthy Astrologer now liuing, who by the helpe of perspective Glasses hath found in the Starres many things vnknowne to the Ancients, affirmeth so much to haue beene discovered in Venus by his late obseruations: Whether some waterie disposition of the Ayre might present as much to them that liued with Ogyges, as Galliens hath seene through his Instrument; I cannot tell: sure I am, that the discourse coherie of a truth formerly vnknowne, doth rather conuince man of ignorance, then nature of errour. One thing herein is worthy to be noted, that this great, but particular Flood of Ogyges, was (as appeareth by this of Saint Augustine) accompanied with such vnusuall (and therefore the more dreadfull, though naturally signes testifying the concurrence of causes with effects in that inundation; whereas the Flood of Noah which was generall and altogether miraculous, may seeme to haue had no other token, or forehewing, then the long preaching of Noah himselfe, which was not regarded: for they were eating and drinking, when the Flood came sodainly, and tooke them all away.

Luc. 17. 24, 27.

§. III.

Of Deucalions Flood: and that this was not Noahs Flood: nor the Ymbri in Italia a remnant of any vniuersall Flood.

A Second Flood of great fame, and of which the time is more certaine, was that of Deucalion in Thessalia, of which Saint Augustine out of Varro: His temporibus (by Varro scribit) regnante Athenien (bus CRANAO, suicessor CECROPS (ut autem moysi, EVSEBIUS & HIERONYMUS) ad huc eodem CECROPE permanente, dilatatum fuit, quod appellatum est DEUCALIONIS: (that is) In these times (as Varro reporteth) CRANAO the successor of CECROPS governing the Athenians, or (as our EVSEBIUS and HIEROME say) CECROPS yet liuing, that Flood (called DEUCALIONS) happened.

And in the beginning of the eleuenth Chapter of the same eighteenth Booke, hee vseth these words: Eduxit ergo MOSES ex Egypto populum Dei nouissimo tempore CECROPS Athenien sum Regis, cum apud Assyrios regnaret ASCATADES, apud Sicyonios MARATHVS, apud Argiuos TRIOPAS: MOSES led the People of God out Egypt about the latter times of CECROPS King of the Athenians, ASCATADES raigning ouer the Assyrians, ouer the Sicyonians MARATHVS, and ouer the Argiuos TRIOPAS: so as leauing the curiositie of a few yeeres, more or lesse, it appeareth, that this Flood of Deucalion was cyther at the egression of the children of Israel out of Egypt, or neere it: and then after Noah 753. yeeres; according to Functius, who makes Cecrops to liue in the yeere of the World 2409. or if we follow MERCATOR, then 739. yeeres after Noah, and in the yeere of the World 2395. But if Deucalion were borne in the age of the World 2356. according to Codoman; then giuing vnto Deucalion fortie yeeres of age when this Flood happened; it falleth within one yeere of Mercators account. But Deucalion by all approoued Historians is said to haue bene 82. yeeres olde at that time. Now Clemens Alexandrinus dates the time of this Flood of Deucalion, and the conflagration and burning in Phaetons time, by the Raigne of Crotopus King of the Argiuos; but Crotopus liued King of the Argiuos fixe yeeres after Israel departed Egypt, which makes twentie yeeres difference, according to Functius, who will haue this Flood and burning to haue fallen fourtene yeeres before Moses left Egypt: for he gaue of the Worlds yeeres to the Flood and burning the yeere 2440. and to Moses his egression the yeere 2454. And yet Cedrenus thinks that Moses was more ancient, and liued with Inachus; but that cannot bee true: for then had the Flood of Deucalion, and the burning of Phaeton, preceded the Flood of Ogyges, which is denied by all: for that of Thessalie (called Deucalions) followed that of Attica (called Ogygia) at least 250. yeeres or thereabouts. Eusebius in his Chronologie makes it 230. and so doth P. Orofius: Eusebius about the 50. yeere of Moses life, and 50 Cyrillus about the 67. and both after Nahabs Flood 770. yeeres: for these be Clemens Alexandrinus his words: Fuit autem in Grecia tempore quidem PHORONEI, qui fuit post INACHVM, inundatio que fuit tempore OGYGIS, There happened in Greece in the time of PHORONEVS, who liued after INACHVS, the Flood of OGYGES. Now if the Flood of Ogyges in Attica were 1020. or 1016. yeeres before the first Olympiad, according cording to Eusebius and Orosius; (as before) then is it manifest, that taking 763. out of this number of 1020. it falls out that Ogyges Flood happened before the Hebrews left Egypt 250. yeeres, or 260. yeeres, according to the difference between the opinions of Eusebius and Orosius. And for my selfe (who rather follow those Chronologers, which giue 60. yeeres more to Abraham after the Flood, then the rest) I reckon the times which come between the Floods in this sort. The generall Flood was in the yeere of the World 1656. Jacob was borne in the yeere of the World 2169. so as from the beginning of the Flood to Jacob's birth. there were consumed 513. yeeres. Ogyges Flood happened 100. yeeres after Jacob was borne; and therefore after the generall Flood 613. yeeres. Now Deucalion was borne in the yeere of the World 2356. and had liued 82. yeeres, when his Kingdome of Thessalie was overwhelmed; (which added to 2356. make 2438.) his Flood was after Noah's Flood ended 782. yeeres. And hereto Annius his Xenophon agreeth, who makes 700. yeeres between the generall Flood and Deucalions birth; to which adde 82. yeeres of his Age (as before) and then the Flood of Thessalie followed the generall 782. yeeres. The words of that Xenophon are these: Ab inundatione terrarum ad ortum DEUCALIONIS, secundo anno Sphari, septingenti supputantur anni, qui natus anno duos & octoginta Thessaliam vidit inundatam. From the drowning of the World to the birth of DEUCALION, in the second yeere of Spherus, are numbered 700. yeeres, and when DEUCALION was 82. yeeres old, he saw Thessalia drowned.

c. 14.

about Parnassus: witnesseth Aristotle in the first of his Meteors. And Varro (whom Saint Augustine so often citeth for his excellent learning, especially in Antiquities) findeth this Flood of Deucalion to haue happened in the time of Cranus, who succeeded Cecrops; Orosius thinkes it somewhat later, Amphitryon reigning in Athens, the third from Cecrops. Only this of Deucalion was very great, and reached not only over Thessalie it selfe, and the Regions adioyning Westward; but it covered the greatest part of Italie: and eyther the same, or some other particular Flood then happening oppressed Egypt, sayth Eusebius. And therefore did the Greekes eyther thinke it, or saie it to be vniuersall; and Deucalion, then King, sauing himselfe and some others on the Mountaine of Thessalie (of all other the highest, sayth Solinus) was by reason thereof (as Strabo witnesseth) layd to be the preseruer of Mankind. That this Flood covered a great part of Italie, Plinius and Solinus make it probable: who affirme that the people then inhabiting Italie were therefore called Quia ab imbris diluuij superfluentes; and therefore also were they esteemed the most ancient Nation, as Strabo confirmeth in his first Booke, and Trezenius in his second: which Vmbri these Authours make the Parents of the Sabines, and the Sabines to bee the Parents of the Sannites, Piceni, Lucani, Brutij, and all others inhabiting anciently the bankes of the Mediterrane Sea. But that these Vmbri were not the Inhabiters of Italie before the Flood of Noah, and so tooke name by sauing themselves vpon the Appennine Mountaines, the Scriptures teach vs: shewing who, and who only then were preferred, SATVRNE descending from the heavens high, Fearing the Armes of IUPITER his sonne, His Kingdome lost, and banisht thence doth flie. Rude people on the Mountaintops he wonne To liue together, and by lawes: which done He chose to call it Latium.

And afterward in the Verses following he speaketh of the Aufones, and after them of the Sicani: Nations, which againe fought to displant the ancient Inhabiters:

TUM MARIUM Aufonia, & gentes venere Sicani,

Virg. l. 8. Æn.

Then came th' Aufonian bands, and the Sicanian tribes.

Of these Sicani (which left Spain and late downe in Italie) Thucydides and Plinius giue testimonie: who were againe expelled by the Ligy, saith Thucydides. After all these plantations and replantations came the Vmbri, descended of the Gauls (saith Annius) not of those Gauls of France, but of those of Scythia, who commanded a great part of Italie, euen all Hetruria and Campania, as Herodotus, Plinius, and Dionysius haue assured vs; and therefore this flood of Deucalion was long after that of Noah. For all those Nations were planted in Italie, and disposed of Italie againe, before the Vmbri were euer heard of, or had being. So that Kingdome was first called Camafene, then Latium or Saturnia, then Aufonia, then Sicania; before the Vmbri (in whose time Deucalions flood happened) possit the same, about 306. yeeres before the war of Troy: Lycan then governing Arcadia; who being the Father of two and twentie Sonnes, the youngest called Oenotrius invaded Italie, who gaue it the name of Oenotria. This name it held vntill Italus of the same Nation changed it into Italie, after his owne name, about 250. yeeres before the fall of Troy. After these came the Pelasgi, of whom Plinius in his third Booke and fifth Chapter; and Strabo in his fifth; Thucydides in his sixth speaks at large: and after them the Lydi vnder Tyrrhenus their Captayne, that gaue name to the Tyrrheni; who calting thence the Vmbri, tooke from them three hundred Cattles, and built therein twelue Cities; to which (after they had possit and past ouer the Appennine Mountaynes) they added diuers others, whereof Telina (afterward Bononia) was one.

Now that there was not anciently such a Nation, as these Vmbri, in those parts, I doe not affirme: hauing respect to the testimonies before repeated. And Stephanus thinkes, that the name was deriued from the Greeke word Ombros; but that these Vmbri of Italie were descended of the Nation of Scythians (called Galli) it shall be shewed hereafter.

§ IIII.

Of some other records testifying the vniuersall flood: and of two ancient deluges in Egypt: and of some else where.

SAINTE AVGVSTINE out of Varro affirmeth, that the Greekes and Latines made not any mention of the vniuersall flood, because they had nothing of antiquitie foregoing that of Ogyges; and therefore (according to Rhodomus before remembered) were all things among the Greekes (which antiquitie had worne out of knowledge) called Ogygia, which we in Englishe commonly call (worme-eaten) or of defaced date. But as all the parts of the earth were successfully planted and peopled; and as all Nations had their proper times, and not their beginning at once and at the instant: so did euery familie which afterward became a great People, with whom the knowledge of diuine time letters was not receiued, finde no parent of more antiquitie, then such as they had themselves, nor allow of any before their owne; and as the Gracians, so did others vaunt themselves to be Indigene, and growing out of the earth, or inuent some other prophane or ridiculous beginning. But the Chaldeans had certayne knowledge of Noahs flood, as Berosus witnesseth; and Nicolaus Damascenus maketh particular mention thereof (as is aforesaid) though he also affirme by heare-say, that some Giants faued themselves vpon the Mountaynes Baris in Armenia, but speaketh not thereof as from any authoritie approued: vjing the word sermo est; That such a speech there was. And Eusebius remembreth a place out of the ancient Historian Abydenus: who writeth that Sisithrus, to preserue himselfe from a flood foretold him by Saturnus, fled to the hills of Armenia by ship, ad Armenian nauigio consuegit; who the third day (after the waters were fallen) sent forth birds, that finding no land to rest on, returned againe; which he also did a second time, but at the third returne the birds feet were covered with mudde and slime. To this effect are Eusebius words out of Abydenus, which may seeme a true description (though in other termes) of Noahs flood.

Cyillus also affirmeth, that Alex. Polyhistor maketh mention of this generall flood. And Plato in Timeo produceth an Egyptian Priest, who recounted to Solon out of the holy Bookes of Egypt, the storie of the flood vniuersall, which (saith he) happened long before the Gracian inundations. Fryer Amnius his Xenophon remembreth a third flood, which also Diodorus Siculus confirmeth, somewhat more ancient then that of Ogyges in Attica. For he named the generall flood for the first, which happened (saith he) vnder the old Ogyges, Sub prisco Ogyge, which was Noah; he calleth the second Niliaca; Hercules and Prometheus then liuing, 44. yeeres before that of Attica, in the 34. yeere of Belochus King of the Assyrians, though I doe not beleue him as touching the time. But this flood couered a great part of the nether Egypt, especially all that Region subiect to Prometheus; and hereof came the fable of the Vulture on Prometheus his liver after ward slaine by Hercules of Egypt; which fiction Diod. Siculus deliuereth in these wordes: Fluvium propter cursus velocitatem, profunditatem, aquarum Aquilam tunc appellatum, HERCVLEM cum consilij magnitudine, 39 tam viriute, voluntis vestigio comprehensisse, & aquarum impetum ad priorem cursum convertisse: Vnde & Graci quidam Poeta rem gestam in fabulam vertentes, HERCVLEM tradunt Aquilam PROMETHEI jecur depulcentem occidisse; This flood (meaning of Nilus) for the swiftnesse of his course, as also for the depth, was in those dayes called the Eagle: but HERCVLES by his great iudgement and vertue did againe compresse and straighten this River, so farre extended and ouer-spread, turning it into the old channels: Whence certayne Greeke Poets (converting this labour and worke of HERCVLES into a fable) deuised that HERCVLES slue the Eagle, which fed on PROMETHEVS liver; meaning that he deliuered Prometheus of that sorrow and torment, which for the losse of his People and Countrey (by the waters destroyed and couered ouer) he 40 suffered.

X. noy. de equis.
Colum. per Annimus. fol. 27.

A fourth flood chanced about Pharus in Egypt, where Alexander Macedon built Alexandria, as Amnius conceiueth out of his Xenophon, who in this briefe sort writeth of all these inundations: Inundationes plures fure: prima nouembris inundatio terrarum sub prisco OGYGE: secunda Niliaca, &c. There were many inundations (saith this same Xenophon) the first which was vniuersall of nine Moneths, and this happened vnder the first Ogyges: the second was Niliaca, and of one Moneths continuance in the time of Hercules and Prometheus Egyptians: a third of two Moneths vnder Ogyges Atticus: the fourth of three Moneths in Thessalia vnder Dencalion: and a fifth of the like continuance (called Pharonica) vnder Proetus of Egypt, about the time of Helen 50 rape. Diodorus in his first Booke and eleuenth Chapter, taking the Samotheaces for his Authors, remembreth a flood in Asia the lesse and elsewhere, of no lesse destruction then any of the other particular inundations, saying, that the same happened before that of Dencalion: the Sea of Pontus and Hellepont breaking in ouer the land.

But

But there haue beene many floods in diuers times, and ages, not inferior to any of these two last remembred, Niliaca and Pharonica in Egypt: as in the yeere of our Redemption 590. when in October of the same yeere, Gregorie then being Bishop of Rome, there happened a maruailous ouerflowing in Italie, and especially in the Penetian Territorie, and in Lyguria, accompanied with a most fearefull storme of thunder and lightning: after which followed the great plague at Rome, by reason of the many dead Serpents cast vp and left vpon the Land, after the waters decreased and returned. And in the yeere 1446. there perished 10000. people, by the breaking in of the Sea at Dordrecht in Holland: of which kinde I take that flood to be of Aciaia or Attica. Before that and in the yeere 1238. Trithemus speaketh of an earthquake which swallowed many thousands: and after that of a flood in Frisland, in which there perished 100000. persons. Strozus Sigee, in his Magia omniuersaria, telleth of an inundation in Italie, in the time of Pope Damasus, in which also many Cities of Sicil were swallowed: another in the Papacie of Alexander the sixth: also in the yeere 1515. Maximilian being Emperor. He also remembreth a perilous ouer-flowing in Polonia, about Cracovia, by which many people perished. Likewise Vignier a French Historian speaketh of a great flood in the South part of Languedoc, which fell in the yeere of our Lord 1557. with so dreadfull a tempest, as all the people attended therein the very end of the world, and iudgement day; saying, That by the violent 20 descent of the waters from the Mountaynes, about Nismes there were remoued diuers old heapes and mountures of ground, and many other places torne vp and rent: by which accident there was found both coyne of silver and gold, diuers peeces of plate, and vessels of other metall, supposed to be hid den at such time as the Gabris invaded that Prouince, in the yeere 1156.

¶ V.

That the flood of Noah was supernaturall, though some say it might haue beene foreseene by the Starres.

 Ow howsoeuer all these floods and many other, which haue couered at severall times severall Regions, not only in these parts of the world, but in America also, (as I haue learned of some ancient Southlayers among them) may be ascribed to natural causes and accidents; yet that vniuersall flood (in the time of Noah) was powred ouer the whole face of the earth by a power aboue nature, and by the especiall commandement of God himselfe, who at that time gaue strength of influence to the Starres, and abundance to the Fountaynes of the deepe: whereby the irruption of waters was made more forcible, then any abilitie of nature could effect, or any second causes by whatsoeuer vnion could performe, without receiuing from the Fountayne of all power, strength, and faculties supernaturall. Henricus Mechlinensis, a Scholler of Albertus Magnus, in his Commentaries vpon the great coniunctions of Albu Masar obserueth, that before the flood of Noah, the like coniunction of Iupiter and Saturne, 40 happened in the last degree of Cancer, against that constellation since called the Ship of Arges; by which the flood of Noah might be foretold, because Cancer is both a watery signe, and the house of the Moone, which is the Ladie of the Sea, and of moysture, according to the rules of Astronomie, and common experience. And this opinion Petrus of Alacio vpon Genesis confirmeth, affirming that although Noah did well know this flood by diuine reuelation, yet (this coniunction being notorious) he could not be ignorant of the second causes thereof: for those were not 50 only signes, but also working causes, by strength receiued from the first cause, which is God himselfe: and further that by * Cataracte caeli (Englithed the windores of heaven) Moses meant this great and waterie coniunction; the word (Cataractæ) signifying flowing downe or comming downe. Now (saith P. de Aliaco) it pleased God to ordaine by the course of the Heauens such a constellat[i]on, by which all men might behold therein their destruction towards, and thereby forsake those wicked wayes wherein they walked, and call vnto God for mercy.

Of this iudgement was Gul. Parisiensis, who vnderstood that the wordes Cataractæ cali, or windores of heauen, were to be taken for the former coniunction, or for these waterie signes, Cancer, Pisces, Pleiades, Hyades, and Orion, and of the Planets, Mars, Venus, and the *Moon*e: which are the forcible causes of the greatest inundations. His owne wordes are these: Nondum intelligo Prophetam Hebraeorum cataractæ cali ac vocasse, nisi partem illas cali, quæ generatim sunt pluuiarum & inundationum aquarum, quales sunt signa aquatica, ut Cancer, &c. as aforelaid. As yet (saith he) I perceiue not what the Prophet of the Hebrewes meant by those wordes (Cataractæ cali, or windores of Heauen) vntil he be thereby vnderstand those celestiall powers, by whose influences are engendred the rayne, and inundations of waters, such as are the waterie signes of Cancer, &c.

But in a word, as it might please God, that in the course of his vnsearchable wisdom this coniunction should at such time be: so did he (as aforelaid) adde vigour and facultie, and gaue to euery operation increase of vertues, violent eruptions to Springs and Fountaynes, commanding them to cast out the whole treasure and heape of their waters; taking retention from the cloudes, and condensing ayre into water by the ministerie of his Angels, or howsoever else best pleased his All-powerfullnesse.

§. VI.

That there was no neede of any new Creation of matter to make the vniersall flood: and what are Cataractæ Cali, GEN. 7. VERS. II.

NOW if it be objected, that God doth not create any thing of new; (for God resteth the seventh day: (that is) he did not then after create any new species) which granted, it may seeme that then all the earth and aire had not waters sufficient to couer the habitable world fifteen cubits aboue the highest Mountaynes. Of this proposition, whether God hath so restrayned himselfe or no, I will not dispute; but for the consequent (which is) that the world had want of water to ouer-couer the highest mountaynes, I take that conceit to be vnlearned and foolish; for it is written, that the fountaynes of the great deep were broken up (that is) the waters forsooke the very bowels of the earth; and all whatsoeuer was disperst therein pierced and brake through the face thereof. Then let vs consider, that the Earth had aboue one and twentie thousand miles: the Diameter of the Earth according to that circle seven thousand mile, and then from the Superficies to the Center some three thousand five hundred miles: Take then the highest Mountayne of the world, Caucasus, Taurus, Olympus, or Atlas; the Mountaynes of Armenia or Syria, or that (of all other the highest) in Tencheris, and I doe not finde, that he that looketh highest fretcheth aboue thirtie miles vpright. It is not then impossible, answering reason with reason, that all those waters mixed within the earth three thousand five hundred miles deepe, should not well helpe to couer the face of thirtie miles in height, this thirtie miles vpright being found in the depths of the earth one hundred and fixtene times: for the Fountaynes of the great Deep were broken up, and the waters drawne out of the bowels of the earth. Secondly, if we consider what proportion the earth beareth to the extension of the ayre ouer and about it, wee shall find the difference exceeding great. If then it pleased

God to condense but so much of this ayre as euery-where compasseth and embraceth the earth, which condensation is a conuerſion of ayre into water, a change familiar in those elements, it will not seeme strange to men of iudgement, yea but of ordinarie vnderstanding, that the Earth (God so pleasing) was couered ouer with waters without any new Creation.

Lastly, for the opinions of Galiliæus Parisiensis, and Aliacensis, to which I may adde Berosus and others, That such a coniunction there was, foretelling that destruction by waters which followed; and that by the word Cataractæ cali, or Windores of heauen, was meant this coniunction; there needs no other answer then that obseruation of Ladonicus Vices, who affirmeth that by the grauest Astrologian it was obserued, that in the yeere 1524. there should happen the like coniunction, as at Noahs flood, then which (saith he) there was neuer a more sayre, drie, and seasonable yeere: the like destruction was prophesied of the yeere 1588. But Picus Earle of Mirandula proueth that there could not be any such coniunction at that time.

To conclude, I finde no other mysterie in the word Cataractæ cali, then that the cloudes were meant thereby: Moses vsing the word Windores of Heauen (if that be the sense of the word) to expresse the violence of the raynes, and powring downe of waters. For whosoever hath seene those fallings of water, which sometimes happen in the Indies, which are called the Spowts (where cloudes doe not breake into drops, but fall with a resistlesse violence in one body) may properly vse that manner of speech which Moses did; That the windores or flood-gates of heauen opened: (which is) That waters fell, contrarie to custome, and that order which we call naturall. God then loosened the power retentive in the vppermost ayre, and the waters fell in abundance: Behold (saith Io 8) he which holdeth the waters, and they drie up, or better in Latine, Et omnia siccantur; And all things are dried up; but when he sendeth them out, they destroy the earth: and in the 26. Chapter: He bindeth the waters in the cloudes; but these bonds God loosed at that time of the generall flood, and called vp the waters which slept in the great deepe: and these ioyning together couered the earth, till they had performed the worke of his will: which done, he then commanded them to returne into their darke and vast Causes, and the rest (by a winde) rarified againe into ayre, formerly condensed into drops.

Of some remaynder of the memorie of NOAH among the Heathen.

NOAH commanded by God, before the fall of those waters, entred the Arke which he had built, with his owne Wife, and his Sonnes, and his Sonnes wiues, taking with them of euery Creature, which tooke life by generation, seven of the cleane, and of the vnclene, two. Noah, according to Philo, signifieth quietnesse: after others, and according to the prophesie of his Father Lamech, cessation; to whom after-times gaue many names answering his antiquitie, zeale, vertue, and other qualities: as, The first Oggyes, because in the time of the Grecian Oggyes there was also a great flood of Achia: Saturne they called him, because he was the Father of Nations: Others gaue him the name of Prometheus, who was said to steale away Iupiters fire; fire in that place being taken and vnderstood for the knowledge of God and heavenly things. Others thinke that he was so called for his excellent wisdom and foresight. He had also the name of Tamus, (id est) vinosus, because Tain signifieth wine in the Hebrew. And so Tertullian finds him written in libris ritualibus; In the bookes of ceremonies, preceding both Saturne, Vranus, and Ioue: which three enioyed an elder time then all the other ancientest fayned gods. And this name Tain is taken from the Hebrew and Syrian, and not from the Latine: for it was in vse before there was any Latine Nation, or or any Kingdome by that name knowne. Of the antiquitie of Ianus, Fabius Pictor giueth this testimonie: *IANI ætate nulla erat Monarchia, quia mortalibus pectoribus nondum hæserat collaregenandi cupiditas, &c. Vinum & far primus populus docuit IANVS ad sacrificia: primus enim aras & Penuria & sacra docuit: In the time of IANVS (saith he) there was no Monarchie: for the desire of rule had not then folded it selfe about the hearts of men. IANVS first taught the people to sacrifice Wine and Meale: hee first set up Altars, instituted Gardens and Solitarie Groves, wherein they used to pray, with other holy rites and ceremonies. A greater testimonie then this there cannot be found among the Heathen, which in all agreeth so well with the Scriptures. For first, whilest Noah flourished, there was not any King or Monarch: Nimrod being the first that tooke on him soueraine authoritie. Secondly, Noah after the flood was the first that planted the Vine, and became a Husbandman; and therefore offered the first fruits of both (to wit) Wine and Meale. Thirdly, he was the first that rayfed an Altar, and offered sacrifice to God, a thanks-giving for his mercifull goodness towards him. Noah was also signified in the name of Bifrons (which was given to Ianus) because he beheld the times both before and after the flood, Quia præterita nouit, & futura præsepevit, saith ARNOBIVS; Because he knew what was past, and provided for what was to come. He was also in the person of Ianus (haddowed by the name of Chaos, and semen orbis; The seede of the world; because as out of that confused heape was drawne all the kindes of Beasts and Plants: so from Noah came all mankind: whereof Ouid in the person of Ianus:*

He was also intituled Cælamand Sol, Heaven and the Sunne, for his excellent knowledge in Astronomie: Vertumnus, Bacchus, and Liber Pater; not that latter, which Diod. Sculus, and Alex. Aphrodisæus so call, because he was the restorer of the Greeks to their former libertie, but in respect of the flood. For the Greeks called Liber zōn, and his Nurfes Hyades, of rayne, because Noah entred the Arke, when the Sunne ioyned with the Starrs Hyades, a constellation in the brow or necke of Taurus, and euer after a monument of Noahs flood. He was also by others furnamed Triton, a Marine God, the Sonne of Neptune: because he liued in safetie on the waters. So was he knowne by the name of DIONYSVS, quasi diarhōon, mentem pungens; Bitter-braine, or wit-singer, though Diodorus conceiue otherwise, and deriue that name à pater & loco; Of his Father, and the place of his birth (to wit) of Ioue, and Nisa a Towne of Arabia felix, saith Suidas out of Orpheus. He had also the by-name of zōn Taurus, or Taurophagus, because he first yoked Oxen and tilled the ground, according to that of MOSES: And NOAH became an husbandman. Now howsoeuer the Grecians vaunt of their Theban Bacchus (otherwise Dionysus) it is certayne that the name was borrowed, and the inuention stolen from Noah. But this name of Bacchus, more anciently Boacchus, was taken (saith Gul. Stackius, and out of him Daneus) from Noachus, (N) being changed into (B); and it is the more probable, because it cannot be doubted but that Noah was the first planter of the Vine after the flood: and of Noah (the first and ancient Bacchus) were all those fables deuised, of which Diodorus complaineth in his fourth Booke, and fifth Chapter. This first Bacchus (to wit) Noah, was furnamed Nysus, of the Mountayne Nysa in India, where the Grecian Bacchus neuer came, whatsoever themselves saie of his enterprises; and these Mountaynes of Nysa ioyned with those of Parnassus, and those other Easterne Mountaynes, on which the Arke of Noah rested after the flood.

Furthermore, to the end that the memorie of this second parent of mankind might might the better bee preferred, there were founded by his issues many great Cities which bare his name; with many riuers and mountaines: which oftentimes forgot that it was done in his regard, because the many names giuen him brought the same confusion to places as to himselfe. Notwithstanding all which, we find the Citie of Noah vpon the banks of the red Sea and elsewhere: the Riuier of Nagas in Thrace, which Strabo calleth Nagarus; Ptolomie Danuis; diuiding Illyria from Pannonia. Thus Strabo much for the name.

§. VIII.

Of sundrie particulars touching the Arke: as the place where it was made, the matter, fashion and name.

Now in what part of the world Noah built the Arke, it doth not appear in the Scriptures, neither doe I finde any approved Authour that hath written thereof: onely Goropius Becanus in his Indo-Scythia conceiue, that Noah built his Arke neere the mountaines of Caucasus, because on those hills are found the goodliest Cedars: for when Alex. Macedon made the warre among a people, called Nysæi, inhabiting the other side of Caucasus, hee found all their burials and Sepulchers wrought ouer with Cedar. To this place (saith Becanus) Noah repaired, both to separate himselfe from the reprobate Giants, who rebelled against God and Nature, as also because he would not be interrupted in the building of the Arke, to which also hee addeth the conueniencie of riuers, to transport the Timber which he used, without troubling any other carriages.

Onely this wee are sure of, that the Arke was built in some part of the Easterne world; and to my vnderstanding, not farre from the place where it rested after the flood. For Noah did not vse any mast or saile (as in other ships) and therefore did the Arke no otherwise moue then the Hytke or body of a ship doth in a calme Sea. Also because it is not probable, that during these continual and downe-right raines there were any windes at all, therfore was the Arke little moued from the place where it was fashioned and set together. For it is written: God made a winde to passe vpon the earth, and the waters ceased, and therefore it may be gathered, that during the fall of the waters, there was not any storme or forcible winde at all, which could driue the Arke any great distance from the place where it was first by the waters lifted vp. This is also the more probable, if that ancient opinion be true, as it is very likely, that the Arke had sundum planum, a flat bottom, and not raised in forme of a ship with a sharpnesse forward, to cut the waues for the better speede.

This kind of Vessell the Hebrewes call Thebet, and the Greeces Larnax, for so they termed Deucalion's ship: and some say, that the hill Parnassus, to which in eight dayes he arriued, was first called Larnassus, and by the change of (L) into (P) Parnassus; but Pausanias thinks that it tooke name of a Sonne of the Nymphæ Cleodora, called Parnassus, the inuentour of Auguration.

Gen. 8. 1.

Steph. de Urb. fol. 227.

De Oracul. fol. 24.

Pencrus findes the word (Parnassus) to haue no affinitye with the Greeke, but thinks it deriued from the Hebrew word Noah, which signifieth Auguration and Diminution: or from Har or Parai, as in his Chapter of Oracles in the lease before cited.

Iosephus calls the Arke Machina, by the generall name of a huge Frame; and Epiphanius out of the Hebrew Aron, but herein lieth the difference betwene Aron and Thebet, That Aron signifieth properly the Arke of the Sanctuary, but Thebet such a Vessell, as swimmeth, and beareth it selfe vpon the waters.

Epi. b. in Arce.

Lastly, this Arke of Noah differed from the fashion of a ship in this, that it had a couer and rooffe, with a crest in the middelt thereof, and the sides declining like the rooffe of an house; to the end, both to cast off the waters, and that thereunder Noah himselfe

Gene. 6. 4.

himselfe and his children might shelter, and separate themselves from the noysomnesse of the many beasts, which filled the other roomes and parts of the Arke.

Of what wood the Arke was built it is vncertaine. The Hebrew word Gopher once and in this place onely vsed is diuersly vnderstood; and though the matter bee of little importance, yet this difference there is, That the Geneua Translation calls it Pinetree, the Rabbinie Cedar, the Seutencie, square timber, the Latine smooth timber. Others will haue it Cypress trees, as dedicated to the dead, because Cypress wasorne at funerals. But out of doubt, if the word Gopher signifie any speciall kind of timber, Noah obeyed the voyce of God therein; if not, hee was not then curious as touching the kinde or nature of the wood, hauing the promise of God, and his grace and mercie for his defence. For with Noah God promised to establish his covenant, Plinie affirmeth that in Egypt it was the vse to build ships of Cedar, which the wormes eate not; and hee auoweth that hee saw in Nica, in the Temple of Apollo Cedar beames, laid in the time of the foundation of the Citie, and that they were still found in his time, which was about 188. yeares after: prouing thereby, that this kinde of wood was not subiect to putrifying or moulding in a very long time. But in that it is easie to cut, light to carie, and of a sweete sauour, lasting also better then any other wood, and because neere the place where the Arke rested, there are found great store of these Cedar trees, as also in all the mountaines of the East, besides those of Libanus, it is probable enough that the Arke might be of that wood: to which hath besides the other commodities the greatest length of Timber, and therefore fittest to build ships withall. Peterius conceiueth that the Arke had diuers sorts of timber, and that the bottoome had of one sort, the decke and partition of another; all which may be true or false, if Gopher may be taken for timber in generall. True it is, that Cedar will serue for all parts of a ship, as well for the body, as for masts and yards. But Noah had most respect to the direction receiued from God: to the length, breadth, and height, and to the partitions of the Arke; and to pitch it, and to diuide it into Cabines, thereby to seuer the cleane beasts from the vncleane, and to preserve their severall sorts of foode; and that it might bee capable of all kinde of liuing creatures, according to the numbers by God appointed. All which when Noah had gathered together, he cast his confidence wholly on God, who by his Angels steered this ship without a rudder, and directed it without the helpe of a Compass or the North starre. The pitch which Noah vsed, is by some supposed to haue bene a kinde of Bitumen, whereof there is great quantitie about the Valley of Sodome and Gomorrah, now the dead Sea or Alphaltes: and in the Region of Babylon, and in the West India, and herein it exceedeth other pitch, that it melts not with the Sunne, but by the fire onely, after the manner of hard waxe.

Peterius.

That the Arke was of sufficient capacitie.

De Civitat. Dei. lib. 9. c. 26.

THe Arke according to Gods commandement had of length three hundred cubites, fittie of breadth, and thirtie deepe or high: by which proportion it had sixe parts of length to one of breadth, and ten times in length to one of depth; of which S. AUGUSTINE: Procul dubio figura est peregrinantis in hoc seculo Civitatis Dei, (hoc est) Ecclesie, quæ sit salua per lignum, in quo precepit Mediator Dei & hominum, homo Christus Iesus: nam & mensura ipsa longitudinis, altitudinis, latitudinisque eius significat corpus humanum, in cuius veritate ad homines præannunciatus est venturus, & venit, &c. Without doubt (saith he) it is a figure of the Citie of God, trauielling in this world as a stranger (that is) of the Church, seated by the tree whereupon the Mediatour betwene God and Man, the man Iesus Christ did hang: for euen the very measure of the length, height, and breadth, answereth the shape of mans body, in the truth whereof the coming of Christ was foretold and performed.

By

By what kinde of Cubite the Arke was measured, it hath bene a disputed question among the Fathers, and others; and the differences are in effect these: The first kinde of cubit (called the Common) containeth one foot and a halfe, measured from the sharpe of the elbow to the point of the middle finger. The second (the palme cubit) which taketh one handfull more then the common. The third is called Regius Cubitus, or the Persian Cubit, which exceedeth the common cubit three inches. The fourth is the sacred cubit, which containeth the common or vulgar cubit double, wanting but a quarter or fourth part. Lastly, there is a fift cubit, called Geometrical, which containeth sixe common cubits. But of all these sortes, which were commonly measured by the vulgar cubit, the alteration and diminution of mensures hath made the difference. For as there is now a lesse proportion of bodies: so is the common cubit, from the sharpe of the elbow to the point of the middle finger, of lesse length then it was in elder times.

S. Augustine considering the many sortes of beasts and birds which the Arke held, with their food and water, was sometimes of opinion, that the Arke had proportion after the Geometrical cubit, which containeth almost fixe of the Common. For measuring the Arke by the vulgar cubit, it did not exceede the capacitie of that vessel built by Hiero of Syracuse, or the ship of Ptolomie Philopater. But S. Augustine (who at the first was led by Origen) changed his iudgement as touching the Geometrical cubit; and found vpon better consideration, that there needed not so huge a bodie to preserve all sortes of creatures by God appointed to bee referued. For it was not needfull to take any kindes of fishes into the Arke, because they were keeptliuing (saith S. Augustine) in their owne element. *Nam sicut necesse conseruare in Arca quæ posset in aquis viuere, non solum mersa sicut pisces, verum super-natantia, sicut multa dices. It was not needfull to conserue those creatures in the Arke, which could liue in the waters; and not onely fishes which can liue vnder water, but also those fowls which sit and swim on them: and againe, Terra, non aqua, maledicta, quia Adam non huius, sed illius fructum: vestium comedit. It was the earth, and not the waters, which God cursed: for of the forbidden fruit of the earth and not of the Sea, did Adam eat; so as S. Augustine gathereth hereupon, (as afore-30 said) that so huge a Frame needed not.*

And if wee looke with the eyes of iudgement hereunto, wee shall finde nothing monstrous therein; although the imaginations of men, who (for the most part) haue more of mischief and of ignorance, then of any reuerend reason, finde many impossibilities in this worke of God. But it is manifest, and vndoubtedly true, that many of the Species, which now seeme differing and of severall kindes, were not then in verum natura. For those beasts which are of mixt natures; either they were not in that age, or else it was not needfull to preserve them: seeing they might be generated againe by others, as the Mules, the Hyæna and the like: the one begotten by Ases and Mares, the other by Foxes and Wolves. And whereas by dis-40 couering of strange landes, wherein there are found diuers beasts and birds differing in colour or stature from those of these Northerne parts, it may be supposed by a superficiall consideration, that all those which weare red and pyed skines, or feathers, are differing from those that are lesse painted, and were plaine russet or blacke: they are much mistaken that so thinke. And for my owne opinion I finde no difference, but onely in magnitude, betwene the Cat of Europe, and the Ounce of India; and euen those dogges which are become wilde in Hispagnia, which the Spaniards vsed to deuoure the naked Indians, are now changed to Wolves, and begin to destroy the breed of their Cattle, and doe also oftentimes teare asunder their owne Children. The common Crowe and Rooke of India is full of red feathers in the50 drownd and low Islands of Caribana; and the Blacke Bird and Thrush hath his feathers mixt with blacke and carnation: in the North parts of Virginia. The dog-fish of England is the Sharke of the South Ocean: For if colour or magnitude made a difference of Species, then were the Negros, which wee call the blacke-mores, non animalia rationalia, not men, but some kinde of strange beastes: and so the Giants of the South America should be of another kinde, then the people of this part of the World. Wee also see it daily that the natures of fruites are changed by transplantation, some to better, some to worse, especially with the change of Climate. Crabs may be made good fruit by often grafting, and the best Mellons will change in a yeere or two to common Cowcummers by being set in a barren Soyle: Therefore taking the kinds precisely of all creatures, as they were by God created, or out of the earth by his ordinance produced: The Arke, after the measure of the common Cubit was sufficiently capacious to containe of all, according to the number by God appointed: For if we adde but halfe a foot of measure to the Common Cubit, which had a foot and a halfe of Giantly stature (and lesse allowance wee cannot giue to the difference betweene them and vs) then did the Arke containe 600. foot in length, and 100. foot in breadth, and 60. foot deepe.

1. Sam. 17. 4.

But first of all to make it manifest, that the Geometrical Cubit is not vsed in the Scripture, the stature of the Giants therein named may suffice. For if the bed of Os King of Basan had bene nine Geometrical Cubites long, it had taken 54. Cubites of the common, which make 80. foot: and Goliath, who had the length of 6. Cubites and a handfull, which makes nine foote and a handfull, (a proportion credible) if these Cubites had bene Geometrical, then had bene 54. foot in height and vppwardes, which were monstrous and most incredible: for (according to this proportion) had the head of Goliath bene nine foot long, and farre waigtier and bigger then all Dan's body, who caried it away.

Exod. 20. 26.

Againe, if the Geometrical Cubit had bene vsed for a measure in the Scripture as many Commenters haue obserued, then had the Altar (appointed to containe five Cubites of length, five of breadth, and three of height) haue reached the length of 27. foot vpright, and so mult their Priests haue ascended by steps or ladders to haue performed their sacrifices thereon, which was contrarie to Gods Commandement giuen in these wordes: Thou shalt not goe up with steps vnto mine altar, that thy sheme bee not discovered thereon; and therefore was the Altar but three Common Cubites high which make foure foot, that their Priests standing thereby might execute their office: Wherefore I may conclude, that the Cubit mentioned in the Scriptures was not the Geometrical, but the ordinarie Cubit of one foot and a halfe, according to the measure of Giantly stature; which measure (doublet) might giue much the more capacitie to the Arke, although it be also probable, that as the men were, so were the horses whereon they rode, and all other creatures of a correspondent size. And yet (as I take it) though by this meanes there were not any whit the more room in the Arke, it were not hard to conceiue, how all the distinct Species of Animals, whose liues cannot bee preserved in the waters, might according to their present quantities bee contained in a vessell of those dimensions which the Arke had; allowing to the Cubit one foot and a halfe of our now vsuall measure: whence it followeth of necessitie, that those large bodies which were in the daies of Noah might haue room sufficient in the Arke, which was measured by a Cubit of length proportionable.

How the appointed number of creatures to be saued, (that is) seuen of the cleane, two of the vnclane (with necessarie foode) might haue place in the Arke, But hath very learnedly declared: the brieue summe of whole discourse to that purpose is this. The length of the Arke was three hundred cubits, which multiplied by the breadth, namely fiftie cubits, and the product by the height of thirtie cubits, sheweth the whole capacitie to haue bene 450000. Now whereas the posts, walles, and other partitions of lodgings may seeme to haue taken vp a great part of the hollow: the height of the roote which (the perpendicular being one cubit) contained 7500. cubicall cubes, was a sufficient recompence: If therefore in a ship of such greatnesse wee seeke room for 89. distinct Species of beasts, or (lest any should be omitted) for 100. severall kinds, we shall easily finde place both for them, and for the birds, which in bignesse are no way answerable to them, and for meate to sustaine them all. For there are three sorts of beasts, whose bodies are of a quantitie best knowne; the Beeffe, the Sheepe, and the Wolfe: to which the rest may be reduced, by saying, (according to Aristotle) that one Elephant is answerable to foure Beeues, one Lyon to two Wolves, and so of the rest. Of beasts, some feede on vegetables, others on flesh. There are one and thirtie kinds of the greater sort, feeding on vegetables: of which number, onely three are cleane, according to the law of Moses, whereof seuen of a kinde entred into the Arke, namely three couples for breede, and one odde one for sacrifice: the other eight and twentie kinds were taken by two of each kinde, so that in all there were in the Arke one and twentie great beasts cleane, and fixe and fiftie vnclane, estimable for largenesse as ninetie one Beeues; yet for a supplement (lest perhaps any Species be omitted) let them be valued, as 120. Beeues. Of the lesser sort feeding on vegetables were in the Arke fixe and twentie kinds, estimable with good allowance for supplie, as fourescore Sheepe. Of those which deuoure flesh were two and thirtie kinds, answerable to threecore and foure Wolves. All these 280. beasts might bee kept in one storie or roome of the Arke in their severall Cabines; their meate in a second: the Birds and their prouision in a third, with place to spare for Noah and his family, and all their necessaries.

§. X.

That the Arke rested vpon part of the hill Taurus (or Caucasus) betweene the East Indies, and Seythia.

†. I.

A praterition of some questions lesse materiall: with a note of the use of this question, to finde out the Metropolis of Nations.

That time Noah tooke to build the Arke, I leaue to others to dispute, but hereceived the Commandement from God 100. yeares before the waters fell: and had therefore choice of time and leisure sufficient. As for the number of decks and partitions, which Origen deuides into foure, S. Augustine into three, I will not trouble the Reader with the controuersie: or whether those creatures which sometimes rest on the land, other times in the waters, as the Crocodiles (now called Aligatoris) the Sea-cowes or Sea-horses, were kept in the Arke, or no, I thinke it a needlesse curiositie; and yet to this faith Petrus, and others before him, that a fish-pool might bee made awell within the Arke, as in Hiero his ship of Syracuse. Lastly, to consider or labour to disprove the foolerie of the Hebrewes, who suppose that the Arke was lightened by a Car-buncle, or had windores of Christall to receiue in light, and keepe out water, were but to reuiue the buried vanities of former times. But that which I seeke most to satisfie my selfe and others in, is in what part of the world the Arke rested after the flood: because the true vnderstanding of some of these places (as the seate of the terrestrial Paradise, and the resting of the Arke) doe onely and truly teach the worlds Plantation, and the beginning of Nations, before and after the flood; and all storie, as well generall as particular, thereby may be the better vnderstood.

†. II.

A propofall of the common opinion, that the Arke rested vpon some of the hills of Armenia.

And first, for the true place where the Arke rested after the flood, and from what part of the world the children of Noah trauielled to their first settlement and plantation, I am resolu'd (without any presumption) that therein the most writers were vtterly mistaken. And I am not led so to thinke out of my humour or newnesse of opinion, or singularity; but doe herein ground my selfe on the originall and first truth, which is the word of God, and after that vpon reason, and the most probable circumstances thereon depending. For whereas it is written, that the Arke (saied vpon one of the mountaines of Ararat, which the Chaldaean Paraphrast hath conuerted Kardai, meaning the hills Gordai or Gordiei in Armenia the greater: (as the wordes Gordai and Kardai, seeme to bee one and the same) of which opinion also the most of our Interpreters are; I finde neither Scripture nor reason which teacheth any such thing: (to wit) that it rested on that part of Ararat, which is in the greater Armenia. 10

Nicolaus Damasceus calls this mountaine of Ararat, Baris, being the fame which the Chaldaean nameth Kardu, to which mountaine the Fryer Annius (citing this place out of Iosephus) makes him finde another adioyning, called Ocila, and to say that the Arke (of which Moses the Lawgiuer of the Hebrewes wrote) did first take ground on this Ocila. But I doe not finde any such mountaine in being, as this Ocila; neither is there any mention of it in the place of Iosephus. Strabo remembreth a Promontorie in Arabia felix, of that name, and Plinie findes a Mart-towne so called in the fame, which Ptolomie calls Ocili, Pmelus Acyla, and Niger Zidon. But this Ocila of Damasceus, or rather of Annius, seemeth to bee one and a part of the Armenian mountaines. Berosus calleth thole mountaines of Armenia Cordai, and Curtius Cordai: Ptolomie Gordai 20 and Gordiei: of which the Countrey next adioyning is by this Nicolaus Damasceus called Ninyada, perhaps (as Becanus coniectures) for Milyada or rather Minni: which word is vled for Armenia Minor. And the very word of Armenia seemes to be compounded of this word Minni, and Aras: as if we should say Minni of Syria; for that Armenia also was a part of Syria, Plinie witnesseth. Epiphanius placeth the Cherades about these mountaines, whom others call Gordien or Gordeni. The mountaines are seated apart from all other to the North of that Ledge of mountaines called Taurus, or Xiphates in the plains of Armenia the great, neere the Lake Thapsitis: whence the River of Tigris floweth in 75. degrees of longitude, and 41. and 42. degrees of latitude. One of the mountaines Gordiei (that which surmounteth the rest) Epiphanius 30 calls Lubar, which in the Armenian signifieth a place of descent: but this out of Iosephus, which name (saith Tunius) was of the euent, because of Noahs comming downe with his children. But this also I take to bee a supposed euent; seeing any hill, from whence on euery side we must descend, may thus bee called: as Iunius correcteth the place in Iosephus Kubariis (Kubariis). That the place is thus to be read, he coniectureth, because Ioseph. l. 1. c. 4. sayes, the place is called Abasbarpius (as it were the descent or comming downe) and Epiphanius. l. 1. cont. Hares. calls it Abas: which word in the Armenian and Egyptian tongue signifieth descent, of Lubar, which is to descend; whence also Lubra is a Synagogue, because it was commonly built on some high place: whereof also the Latine Delubrum may seeme to be deriued; and Act. 6. 9. they that belonged to the Synagogue of the Egyptians are called Libertini, for Lubra tenu. Yet this opinion hath bene embraced from age to age: receiving a habit of strength by time, and allowance without any farther examination; although the name of Lubar might otherwise rightly be giuen, especially to that mountaine, by reason that the passage was more faire, vp and downe vnto it, then to any of the rest adioyning.

†. III.

The first argument against the common opinion. They that came to build Babel, would haue come sooner, had they come from so neere a place as Armenia.

BVt there are many arguments to perswade me, that the Arke of Noah did not rest it selfe in any part of Armenia, and that the mountaines Ararat was not Baris, nor any one of the Gordiean mountaines.

For

For first, it is agreed by all which follow Berosus, that it was in the 130. yeare, or in the yeare 131. after the flood, when Nimrod came into the valley of Shinar, which Valley was afterward called Babylonia, Chus, and Chaldea. If then the Arke had first found land in Armenia, it is very vnprobable, that the children of Noah which came into that valley could haue spent so many yeares in so short a passage: seeing the Region of Mesopotamia was only interiacent, which might by ealie iourneies haue bene past ouer in twentie dayes; and to haften and helpe which passage the nauigable river of Tigris offered it selfe, which is euery where transpassable by boates of great burden: so as where the Defart on the one side reuerted their expedition, the river on the contrarie side serued to aduance it; the river rising out of the same Ledge of mountaines, or at the foote of them, where the Arke of Noah was first supposed to settle it selfe; Then, if the Nations which followed Nimrod still doubted the surprise of a second flood (according to the opinions of the ancient Hebrewes) it foundeth ill to the care of reason, that they would haue spent many yeeres in that low and 10 or flowne Valley of Mesopotamia, so called of the many Riues which imbroyder or compasse it: for the effects witnesseth their afflictions, and the workes, which they vnderooke, their vnbeliefs; being no sooner arrived in Shinar, but they began to prouide themselves of a defence (by erecting Babel) against any future or feared inundation. Now at Babel it was that Nimrod began his Kingdome, the first knowne 20 Citie of the world founded after the flood, about 131. yeares, or (as others suppose) ten yeeres later: though (for my selfe) I rather thinke, that they vnderooke that worke in two respects; first, to make themselves famous, To get vs a name (saith the Text:) Secondly, thereby to vsurpe dominion ouer the rest.

Gen. 10. 10. Beros. 1.

†. IIII.

The second argument, That the Eaſterne people were most ancient in population, and in all humane glorie.

FOr a second Argument: The ciuilitie, magnificence and multitude of people (wherein the East parts of the world first abounded) hath more weight then any thing which hath bene, or can be said for Armenia, and for Noahs taking land there. And that this is true, the vlc of Printing and Artillerie (among many other things which the East had) may easily perswade vs, that those Sunne-rising Nations were the most ancient. The certaintie of this report, that the East Indians (time out of minde) haue had Gunnes and Ordnance of batterie, confirmed by the Portngals and others, makes vs now to vnderstand, That the place of Philoftratus in uita Apollonij Tiane l. 2. c. 14. is no fable, though exprest in fabulous wordes: when he saith, that the wise men, which dwell betweene Hyphasis and Ganges, vse not themselves to goe 40 forth into battaile: but that they drive away their enemies with thunder and lightning sent from Iupiter. By which meanes there it is said, that Hercules Aegyptius and Bacchus, ioyning their forces were defeated there; and that this Hercules there cast away his golden shield. For the inuention of letters was ignorantly ascribed to Cadmus, because he brought them first into Greece: of which the people (then rude and sauage) had reason to giue him the honour, from whom they received the benefit. But it is true, that letters are no lesse ancient then Seth or Tienoch were: for they are said to haue written on pillars of stone (as before remembred) long before the flood. But from the Eaſterne world it was that Iohn Cuthenberg a Germane, brought the deuice of Printing: by whom Conradus being instructed, brought the practice thereof 50 to Rome: and alter that Nicholaus Gerson a Frenchman, bettered both the letters and inuention. And notwithstanding that this mytherie was then supposed to bee but newly borne, the Chinians had letters long before either the Egyptians or Phenicians; and also the Art of Printing, when as the Greekes had neither any ciuill knowledge, or any letters among them.

And

And that this is true, both the Portugals and Spaniards haue witnessed, who about an hundred yeares since discovered those Kingdomes, and doe now enjoy their rich trades therein: for the Chinos account all other Nations but Saluages, in respect of themselves.

And to adde strength to this argument, the conquest and storie of Alex. Macedon may iustly be called to witnesse, who found more Cities and sumptuositie in that little Kingdom of Porus, which lay side by side to the East India, then in all his other traualles and vndertakings. For in Alexanders time learning and greatnesse had not traualled so farre to the West as Rome: Alexander esteeming of Italie but as a barbarous Countrey, and of Rome as of a Village. But it was Babylon that stood in his eye, and the fame of the East pierced his eares. And if wee looke as farre as the Sun-riuing, and heare Paulus Venetus what he reporteth of the vitermost Angle and Island thereof, we shall finde that those Nations haue sent out, and not received, lent knowledge, and not borrowed it from the West. For the farther East (to this day) the more ciuill, the farther West the more saluage. And of the Ile of Iapan (now Zipangu) Venetius maketh this report: Incola religioni, literis, & sapientia sunt additi summi, & veritatis indagatores acerrimi, nihil illis frequentius oratione, quam (more nostro) sacris in delubris exerceant: vnum cognoscunt Principem, vnum Deum adorant, The Islanders are exceedingly addicted to religion, letters, and Philosophie, and most diligent searchers out of truth: there is nothing among them more frequent then prayer, which they use in their 20 Churches, after the manner of Christians. They acknowledge one King, and worship one God. The antiquitie, magnificence, ciuillitie, riches, sumptuous buildings, and policie in gouernement, is reported to be such by those who haue beene employed into those parts, as it seemeth to exceede (in those formerly named, and diuers other particulars) all other Kingdomes of the world.

†. V.

The third argument, From the wonderfull resistance which SEMIRAMIS found in the East Indies.

But for a third argument, and also of a treble strength to the rest, I lay the inuasion of Semiramis before the indifferent and aduised Reader: who may consider in what age shee liued, and how soone after the worlds new birth shee gathered her Armie (as Diodorus Siculus out of Ctesias reporteth) of more then three Millions to invade India, to which hee adioyned also 500000. Horse, and 100000. Waggones: whereof if we beleue but a third part, it shall suffice to proue that India was the first planted and peopled Countrey after the flood. Now as touching the time wherein shee liued: All Historians consent, that shee was the wife of Ninus; and the most approved Writers agree, that Ninus was the Sonne of Belus, and Belus of Nimrod, that Nimrod was the Sonne of Cush, Cush of Cham, and Cham of Noah. And at such time as Nimrod came to Shinar, hee was then a great Nation, as by the building of the Citie and Tower of Babel may appeare; and being then so multiplied and increased, the two descents call betweene Nimrod and Semiramis, brought forth in that time those multitudes, whereof her Armie was composed. Let vs then see with whom hee encountered in that warre with this her powerfull Armie: euen with a multitude, rather exceeding, then equalling her owne, conducted by Stavrobates King of India beyond Indus; of whose multitudes this is the witnesse of Diod. Siculus. Stavrobates, autis maioribus quam quae erant SEMIRAMIDIS copijs. STAVROBATES gathering together greater troupes then those of SEMIRAMIS. If then 50 these numbers of Indians had beene encreased but by a Colonie sent out from Shinar, (and that also after Babel was built, which no doubt tooke some time in the performance) this encrease in the East, and this Armie of Stavrobates must haue been made of stone, or somwhat else by miracle. For as the numbers which Semiramis gathered might might easily grow vp in that time, from so great a Troupe as Nimrod brought with him into Babylonia (as shall be demonstrated hereafter in the Storie of Israel) so could not any such time, by any multiplication naturall, produce so many bodies of men, as were in the Indian Army victorious ouer Semiramis, if the Colonies sent thither had beene so late as Babel ouerturned, and the confusion of Languages. For if we allow 65. yeeres time after the Flood, before Nimrod was borne: of which, 20. yeeres to Cush ere he begat Seba, after whom hee had Hanilab, Sabtah, Raamah, and Saktecha: Gen. 10. 7. and then 30. yeeres to Raamah, ere hee begat Sheba and Dedan, both which were borne before Nimrod: and five yeeres to his five elder brothers, which make 65. and then twice 30. yeeres for two Generations more, as for Nimrod, Sheba and Dedan with others, to beget their sonnes; and that a third Generation might grow vp, which makes in all 125. yeeres, there will then remaine fixe yeeres to haue beene spent in trauielling from the East, ere they arrived in Shinar in the yeere after the Flood 131. And so the followers of Nimrod might bee of sufficient multitude. But as for those which make him to haue arrived at Shinar in the yeere 101.: and the confusion to haue beene at Peleg's birth, these men doe all by miracle: they beget whole Nations without the helpe of time, and build Nimrod's Towre in the Ayre; and not on those low and marshy grounds (which require found foundations) in the Plainses of Shinar. For except that huge Towre were built in a day, there could be no confusion in that yeere 101. or at Peleg's birth. And therefore it is farre more probable, that Nimrod vsurped Regall authoritie in the 131. yeere after the Flood, (according to Berosus) and that the worke of Babel lasted fortie yeeres (according to Grecus) Hominibus in ea perficienda totius 40. annis incausum laborantibus: Men labouring in vaine 40. yeeres to finish it. By which account it falls out, that it was 170. yeeres after the Flood, ere a Colonie was sent into East India; which granted (the one being the maine bodie, and the other but a Troupe taken thence) it can hardly bee beleued, that Stavrobates could haue exceeded Semiramis in numbers: who being then Emperre of all that part of the world, gathered the most of Nations into one bodie.

†. VI.

The fourth Argument from diuers considerations in the person of NOAH.

Fourthly, it is no way probable, that Noah, who knew the world before the flood, and had liued therein the long time of 600. yeeres, was all that space 130. yeeres after the flood, without any certaine habitation: No, it will fall out, and better agree with reason, that Nimrod was but the conductor of those people, by Noah destined and appointed to fill and inhabit that middle part of the earth and the Westerne worlds; (which traualles Noah put ouer to yong and able bodies) and that Noah himselfe then couered with many yeeres, planted himselfe in the same place which God had assigned him: which was where he first came downe out of the Arke from the waters: For it is written, that after Noah came downe out of the Arke hee planted a Vineyard, and became a Husbandman: whose businesse was to dresse and manure the earth; and not to range ouer so many parts of the world, as from Armenia into Arabia felix, where he should (if the tradition be found) haue left certaine Colonies: thence into Africa towards Triton; then into Spaine, where they say hee settled other companies, &c. built Cities after the names of Gela and Noela his sons wiues: from thence into Italie, where they say hee found his sonne Cham the Saturne of Egypt, who had corrupted the people and subiects of Gomer in his absence: with whom Noah (as they make the storie) had patience for three yeeres; but then finding no amendment, they say he banisht him out of Italie. These be but the fancies of Berosus Annianus, a plaine imitation of the Gracian fables. For let euery reasonable man conceiue conceiue, what it was to trauaile farre in such a Forrest as the World was, when after so great a rotting of the earth by the floud, the same lay waste and ouer-grown for 130. or 140. yeeres, and wherein there could hardly be found either path or passage through which men were able to creepe for woods, bulhes and bryars that in those yeeres were growne vp.

And there are so many reasons, prouing that Noah neuer came into the valley of Shinaar, as we need not suspect his passage into Italie or Spaine: For Noah, who was Father of all those Nations, a man reuerenced both for his authoritie, knowledge, experience and pietie, would neuer haue permitted his children and issues to haue undertaken that vnbeneuolent presumptuous worke of Babel. Rather by his presence, and preualent perswasions he would haue bound their hands from so vaine labours, and by the authoritie which he receined euen from God himselfe, hee would haue held them in that awfull subiection, as whatsoever they had vainely conceiued or feared, yet they durst not haue disobeyed the personall commandement of him, who in the beginning had a kinde of Regall authoritie ouer his children and people. Certainly, Noah knew right well, that the former destruction of mankind was by themselves purchased through crueltye and disobedience; and that to distrust God, and to raise vp building against his Almighty power, was as much as in them lay, a prouocation of God to lay on them the same, if not a more sharpe affliction. Wherefore, there is no probability, that euer he came so farre West as Babylonia; but rather, so that hee sent those numbers which came into Shinaar (being the greatest troupe, because they had the greatest part of the world to plant) vnder Nimrod, or those vpon whom he vsurped. Nauclerus and Calesinus take the testimonie of Methodius Bishop of Tyre for current, that there were three Leaders of the people after their encrease (to wit) Nimrod, Suphene, and Ischan: of which Nimrod commaunded the issues of Cham, Ischan of Sem, and Suphene of Iaphet. This opinion I cannot iudge of, although I will not doubt, but that so great a worke as the worlds plantation, could not bee effected without order and conduction.

Of the Sonnes of Sem: Ischan, Hanilah, and Ophir, are especially noted to haue dwelt in the East India. The rest of Sems issues had also the Regions of Persia and the other adioyning to Indus, and held also a part of Chaldea for a time: for Abraham inhabited Urr, till he was thence called by God; and whether they were of the Sonnes of Ischan, or of all the rest a certaine number (Cham and his issue onely excepted) that Noah kept with himselfe, it cannot be knowne. Of which plantation I shal speake at large in the Chapter following.

Now another reason which moues me to beleue, that Noah stayed in the East far away from all those that came into Shinaar, is, that Moses doth not in any word make mention of Noah in all the storie of the Hebrewes, or among any of those Nations which contended with them. And Noah, being the Father of all mankind, and the chosen seruant of God, was too principall a person, to bee either forgotten or neglected, had he not (in respect of his age and wearisome experience of the world) withdrawn himselfe, and retired apart with his best beloved, giuing himselfe to the seruice and contemplation of God and heavenly things, after hee had directed his children to their destined portions. For hee landed in a warme and fertile soile, where hee planted his Vineyard, and dressed the earth; after which, and his thankes giuing to God by sacrifice, he is not remembered in the Scriptures, because hee was so farre away from those Nations of which Moses wrote: which were the Hebrewes chiefly, and their enemies and borderers.

†. VII.

Of the senselesse opinion of ANNIUS the Commentor vpon BEROVS: who finds diuers places where the Arke rested; as the Caspian and Gordian hills which are three hundred miles asunder, and also some place of Scythia.

IT remaineth now that we examine the Arguments and authorities of Frier Annianus, who in his Commentaries vpon Berosus and others, laboureth maruailously to proue, that the Arke of Noah rested vpon the Armenian mountains called Casspy, which mountains separate Armenia from the vpper Media, and doe equally belong to both. And because all his Authours speake of the mountains Gordiaei, hee hath no other shift to vnite these opinions, but by vniting those farre-distant mountains together. To effect which, he hath found no other inuention, then to charge those men with error, which haue carefully ouerscene, printed, and published Pholomies Geographie, in which they are altogether disseuered. For that last edition of Mercator, sets these hills fise degrees (which makes three hundred English miles) asunder. And certainly if we looke into those more ancient copies of Villanovanus and others, we shall finde nothing in them to helpe Annius withall: for in those the mountains Casspy stand seven degrees to the East of the Gordiaei, which make 420. miles. And for those Authours by whose authoritie Annius strengtheneth himselfe, Diodorus whom hee so much followeth, giueth this iudgement vpon them in the like dispute. Aberrant vero omnes, non negligentia, sed regnorum situs ignorantia, They haue altered Diodorus. (saith he) not through negligence, but through ignorance of the situation of Kingdomes. But for an induction, to proue that the Arke of Noah stood on the mountains of Armenia, he beginneth with the antiquitie of the Scythians: and to proue the same hee citeth Marcus Porcius Cato, who auoweth that 250. yeeres before Noah, the earth was ouerflowne with waters, & in Scythia Sagarenatum mortale genus, and that in Scythia Saga the stocke of mortall men was renewed. The same Authour also teacheth that the Vmbri before remembred (who were so called, because saued from Dencalions floud) were the Sonnes of the Galli, a Nation of the Scythians. Ex his venisse IANNVM cum DRYM & Gallis progenitoribus Vmbrosum, From these Scythians, he saith, that IANNVS came with DRYM and with the Galli the progenitors of the Vmbri; And againe, Equidem principatus originis semper Scythia tribuitur, Certainly, the Prime antiquitie of off spring is alway giuen to the Scythians. And herein truly I agree with Annius, that those Regions called Scythia, and now Tartaria, and by some Writers Sarmatia Asiatice, were among the first peopled: and they held the greatest part of Asia vnder tribute till Ninus time. Also Plinie calleth the Vmbri which long since inhabited Italia, Gens antiquissima, a most ancient Nation, who descended of these Scythians. Now that which Annius laboureth, is to proue that these ancient Scythians (meaning the Nephews of Noah) did first inhabite that Region of the mountains, on which the Arke rested; and confessing that this great ship was grounded in Armenia, he fineth a nation of Scythians called Araxes, taking name of the mountaine Ararat, neere the Riuer of Araxes. And because his Authour Cato helpeth him in part (to wit, That in Scythia mankind was restored after the great floud, 250. yeeres before Ninus) and in part vtterly destroyeth his conceit of Armenia, by adding the word Saga, as in Scythia Sagarenatum mortale genus, in Scythia Saga mankind was restored. hee therefore in the Proeme of his Commentarie vpon Berosus, leaueth out the addition of Saga altogether in the repetition of Cato his wordes, and writes homines in Scythia saluatos. For Scythia Saga or Saca, is vndoubtedly vnder the mountains of Paropamisus, on which, or neere which it is most probable that the Arke first tooke ground; and from those East parts (according to Moses) came all those companies which erected the Tower of Babel in Shinaar or Babylonia.

But now the best authoritie which Annius hath, is out of Diodorus: where he hath read, read, that the Scythians were originally Armenians, taking name à Scythia Regem eorum, from Scythathen King. But (in a word) we may see his vanitie, or rather (indeede) his fallshood in citing this place. For Diodorus a most approved and diligent Author beginneth in that place with these words: Fabulantur Scythia, The Scythians fable: and his Interpreter in the table of that worke giveth this title to that very Chapter. Scythiarum origo & successus, fabula, The originall and successe of the Scythians, a fable. And (indeede) there needs no great disproofe hereof, since Ptolomie doeth directly delineate Scythia Saca, or Saca, and sets them in 130. degrees of longitude: and the Persians (saith Herodotus) call all the Scythians, Saca, which Plinie confirmeth: for in respect that these Saca (saith Plinie) are the next Scythians to the Persians, therefore they give all the rest that name. Now that any Nation in Armenia can neighbour the Persians, there is no man beleeveth. But this supposed Scythia Araxea in Armenia lyeth in 78. degrees of longitude (that is) 42. degrees distant from the Saca; and the Countrie about Araxes, Ptolomie calleth Colchene and Soanene and Sacupene, without any mention of Scythia at all: and yet all those which are or were reputed Scythians, either within Imatus or without, to the number of 100. severall Nations are by Ptolomie precisely set downe.

Tab. Afr. 7. & 8

But to come to those later Authors, whereof some have written, others have seene a great part of those North-east Regions, and searched their antiquities with great diligence: First, Marius Niger boundeth Scythia within Imaus, in this manner: (for Scythia without these mountains is also beyond our purpose.) Scythia intra Imaum montem ca est, qua proprio vocabulo Gassaria hoc tempore dicitur: ab Occasu Sarmatia Asiatica: ab Oriente Imao monte: à Septentrione terra incognita: à Meridia Sactia, Sogdiana, Margiana, usq. usq. Oxannus in Hyrcanum mare excurrent; & parte ipsius maris hinc usq. ad Rhissimum usq. terminatur: Scythia within the mountaine Imaus is that part of the world, which in their own speech is at this time called Gassaria; and the same is bounded on the West side by Sarmatia Asiatica, (or of Asia) on the East by the Imaus mountaine: on the North by unknowne lands: on the South by the Sactia (which are the Saca) the Sogdiani, and the Margiani, to the mouth of Oxus, falling into the Hyrcan Sea, and by a part of the same Sea as farre as the mouth of Rha.

Now if Niger lets all Sarmatia Asiatica, to the West of Scythia, then Sarmatia (que magna & regio est, & que innumeras nationes complectitur, Which is a great Region, comprehending innumerable Nations, (saith Niger) much of it being betwene Scythia and Armenia, doth sufficiently warrant vs, that Armenia can bee no part of Scythia; and to make it more plaine, he differeth Sarmatia it selfe from any part of Armenia, by the Regions of Colchis, Iberia, Albania, which he leaveth on the right hand of Sarmatia, and yet makes Sarmatia but the West bound of Scythia.

And for Paulus Venetus, he hath not a word of Armenia among the Tartarian, or Scythian Nations; neither doth his fellow Frier Iohn Plancarpio (cited by Vincetius in his description of Scythia) make any mention of Armenia; neither doth Haytonus an Armenian borne, of the blood of those Kings; (though afterward a Monke) ever acknowledge himselfe for a Tartarian, or of the Scythian races descended: though he writeth that storie at large, gathered by Nicholaus Salerni, and (by the commendement of Pope Clement the fifth) in the year 1307. published.

Neither doth Mathias a Michon (a Canon of Craconia in Polonia) a Sarmatian borne, and that traualled a great part of Sarmatia Asiatica, finde Armenia any way within the compass of Tartaria, Scythia, or Sarmatia; and yet no man (whose traualles are extant) hath observed so much of those Regions as he hath done: prouing and disproving many things, heretofore subiect to dispute. And among others hee burieth that ancient and received opinion, That out of the mountaine Riphei, and Hyphorbei in Scythia, spring the Rivers of Tanaïs or Don, Volga or Edel, prouing by vnauisurable experience, that there are no such mountaine in rerum natura; and (indeede) the heads and fountaines of those famous Rivers, are now by the trade of Mosconia knowne to euery Merchant, and that they arise out of Lakes, low, wooddie, and and marish grounds. The River of Tanaïs or Don, ariseth to the South of the Citie Tulla; some twentie English miles, out of a Lake called Imarone (or in the great wood Okenit; skiles or Isciphonales, Volga, which Ptolomie calls Rha, and the Tartars call Edel, riseth out of a Lake called Frenon, in the great Wood Fadonkzi: from which Lake the two other famous Rivers flow of Rhyssenes (now Neyper) and Dnista or Dniesta. And this learned Polonian doth in this fort bound the European Sarmatia. In Sarmatia of Europe are the Regions of Russians, Lithuanians, Muscovians, and those adioyning, bounded on the West by the River of Vissa, the name perchance misprinted Vissa for Vistula, a River which parts Germanie and Sarmatia; and for the East border hee nameth Tanaïs or Don. Sarmatia Asiatica hee cutteth from Europe by the same River of Tanaïs, and the Caspian Sea, to with-hold it from stretching farther East: this Asian Sarmatia being part of that Scythia which Ptolomie calleth Scythia intra Imaum montem: Scythia within the mountaine Imaus. And the same Mathias Michon farther affirmeth, that the Scythians (which Frier Annivus would make Armenians) came not into Sarmatia Asiatica it selfe about three hundred and a few odde yeeres before his owne time: these be his words: Constat eam esse gentem nouam, & aduentitiam à partibus Orientis, (mutatis sedibus) paulo plus abhinc trecentis annis Asia Sarmatiam ingressam: It is manifest (sayth hee, speaking of the Scythian Nation) that this is a late planted Nation, come from the Coast of the East: from whence they entered into Asia, and gat new seats a little more then three hundred yeeres since: For (indeed) before that time the Gathes or Pouloei inhabited Sarmatia Asiatica. And this Mathias lived in the yeere 1511. and this his Discourse of Sarmatia was printed at Augusta in the yeere 1506. as Bucholzerus in his Chronologie witnesseth. Now these Scythians (sayth hee) came from the East, for in the East it was that the Arke of Noah rested; and the Scythia Saca were those people which lived at the North foot of those Mountaines of Taurus or Ararat, where they encounter or beginne to mixe themselves with the great Imaus. And were there no other testimonie then the generall description of the Earth now extant, and the witness of Ptolomie, it is plaine, that betwene al parts of Armenia and Scythia, there are not only those three Regions of Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, but the Caspian Sea: on the East shore of which Sea, but not on the West, or on that part which any way toucheth Armenia, there are (indeed) a Nation of Scythians (called Ariace) betwene Iaxartus and Iactus; but what are these Scythians to any Ariace, or Scythia Araxea which ANNIVS placeth in Armenia, more then the Scythians of Europe?

The first argument, The Vine must grow naturally neere the place where the Arke rested.

TO this if we adde the consideration of this part of the Text, That NOAH planted a Vineyard, we shall finde that the fruit of the Vine or Rayn did not grow naturally in that part of Armenia, where this resting of the Arke was supposed: for if the Vine was a stranger in Italie and France; and brought from other Countries thither, it is not probable that it grew naturally in Armenia, being a farre colder Countrie. For Tyrrhenus first brought Vines into France, and Saturus into Latium: yea at such time as Brennus and the Gauls invaded Italie, there were few or no Vines in France. For (sayth Plutarch in the life of Cimillus) the Gauls remained betwene the Pyrenae and the Alpes, neere unto the Senones, where they continued a long time, vntill they drunke Wine, which was first brought them out of Italie; and after they tasted thereof they hasted to inhabit that Countrie, which brought forth such pleasant fruit: so as it appeared, that the Plant of the Vine was not naturall in France, but from Italie brought thither; as by Saturus from elsewhere into Italie.

M

Now

Now it is manifest that Noah traualled not farre to seeke out the Vine. For the Plantation thereof is remembred, before there was any counsaile how to dispose of the World among his children: and the first thing he did was to till the ground, and to plant a Vineyard, after his Sacrifice and Thanksgiving to God; and wherefoever the Arke rested, there did the Vine grow naturally. From whence it doth no where appeare that hee traualled farre: for the Scriptures teach vs, that hee was a Husbandman, and not a Wanderer.

Answere to an obiection out of the words of the Text: The Lord scattered them from thence upon the face of the whole earth.

AN so that all the children of Noah came together into Shinar, it doth not appeare, sauing that it may be inferred out of these wordes (from thence) because it is written: So the Lord scattered them from thence upon all the earth; which hath no other sense, but that the Lord scattered them (to wit) those that built this Towre: for those were from thence dispersed into all the Regions of the North and South, and to the Westward. And by these wordes of *Sybil*a (as they are conuerted) it seemeth that all came not together into Shinar, for they have this limitation: Quidam eorum turrem adificauerunt altissimam, quasi per eam cælum essent ascensuri. Certaine of them built a most high Towre, as if they meant thereby to haue scaled the Heauens.

Answere to the obiection from the name of Ararat, taken for Armenia: and the height of the Hills there.

Gen. 8. 14.

Epiph. L. contra Hæres.

BUT before I conclude this part, it is necessarie to see and consider, what part of Scripture, and what reason may be found out to make it true or probable, that the Arke of Noah was forsaken by the waters on the Mountaines of Armenia. For the Text hath only these wordes: The Arke rested on (or vpon) the Mountaines of Ararat or Armenia, saith the marginall note of the Geneua, the Chaldean Paraphrasi calls it Kardu; of which the highest hath the name of Lubar, saith Epiphanius. Now this Ararat (which the Septuagint doe not conuert at all, but keepe the same word) is taken to be a Mountaine of Armenia, because Armenia it selfe had anciently that name: so as first out of the name, and secondly out of the height (which they suppose exceeded all other) is the opinion taken, That the Arke first sate thereon.

But these suppositions haue no foundation: for neyther is Ararat of Armenia alone, neyther is any part, or any of those Mountaines of equall stature to many other Mountaines of the World; and yet it doth not follow, that the Arke found the highest Mountaine of all other to rest on: for the Plaines were also vncouered, before Noah came out of the Arke. Now if there were any agreement among Writers of this Ararat, and that they did not differ altogether therein, wee might give more credit to the conceit. For in the Bookes of the *Sybil*s it is written, that the Mountaines of Ararat are in Phrygia, vpon which it was supposed that the Arke stayed after the Flood. And the better to particularize the place and seate of these Mountaines, and to proue them in Phrygia, and not Armenia, they are placed where the Citie of Calene was afterward built. Likewise in the same description there maketh mention of Marjys, a Riuer which runneth through part of Phrygia, and afterward ioyneth it selfe with the Riuer Meander, which is farre from the Gordian Mountaines in Armenia. We may also find a great mistaking in Iosephus, (though out of Berosus, who is in effect the Father of this opinion) that Iosephus sets Ararat betwene Armenia and Parthia toward Adiabene, and

affirmeth withall, that in the Pronince of Carony by others Karros and Arnos, so called by reason that the waters haue from thence no descent, nor issue out, the people vaunt that they had in those dayes reserved some pieces of Noahs Arke. But Parthia toucheth no where vpon Armenia, for Armenia bordereth Adiabene, a Province of Assyria: so that all Media and a part of Assyria is betwene Parthia and Armenia. Now whereas the discouerie of the Mountaines Gordias was first borrowed out of Berosus by Iosephus; yet the Text which Iosephus citeth out of Berosus, differs farre from the wordes of that Berosus, which wandreth vp and downe in these dayes, set out by Annus. For Berosus cited by Iosephus, hath these wordes: Fertur & nuncq̃ butus pars in Armenia, quâ montem Gordiasorum superesse, & quosdam bitumen inde absum secum reportare, quo vice amissi loci huius homines uti solent: (which is) it is reported also that a part of this ship is yet remaining in Armenia vpon the Gordian Mountaines, and that diuers doe scrape from it the Bitumen or Pitch, and carrying it with them, they use it in stead of an amulet. But Annus his Edition of the Fragment of Berosus vseth these wordes: Nam eleuata ab aquis in Gordias montis vertice quicunq̃, cuius ad huc dicitur aliqua pars esse, & homines ex illa Bitumen tollere quo maxime utuntur ad expiationem: For the whole Arke being lifted up by the waters, rested on the top of the Gordian Mountaines, of which it is reported that some parts remaine, and that men doe carry thence of the Bitumen to purge by sacrifice therewith: so as in these two Texts (besides the difference of wordes) the name is diuerly written. The ancient Berosus writes Gordias with a (C) and the Fragment Gordias with a (G.) the one that the Bitumen is vsed for a preteritue against Poyson or Inchantment; the other in Sacrifice; And if it bee said that they agree in the generall, yet it is reported by neither from any certaine knowledge, nor from any approved Authour: for one of them vseth the word (fertur) the other (dicitur) the one, that so it is reported, the other, that so it is sayd; and both but by heare-say, and therefore of no anothoritie nor credit. For common bruit is so infamous an Historian, as wife men neyther report after it, nor giue credit to any thing they receive from it.

Furthermore, these Mountaines which Ptolome calls Gordias, are not those Mountaines which himselfe giueth to Armenia, but hee calleth the Mountaines of Armenia Moschici. These be his owne wordes: *Montes Armenie nominantur ij, qui Moschici appellantur, qui protendantur usq̃ ad superiorem partem Ponti Cappadocum; & ruens qui Parjardes dicitur: The Mountaines of Armenia are they which are called Moschici, which stretch along to the higher part of Pontus of the Cappadocians: also the Hill which is called Parjardes; which Mountaines Plinie calleth Parjardi, and both which lye to the North of Gordias or Baris, in 43. and 44. and a halfe; and the Gordian Mountaines in 39. and a halfe: from the Northernmost of which did the Georgians take their names, who were first Gordians and then Georgians, who amidst all the strength of the greatest Infidels of *Per*sia and Turkie, doe still remaine Christians. Concerning the other suppositions, that the Mountaines of Gordias, otherwise Baris Kardir or Lubar, (which Ptolome calleth Togordai) are the highest of the World, the same is absolutely false.*

† XI.

Of Caucasus, and diuers farre higher Hills then the Armenian.

FOR the best Cosmographers with other, that haue seene the Mountanes of Armenia, find them farre inferiour, and vnder-set to diuers other Mountanes euen in that part of the World, and elsewhere: as the Mountaine Athos betwene Macedon and Thrace, which Ptolome calls Olympus, now called Lacus, (saith Cassaldus) is farre surmounting any Mountaine that euer hath bene seene in Armenia: for it casteth shade three hundred furlongs, which is euen and thirtie miles and vpwades: of Plut. Marf. which Plutarch: Athos adunbrat latera Lemnae bonis: Athos shadoweth the Cowe of Lemnos.

mos. Also the Mount of Olympus in Thessalie, is sayd to be of that height, as neither the Winds, Cloudes, or Raine ouertop it. Again, the Mountaine of Antandrus in Myfia, not farre from Ida, whence the Riuer Scamandrus floweth, which runneth through Troy, is also of a farre more admiration then any in Armenia, and may bee seene from Constantinople. There are also in Mauritania neere the Sea, the famous Mountaines of Atlas, of which HERODOTVS: Extat in hoc mari Mons, cui nomen Atlas, ita sublimis esse dicitur, ut ad illius verticem oculis mortalium peruenire non possint: Vpon this Coast there is a Mountaine called Atlas, whose height is sayd to be such, as the eye of no mortal man can discern the top thereof. And if we may beleuee Aristotle, then are all these inferior to Caucasus, which hee maketh the most notorious both for breadth and height: Caucasus Mons omnium maximus, qui aestiuum ad ortum sunt, autumnus atq; latitudine, cuius iuga à Sole radiantur usq; ad conticinium ab ortu: & iterum ab occasu: Caucasus (saith ARISTOTLE) is the greatest Mountaine both for breadth and height of all those in the North-east, whose tops are lightened by the Sun-beames, usq; ad conticinium (which is saith Macrobius betweene the first crowing after mid night and the breake of day: Others affirme, that the top of this Mountaine holds the Sunne-beames when it is darkein the Valley; but I cannot beleuee eyther: for the highest Mountaine of the World knowne is that of Tenerife in the Canaria: which although it hath nothing to the Westward of it for 1000. Leagues together but the Ocean Sea, yet doth it not enioy the Sunnes companie at any such late houres. Besides, these Mountaines which Aristotle calleth Caucasus, are those which separate Colchis from Iberia; though (indeed) Caucasus doth diuide both Colchis, Iberia, and Albania from Sarmatia: for he acknowledgeth that the Riuer of Phasis riseth in the same Mountaine, which himselfe calleth Caucasus, and that Phasis springeth from those Hills which sunder Colchis from Iberia, falling afterward into Eufrates: which Riuer (it is manifest) yeldeth it selfe to the Sea, two degrees to the North of Trapezus (now Trabesunda) howsoever Mercator bringeth from Peryardes.

†. XII.

Of diuers incongruities, if in this Storie we should take Ararat for Armenia.

SO as it doth first appeare, that there is no certaintie what Mountaine Ararat was: for the Bookes of the Syblis set it in Phrygia: and Berosus in Armenia: and as for Berosus authority, those men haue great want of proofes that borrow from thence.

Secondly, that Baris was the highest Hill, and therefore most likely that the Arke grounded thereon, the assertion and supposition haue equall credit: for there are many Hills which exceed all those of Armenia; and if they did not, yet it doth not follow (as is before written) that the Arke should sit on the highest.

Thirdly, it cannot be proued that there is any such Hill in Armenia, or in rerum natura, as Baris: for Baris (saith Hierome) signifieth high Towres: and so may all high Hills bee called indifferently; and therefore wee may better giue the name of Baris to the Hills of Caucasus (out of which Indus riseth) then to any Hills of Armenia. For those of Caucasus in the East, are vndoubtedly the highest of Asia.

Fourthly, the Authours themselves doe not agree in what Region the Mountaines Gordaei stand: for Ptolomie distinguisheth the Mountaines of Armenia from the Gordaei, and calleth those of Armenia Moschici and Paryardes, as aforesaid. Now Paryardes is seated neere the middle of Armenia, out of which on the West-side riseth Euphrates, and out of the East-side Araxis: and the Mountaines Moschici are those Hills which disioyne Colchis, Iberia, and Albania (now the Countrie of the Georgians) from Armenia.

†. XIII.

†. XIII.

Of the contrary situation of Armenia to the place noted in the Text: and that it is no maruaile that the same ledge of Hills running from Armenia to India, should keepe the same name all along: and euen in India bee called Ararat.

LASTly, we must blow vp this Mountaine Ararat it selfe, or else wee must digge it downe, and carry it out of Armenia; or find it elswhere, and in a warmer Countrie, and (withall) set it East from Shinar: or else wee shall wound the Truth it selfe with the weapons of our owne vaine imaginations.

Therefore to make the mistaking open to euery eye, wee must vnderstand, that Ararat (named by Moses) is not any one Hill, so called, no more then any one Hill among these Mountaines which diuide Italie from France is called the Alpes: or any one among those which part France from Spainie is the Pyrenian; but as these being continuations of many Hills keepe one name in diuers Countries: so all that long ledge of Mountaines, which Plinie calleth by one name Taurus, and Ptolomie both Taurus, Niphates, Costrus, Coronus, Sariphi, vntill they encounter and crosse the Mountaines of the great Imaus, are of one generall name, and are called the Mountaines of Ararat or Armenia, because from thence or thereabout they seeme to arise. So all these Mountaines of Hircania, Armenia, Coraxis, Cassij Moschici, Amazonici, Heniochi, Scythici, (thus diuersly called by Plinie and others) Ptolomie calls by one name Caucasus, lying betweene the Seas Caspium and Euxinus: as all those Mountaines which cut asunder America, euen from the new Kingdome of Granado, to the streight of Magellan, are by one name called Andes. And as these Mountaines of Ararat runne East and West: so doe those maruailous Mountaines of Imaus breeth themselves North and South; and being of like extent well-neere, are called by the name of Imaus, euen as Plinie calleth these former hills Taurus, and Moses the hills of Ararat. The reason of generall names giuen by Ptolomie was, thereby the better to distinguish the great Regions and Kingdomes, which these great mountaines bound and disseuer, as Armenia, Meopotamia, Affryia, Media, Susiana, Persia, Parthia, Caramania, Asia, Margiana, Bactria, Sogdiana, and Paropanisus: hauing all these Kingdomes either on the North or South side of them. For all the mountaines of Asia (both the lesse and the greater) haue three generall names, (to wit) Taurus, Imaus, and Caucasus: and they receiue other titles, as they feuer and diuide particular places and regions. For these mountaines which sunder Cilicia from the rest of Asia the lesse on the North side, are called Taurus; and those mountaines which part it from Comagena (a Province of Syria) are called Amanus: the mountaines called Taurus running East and West, as Imaus doth North and South. Through Taurus the Riuer of Euphrates forceth her passage, leauing the name of Amanus to the mountaines on her West bank; and on her East side the mountaines are sometimes knowne by the name of Taurus, (as in Ptolomies three tables of Asia) and sometimes Niphates: (as in the fourth) retaining that vncertaine appellation so long as they bound Armenia from Meopotamia: and after the Riuer of Tygris cutteth them asunder, they then take the name of Niphates altogether, vntill they separate Affryia and Alecia; but then they call themselves Costrus, though betweene the vpper and nether Media, they doe not appeare, but altogether discontinue. For at Alazada in Media they are not found, but runnethrough the Easterne Media by pieces: in the middle of which Region they call themselves Orontes, and towards the East part Coronus; out of the Southerne part whereof the Riuer of Bagradus riseth, which diuideth the ancient Persia from Caramania: and then continuing their course Eastward by the name of Coronus, they giue to the Parthians and Hircanians their proper Countries. This done, they change themselves into the mountaines of Sariphi, out of which riseth the Riuer Margus, afterward yelding her selfe to Oxus: (now Abia) and drawing now neere their wayes Plinie in his description of Lybia. lib. 6. c. 27.

Phil. tab. Asia.

end, they first make themselves the South border of Bactria, and are then honoured with the Title of Paropamisus; and lastly of Caucasi, euen where the famous River of Indus with his principal companions Hydaspis and Zaradrus spring forth, and take beginning. And here doe these Mountaines build themselves exceeding high, to equall the strong Hills called Imaus of Scythia, which encounter each other in 35. 36. and 37. degrees of Latitude, and in 140. of Longitude: of the which the West parts are now called Delanquer, and the rest Nagracot; and these Mountaines in this place onely, are properly called Caucasi (sayth Ptolomie) that is, betwene Paropamisus and Imaus: and improperly, betwene the two Seas of Caspium and Pontus.

NUM. 13. 14.

NOW in this part of the World it is, where the Mountaine and River Ianus, and the Mountaine Nysseus (so called of Bacchus Nysseus or Nysa) are found: and on these highest Mountaines of that part of the World did Griopius Boreanus conceive that the Arke of Noah grounded after the Flood: of all his coniectures the most probable, and by best reason approved. In his Indo-Scythia he hath many good Arguments, though mixt with other fantastick opinions of this subiect. And as the same Boreanus also noteth; that as in this part of the World are found the best Vines so it is as true, that in the same Line, and in 34. 35. and 36. degrees of Septentrionall Latitude are the most delicate Wines of the World, namely, in India, Candia, and other parts of Greece; and likewise in this Region of Margiana, and vnder these Mountaines, Strabo affirmeth, that the most excellent Vines of the World are found; the clusters of Grapes containing two Cubits of length: and it is the more probable, because this place agreeth in Climate with that part of Palesina, where the Searchers of the Land by Moses direction found bunches of equall bignesse at Ecol.

The fruitfulness of this place (to wit) on the South bottome of these Hills, Curtius witnesseth. For in Margiana neere the Mountaine of Miras did Alexander seal himselfe and his Armie ten dayes together, finding therein the most delicate Wine of all other.

†. XV.

The conclusion, with a briefe repeating of diuers chiefe points.

L. 54. 27.

AND therefore to conclude this opinion of Ararat, it is true, that those Mountaines doe also trauesse Armenia: yea, and Armenia it selfe sometime is knowne by the name of Ararat. But as Plinie giueth to this ledge of high Hills, euen from Cilicia to Paropamisus and Caucasus, the name of Taurus; and as the Hills of France and Germanie are called the Alpes; and all betwene France and Spainie the Pyrenes; and in America the continuation of Hills for 3000. miles together, the Andes: so was Ararat the generall name which Moses gaue them; the diuersitie of appellations notwithstanding, then by their diuiding and bordering diuers Regions and diuers Countries. For in the like case doe we call the Sea, which entreteth by Gibraltar, the Mediterran and inland Sea; and yet where it walketh the Coasts of Carthage, and out against it, it is called Tyrrhenum: betwene Italie and Greece, Ionium: from Venice to Durazzo, Adriaticum: betwene Athens and Asia, Egeum: betwene Scissus and Abydus, Hellespont: and afterward Pontus, Propontis, and Bosphorus. And as in these, these, so is the Ocean to the North-east part of Scotland called Deucalidonicum: and on this side, the Brittaine Sea: to the East, the Germane and Baltick, and then the Frozen.

For a final end of this question we must appeale to that Iudge which cannot erre, euen to the word of Truth, which in this place is to be taken and followed according to the plaine sense: seeing it can admit neither distinction, nor other construction then the words beare literally, because they are vsed to the very same plaine purpose of a description, and the making of a true and precise difference of places. Surely, where the sense is plaine (and being so vnderstood, it bringeth with it no subsequent inconuenience or contrarietie) we ought to be warie, how we fancie to our selves any new or strange exposition; and (withall) to resolve our selves, that euery word (as aforesaid) hath his waight in Gods Booke. And therefore we must respect and reuerence the testimonies of the Scriptures throughout, in such sort as S. Augustine hath taught vs touching the Gospell of CHRIST IESVS (which is) Negus aliter accipiat quod narrantis Discipulis Christi in Euangelio legerit, quam si ipsammanum Dei, quam in proprio corpore gestabat, conspexerit: That no man otherwise take or vnderstand that which he readeth in the Gospell (the Disciples of Christ haue written it) then if he had seene the very hand of the Lord, which he bare in his owne body, setting it downe.

The wordes then of Moses which end this dispute, are these: *And as they went from the East, they found a Playne in the land of Shinaar, and there they abode: which pro- Gen. 11. 2. cept without controuersie, that Nimrod and all with him came from the East into Shinar; and therefore the Arke of Noah rested and tooke land to the Eastward thereof. For wee must remember, that in all places whereloener Moses maketh a difference of Countries, hee alwayes precisely nameth toward what quarters of the world the same were seated: as where he teacheth the plantation of iohan, he nameth Sephar, a Mount in the East: where he remembreth Cains departure from the presence of God, he addeth: And Cain dwelt in the land of Nod towards the East- Gen. 4. 16. side of Eden: And when he describeth the Tents and Habitations of Abraham after he departed from Sechem, he vsed these wordes: Afterwards remoouing thence vnto a Mountayne Eastward from Bethel, he pitched his Tents: hauing Bethel on the West- Gen. 12. 8. side, and Hai on the East: and afterward in the ninth Verse of the same Chapter it is written: And Abraham went forth iourneying towards the South: also when Ezechiel prophesied of Gog and Magog, he sheweth that these Nations of Tegarmawere of the North quarters: and of the Queene of Saba it is written, that she came from the South to visit Salomon: And the Magi (or wisemen) came out of the East to offer presents vnto Christ. And that all Regions, and these trauailes were precisely set downe vpon the points of the Compasse and quarters of the World, it is most manifest: for Eden was due East from India, Saba South from Hierusalem: the way from Bethel to Egypt directly South; and the Caldeyrians the Tubalines and Magogians inhabited the Regions directly North from Palesina, and so of the rest. But Armenia answereth not to this description of Shinaar by Moses. For to come out of Armenia, and to arrive in that Vally of Babylonia, is not a iourning from the East, nor so neere vnto the East as the North: for Armenia is to the West of the North it selfe; and we must not say of Moses (whose hands the holy Ghost directed) that he erred so to calo, and that he knew not East from West. For the body of Armenia standeth in fortie three degrees Septentrionall, and the North part thereof in fortie five; and those Gordiean Mountaynes, whereon it was supposed that the Arke rested, stand in fortie one. But Babylonia, and the Vally of Shinaar are situated in thirtie five, and for the Longitude (which maketh the difference betwene East and West) the Gordiean Mountaynes stand in 75. degrees, and the Vally of Shinaar in 79. and 80. And therefore Armenia lyeth from Shinaar Northwest, ninetie five degrees from the East; and if Armenia had bene but North, yet it had differed from the East one whole quarter of the Compasse. But Gregorie and Hierome warne vs, in scripturis ne minima* minima differentia omitti debet: nam singuli sermones, syllabæ, apices, & puncta in diuina Scriptura plena sunt sensibus; in the Scriptures the least difference may not be omitted: for every speech, syllable, note, or accent, and point in diuine Scriptures are replenished with their meanings. And therefore seeing Moses teacheth vs that the children of Noah came from the East, we may not belecue Writers (of little authoritie) who also speake by heare-say and by report, ut fertur, & ut dicitur, as Berosus and Nicolaus Damascenus, determining herein without any examination of the Text, at all-adventure. But this is infallibly true, that Shinaar lyeth West from the place where the Arke of Noah rested after the flood; and therefore it first found ground in the East, from whence came the first knowledge of all things. The East parts were first ciuill, 10 which had Noah himselfe for an Instructor: and directly East from Shinaar in the same degree of 35. are the greatest grapes and the best Wine. The great Armies also, which ouertopped in number those Millions of Semiramis, proue that those parts were first planted: And whereas the other opinion hath neither Scripture nor Reason sufficient: for my selfe I build on his wordes who in plaine termes hath told vs, that the Sonnes of Noah came out of the East into Shinaar, and there they abode. And therefore did the Arke rest on those Easterne Mountaynes, called by one general name Taurus, and by Moses the Mountaynes of Ararat, and not on those Mountaynes of the Northwest, as Berosus first fained, whom most part of the Writers haue followed therein. It was, I say, in the plentiful warme East where Noah rested, 20 where he planted the Vine, where he tilled the ground and liued thereon. Placuit vero NOACHO agriculture studium, in qua tractanda ipse omnium peritissimus esse dicitur: ob eam rem sua ipsius lingua ISE-ADAMATH (hoc est) telluris uir appellatur celebratissq; est; The studie of Husbandrie pleased NOAH (saith the excellent learned man ARIAS MONTANVS) in the knowledge and order of which it is said, that NOAH excelled all men: and therefore was he called in his owne language a man exercised in the earth. Which also sheweth that he was no Wanderer: and that he troubled not himselfe with the contentions, beginning againe in the world, and among men, but stayed in his destined places, and in that part of the world, where he was first deliuered out of the prison of the Arke, 30 whereinto God had committed him, to preserve him and mankind.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the first planting of Nations after the flood; and of the Sonne of NOAH, SEM, HAM, and IAPHET, by whom the earth was repeopled.

§. I.

Whether SEM and HAM were elder then IAPHET.

Of these Sonnes of Noah, which was the eldest, there is a question made. S. Augustine esteemed Schem for the eldest, Ham for the second, and Iaphet for the youngest: and herein the opinions of Writers are diuers. But this we finde euerywhere in the Scriptures, and especially in Moses, that there was neuer any respect giuen to the eldest in yeeres, but in vertue, as by the examples of Enoch, Abraham, Jacob, and Dauid, is made manifest. In a few wordes, this is the ground of the controuersie; The Latine translation, and so the Geneua, hath conuerted this Scripture of Genesis the August. de Ciuil. Dei, l. 1. c. 3.

10. v. 21. in these wordes: Vnto SEM also the Father of all the Sonnes of HEBER, and elder brother of IAPHET, were children borne. But Iunius agreeing with the Septuagint, placeth the same wordes in this manner: To SEM also the Father of all the Sonnes of HEBER, and brother of IAPHET, the eldest sonne were children borne: So the transposition of the word (elder) made this difference. For if the word (elder) had followed after Iaphet, as it is in the vulgar translation placed before it, then had it bene as plaine for Iaphet, as it is by these translations for Schem. Now (the matter being otherwise indifferent) seeing Gods blessings are not tyed to first and last in blood, but to the eldest in pietie, yet the arguments are stronger for Iaphet then for Schem. And where the Scriptures are plainly vnderstood without any danger or inconvenience, it seemeth strange why any man of iudgement should make valuation of coniecturall arguments, or mens opinions. For it appeareth that Noah in the five hundredth yeere of his life, begat the first of his three Sonnes, Schem, Ham, and Iaphet: and in the sixe hundredth yeere (to wit) the hundredth yeere following, came the generall flood; two yeeres after which Schem begat Arphaxad, which was in the yeere 602. of Noahs life, and in the yeere of Schems life one hundred: so as Schem was but 100. yeeres old, two yeeres after the flood: and Noah begat his first borne being 500. yeeres old; and therefore, were Schem the elder, he had then bene a hundred yeeres old at the flood, and in the sixe hundredth yeere of Noahs life, and not two yeeres after. Which seeing the Scripture before remembred hath denied him, and that it is also written: Then NOAH awoke from his wine, and knew what his younger sonne had done vnto him (to wit) HAM; of necessitie the first place doth belong to Iaphet. This younger sonne so conuerted by the vulgar and Geneua, Iunius turnes it filius minimus; His youngest sonne; but S. Chrysostome takes it otherwise, and findes Cham to be the middle or second brother, and Iaphet the youngest sonne of all: which Cham for his disobedience and the contempt of his Father (whose nakednesse he derided) was disinherited, and lost the preeminencie of his birth, as Esa and Reuben did. Peterinus conceiveth that Ham was called the younger in respect of Schem the eldest, but auoweth

Gen. 11. 10.

Gen. 11. 2. 24.

In Gen.

auoweth withall, that the Hebrew hath not that precise difference of younger and youngest, because it wanteth the comparative degree. It is true that Shem himselfe was alwaies named in the first place yet whereas in the first Verse of the tenth Chapter of Genesis, Shem is accounted before Iaphet: in the second Verse Moses leaueth to begin with the issue by Shem, and reciteth the children of Iaphet first. So the first place was giuen to Shem for his election and benediction, and for this weightier respect, that the Hebrew Nation, Abraham, the Prophets, David, and Christ our Saviour were descended of him. And therefore, whether we shall follow the Vulgar Pagninus, and the Genua, who agree in this conuersion, Shem frater IAPHET maior; or with the Septuagint, Iunior, and Tremelius, Shem fratri IAPHET minoris; or with Pererius, Shem frater IAPHET ille magnus: inferring that Shem was the great and famous brother of Iaphet, let the Reader iudge. But for ought that I haue seene to the contrarie, it appeareth to me that Iaphet was the eldest. For where Pererius qualifieth the strength of the former Argument, That Shems age at the time of the flood did not agree with his eldership (with a supposition that the Scriptures tooke no account of smaller numbers) I doe not finde in the Scriptures any such neglect at all: for it is written, that Shem was an hundred yeeres old, and begat ARPHAXAD two yeeres after the flood, and againe in the 12. Verse: So SHELA lived after he begat EBAR, four hundred and three yeeres, &c. So as the number of two yeeres, of three yeeres, of five yeeres, and afterward of two yeeres were alwayes precisely accounted.

GEN. II. 7. 10.

§. II.

Of diuers things that in all reason are to be presumed, touching the first planting of the World, as that all Histories must yeeld to MOSES: that the world was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and that the knowne great Lords of the first ages were of the issue of HAM.

BUT let vs goe vnto the Worlds plantation after the flood, which being rightly vnderstood, we shall finde that many Nations haue supposed or fained themselues those Ancestors and Fathers, which neuer saw or approached the bounds of their Countries, and of whom they are by no way or branch descended. For it is plaine in the Scriptures how the sonnes and issues of Noah were distributed, and what Regions were first planted by them, from whence by degrees the rest of the world was also peopled. And if any prophane Author may receiue allowance herein, the same must be with this caution, That they take their beginning where the Scriptures end. For so farre as the storie of Nations is therein handled, we must know that both the truth and antiquitie of the bookes of God finde no companions equall, either in age or authoritie. All record, memorie, and testimonie of antiquitie whatsoever, which hath come to the knowledge of men, the same hath bene borrowed thence, and therefore later then it, as all careful observers of time haue noted: among which thus writteth Eusebius in the Proeme of his Chronologie: MOSES is found more ancient then all those whom the Grecians make most ancient, as HOMER, HESIOD, and the Trojan warre, and farre before HERCVLES, MYSEVS, LINVS, CHIRON, ORPHEVS, CASTOR, POLLVS, ESCVLAPIVS, BACCHVS, MERCVRIVS, and APOLLO, and the rest of the gods of the Nations, their Ceremonies, or holy Rites, or Prophets: and before all the deeds of IVPITER, whom the Greekes haue fabled in the top and highest Turret of their Diuinitie.

For of the three Iupiters remembered by Cicero, the ancientest was the sonne of Aether, whose three sonnes begotten on Proserpina, were borne at Athens, of which Cecrops was the first King: and in the end of Cecrops time did Moses bring the children of Israel out of Egypt: Eduxit MOSES populum Dei ex Aegypto nouissimo tempore porē CECROPS Atheniensis Regis; MOSES brought the children of Israel out of Egypt, in the last dayes of CECROPS King of the Athenians, saith S. Augustine: and yet was not Cecrops the Founder of the Citie it selfe, but Theseus long after him. But because the truth hereof is diuersly proued, and by many learned Authors, I will not cut afunder the purpose in hand, by alleaging many authorities in a needlesse question, but leaue it to the proper place.

De Ciuit. Dei, lib. 8. c. 11.

10 The Sonnes of IAPHET were,	{ Gomer, Magog, Madai, Iauan, Tubal, Mefhach, and Tiras.	{ The Sonnes of GOMER were,	{ Askenaz, Riphaty, Togorma.
		{ The Sonnes of IAVAN were,	{ Elisha, Tarshis, Kittim, and Dedanim.

First, we are to consider that the world after the flood was not planted by imagination, neither had the children of Noah wings, to flie from Shinuar to the vttermoſt border of Europe, Africa, and Asia in halie, but that these children were directed by a wise Father, who knew those parts of the world before the flood, to which he disposed his children after it, and sent them not as Discoverers, or at all-adventure, but assigned and allotted to euery Sonne and their issues, their proper parts. And not to hearken to fabulous Authors, who haue no other end then to flatter Princes (as Virgil did Augustus in the fiction of Aeneas) or else to glorifie their owne Nations; Let vs build herein vpon the Scriptures themselues, and after them vpon Reason and Nature. First, therefore we must call to minde and consider, what manner of face the earth euerywhere had in the 130. yeere after the great inundation, and by comparing those fruitfuleſt Vallies with our owne barren and cold ground, informe our felus thereby, what wonderfull Desarts, what impassable fastnesse of woods, reeds, bryars, and rotten graſſe, what Lakes and standing Pooles, and what Marishes, Fens and Bogs, all the face of the earth (excepting the Mountaynes) was peſtered withall. For if in this our Climate (where the dead and destroying winter deſſeth all vegetatiue and growing Nature, for one halfe of the yeere in effect) yet in twentie or thirtie yeeres these our grounds would all ouer-grow and be couered (according to the nature thereof) either with Woods or with other offeſſue Thickets and Bushments: much more did all sorts of Plants, Reedes, and Trees, prosper in the most fruitfull Vallies, and in the Climate of a long and warme Summer, and hauing withall the start of 130. yeeres, to raise themselves without controlement.

This being considered, it will appeare, that all these people which came into Shinuar, and ouer whom Nimrod either by order or strength tooke the Dominion, did after the confusion of Languages, and at such time as they grew to be a mightie People, disperse themselves into the Regions adioyning to the said Vally of Shinuar, which contayned the best part of Mesopotamia, Babylonia, and Chaldea; and from the borders thereof in time they were propagated: some of them towards the South, others towards the West and North. And although there were allotted to Shem many Regions, both East and West from Shinuar, with the Dominion of Palestina, which the Canaanites first posselt; yet could he not enioy the lot of his inheritance on the suddaine, but by time and degrees. For we finde, that Abraham the true successor of Shem dwelt in Chaldea at Ur; and from thence (called by God) he reſſed to Charran in Mesopotamia: from whence after the death of Thare he trauielled to Sichem in Palestina: and yet there had passed betweene Shem and Abraham (reckoning neither of themselves) seven descents, before Abraham moued out of Chaldea: where, and in Babylonia, all those people by Nimrod commanded, inhabited for many yeeres, and whence Nimrod went out into Aſſyria, and founded Nimine. Indeed deed the great Masters of Nations (as farre as we can know) were, in that Age of the illuses of Ham; the blessing of God giuen by Noah to Shem and Iaphet taking lesse effect, vntill diuers yeeres were consumed; and vntill the time arriued, which by the wisdome of God was appointed. For of Chus, Mizraim, and Canaan, came the People and Princes, which held the great Kingdomes of Babylonia, Syria, and Egypt, for many descents together.

§. III.

Of the Isles of the Gentiles in IAPHETHS portion: of BEROSVS his too speedie sailing GOMER the sonne of IAPHET in Italie; and another of IAPHETHS sonnes TYBAL in Spaine: and of the antiquitie of Longinque Navigation.

TO begin therefore (where Moses beginneth) with the sonnes of Iapheth, among whom the Isles of the Gentiles were diuided: which diuision, as well to Iapheth sonnes as to the rest which came into Shinar, was (if the diuision were made at Phuleg birth) in the yeere of the World 1757. or 1758. and (by that account) in the yeere after the flood one hundred and one, of which question elsewhere.

The habitations proper to the sonnes of Iapheth were the Isles of the Gentiles, which include all Europe with all the lands adioyning, and compassing it about: Europe being also taken for an Island, both in respect that the Sea Hellspont and Engewm, Bosphorus and Euxinus cut it off from the great Continent of Asia, as also because Europe it selfe is (in effect) surrounded with water, sauing that it is fastned to Asia by the North, for it hath those Seas before named to the East, the Mediterran to the South and Southweft, the Ocean to the West, and Brittish, German, and Baltick Sea, with that of Glaciade to the North North-east, and North-west. Besides, it hath about it all the Cyclades or Isles lying betweene Greece and the lesser Asia, and the Isles of Rhodes, Cyprus, Creet or Candia, Sicilia, Corfica, Sardinia, Malta, the Isles of Brittanie and Zealand, with their yong-ones adiacent.

This partition and portion of Iapheth, with the part which he held in Asia, and the North, which was also very great, answereth to that blessing of God by Noah, Dilatet Deus IAPHETH; Let God spreade abroad (or increase the posteritie of) Iapheth, and let him dwell in the Tents of Shem. For though Iunius here yseth the word (allicit) and not dilatet: and the Geneva persuaides; yet the Septuagint haue dilatet or amplificet; and such was the blessing giuen to our Fathers, which God promised to Abraham and his seede for euer. And the dwelling in the Tents or Tabernacles of Shem was a blessing by God to the posteritie of Iapheth: noting not onely an enlargement of Territories; but that thereby they should be made participant of Gods Church. But to come to Iapheth sonnes, of whom Gomer is the eldest. This Gomer (if we may beleeue Berosus and Amnius, whose authoritie the greatest number of all our late Writers haue followed) did in the tenth yeere of *Nimrod*s reigne depart from Babylonia, and planted Italie; which also Punctius confirmeth in these words: anno decimo NIMROD, &c. In the tenth yeere of *Nimrod*s reigne, GOMERVS GALVS planted a Colonie in that land afterward called Italie: and in the twelfth yeere of the same *Nimrod*s reigne TYBAL fasted himselfe in Asuria in Spaine (now called Biscay) which was in the 140. and in the 142. yeeres after the flood, according to Berosus. But this opinion is very ridiculous. For before the confusion of tongues the children of Noah did not separate themselves, at least so many of them as came with Nimrod into Shinar. Let vs therefore consider with reason, what time the building such a Citie and Towre required, where there was no prepared matter, nor any readie meanes to performe such a worke as Nimrod had erected (and as Punctius himselfe out of his Author Berosus witnesseth) ad altitudinem & magnitudinem montium; To the the height and magnitude of the Mountaines. Sure that both this Citie and Towre were almost builded the Scriptures witnesseth: But the Lord came downe to see the Citie and Towre, which the Sonnes of men builded. Let vs then but allot a time sufficient for the making of Bricke to such a Worke, of the greatest height (and therefore of circuit and foundation answerable) that euer was. For where the vniuersall Flood covered the highest Mountaines fiftene Cubits; Let vs build vs a Citie and a Towre (saith NIMROD) whose top may reach vnto the Heauen; meaning, that they would raise their Worke about fiftene Cubits higher then the highest Mountaine, otherwise they could not assure themselves from the feare of a second inundation: a great part whereof was finished before it fell, and before they left the Worke. They also began this building vpon a ground, the most oppressed with waters of all the World: as by the great ruine which these waters forceably ouer-bearing and ouer-flowing, made in the time of the succeeding Emperours, is made manifest, approved also by the Prophet Hieremie, speaking of Babylon in these wordes: Thou that dwellest vpon many waters. It cannot be doubted but that there needed a substantiall foundation, for so high a raised building on a marish ground: and to which, Glycas vpon Genesis giueth fortie yeeres. For it seemeth, that the Towre was neere finished when God ouerthrew it: it being afterward written, So the Lord scattered them from thence vpon all the earth, and they left to build the Citie. Out of which place it may be gathered (because the Towre is not then named) that they very neere had performed the Worke of their supposed defence, which was the Towre: and that afterward they went on with the Citie adioyning, wherein they inhabited. It is also to be noted, that till such time as this confusion seized them (whereupon the Towre was throwne downe) these Nations did not disperse themselves: for from thence the Lord scattered them vpon all the Earth, (that was) when they perceived not one anothers speech. Now to thinke that this Worke in the newnesse of the World (wanting all instruments and materials) could be performed in ten yeeres; and that Tubal and Gomer in the same yeere could creepe through 3000. miles of Defart, with Women, Children, and Cattell: let those light Beleuers, that neyther tye themselves to the Scripture, nor to reason, approoue it, for I doe not. And if the Arke of Noah was 100. yeeres in building, or but neere such a time; (and then) when the World had flood 1556. yeeres, it were more then foolishnesse and madnesse it selfe, to thinke that such a Worke as this could be performed in ten; when the World (from the Flood to the arrivall at Babel, and beginning of this building there) had but 131. yeeres, and whereof they had spent some part in traauiling from the East. Again, if all Asia set to their helping hands in the building of the Temple of Diana, and yet they consumed in that Worke 400. yeeres (or bee it but halfe that time) and in such an Age as when the World flourished in all sorts of Artificers, and with abundant plentie of materials and carriages: This Worke of the Towre of Babel could hardly (with all the former wants supposed) be erected in those few yeeres remembered. And for conclusion, let all men of iudgement waigh with themselves how impossible it was for a Nation or Family of men, with their Wiues and Children, and Cattell, to traualle 3000. miles through Woods, Bogs, and Defarts, without any Guide or Conductor; and we shall find it rather a Worke of 100. yeeres then of 100. daies. For in the West Indies of which the Spaniards haue the experience, in those places where they found neither path nor Guide, they haue not entred the Countrey ten miles in tenne yeeres. And if *Nimrod*s people spent many yeeres by the account before remembered in passing from the East-India or the higher part thereof, which standeth in 115. Degrees of Longitude, vntill they came into Shinar which lyeth in 79. Degrees (the difference betweene those places containing 36. Degrees, which make 720. Leagues, which is 2160. miles) and did all the way keepe the Mountaines and hard ground; then the difference betweene Babylon and Biscay is much more: for the bodie of Biscay lyeth in ten Degrees, and Babylon or Shinar, (as aforesaid) in 79. so the length of way from Shinar to Asiwa or Biscay is 69. Degrees, which make 1380. Leagues, or of miles 4140. And therefore if Nimrod took diuers yeeres to find Shinar, which was but 2160. miles : or (supposing that the Arke rested in Armenia) little above 400. miles : there is no cause to the contrary, but to allow as many yeeres to Gomer and Tubal to trauaile 3000. miles to Countries lesse knowne vnto them by farre; then the Land of Shinar was to Nimrod. For Paradise was knowne to Noah before the Flood: and so was the Region of Eden by Moses afterward remembered; but what hee vnderstood of most part of the World else it is vnknowne. And therefore did Annius ill aduise himselfe to plant Gomer in Italia, and Tubal in Spaine, in the tenth and twelfth of Nimrods Raigne: Shall the earth be brought forth in one day, or shall a Nation be borne at one? But it may be objected, That the Sonnes of Iapheth might come by Sea, and so faue this great trauaile through Desarts by Land. But we neuer read of any Navigation in those dayes, nor long after. Surely he that knoweth what it is to imbarke so great a people as we may iustly suppose those Conducters carried with them, will not easily beleue, that there were any Vessels in those dayes to transport Armies, and (withall) their Cattell, by whose Milke they liued and fed their Children: for Milke and Fruit were the banquetting dishes of our Forefathers. And in the eldest times, euen the Kings and Fathers of Nations valued themselves by the Heards and numbers of their Cattell: who had flocks of Sheep, and great Droues and Herds of their owne, and their owne Sheep-herds and Herdsmen. Now if Tubal had past by Sea from any part of Palestina, Syria, or Cilicia, he might haue made good choice within the Streights, and not haue ouergone Granado, Valencia, and other Provinces in that Tract: past the Streights of Gibraltar, disdained all Andalusia and Portugal, with all those goodly Ports and Countries; and haue fought out the yron, woody, and barren Countrey of the World (called Bisay) by a long and dangerous Navigation. But before the iourney of the Argonautæ there were scarce any Vessels that durst crosse the Seas in that part of the World: and yet that which Iason had (if the Tale be true) was but a Galley, and a poore one (God knowes) and perchance such as they vse this day in Ireland: which although it carried but foure and fiftie Passengers, yet was it farre greater then any of the former times: Erat enim antequam nauicularum usus: For in former times they used very small Vessels. I denie not but that the Tyrians gaue themselves of olde to farre-off Navigations, whence Tibullus ascribed the inuention of Ships vnto them:

Prima ratem ventis credere docta Tyros,

Tyros knew first how Ships might vse the wind.

And for those boates called long auaues or Gallies, Plinie saith that Aegæus ascribed them the deuice to Paralus: and Philosophebanus to Iason; Ctesius to Samyras; and Saphanus to Semiramis: Archimachus to Aegæon: to which inuention the Erythraei are said to haue added certaine numbers of Oares: and then Aminocles the Corinthian to haue increased them: the Carthaginians afterwards to haue brought them to foure Banks: the Quing, Remi first to haue bene vsed by Nesichthom the Saleminian, with which Vessels in those parts of the World, the Romans serued themselves in the Punicke War. But these be perhaps but the partialities of Writers, or their ignorance. For there are that as constantly cast the deuiling of these Gallies on Sesoliriu, though Semiramis vsed them in the passage of her Armie ouer Indus in Abrams time. So it is said, that Danaus was the first that brought a Ship into Greece: and yet the Samotheans challenge the inuention; and yet Tertullian (on the contrary) giues it to Mincras: others to Neptune, Thucydides to the Corinthians. And so ignorant were the people of those Ages, as the Egyptians vsed to coast the Shores of the Red Sea vpon rasses, deuiled by King Erythrus: and in the time of the Romans, the Brittans had a kind of Boat (with which they crosst the Seas) made of small twigs, and couered over with Leather:

Leather: of which kind I haue seene at the Dingle in Ireland, and elsewhere. Nauis ex corio circumfusa in Oceano Britannica (saith Tertius): of which Lucan the Poet:

*Primum cava salix, vnde fuso vimine, parum
Texitur in puppim, casq; induta iuuenco, Vectores patiens tumidam supercubat anem.
Sic Penetus stagnante Pado, fulgida Britannus Nauigat Oceano.*

The moynted Ofler of the hoarie Willow
Is wouen first into a little Boat:
Then cloth'd in Bullockes Hide, vpon the billow
Of a proud Riuer, lightly doth it float
Vnder the Waterman:
So on the Lakes of overf swelling Poe
Sailles the Penetian: and the Brittaine so On th' out-spreed Ocean.

And although it cannot bee denied, when Noah by Gods inspiration was instructed in so many particulars concerning the Arke, that then many things concerning Navigation were first reuealed; yet it appears that there was much difference betwene the Arke of Noah, and such Ships as were for any long Navigation. Yea ancient Stories shew, that it was long after these times, ere any durst presume vpon any long Voyages to Sea: at least with multitudes of Women, and Children, and Cattell: as also common reason can tell vs, that euen now when this Arte is come to her perfection, such Voyages are very troublesome and dangerous. So as it doth appeare, that there was not in that Age of Nimrod any Ship, or vse of Ships fit for any long Navigation. For if Gomer and Tubal had passed themselves and their people by Sea; the exerceise of Navigation would not haue bene dead for so many hundred yeeres after. Leauing therefore the fabulous to their Fables, and all men else to their fancies, who haue cast Nations into Countries farre off, I know not how, I will follow herein the Relation of Moses and the Prophets: to which Truth there is ioynd both Nature, Reason, Police, and necessitie: and to the rest, neither probability, nor possibillitie.

§. IIII.

Of Gog and Magog, Tubal, and Mesech, seated first about Asiathelasse, out of Ezechiel

CAP. 38. 39.

Ow although many learned and reuerend men haue formed (I know not whereby led) a Plantation of the World, which also hath bene and is receiued: yet I hope I may be excused, if I differ altogether from them in many particulars. Certainly, that great learned man of this latter Age, Arius Montanus was also in some things much mistaken: and for Iosephus, as he hath many good things, and is a Guide to many errors withall, so was he in this Plantation of the World very grosse and fabulous, whereby both Ezechius, Micropolymitanus, Epiphanius; and others; that haue taken his testimonies for current, haue bene by him farre misled. But the better to conceiue what Regions of the World Gomer the first sonne of Iaphet posselt, as also Tubal, it is needfull to beginne with Magog: becaue the Scriptures take most knowledge of Gog and Magog, which two names haue troubled many Commentators, saith Matth. Beroldus, who hath laboured herein with great diligence, and whom (of all that euer I read) I find most iudicious in the examination of this plantation. He takes authority from the Prophet Ezechiel chiefly, who in the 38. and 39. Chapter directeth vs, what Nations the Gomerians, Tubalines, and Togornians were, together with the Magogians: of which Gog was Prince or chiefe Conductor in their attempts against Israel. For besides the portions of Europe, and the North-east parts of the greater Asia, which Iapheth issues posselt, all Asia the lesse was peopled by them. And that those of the issue of Iapheth (whom Ezechiel speaks of) were seated hereabout, it may best appeare, if wee consider the circumstances of the place, and the dependencie vpon the former prophetic in the 37. Chapter. For in that 37. Chapter, Ezechiel prophesieth of the vniing of the two Kingdomes of Israel and Iuda, after their deliuerie from 15 captivity.

By which prophetic of Ezechiel, it appeareth, that God purposed to gather together his people, to giue life to dead bones, and to rule them by one Prince. For to that purpose it is written; And DAVID my seruant shall bee King ouer them, and they shall haue one sheepeheard, (that is) they shall bee vniited as they were in *Dauid*s time. Hereupon in the 38. Chapter Ezechiel prophesieth against those Nations, which should seeke to impeach this Vnion, and disturb the people of Israel, whom God purposed to reueile to grace, and promised to restore. And so in the same Chapter are those Nations coupled together, which infested the Israelites after their returne, and fought to subiect them: all which were the subiects or Allies of Gog, 20 Prince of the Magogians, or Calefyrians, next bordering Palestina, or the holy Land, followed also by the rest of the Nations of Asia the lesse, which lay North from Iudea. The words of Ezechiel are these: Some of manifest thy face against Gog, and against the land of MAOGOG, the chiefe Princes of MESSECH (or MOSCH) and TUBAL: and in the sixth Verse; GOMER and all his bands, and the house of TOGORNA of the North quarters. Herein Ezechiel hauing first deliuered the purpose of his Prophecie, teacheth what Nations they were, that should in vaine assaile Israel. He ioyneth them together vnder their Prince Gog, and sheweth that their habitations were on the North quarters of Iuda, and how seated and ioyned together. Gog signifieth 30 in the Hebrew (sayth Saint Hierome) teſtum or couering of a house: and Pintus vpon *Ezechiel*s firmeth, that by Gog is meant Antichrist: for (sayth hee) Antichristus erit Diabolus tegumentum sub specie humana: That Antichrist shall be the couering of the Deuill vnder humane forme. Hee addeth that Magog is as much to say as Gog: the letter (M) being an Hebrew Preposition, and importeth as much as of or from: so he taketh Magog for those people which follow Antichrist. So farre Pintus is at least in this not amisse, that he expoundeth Magog not for any one person, but for a Nation, with which agreeth this obseruation of Beroaldus. Magog (sayth he) in Hebrew is written Hann-Magog, which sheweth Magog to be a Region or Nation: for the letter (He) which is vied but for an Emphasis (which the Hebrewes call Heliaiedia) is neuer added 40 to proper names of men, but often to place. So as Gog was Prince of that Nation (called cyther Magog, or according to others, the people of Gog) also Prince of Mesech, (or Mosoch) and of Tubal: as by the first Verse of the 39. Chapter is made manifest: Behold, I come against thee Gog the chiefe Prince of MESSECH and TUBAL. This must needs bee meant by the Successours of Selencus Nicator, who did not (as other conquering Nations) seeke to make the Jews their Tributaries onely, but endeouored by all meanes, and by all kind of violence to extinguiſh the Religion it selfe (which the Hebrews profest) and the acknowledging of one true God: and to force them to worship and serue the mortall and rotten gods of the Heathen; of which nothing remained but the very name, and dead Images. S. Ambrose and Istodore take Gog for the Nation of the Goths: belike because they invaded Europe, and sacked Rome, and many other places and Cities thereabout. Hermolani Barheri our of Pomp. Mela deriues the Turkes from the Scythians, esteemed Magogians of Gog. Many take Gog for the proper name of a Man: other of a Region: others for a Nation inhabi-inhabiting a Region, as Iunius, who saies that Gog is the name of a Nation, denominated from him whom the Greeke Stories call Gyges: who in former time hauing slaine Candaules the Lydian, gaue his owne name to that Nation, thence after called Gygades: and thereof also the Gygean Lake; which Lake Strabo also findeth in Lydia, (of which Gyges was King) fortie Furlongs from Sardis. Plinie calleth it Gygenum 15 stadium. Herodotus and Nicander set it about the Riuer of Phlius, and Alexander; but the difference is not great. Marius Niger maketh mention of this Gyges King of Lydia: who after he had subdued the Countie about the Riuer Rhadus which runneth into the Helleſpont, called the Promontorie Trapſe after his owne name Gyges. These opinions doe also seeme to strengthen that of Iunius. For Magog, sayth hee, is that part of Asia the lesse, which Halyattes obtained, and after him his sonne Craſus; who (as Iunius further notes) hauing mastered all those Regions as farre South as 20 Libanus in that border built the Citie Gigarta or Gozkarta (which in the Syrian lignifieth the Citie of Gog) seated in Caleſyria, whose people were the ancient Enemies of the Jews.

Now that Magog is found in Caleſyria, Plinie affirmeth, saying; Caleſyria habet Bamyceam, quae alio nomine Hierapolis vocatur, S. is verò Magog. Caleſyria habet in it Bamyce, quibus by another name is called Hierapolis, but of the Syrians Magog. Hee further telleth vs that the monstrous Idoll Atergata, called by the Greekes Deretia, was here worshipped, Lucian makes mention hereof, saying that the Citie had anciently another name, which yett hee expreſſeth not; forbearing perhaps the word Magog, as sounding nothing elegantly in the Greeke. But if wee may beleuee Strabo, then was Edeſſa in Meſopotamia the same Bamyce or Hierapolis, where the same Idoll was worshipped. Ouelius is doubtfull whether one of these Authours did not miſtake the place of this Bamyce or Hierapolis. It may well enough bee that the same name and Religion was common to them both. Certaine it is, that both of them lay due North from Paleſtina, and were both subiect vnto the Kings of the Race of Selencus. Now I doe not condemne the opinion of Hermolani Barbarus following Iosephus, but grant that perhaps Magog might also bee the Father of the 30 Scythians; notwithstanding that in this place, where Gog is made the Prince of Magog, the Nations of Caleſyria and the North parts adioyning bee meant by Magog: for by a latter Plantation from these parts they might bee propagated into Scythia. Yet it is not to bee denied, that the Scythians in olde times coming out of the North-east waited the better part of Asia the lesse, and posselt Caleſyria, where they built both Scythopolis and Hierapolis, which the Syrians call Magog. And that to this Magog Ezechiel had reference, it is very plaine: for this Citie Hierapolis or Magog standeth due North from Iudea, according to the wordes of Ezechiel, that from the North quarters those Nations should come. For as the Kings of the South which infested the Israelites were the Ptolomes Kings of Aegypt: so those of the North were the Kings of Asia and Syria, the Successours of Selencus, the Successour of Alexander Macedon. Gulielmus Tyrim thinkes that this Hierapolis is that Rager, mentioned in the 15 Storie of Tobias. Plinie takes it not onely to haue beene called Bamyce, as we haue said, but also Edeſſa: not that by Euphrates; but another of the same name; now the knowne name is Alapo: for so Bellonius expounds this Hierapolis, or Magog. This Citie had the title of Sacred, as the Sacred Citie, (for so the word Hierapolis signifieth) yett was it a place of most detested Idolatry, and wherein was worshipped the Idoll of the Mermaide Atergata, or Atergita, according to Plinie, which the Greekes call Deretia.

If then wee conferre the wordes of Ezechiel in the third verse of the thirtie eight Chapter, wherein hee ioyneth together Gog, Mesech, and Tubal: and withall remember that Hierapolis was the Citie of Magog, which also is seated directly North from Iudea: with whom also Ezechiel coupleth Gomer, and all his bands of the North quarters; we may (as I conceiue) safely conclude, that these Followers and Vassals of Gog (which were Northern Nations in respect of Iudea) were not the Gomeri- ans of France, nor the Tubalines of Spaine, but a people of the lesser Asia, and Calesyria: and therefore that the opinions of Berosus, Iosephus, and whosoever else hath followed them therein are to bee rectified. But if Iosephus referre himselfe to later times, and thinke that some Colonie of the Tubalines might from Iberia and Asia passe into Spaine (to wit, from that piece of Land betwene Colchus (or Mengrelia) and Albania: (most part posselt by the Georgians) then is his iudgement of better allowance. For without any repugnance of opinions, it may bee granted, that in proceesse of time these people might from their first habitation passe into the Countries neere the Euxine Sea, and from thence in after Ages into Spaine.

Iosephus makes mention of the Iberi, saying, that they were anciently called Thubelos, as of Tubal, from whence (saith Iustine) they passed into Spaine to search out the Mines of that Region: having belike vnderstood that it was a Southerly Countrey and Mountainous. For it seemeth that the Tubalines called Chalybes liued altogether by the exchange of Iron, and other Metals, as Apollonius witnesseth in these following Verses, telling how the Argonautes did visit them;

*Hac gens tellurem rigido non vertit aratro,
Sed ferri venas scindit sub montibus altis:
Mercurius hac mutat, quæ vitæ alimenta ministrant:*

The Chalybes plough not their barren Soyle
But vndermine high Hills for Iron Veines:
Changing the purchase of their endlesse toyle
For marchandize, which their poore liues sustaines.

But it is more probable, that Spaine was first peopled by the Africans, who had euer since an affection to returne thither, and to reapeople it anew. This appeared by the Carthaginians of old, who were easily drawne to passe ouer the Streights into that Countrey; and after by the Moors who held Granado, and the South parts eight hundred yeeres, till the time of Ferdinand and Isabel. And either of these opinions are 30 more probable, then that in the twelfth yeere of Ninnods raigne, Tubal, past into Spaine, and therein built St. Pual: a poore Towne, and a poore denice, God knowes. Certaine it is that we must finde Mosch or Mesch, and Tubal neighbours, and Gomer and Togorma not farre off, or else we shall wrong Ezechiel: for he called Gog the Leader or Prince of Mesch and Tubal, and maketh Gomer and Togorma their assistants. And that Mesch inhabited Asia, Euanthius (though he followed Berosus) confesseth, for these be his words: MESACVS, qui à MOSE MESECH, prius: Meschus ab Adula monte vsq; ad Ponticum regionem posuit: hac regio posset Cappadocia dicta est, in qua urbs Masica, Græcæ est terra MACOG principalis. MESACVS, whom MOSES calleth MESECH, placed the ancient Meschians from the mount Adulas, vnto the coast of Pontus. 40 This Region was afterward called Cappadocia, in which is the Towne Masica, Græc. this is the principall Countrey of MACOG. And this doth Annins also auow, and yet forgets that Gog was Prince both of Mesch and Tubal: and therefore, that the one was a Nation of Spaniards, the other of Cappadocians, is very ridiculous; Spaine lying directly West, and not North from Iudea. Also Ezechiel in the 27. Chapter, where he prophesieth of the destruction of Tyre, nameth Mesch and Tubal ioynly. And for a small proofe, that these Nations were of a Northerne neighbour land (how farre soeuer stretched) Ezechiel in the 38. Chapter makes them all horsemen. Thou, and much people with thee, all shall ride vpon horses, euen a great multitude and a mighty. Then if any man beleuee that these troups came out of Spaine ouer the Pyrenies, and first passed ouer a part of France, Italie, Hungarie, and Sarmatia, and imbarqued againe about the Hellespont, or else compassed all Pontus Euxinus, to come into the lesser Asia, which is halfe the length or compass of the then knowne world, he may be called a strong beleuer, but he shall neuer be iustified thereby. But on the contrarie it is is knowne, that Seleucus was a Prouince neighbouring Palestina or Iudea; and that Hierapolis (or Magog) ioyned vnto it: whose Princes commanded all Syria, and Asia the lesse, (namely the Seleucide) and held it, till Sapia Asiatius ouerthrew Antiochus the Great: after which they yet posselt Syria till the time of Tigranes: and whether Mesch be in Cappadocia, or vnder Iberia, yet is it of the Tubalines, and one and the same Dominion.

Of Gomer the like may be said. First he seated himselfe with Togorma, not farre from Magog and Tubal, in the borders of Syria and Cilicia. Afterward he proceeded further into Asia the lesse; and in long tract of time his valiant issue filled all Germany, 10 rested long in France and Brittain, and possessed the vtmost borders of the earth, accomplishing (as Melancton well notes) the signification of their parents name, which is Vimosi bordering. But when these borderers wanted further place, wherinto they might exonerate their swelling multitudes, that were bounded in by the great Ocean, then did they returne vpon the Nations occupying the Countries, through which they had formerly passed, oppressing first their Neighbours, afterwards the people more remote. Hereupon it was (as the worthy restorer of our antiquities, M. William Camden hath noted) that they were called Cimbr, which in their old language 20 doth signifie Robbers; necessitie enforcing them to spoile their Neighbours, to whom in their original they were as neere ioyned, as afterwards in the leates which they possessed. For that the warlike Nations of Germanie were in elder ages accustomed to be beaten by the Gauls, the authoritie of Cæsar affirming it is prooue sufficient. But in times following they pursued richer conquests, and more easie though further distant, by which (to omit their other enterprises not here to be spoken of) they were drawne at length into Asia the lesse, and occupied those parts, which had formerly beene held by their Progenitors. I say not that they claimed those Lands as theirs by descent; for likely it is, that they knew little of their owne pedigree. Neither can any man therefore denie, that they were of old seated in Asia, because in late ages they returned thither; vnlesse he will thinke, that all those Nations which from 30 farre parts haue inuaded and conquered the land of Sinaar, may by that argument beproued not to haue issued from thence at the first.

Now concerning Samothres for his excellent wisdom furnished Dīs, whom Annins makes the brother of Gomer and Tubal (which brother Mosch neuer heard of, who spake his knowledge of Isaphet sonnes) they must finde him in some old Poet: for Functius, a great Berosian, confesseth: Quia hic SAMOTHESES fuerit incertum est; Who 40 this SAMOTHESES was it is uncertayne, neither is there any proofe that he was that lame Dīs, whom Cæsar saith the Gauls supposed to be their Ancestor; yea, and Vignier confesseth with Functius: Mais on ne sçait qui il estoit; No man knowes who he was.

Against the fabulous Berosus his fiction, That the Italian IANVS was NOAH.

Before I goe on with Nosh his sonnes, I thinke it necessarie to disprove the fiction which Annins hath of Noah himselfe: an invention (indeede) very ridiculous, though warranted (as he hath wretted) by those Authors of whom himselfe hath Commented: 50 as the Fragment of Berosus, Fabius, Rictor, Cato, Lælius and others. Ann. de Herod. Pichle aor. faculo. Cato de origin. Latin. Berosus de Chalde. For Annins seekes to perliwade vs, that Noah (furnamed Ianus) was the same which founded Genoa, with other Cities in Italie, wherein he liued 92. yeeres. This to disprove, by Mosch silence, is a sufficient argument to me, if there were nothing else to disprove it. For if he vouchsafed to remember the building of Babel, Eret, Achad, Chalde

Ann. de Herod.
Pichle aor. faculo.
Cato de origin.
Latin. Berosus de Chalde.

Chalde and Niniue by Nimrod, Noah was a man of too great make to be forgotten, with all the acts he did in 92. yeeres. But it were a needlesse labour for me to disprove the authoritie of that Berosus, on whom Annianus groundeth, seeing to many learned Men haue so demonstratiuely proued that Fragment to be counterfeite. Besides that, Tatianus the Affirian in his Oration against the Greekes auoweth, that the ancient and true Berosus wrote onely three Books, dedicated to Antiochus the successor of Seleucus Nicanor: but Annianus hath deuised fūe Bookes, wherewith he honoreth Berosus. And whereas Berosus handled onely the estate of the Chaldeans and Affirians, Annianus hath filled this Fragment with the businesse of all the world: And if we may beleue Eusebius better then Annianus, then all the Kings of the Latin times (before Enneas) consumed but 150. yeeres: whereas no man hath doubted, but that from Noah to Enneas arrivall into Italie there past 1126. (after the least rate of the Hebrew account) and (after Codoman) 1291. For Ianus (who was the first of their Kings) liued at once with Ruth, who married Booz, in the Worlds yeere (as some reckon) 2717. after the flood 1064. and Noah dyed 350. yeeres after the flood: and so there past betweene Ianus of Italie and Noah turnamed Ianus 704. yeeres. For Saturnus succeeded Ianus, Picus after Saturnus, Faunus after Picus, and Latinius followed Faunus: which Latinius liued at once with Tautanes the 27. King of Affria; with Pelasgus of Peloponnesus; with Demophoon of Athens; and Sampson Iudge of Israel. Now all these fūe Kings of the Latines haue consumed but one 200. hundred and fūty yeeres; and the last of them in the time of Sampson: then reckoning vpwards for one hundred and fūty yeeres, and it reacheth Ruth, with whom Ianus liued.

True it is, that the Greekes had their Ianus; but this was not Noah: so had they the sonne of Xuthus, the sonne of Deucalion, from whom they draw the Iones, who were indeede the children of Iaman, the fourth sonne of Iapheth. For the vulgar translation (where the Hebrew word is Iaman) writes Greece, and the Septuagint, Helias; which is the same. So had they Medus the sonne of Medea, whom they make the parent of the Medes, though they were defended of a farre more ancient Father (to wit) Madai the third sonne of Iapheth.

Lastly, we see by a true experience, that the Brittish language hath remayned among vs about 2000. yeeres, and the English speech euer since the inuasion of the Angles, and the same continuance haue all Nations obserued among themselves, though with some corruption and alteration. Therefore, it is strange if either Noah (by them called Ianus) had left in Italie his grand-child Gomer after him, or Tubal in Spain, that no plaine resemblance of the Hebrew, Syrian, or Seythian (which no time could haue quite extinguished) should haue bene found in the languages of those Countries. For which reasons we doubt not but these personall plantations of Ianus, Gomer, Tubal, &c. in Italie, Spain, or France, are merely fabulous. Let the Italians therefore content themselves with the Grecian Ianus, which commanded them and planted them, and who preceded the fall of Trey but 150. yeeres (saith Eusebius) which was in the time of Latinius the fūth King: which also S. Augustine and Iustine confirme: and this agreeth with reason, time, and possibilitie. And if this be not sufficient to disprove this vanitie, I may out of themselves adde thus much: That whereas some of them make Vesta (others Carnusena) the wife of this Ianus, who instituted the holy Fire of the Vestal Virginitie in Rome (the Latines and Romans taking from Ianus all their Idolatrous and Heathenish ceremonies) there is no man so impious, as to beleue that Noah himselfe (who is said by Moses to haue walked with God, so be a iust man, and whom God of all mankind made choice of) could be either ignorant of the time and only God, or so wicked and vngratefull, to set vp or deuise any Heathen saluage, or idolatrous adoration, or haue instituted any ceremony, contrarie to that which he knew best pleasing to God himselfe.

§. VI.

§. VI.

That GOMER also and his sonne TOGORMA of the posteritie of IAPHETH were first seated about Asia the lesse: and that from thence they spread Westward into Europe: and Northward into Sarmatia.

10 TO turne now to the sonnes of Noah, and the worlds plantation after the flood: therein I obserue, that as both reason and necellitie taught them; so, when they multiplied in great numbers, and dispersed themselves into the next Countries bordering to their first habitations, & from thence sent forth Colonies elsewhere, it was in such a manner as that they might repaire to each other, and keep intelligence by Riuer: because the Land was yet Desert and ouer-prest with Woods, Reedes, Bogs, and rotten Marishes. As when Nimrod seated in Babylonia, Chus took the South part of Chaldea, downe the Riuer of Gehon, by which he might passe to and fro from Babylon to his owne plantation: those also, which were of the race of Shem, inhabiting at Vr or Orcha neere the Lakes of Chaldea, might by the same Riuer get vp to Babylon, and receiue succour from thence. All which Tract of Land vpon Gehon Southward, 20 Moses in the description of Paradise calleth the Land of Chus; because the Dominion and Empire was then in the hands of Nimrod a Cushite, by whom the children of Shem (which came into that Valley and stayed not in the East) were for awhile oppressed, till God afterward by the seede of Abraham made them his owne Nation and victorious. Hauilah, the brother of Nimrod, and sonne of Cush, tooke both banks of Tigris, especially on the East side of the Riuer: by which Riuer his people might also passe to and fro to Babel.

The Imperiall seat of which Region of Hauilah or Susan, was anciently called Chusian or Chusan, afterward Susa. Cush himselfe tooke the banks of Gehon, and planted those Countries Westward, and Southwest-ward towards Arabia the Stony, 30 and the Desert, where Ptolemy placeth the Citie of Chusida, first Chusta.

Seba, and Sheba with the rest that planted Arabia felix, had Tigris to conuey them into the Persian Gulfe, which waltheth the banks of Arabia felix on the East side: so as those sonnes of Cush might take Land downe the Riuer as they pleased. Also the Citie of Niniue was by Nimrod founded on the said Riuer of Tigris; and from thence a Colony past to Charran, standing also vpon a nauigable branch of Euphrates. In like manner did Tapheths sonnes settle themselves together, and tooke their seats in Asia the lesse: from whence they might indifferently stretch themselves Northward, and Westward, into the next parts of Europe, called the Isles of the Gentiles. And it seemeth very agreeable to reason, that both Gomer, Migo, and Tubal, late 40 downe first of all in that part of Syria, to the North of Palestina and Phenicia: and from thence Gomer or his children past on into Asia the lesse, as those of Migo and Tubal did; from whence the Tubalines spread themselves into Iberia; and the Mago 50 zians more Northerly into Sarmatia. The first Gomerians, and first planters in Asia the lesse, held the Countrie of the Cymmerians (witnesseth Herodotus) the same Region which was afterward by the Gallo-greekes called Galatia, to whom S. Paul wrote his Epistle so intituled. This Nation of the Cymmerians (whom the inuincible Seythians afterwards dispersed, and forced from their first plantations) gaue names to diuers places; as to the Mountaynes about Albania (called Cymmerini) and to the Citie of Cymmeris in Phrygia: also Bosphorus Cymmerius tooke appellation from this Nation, in the out-let whereof was also a Citie of that name, called Cymmerian: which Plinie (mistaking the place) had sometime the name of Cerberion; but Cerberion was a Towne in Campania, so called of the vnhealthfull waters, sauouring of brimstone, which Augustus caused to be cleansed by letting in the water of the Lake Lucinus.

The

The children of Tubal ranged as farre as Iberia, to whom the Moschici were neighbours, which others write Meshech. The Prophet Ezechiel (coupling them together) calleth Gog the Prince of Meshech and Tubal. For these Meschi (which Ptolemy calleth Meschi) inhabite Syracena a Province of Armenia, directly South from the Mountaynes Moschici, in the Valley betwene the Mountaynes Moschici, and the Mountaynes Parysades: out of whose North part springeth the River Phasis; from the East part Arax; and from the West Euphrates: and of this Meshech are descended also the Mesemians (saith Adelanchon) and it may be, that in processe of time some of them inhabited those Regions also. For Meshech (saith Adelanchon) signifieth extending, enlarging or stretching forth. Togormas also at first did inhabit amongst his parents and kindred. The Togormians were also called Giblet, a people neighbouring the Sydonians in Gabala, a Teirarchie of Phoenicia, the same which Plinie calleth Gaben: from whence Salomon had his most excellent Malons, which hewed stones for the Temple of Hierusalem. Thence the Togormians stretched into the lesse Armenia, whose Kings were hence called Tigranes, and their Cities Tigranokarta: of which Cities Tigranes subdued by Lucullus the Roman, built one. Hiero Polymita hath planted the Togormians in Barbarie: forgetting the prophetic of Ezechiel against the Tyrians. They of the house of Togormas, brought to thy Egypt horses, and horse-men, and mules, which could not well be driven over the whole length of the Mediterranean Sea, but from the neighbour Countries by land. But Iosephus takes them for the parents of the Phrygians; which I doe not deny, but they might be in the ensuing ages: and so might the Tubalines be of the Spaniards; but it was from Iberia, and many hundred yeeres after the twelfth of Nimrods reigne. The Leues conceive that the Turkes came of those Togormians, because their Emperor is called Togar. The Chaldeans make them the Fathers of the Germanes. But Laeticius affirms, that the Turkes descended of the Crim Tartar, which borders Moscouia. But for these subterfuges it were infinite to examine them. Only of the first and second plantation, and of the first Nations after the flood is the matter which I labour to discover; and therein to open the ignorance of some, and the corruption of other fabulous Writers. And this we must note, that those grand-children of Noah which were of a more quiet, or (perchance) of lesse understanding, and had not therefore the leading of Colonies sent out, their proper habitations can be hardly knowne: onely reason hath taught vs, that they dwelt among the rest, and were covered with the same of others, who tooke on them the Conduction and Dominion over the rest.

From Madai the third sonne of Iapheth, were the Medes. The Grecians bring them (as before) from Medus the sonne of Medea.

§. VII.

Of Iavan the fourth sonne of Iapheth: and of Mesch, of Aram, and Meshech of Iapheth.

In Iavan the fourth sonne of Iapheth came the Iones, which were afterwards called the Greekes: and so the Latine and Greeke Interpreters for Iavan write Greece, as in Esay: El mittam ex ijs qui saluati fuerint ad gentes, in mare, in Italiam, & Graciam; And I will send those that escape of them to Nations in the Sea, in Italie and in Greece. The Geneua here vseth the word (Tarsich) for Tarsus, a Citie in Cilicia, though Tarsus in many places be taken for the Sea. The Tigurine and the Geneua vse the names Tubal and Iavan, and not Italie and Greece: keeping the same Hebrew wordes. Of these Iones were the Athenians, though themselves dreame that they were Aborigines, or men without Ancesters, (as it were) out of the soile it selfe: who about without Ancesters, and growing (as it were) out of the soile it selfe: who about in people sent Colonies into Asia the lesse, of whom came the Iones of those parts.

parts. Others deriue the Athenians from Ion the sonne of Xuthus, the sonne of Deucalion; but the antiquitie of Ionan marres the fashon of that supposition, who so many yeeres preceded Xuthus, Ion, or Deucalion. Pausanias tells vs that Xuthus stole out of Theffale with all his Fathers treasure, and his Brothers portions, and arriving at Athen, he was graciously receiued by Erichon, who gaue him his Daughter in marriage; of whom he receiued two sonnes, Ion, and Acheus, the supposed Ancesters of the Athenians. For Attica was called Ionia (saith Plutarch in the life of Themistocles) who, when he had ioyned Megara to Attica, erected a pillar in that Isthmos or Strait, which fastneth Peloponnesus to the other part of Greece: writing on that part which looketh towards the East, these wordes: Hec non sunt Peloponnesus, aut Ionia; These Countries are not of Peloponnesus, but of Ionia: and on the other side which looked towards the South and into Peloponnesus, this: These parts are Peloponnesus, and not Ionia.

Strabo out of Hecataeus affirmeth, that the Iones came out of Asia into Greece, which is contrarie to the former opinion: That the Iones of Greece transporting certayne companies into Asia the lesse, the name of Iones was thereby therein retained. And though Strabo knew no more thereof then he learned of the Greekes themselves, yet I finde this coniecture of Hecataeus reasonable enough. For though it were to him unknowne, yet sure I am that Asia the lesse had people before Greece had any: and that Ionan did not flie from Babylonia into Greece, but tooke Asia the lesse in his passage; and from thence past over the neere way, leauing his owne name to some Maritime Province on that side, as he did to that part of Greece so called. But yet Strabo himselfe beleueed, that Ionia tooke the name from Ion the sonne of Xuthus: for so much he had learned from themselves; which was also the opinion of Pausanias. True it is, that the Greekes in after-times cast themselves into that part of Asia the lesse, opposite vnto them, which they held for diuers yeeres. And howeouer the Greekes vaunt themselves to be the Fathers of Nations, and the most ancient; yet all approved Historians (not their owne) deride and disprove their pride, and vanitie therein. For this dispute of Antiquitie (among prophane Writers) rested betwene the Seythians and the Egyptians, as Iulius out of Trogus, in the warre betwene Pexoris of Egypt, and Tanaus of Seythia, witnesseth: which preceded far the reigne of Ninus, and was long before the name of Greece was euer heard of. And it is also manifest, that in Cecrops time the Greekes were all saluages without law or religion, liuing like brute beasts in all respects: and Cecrops (saith S. Augustine) liued together with Moses.

The sixth sonne of Iapheth was Meshech, whom the Septuagint call Mosch: (a part of those Nations commanded by Gog the chiefe Prince of Meshech and Tubal.) But this we must remember, that betwene Meshech the sonne of Aram, and Meshech (or Mosch) the sonne of Iapheth, there is little difference in name, and both by diuers Interpreters diuersly written. Montanus with the Vulgar writeth Meshech, the sonne of Aram, Mes; the Geneua, Mash; Iunius, Mesch. But it may be gathered out of the 120. Psalm, that either Meshech the sonne of Iapheth, was the parent of those people, or gaue name to that Province wherein Dauid hid himselfe: or else (which may rather seeme) that it tooke name from Meshech the sonne of Aram. For Dauid bewailing his exile (while he liued among a barbarous and irreligious People) vseth these wordes: Woe is me that I remaine in Meshech, and dwell in the Tents of Kedar: which Iunius interpreteth thus: Hei mihi quia peregrinor tam diu: habito tanquam Senite Kedareni: The Septuagint giues it this sense: Woe is me because my habitation (or abode) is prolonged, who dwell with the inhabitants of Kedar; with which this of the Latine agreeth: Heu mihi, quia incolatus meus prolongatus est; habitauit cum habitantibus Kedar: The Chaldean otherwise, and in these wordes: O me miserum, quia peregrinatus sum Alanis, habitauit cum tabernaculis Arabum; O wretch, that I am, for I haue traualled among those of Asia: I haue dwelt in the Tabernacles of the Arabians. But howeouer or which fouer conuerfion be taken for the best, yet all make mention of Kedar: which is a Province of much to call Aikenaz Germanic or Almaine, for wee heare of no Swart Rattlers at that sieg. But the Aikenaz were of those Nations which were either subdued or allied to the Medes: of which, if any of them came afterward into Phrygia, I know not: for the dispersion of Nations was in aftertimes without account. But for the opinion of Eusebius, who makes them to be Gathis; or that of Iosephus, who calls them Rhegini; or of the Iewes, who will have them to be Almaines; when they confirme it either by Scriptures or Reason, I will thinke as they doe.

Of Ripbath the second sonne of Gomer there is mention in the first of Chronicles. Berosus and Pererius thinke that hee wandered farre off from the rest of his Brothers, and therefore no memorie of his plantation. But I see nothing to the contrary, but that he might seate himselfe with the rest of his Family: for there wanted no roome or soile in those dayes for all the sonnes and Grand-children of Noah. Therefore I take it to be well understood, that the Riphei were of Ripbath, which the Greekes afterwards (according to Iosephus) called the Paplagones; and Riphei (sayth Melanchton) signifieth Giants. These people were very famous in the North parts, and in Sarmatia: the most of number and power among them, Sarmatarum gens maxima Heneti. The greatest number of the Sarmatians were the Heneti; who spake the ancient Polac: which being first called Riphei (for the loue of some of their Leaders or Kings) changed their names and became Heneti, (a custome exceeding common in thole times) and dwelt first in Paplagonia, as Homer witnesseth, and so doth Apollo- caution.

Now, when these Riphei (afterward Heneti) sought new Regions, they came along the shores of Euxinus, and filled the North part of Europe, containing Russia, Lithuania, and Polonia. From thence they crost thward the Land, and peopled Syria, delirous (sayth Melanchton) of a warmer soile of fruit and Wine. These Heneti or Veneti, whom Melanchton taketh to be one people, filled all that Land betweene the Baltick and Adriaticke Seas; and to this day the name of the Gulse Vene- dici is found in Russia. This Nation, after they were posselt of Lithuania and Polonia, disturbed the plantation of the Boij and Hermondunij. Therefore, it seemeth to mee, that of Ripbath came the Riphei, afterward Heneti; and so thinketh Arius Montanus, first seated in Paplagonia, but in course of time Lords of Sarmatia, and those other parts before remembred, chiefly betweene the Rivers of Vistula and Albis. The name parts before remembred, chiefly betweene the Rivers of Vistula and Albis. The name (sayth Melanchton) signifieth wandering or Wanderers, or Nomades: a people which liued by White-meates and fruits, as (indeed) all Nations did in the first Ages.

Of the third sonne of Gomer, Togorma, I haue spoken already; now therefore of Iauans children, which were foure:

{ Elisa, Tharfi, Cethim, Dodanim. }

Of the foure Sonnes of Iauan: and of the double signification of Tharfi, either for a proper name or for the Sea.

v. 7.

F Elisa or Elipha, came the Aeoles: and of this Elisa all the Greekes were called Hellenes, sayth Montanus. Melanchton makes Elisa the Father of so the Aeoles in Asia side: others of Elis in Peloponnesus, or of both. And seeing the Greekes were defended in generall of Iauan, it is probable that the Aeoles and the Elei, tooke name of Elisa, his eldest Sonne. Ezechiel in the 27. speaking of Tyre, nameth the Iles of Elisa. Elyacynthus

Et purpura de insulis Elisa facta sunt operimentum tuum: Blue Silke and Purple, brought from the Iles of Elisa, was thy covering: The Chaldeans for Elisa write Italo: and so I thinke they might doe with reason. For there was not found any such Purple Dye in Italie in those dayes nor since, that I can read of: but those Iles of Elisa, were by a better coniecture the Iles of Greece; and the best Purple was found afterward at Tyre it selfe and before that, among the Cyclades, and on the Coast of Getulia.

Tharfi, the second Sonne of Iauan, inhabited Cilicia, of which Tharfi is the Metropolis. Montanus for Tharfi in Cilicia, vnderstands Carthage in Africa; but (referring the respect due to so learned a man) he was much mistaken in that coniecture. The Chaldean Paraphrast puts Carthage for Tharfi, but it hath no authoritie, nor warrant of reason therein. So likewise, where it is written, that the Ships of Salomon went euery three yeeres to Tharfi, and brought thence Gold, Siluer, Elephants teeth, &c. the Chaldean Paraphrast translates Tharfi (Africa). But Salomons Ships were prepared in the Red Sea at Ezion Gaber, in the Bay of Elana, neere vnto Midian, where Isidro (Moses Father in Law) inhabited; a Province of Arabia Petraea, Idumaea, or of the Chusites; and they sayled to the higher part of the East India. For it had beene a strange Navigation to haue spent three yeeres in the passage betweene Indea and Carthage, or any other part of Africa, which might haue bene sayled in six or ten daies. And if so great riches might haue bene found within the bounds of the Mediterran Sea, all other neighbouring Princes would soone haue entertained that Trade also. But this enterprize of Salomon is in this sort written of in the first of Kings: Also King Salomon made a Name of Ships in Ezion Gaber, which is beside Elath and the brinke of the Red Sea in the Land of Edom: and Hyram sent with the Name his servants, that were Mariners, and had knowledge of the Sea, with the servants of Salomon: and they came to Ophir, and set from thence 420 Talents of Gold, &c. But as the Nations about Pontus thought no Sea in the World like vnto their owne, and doubted whether there were any other Sea but that only: (whereof it came, that Pontus was a word vsed for the Sea in generall) so, because the Israelites and the Phoenicians knew no other Sea then that of the Mediterran in the beginning; and that the people of Tharfi had the greatest Ships, and were the first Navigators in those parts with such Vessels, they were therefore called men of the Sea: and the word Tharfi vsed often for the Sea. And whereas it is said that the Ships of Salomon went euery three yeeres to Tharfi, that phrase is not strange at all; for we vs it ordinarily wherefoeuer wee navigate, (namely) that the Kings Ships are gone to the Sea, or that they are set out euery yeere, or euery three yeere to the Sea, and therefore Tharfi was not therein named, eyther for Carthage, Africa, or India, but vsed for the Sea it selfe. But in this place Tharfi is truly taken for Tharfi, the chiefe Citie in Cilicia, founded by Tharfi the second sonne of Iauan, or by his Successours in memorie of their first parent. To this Citie arriued Alex. Macedon, before he gaue the first overthrow to Darius, and casting himselfe into the River to bathe and wash his bodie, he fell into an extreme Fener, and great danger of death: and in this Citie of Tharfi was Saint Paul borne. Now this agreeth with the reason and nature of a Plantation. For (Gomer and his other sonnes inhabiting Asia the lesse, and that part of Syria adioyning) Iauan, who was to passe ouer the Sea into Greece, tooke the edge of the same Coast, and first planted the Iowen on that shore: gaue the Ilands betweene Asia the lesse and Greece, to Elisa, and left Tharfi vpon the Sea-side in Cilicia; of whom that Citie tooke name.

The third Sonne of Iauan was Cethim, of whom were the Romans and Italians, so saith Berosus, but I allow better of Melanchtons opinion, who makes Cethim the Father of the Macedonians. Cethim is a voice plural (saith he) and signifieth percussors, though in that respect it may be meant by either. But it seemeth more probable, that the place of Esa. 23. (according to Melanchton) had relation to Alexander and the Macedonians: Hec calamitas ab Esai predicta est, qui capite vicesimo tertio inquit, sidere exercitum otiosum agere ferret, hoste non audente manu conferere, tale quiddam accidit. Erat Æthiopianus Regi filius, nomine THARRIS, &c. which Tale hath this sense in English: when MOSES was grined that his Army lay idle, because the Enemy besieged, durst not sally and come to handie strokes, there happened this accident in the meane while. The Æthiopian King had a Daughter called THARRIS, who at some assaults given beheld the person of MOSES, and withall admired his valour. And knowing that MOSES had not only up-held and restored the falling estate of the Egyptians, but had also brought the conquering Æthiopians to the very brink of subversion: these things working in her thoughts, together with her owne affection, which daily increased, shee made meanes to send unto him by one of her trustiest servants to offer her selfe unto him, and become his Wife; to which MOSES on this condition entreated, that shee should first deliuer the Citty into his possession: wherunto shee condescending, and MOSES hauing taken oath to performe this contract, both the one and the other were instantly performed.

¶ II.

A dispute against the Tale of IOSEPHVS.

THIS Tale (whereof Moses hath not a word) hath Iosephus fashioned, and therein also utterly mistaken himselfe, in naming a Citty of Arabia for a Citty of Æthiopia: as he names Æthiopia; selfe to haue bene the Countrey of Moses his Wife, when (indeed) it was Arabia. For Saba is not in Æthiopia, but in Arabia, as both Strabo and all other Geographers, ancient and moderne teach vs, saying that the Sabæans are Arabians and not Æthiopians; except Iosephus can persuade vs, that the Queene of Saba which came from the South to heare the wisdom of Salomon, were a Negro, or Blacke-Moore. And though Damianus a Goes speake of certaine Letters to the King of Portugall from Presler Iohn, of the Abissines; wherein that Æthiopian King would persuade the Portugals that hee was descended of the Queene of Saba, and of Salomon; yet it doth no where appeare in the Scriptures, that Salomon had any Sonne by that great Princeesse: which had it bene true, it is likely that when Sisbac King of Egypt invaded Roboam, and sackt Hierusalem, his Brother (the Sonne of Saba and Salomon) who ioynd vpon Egypt, would both haue impeached that enterprize, as also giuen aide and succour to Roboam against Ieroboam, who drew from him tenne of the twelue Tribes to his owne obedience. Neyther is it any thing against our opinion of Moses his Wife, to haue bene an Arabian; that the Scriptures teach vs, that Moses married the daughter of Jethro Priek of Midian or Madian: which standing on the North Coast of the Red Sea, ouer against the bodie of Egypt, and neere Eison Gaber, where Salomon prouided his Fleet for India, in the Region of Edom, may well be reckoned as a part of Arabia, as the Red Sea is called Sinus Arabicus. For Edom ia ioyne to the Tribe of Juda by the North, to Arabia Petræa by the East, to the Mediterran by the West, and to the Red Sea by the South-east. And if wee mark the way which Moses tooke when he left Egypt, and conducted Israel thence, it will appeare that hee was no stranger in Arabia: in the border whereof, and in Arabia itselfe, hee had formerly liued fortie yeeres; wherit seemeth, that besides his careful bringing vp in Egypt, hee was instructed by Jethro in the Egyptians learning. For Iosephus confesseth, and Saint Stephen confirmeth, that hee was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians. But on the other side this Text makes much against Iosephus, where it is written in Exodus the second, Therefore MOSES fled from Pharaos, and dwelt in the Land of Madian or Midian, and not in Æthiopia. And in the third Chapter it is as plaine as wordes can expresse, in what Region Madian was, where it is written, When MOSES kept the sheepe of Jethro his Father in Law, Priest of Madian, and drave the Flocke to the Desert, and came to the Mountaine of God in Horeb. Now that Mount Horeb is not in Æthiopia, euery Infant knoweth. And if wee may beleue Moses himselfe, then was not the Wife of

Moses

Moses purchased in that manner which Iosephus reporteth (which was for betraying her Countrey and Friends) neither had shee the name of Tharbia, but of Sippora, or Zippora: neither was shee a Negro, but a Madianitish. And as God worketh the greatest things by the simplest meanes: so it pleased him from a Sepherd to call Moses, and after him Dauid, and by them to deliuer his people first and last. For Moses sitting by a Well (as disconsolate and a stranger) defended the daughters of Reuel from the other shepherds, and drew them Water to water their sheepe: vpon which occasion (by God ordaind) he was entayned by Jethro, whose Daughter he married: and not for any betraying of Townes or Countreies.

From hence also came Jethro to Moses at Rephidim, not farre from Idumæa, and finding the insupportable gouernement of such a multitude, he aduised him to distribute this waightie charge, and to make Gouernours and Iudges of euery Tribe and Familie. And if Jethro had bene an Æthiopian, it had bene a farre progresse for him to haue passed through all Egypt with the Wife and Children of Moses, and to haue found Mose in the border of Idumæa: the Egyptians hating Moses, and all that fauoured him. But the passing of Moses through Arabia Petræa (which ioyne to Madian) proueth that Moses was well acquainted in those parts: in which the second time he wandred fortie yeeres, and did by these late trauals of his, seeke to instruct the children of Israel in the knowledge of one true God, before he brought them to the Land of plenty and rest. For he found them nourished vp with the milke of Idolatrie, and obdurate in the Religion of the Heathen, and finding that those stiffe plants could not be bowed or declined, either by persuasion or by miracle, he ware them out in the Desarts, as God directed, and grafted their branches anew, that from those he might receiue fruit, agreeable to his owne desire, and Gods Commandements.

Lastly, this opinion of Iosephus is condemned by Augustinus Chrysostomus, where also he reprehendeth Apollinaris, who auowed that Moses had married both Tharbia and Sephora: His owne wordes haue this beginning: Plenitudo etiam Apollinaris duas uxores habuisse MOSEN, &c. Apollinaris is also lyeth in affirming that MOSES had two wiues: and who doth not perceiue these things fayned by them? for it is manifest that the wife of MOSES was ZEPHORA, Daughter to the Priest or President of Madian: and that Madian cannot be taken for Æthiopia beyond Egypt, being the same that ioyne to Arabia: so farre Chrysostomus.

¶ III.

Chubb ill expounded for Æthiopia, Ezech. 29. 10.

NOW as Chubb is by the Septuagint conuerted Æthiopia, and the wife of Moses there ore called Æthiopia: so in the conquest of Nabuchodonosor is Æthiopia written for Arabia. For by the wordes of Ezechiel it is manifest that Nabuchodonosor was neuer in Æthiopia. Behold (saith Ezechiel, I speaking of the person of this great Assyrian) I come vpon thee and vpon thy Riuers, and I will make the Land of Egypt utterly waste and desolate, from the Towre of Senen, even to the borders of the Black-moors: which last wordes should haue bene thus conuerted: From the Towre of Senen to the borders of the Chusites or Arabians: betwene which two is situate all Egypt. For to say, from the borders of Senen to the Æthiopians, hath no sense at all. Senen it selfe being the border of Egypt, confronting and ioyning to Æthiopia, or the Land of the black-Moors. So as if Nabuchodonosor conquest had bene but betwene Senen and the border of Æthiopia, it were as much to say, and did expresse no other victorie then the conquest of all that Land and Countrey, lying betwene Middlesex and Buckingham, where both the Countreies ioyne together; or all the North parts of England, betwene Barwick and Scotland: for this hath the same sense with the former, if any man sought to expresse by these two bounds, the Conquest of deede could the Arabians come on to succoureither Pelufium or Hierusalem. But, that there is any Defeat betwene Pelufium and the South part of Egypt, hath neuer yet beene heard of, or described by any Cosmographer or Historian. So then this Scripture of the second of Kings, Verse the ninth, hath the same mistaking as the rest. For here the word (Chus) is also translated Ethiopia; and in this sense haue all the Interpreters, (but Iunius) exprest the beginning of the ninth Verse: He heard also men say of Thirrhakeh King of Ethiopia, &c. whereas it should haue bene thus conuerted with Ivnivs: Andiens autem de Thirrhakeh Rege Chusis; He heard also of Thirrhakeh King of the Chusites. For they were the Chusites and Arabians, whose Houses and Cities were next the fire, and vpon whom the very 10 smoke of Juda flaming was blowne, being their neereft Neighbours: and so were not the Ethiopian blacke-Moorees vnder the Equinoctiall, whom neither warre nor peace (which discouereth all Regions) euer found out, saith Plinie. For this King was no more King of Ethiopia then Zerah was, who invaded Asia King of Juda, with an Armie of a Million and three thousand Chariots. Indeed, how such an Armie and those Chariots should passe through all Egypt, (the Kings of Egypt being mightie Kings) let all men that know how these Regions are seated, and how farre distant, iudge. For Princes doe not easily permit Armies of a Million to runne through them; neither was there euer any such strength of Black-Moorees heard of in that part of the World, or elsewhere. Neither are these *Ethiopian*s such trauail-20 lers or Conquerors; and yet is this King Zerah also called King of Ethiopia. But the word Chus being first so conuerted for Ethiopia, the rest of the Interpreters (not looking into the seates of Kingdomes, or the possibilities of attempts, or inuasions) followed one another in the former mistakings.

A farther exposition of the place, ESAY 18. 1.

Concerning these wordes in that eighteenth Chapter of ESAY, Navium alarum; 30 Winged ships, (so the Septuagint turne it) or Cymbalarum (according to the Latine) sailes whistling in the windes, or terra umbrosa or a (after Ivnivs) the Land of a shadowed coast, or the Land shadowing with wings, as our English Geneva hath it. The two first interpretations of the Septuagint and S. Hierome haue one sense in effect. For the sailes are commonly called the wings of a ship; and we vse to say ordinarily when our ships saile slowly, that they wanteth wings: (that is) when her sailes are either worn or too narrow; and we also vse the same phrase of the winde whistling in the sailes. And it may be that the Egyptians employed so many of those small ships, as their sailes were said to give a shadow ouer the Red Sea. But to make both interpretations good, Pintus (vpon Esay) affirmeth, that the word (Sabal) doth signifie 40 both to shadow and to gingle (which is) to make a kinde of Cymbaline sound: so as the meaning of this place (saith Pintus) is this: Waite thee, O Egypt, which dost promise to others (safegard, vnder the shadow of thy wings, which (indeede) seemeth to agree with the argument of the eighteenth Chapter of Esay: and this phrase is often elsewhere vsed, as in the sixteenth Psalm: Sub umbra alarum tuarum protege me; Defend me vnder the shadow of thy wings. The Boates of reede spoken of are of two kindes; either of basket-willow couered with hides (as anciently in Brittain) or a Tree made hollow in the bottome, and built vpon both sides with Canes. Of the one sort I haue seene in Ireland, of the other in the Indies.

Of the plantation and antiquities of Egypt.

¶ I.

That Mizraim the chiefe planter of Egypt, and the rest of the sonnes of Ham, were seated in order, one by another.

10 THe second sonne of Ham was Mizraim, who (according to the place of a second brother) was sent somewhat farther off to inhabit. For Chus first posselt Chaldea on the West side of Gehon chiefly: and from thence, as he increased in people, so he entred Arabia, and by time came to the border of the Red Sea, and to the South-east-side of Judea. Mizraim his brother (with Phut) past ouer into Africa. Mizraim held Egypt: and Phut (as a third brother) was thrust farther off into Mauritania. Canaan tooke the Sea-coast, and held the side of Palestina: and these foure brothers posselt all that Tract of Land, from Gehon in Chaldea, as farre to the West as the Mediterranean 20 Sea: comprehending all Arabia Deserta, and Petra, all Canaan which embraceth Galilee, Samaria, and Judea; with the two *Egypt*s, whereof the nether is bounded by Memphis on the South, and by the Mediterranean Sea on the North: and Thebaida (called the vpper Egypt) stretcheth it self toward the South as farre as Syene, the border of the *Ethiopian*s or black-Moorees. All the rest of the coast of Africa Westward Phut peopled; which brothers had not any other Nation or Familie that dwelt betwene them. And in the same manner did all their sonnes againe, and all the sonnes of the rest of Noahs children, sort themselves.

¶ II.

Of the time about which the name of Egypt began to be knowne: and of the Egyptians Lunatic yeeres, which made their antiquities seeme the more fabulous.

40 THis flourishing Kingdome posselt by Mizraim, changed her ancient name, and became Egypt, at such time as Aegyptus (otherwise Rameses, as some thinke) the sonne of Belus, chased thence his elder brother Danaius, shifting him into that part of Greece now called Morea, by whom the Argiues were made Danai, abandoning their proper names: which happened 877. yeeres after the flood, in the time of Iosua, as S. Augustine coniectureth out of Eusebius. But in Homers Odyssey it appeareth that the Egyptians were so called at the time of the Troian Warre. And before this, Egypt was knowne by diuers other names, as Oceana, Asia, Osiriana, &c. 50 And Manethon (whom Iosephus citeth in his first booke against Apion) numbrellh all by the Kings of Egypt after Moses departure, who consumed 393. yeeres. By which other men coniecture, that the Egyptians tooke on them that name 330. yeeres after Iosua, and about 1000. yeeres after the flood. But where Iosephus in the same booke taketh Israel to be those Hiclos, which he also calleth Pastores or Shepherds, which are said to haue reigned in Egypt 511. yeeres: whom also he calleth his Ancesters, (meaning the Ancesters of the Iewes) in this I am sure he was grossly decieued, or that he vainly boasted: for the Israelites had no such Dominion as Manethon sayneth: nor abode in Egypt so long a time by many yeeres.

Of the Egyptian Antiquities there are many fancies in Tragus, Herodotus, Plato, Diod. Siculus, Mela, and others. For they affirme (saith Pomp. Mela) that there had reigned in Egypt 330. Kings before Amasis, who was contemporarie with Cyrus; and and that they had memorie and storie of 13000. yeeres; and that the Starres had four times changed their course, and the Sunne twice set in the East. These Riddles are also rife among the Athenians and Arcadians, who dare affirme, that they are more ancient then Jupiter and the Moone, whereof Onid:

De Fals. Lt.

Ante Iovem genitum terras habuisse feruntur Arcades: & Lyra gens prior illa fuit.

The Arcadians the earth inhabited Ere yet the MOONE did shine, or IOVE was bred.

19

But for those 13000. yeeres it may well be true: seeing it is certayne that the Egyptians reckon their yeeres by Moneths, which makes after that account not about 1000. or 1100. yeeres, whether we take their Moneths or Lunarie yeeres to have beeme of the first kinde of 27. dayes and eight houres; or otherwise 29. dayes and twelue houres; or after any other of those five diuerfities of their Lunarie yeeres.

†. III.

Of certayne vaine assertions of the Antiquitie of the Egyptians.

GERARDVS MERCATOR in his Chronologie, reasoneth for the Egyptians Antiquitie in this manner: That the sixteenth Dynastie (where Eusebius begins to reckon the Egyptians times) had beginning with the generall flood: and that therefore the first of the other fiftene reached the Creation, or soone after it. To which coniecture of Mercator, Pererius maketh this answer. That therein Mercator was first deceived, because he taketh it for granted, that the beginning of the sixteenth Dynastie was at once with the generall flood: which Eusebius maketh 292. yeeres after, and in the time of Abraham. Secondly, Mercator maketh the beginning of the 17. shepherds Dynastie (being in number the 17.) in the time of their first King, Salitis, to have beene in the yeere of the World 1846. which Eusebius findeth in the Worlds age 2140. For the 16. Dynastie was begunne but in the 292. yeere after the flood, as they account, and continued 190. yeeres. Thirdly, whereas Mercator maketh every Dynastie to endure 115. yeeres, Eusebius reckoneth many of them at lesse then 100. yeeres: for the 28. had but fixe yeeres; the 29. but 20. and the 30. but 18. yeeres.

Now Annius in his Supplement of Manethon affirmeth, That all these 15. Dynasties lasted but 162. yeeres: and that the first of the 15. beganne but in the 131. yeere after the flood: so as where Mercator makes all the 15. to precede the flood, and the 16. to have beene then in being at the time of the flood, Annius makes them all after it. But the contrarie of fallshood cannot be hidden, though disguised. For Annius had forgotten his former Opinion and Assertion, that it was in the 131. yeere that Nimrod with the sonnes of Noah came into the Valley of Shinar: so he forgets the time which was consumed in the building of Babel: and that before the confusion of Speech there was no dispersion, nor farre-off plantation at all. And though he hastily conveyed Gomer into Italie, and Tubal into Spaine, in the 101. yeere of Nimrods reigne: (which was ten yeeres after his arrivall into Babylonia) yet herein he is more vnaidified. For he makes Egypt posselt, and a government established in the very first yeere of the arrivall of Nimrod into Shinar, before all partition, or 50 any expedition farre off or neere in question: for from thence (that is, from Babel) did the Lord scatter them upon all the earth.

†. IIII.

†. IIII.

Against PERERIUS: that it is not unlikely, but that Egypt was peopled within 200. yeeres after the Creation; at least, that both it, and the most parts of the World were peopled before the Flood.

BUT whereas Pererius seeketh to overthrow this Antiquitie of the Egyptians touching their Dynasties, (which Eusebius doth not altogether destroy, but lessen) I do not find any great strength in this opinion of Pererius; (to wit) that it was either unlikely or impossible that Egypt should be peopled within 100. or 200. yeeres after Adam, in the first Age. And whereas he suppoeth that it was not inhabited at all before the generall Flood, I doe verily beleuee the contrarie: and that not only of Egypt, but the better part of all the World was then peopled: Pererius his words are these: Quomodo enim primis mundi ducentis, vel etiam centum annos ADAMI proles adeo multiplicari potuit, ut ad Egyptum usq. habitandum & complendum propagata sit, &c. For how could the children of ADAM be so multiplied in the first two hundred, or in the first hundred yeeres of the world, and so propagated as to inhabit and fill Egypt for allowing this (saith Pererius) we must also confesse, that there were then both the Assyrians, and other Nations.

Now seeing that the Scriptures are silent herein, and that it is no point of our faining beleefe, it is lawfull for every man to be guided in this and the like questions by the best reason, circumstance, and likelihood; and herein, as in the rest, I protest that I doe not gainsay any mans opinion out of any crolling or caulling humour: for I thinke it the part of every Christian, rather to reconcile differences, where there is possibilitie of vnion, then out of froward fubletie, and preiudicate resolute nesse, to maintaine factions needlesse, and dangerous contentions.

First therefore, to this opinion, that Egypt was not planted so soone after Adam, no, nor at all before the Flood, I say that there is no reason why we should giue a lesse increase to the sonnes of Adam, then to the sonnes of Noah. For their length of life, which exceeded those which came after the flood double, & (after a few yeeres) treble, is an infallible prooffe of their strength and abilitie, to beget many Children: and at that time they observed no degrees of kindred, nor consanguinitie. And that there was a speedie increase of people, and in great numbers, it may in some sort appeare by this, that Cain, who (being fearefull that the death of Abel would have beene reuenged on him) withdrew himselfe from the rest, which were afterward begotten, and dwelt in the Land of Noah, and there, by the helpe of his owne issues built a Citie, (called Enoch) after the name of his first borne. Now if it bee gathered that Enoch came into the Valley of Shinar with so many multitudes, as sufficed to build the Citie and Towre of Babel: and that to this increase there was giuen but 130. yeeres by Berosus, and after the account of the Scriptures (reckoning, as it is commonly vnderstood, by the birth of Abraham, Isaac, Heber, and Phaleg) but one hundred and one yeere: I see no cause to doubt, but that in the infancy of the first age, when the bodies of men were most perfect, even within 130. yeeres, the same (if not a greater) number might be increased; and so within 70. yeeres after (that is, by such time as the World had stood 200. yeeres) as well Assyria, Syria, and Egypt might be posselt before the Flood, as they were within the same or lesse time after it. Neyther doth it agree with the circumstance or true Storie of the Babylonian and Assyrian Empire, that all those people, which were increased in the first 50 hundred or 130. yeeres after the Flood, came into Shinar and Babylonia. For that Euer Noah himselfe came out of the East, as there is no Scripture or Authoritie to prouoe it, so all probable coniecture and reason it selfe denies it. Again, those multitudes and powerfull numbers, which Semiramis (but the third from Noah) found in India, considered with her owne Armie of three Millions, (and shee left not all her Kingdomes emptye) doe well prouee, that if the World had such plenty of people in so few yeeres after the Flood, it might also bee as plentifully filled in like time before it. For after their owne account Ninus gouerned Babylonia and Assyria but 292. yeeres after the Flood of Noah. And these Troupes of Semiramis were gathered out of all those Easterne Kingdomes, from Media to the Mediterran Sea; when there had now past from the Flood to the time of this her inuasion, somewhat lesse or more then 360. yeeres: for much more time the true Chronologie cannot allow; though I confesse, that in respect of the strange greatnesse of Semiramis Armie, and the incredible multitudes gathered, this is as short a time as can well bee giuen. And if but the one half be true of that which is said, That her Armie consisted of 1300000. Footmen, and 500000. Horsemen, it must needs bee, that long before Semiramis Raigne, the greatest part of Asia (whence her huge Armie was gathered) was full of people: yea Arabia it selfe (much part whereof is barren) mult long before this time of Semiramis haue bene plentifully peopled; when Ninus hauing a determination to make himselfe Master of all Nations, entred (notwithstanding) in League with the King thereof: whom therefore he eyther feared, or fought his assistance. And if Arabia were then so well replenished, I see no cause but Egypt might also be peopled. Now if we may beleue Trogus Pompeius (Epitomis d'by Iustine) Egypt was a most flourishing and magnificent Nation before Ninus was borne. For these be his owne wordes, speaking of NINVS. Fuere quidem temporibus antiquioribus VEXORIS REX Egypti, &c. But there were in times more ancient VEXORIS King of Egypt, and TANANIS King of the Scythians: of which the one inuaded Pontus, the other Egypt. And how full of people all that part of the World was, the Conquests of Ninus witnesse, who subdued with no small force the Armenians, the Medes, and afterwards the Bactrians; yea, all that whole bodie of Asia on this side India. For Diodorus out of Ctesias numb'reth the Armie, wherewith Ninus inuaded Zorasther, at 1700000. Footmen, and 200000. Horsemen: and the Stories generally shew, that though Zorasther's Armie was farre short of this, yet it was greater then any that those parts of the World euer since beheld. But to what end should I seeke for forraigne authoritie? for no man doubteth but that Egypt was possit by 30 Mizraim, the sonne of Ham; and that it was an established Kingdome, filled with many Cities in Abrahams time, the Scriptures tell vs. And sure to prepare and cultivate a desolate and ouergrowne ground, to beautifie it with many Cities, Lawes, and Policies, cannot be esteemed a labour of a few dayes: and therefore it must bee inhabited in a lesse time then 200. yeeres after the Flood; and in the same time (if not in a shorter) before the Flood. For if so many Millions of men were found within 300. yeeres after the generall Flood; so as not only Babylon, and Assyria, Bactria, Armenia, Media, Arabia, Egypt, Palastina, yea the farre-off Lybia on the one side, and India on the other, and Scythia (inferiour to neyther) were all filled: into what small corners could then all those Nations be comprehended, which 1656. yeeres brought 40 forth before the Flood: euen necessitie, which cannot be resisted, cast the abundance of mens bodies into all parts of the knowne World; especially, where Death forbore the Father, and made no place for the Sonne, till he had beheld liuing Nations of his owne bodie.

†. V.

Of some other reasons against the opinion of PERERIVS.

FOR what a strange increase did the long liues of the first Age make, when they 50 continued 800. or 900. yeeres. Surely, we haue reason to doubt, that the World could not containe them, rather then that they were not spread ouer the World. For let vs now reckon the date of our liues in this Age of the World: wherein if one exceed 50. yeeres, tenne for one are cut off in that passage, and yet wee find no want of people;

people; nay, wee know the multitude such, as if by warres or pestilence they were not sometimes taken off by many thousands, the earth with all the industrie of man could not giue them food. What strange heapes then of soules had the first Ages, who enioyed 800. or 900. yeeres, as aforesaid? These numbers, I say, cannot be counted nor conceived. For it would come to the same reckoning in effect, as if all those which haue bene borne in Brittaine since 3. or 4. hundred yeeres before the Norman Conquest (sparing such as by accident or by violence were cut off) were now alive; and if to these there were added as many as by Polygamie might haue bene increased. For (to omit, that the Giants and mightie ones of the first Age obserued 10 no law of Matrimony) it is to be thought that those Louers of the world and of pleasure, when they knew the long and liberal time which Nature had giuen them, would not willingly or hastily present themselves to any danger which they could flye from or eschew. For what humane argument hath better perswasion to make men carelesse of life, and fearelesse of death, then the little time which keeps them asunder, and that short time also accompanied with so many paines and diseases, which this eniuous olde Age of the World minglenth together, and soweth with the seeds of Mankind?

Now if that Berosus or Annins may be alleaged for sufficient Authours, whom Pererius himselfe in this question citeth, then is it by them affirmed, and by Iosephus confirmed, that the Citie of Enoch was seated neere Zybanus in Syria: and it other 20 parts of Syria were peopled in Cain time, I see no cause why Palastina (which is also a Prouince of Syria) and Egypt (which neighboureth it) could bee left desolate both all the life time of Cain, and all those times betweene his death and the Flood, which were by estimation 700. or 800. yeeres. And sure though this Fragment of Berosus with Annins his Comment bee very ridiculous in many places (the ancient Copies being corrupted or lost) yet all things in Berosus are not to bee reiected. Therefore Saint Hierome for such Authours giues a good rule. Bona eorum eligamus, vitemus contraria; Let vs choose what is good in them, and reiect the rest. And certainly in the very beginning of the first Booke, Berosus agreeth (in effect) with Moses, touching the generall Flood: and in that first part Berosus affirmeth, that those mightie men and Giants which inhabited Enoch, commanded ouer all Nations, and subiected 30 the vniuersall World: and though that phrase (of all the World) bee often vsed in the Scriptures for a part thereof; as in the second of the Acts, That there were dwelling at Hiernsalem Iewes: men that feared God of euery Nation vnder Heauen: yet by wordes which follow in Berosus, it is plaine that his words and sense were the same: for hee addeth from the Sunnes rising to the Sunnes setting, which cannot be taken for any small part thereof. Againe, wee may safely coniecture, that Noah did not part and proportion the World among his sonnes at aduenture, or left them as Discouersers, but directed them to those Regions which he formerly knew had bene inhabited. 40 And it cannot be denied that the earth was more passable and easie to traualle ouer before the Flood, then after it. For Pererius himselfe confesseth, that Attila (by reason of mudde and slime which the water left vpon the Earth) was vninhabited 200. yeeres after Ogyges Flood, whereby wee may gather that there was no great pleasure in passing into farre Countreies after the generall Deluge, when the earth lay (as it were) incopied for 100. or 130. yeeres together. And therefore was the face thereof in all coniecture more beautifull, and lesse cumbersome to walke ouer, in the first Age then after the generall overflowing.

†. VI.

Of the words of MOSES, GEN. IO. V. ultimo, whereupon PERERIVS grounded his opinion.

L Astly, whereas Pererius draws this Argument out of the last Verse of the tenth of Genesis, And out of these were the Nations divided after the Flood: Quo significatur talem divisionem non fuisse ante diluvium, By which it appeareth (sayth Pererius) that there was no such division before the Flood, which hee also seeketh to confirme out of the cleuneth of Genesis, because the division of tongues was cause of the dispersion of the people. This consequence, quo significatur, &c. seemeth to me very weake: the Text it selfe rather teaching the contrarie: for out of these (sayth MOSES) were the Nations divided in the earth after the Flood; inferring, that before the Flood the Nations were divided out of others, though after the Flood out of these only. But whatsoever sense may be gathered from this place, yet it can no way bee drawne to the times before the Flood, or to any Plantation or division in that Age: for if there were none else among whom the earth could bee divided after the Flood, but Nahs Sonnes, wherein doth that necessarie division controule the planting of the World before it? And whereas it is alleged that the confusion of speech was the cause of this dispersion, it is true, that it was so for that present; but if Babel had neuer bene built, nor any confusion of Languages at all, yet increase of people and time would haue enforced a farther-out and general Plantation: as Berosus sayes well, that when Mankind were exceedingly multiplied, Ad comparandus novas sedes necessitas compellat, They were driven by necessity to seek new Habitations. For we find (as is before said) that within 300. yeeres after the Flood, there were gathered together into two Armies, such multitudes as the Valley about Babylon could not haue sustained those numbers with their increase for any long time: all Asia the greater and the lesser; all Sythia, Arabia, Palestina, and Egypt, with Greece, and the Islands thereof; Mauritania and Lybia being also at that time fully peopled. And if we beleue Berosus, then not only those parts of the World, but (within 140. yeeres after the Flood) Spaine, Italie, 30 and France were also planted: much more then may wee thinke, that within 1656. yeeres before the Flood, in the time of the chiefe strength of Mankind, they were replenished with people. And certainly seeing all the World was ouerflowne, there were people in all the World which offended.

†. VII.

A conclusion, resolving of that which is most likely, touching the Egyptian Antiquities: with somewhat of PERERIVS (another Sonne of HAM) which peopled Lybia.

T Herefore, for the Antiquitie of the Egyptians, as I doe not agree with Mercator, nor iudge with the Pulgar, which giue too much credit to the Egyptians Antiquities: so I doe not thinke the report of their Antiquities so fabulous, as either Pererius or other men conceiue it. But I rather incline to this, That Egypt being peopled before the Flood, and 200. or 300. yeeres, more or lesse after Adam, there might remaine vnto the Sonnes of Mizraim some Monuments in Pillers or Altars of stone or metall) of their former Kings or Gouvernours: which the Egyptians haue added to the list and Roll of their Kings after the Flood, in succeeding time (out of the vanitie of glory or by some corruption in their Priests) something beyond the truth might be inferred. And that the memorie of Antiquitie was in such sort preferred, Berosus affirmeth it of the Chaldeans, and so doth Epigenes. For they both write that the vse of Letters and the Art of Astronomie was knowne to the Babylonians 3634. yeeres before Alexanders Conquest: and this report Annus findeth to agree agree and reach to the time of Enefs, who was borne 1034. yeeres before the Flood, and wrote of the Worlds destruction, both by Water and Fire; as also of Christs coming in iudgement, as Saint Iude hath witnessed. But leaning these Antiquities to other mens iudgements, and every man to his owne reason, I will conclude this Plantation of Egypt. It is agreed by all, that it was peopled by Mizraim, and that it tooke the name of Egypt from Egyptus the forme of Belus, as aforesaid. Being divided into two Regions, that part from Memphis or Nicopolis to the Mediterranean Sea, was called the inferiour Egypt; surnamed also Delta: because the severall branches of Nilus breaking asunder from one bodie of the River, gaue it the forme of the Greeke letter Delta, which is the forme of a Triangle. That branch, which ranne toward the North-east and embraced the Sea next unto the Deserts of Sar and Phaen, had on it the Citie of Pelusiun, where Sencherib was repulld: The other branch, which yielded it selfe to the Salt-water towards the North-west, is beautified by that famous Citie of Alexandria: The vpper part of Egypt is bounded betweene Memphis and Syene neere Ethiopia, and had the name of Thebaida, of that ancient Citie of Thebes, which (according to Homer) was adorned with 100. Gates: and therefore called Civitas centum portuum; and by the Greekes Diospolis; in the Scriptures No-hamon, which signifieth multitudes of Inhabitants, exceeding beliefe. Iosephus calls Egypt Mersin of Mizraim: and Hierodotus affirmes that it had once the name of Thebaia.

Hierod. Entrep.

But the third sonne of Ham tooke the next portion of Land to his other Mizraim, and inhabited Lybia: whose people were anciently called Phutei; (sayth Iosephus) and Plinie mentioneth the River Fut in Mauritania: which River from the Mountaine Atlas (knowne to the Inhabitants by the name of Dyrus) hee maketh to bee distant the space of two hundred miles. It also appeareth in the thirtieth Chapter of Ezechiel, that Phut, Chus, and Lud were contermini and Associates with the Egyptians.

¶. XII.

Of the cleuen sonnes of CANAAN, the fourth sonne of HAM.

†. I.

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan: with the names of his cleuen sonnes.

C ANAAN (the fourth sonne of Ham) posselt all that Region called by the Romanes Palestina; in the Scriptures Galilea, Samaria, and Iudea; in the latter times knowne by the name of the Holy Land and Iurie: the limits whereof are precisely set downe by MOSES, Genesis the tenth, Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon as thou goest to Gerar untill Azzah, and as thou goest vnto Sodome and Gomorha, and Admah, and Zebaim, even vnto Lalba. Now howsoever these words of the Hebrew Text (as thou goest) be converted, Moses meaning was that Gerar was the South bound of Canaan and Zidon the North; Sodome and Gomorha the East, and the other Cities named stood on the Frontiers thereof. For Gerar standeth in a right Line from Gaza in the way of Egypt, the vttermost Territorie of Canaan Southward: and this was properly the Land of Canaan.

Now the sonnes of Canaan which posselt this Countrie, and inhabited some part of the borders thereof, were in number cleuen:

1. Zidon.

1. Zidon.
2. Heth or Chethus.
3. Iebusi or Iebuseus.
4. Emori or Emoreus, or Amoreus.
5. Gergesii or Gergesius.
6. Heni or Chineus.
7. Arki or Harkus.
8. Seni or Sinaius.
9. Aradi or Aradensis.
10. Zemari or Samareus, or Tzemareus.
11. Hamathi or Hamathus, or Chamathus.

Of which the most renowned were the Hethites, Gergesites, Amorites, Henites, Iebusites, and Perizzites: which Perizzites were descended of Zemari or Samareus, or from some of his.

†. II.

Of the portions of ZIDON and HETH.

ZIDON the first borne of Canaan, built the famous Citie of Zidon in Phoenicia, which afterward fell in partition to the Tribe of Asser: for Asser, Zabulon, and Nephthali had a great part of the ancient Phoenicia distributed among them; but the Asserites could neuer obtaine Zidon it selfe.

The second sonne of Canaan was Heth or Cethus: of whom came the Hethites, or Hittites, one of those seven principall Nations (Commanders of Canaan) appointed by God to bee rooted out; namely, the Gergesites, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Perizzites, and Henites, and the Iebusites. The Hittites inhabited about Bersabe, and towards Hebron neere the Torrent Belor, and about Gerar, which Moses maketh the uttermost limit of Canaan, hauing the Desert of Pharan to the South: for about Bersabe (otherwise Patus inramenti) foure miles from Gaza dwelt Heth and his Posteritie, as farre to the Northeast as Hebron, and Mamre; and of Ephraim the Hittite did Abraham buy the field of Sarabs buriall. Of which Nation Rebecca bewailed her selfe to Isaac, saying, That I see was wearie of her life for the Daughters of HETH. The Giants Anakim were of these Hittites, a strong and fierce Nation, whose entertainment by the Kings of Israel against them the Syrians greatly feared: as in the fourth of the Kings; Israel hath hired against vs the Kings of the Hittites.

†. III.

Of the Iebusites and Amorites.

IEBUSITES, the third sonne of Canaan, of whom came the Iebusites, and whose principall seat was Iebus, (afterward Hierusalem) were also a valiant and stubborn Nation, and held their Citie and the Countie neere it, till such time as David by Gods assistance recovered both: yet were not the Iebusites extinguished, but were Tributaries to Salomon.

Amoreus was the fourth sonne of Canaan, of whom the Amorites tooke name, who inhabited that Land to the East of Jordan below the Sea of Galilee, hauing Aradon and the Mountaines of Galad on the East, and Jordan on the West: of whom Og (King of Basan) and Sihon (ouerthrowne by Moses) were Princes.

The Amorites had also many other habitations dispersed within the bounds of Canaan: as behind Libanus in the edge of Calefryia, or Syria Libanica. They had also their their being in the Mountaynes of Inda, and in Idumea neere the Metropolis thereof, called Duma. And hereof it came that all the Canaanites were sometime called Amorites: as in Genesis the fifteenth: For the wickednesse of the Amorites is not yet full. And that this was also a powerfull Nation, we finde in the Prophet Amos: For de Amos 2. destroyed I the Amorite before them, whose height was like the height of a Cedar, and he was strong as the Oke.

†. IIII.

Of the Gergesites, Henites, and Harkites.

THE first sonne of Canaan was Gergesius or Gergesius, (otherwise Girgasi) who inhabited on the East side of the Lake of Tiberias, or the Sea of Galilee, where Ptolemie sets the Citie Gersa, which Iosephus calls Gersa in the Territorie of Decapolis. Here it was that CHRIST disposed the possessed with Devils; and the Gergesites desired him to depart their Coast: because their Swine filled with the euill spirits, drowned themselves in the Sea of Galilee. Gergesius also built Berytus (sometime Geris) afterward Felix iulia, three miles from the Riuer Adonis in Phoenicia: in which the Romans held a Garrison: and to which Augustus gave many large priuiledges.

Henus the sixth sonne; and Father of the Henites, inhabited under Libanus neere Emath. These Henites, howeouer the Capitolin expelled a good part of them (as in Dionysius the second is remembred) yet many of them remayned all the warre of Iudas, and afterward to the time of Salomon. For God was not pleased utterly to roote out these Nations, but they were sometimes made Tributaries to the Israelites, and at other times serued (in their falling away from the true worship of God) to assist them: for as it is written, Judges the third: They remayned to proue ISRAEL by them, whether they would obey the Commandments of God.

The seventh sonne was Aracus or Arki, who betwene the foote of Libanus and the Mediterran Sea, (ouer against Tripoli) built the Citie of Archus, Arce, or Arca, afterwards Arachis.

†. V.

Of SINI and ARADI.

SINEVS the eighth sonne, Hieropolymitanus sets at Capareva, which Ptolemie findes in Indea, not farre from Iebus; to the South thereof, saith Iunius. But it is more probable, that Sineus founded Sin, which S. Iherome calls Sini, Ptolemie, Simyria: Me-la and Plinie, Simyris: Brochard, Syon, (called Synochis) neere Arca. Ptolemie thinks that Sineus inhabited the Desarts of Sini or thereabout; but hereof there is no other certaintie then the report of Brochard, who tooke view of all these places, affirming, that Sineus built Synochis, as Zidon built Zidon. There is also another Nation of Cini (written with the letter C. otherwise Kenai) who descended of Hobab the sonne of Raguel the Midianite, who assisted the Israelites in their conduction through the Wildernesse of Pharan. But these Cinai were admitted among the Israelites, and had a portion of Land with the Nephthalims, beside their habitations with the Amalekites: against these Cinai, Balaam prophesied, that they should be destroyed by the Assyrians.

The ninth sonne was Aradus or Aradensis, who in the Ile of Arades built the Citie Arados: opposite against which Iland on the Maine of Phoenicia, they founded another Citie of that name, which for opposition was afterwards called Antaradus. To this Citie came S. Peter (saith Clement) and in this Ile preached the Gospel, and founded a Church in honor of our Lady: but we finde no such worke of

of his in the Acts of the Apostles. Both these two were very famous, and places of skilfull Sea-men: whom Ezechiel remembreth in his prophecies against the Tyrians. The inhabitants of Zidon and Arvad were shy Mariners.

Cap. 7. v. 8.

†. VI.

Of ZEMARI.

OF Samaricus, or Zemari, the tenth sonne, there are diuers opinions. Some think that he first inhabited in Calcfyria at Edelfa, and founded Samararia, in which in Joſua is placid in the Tribe of Beniamin. There is also Samarajm (of the same Orthographic) vpon the Mountaynes of Ephraim (saith Berodius) mentioned in the second of Chronicles c. 13. v. 4. which the Latine conuerreth amisse (saith he) by Semercon. The Hieroglyphytan Paraphraſt makes Samaricus (of whom were the Periſſites) the parent of the Emiffari, which Plinie calls the Hemſenti, in Calcfyria; and it may be that it was their first habitation, and that they afterwards inhabited those other places before remembered. But that they founded Samaria, both the Hebrew Orthographie, and this place in the first of Kings (speaking of Omri) diproueth: And he bought the Mountayne Samarior Shemer one of SHEMER, for two talents of filuer, and built in the Mountayne: and called the name of the Citie which he built, after the name of SHEMER, Lord of the Mountayne Samarita. But of all theſe places I shall ſpeake more at large in the conqueſt of the holy Land, by the children of Iſrael. Of whomſoeuer the Samaritanes were defended, ſure I am, that they were euer a perfidious Nation, and baſe: for as long as the ſtate of the Iewes stood vp, they alwayes called themſelues Iewes: when it ſuffered or ſanke, they then vltro denyed to be of that Nation or Familie; for at ſuch time as they were returned from their first captivity, they became a mixt Nation; partly of the Colonies of the Aſſyrians; and partly of the naturalls.

of HAMATH.

T^He laſt of Canaan ſonnes was Hamathew, or (according to the Hebrew) Hamathi, of Hamath: (ſaith Berodai) of which (the aſpiration taken away) the ſame is pronounced Emath, whereof Hamathew was parent. Iofeph and S. Hierome confound Emath with Antioch, not that Antioch which ſtandeth on the River Orometes, on the frontier of Camagena, betweene the Mountaine Caſius and the Province of Pieria, and Selencius, of which S. Peter was Biſhop, and in which S. Luke and Ignatius were borne: but Antioch, ſurnamed Epiphania, as Berodai ſuppoſeth, which ſtandeth betweene Apamea and Emel in Caſtalis. Yet, indeede, Emath cannot be taken for either: for both that Antioch vpon Orometes, and that which neighboureth Emel, are farther off ſeated from Canaan, then euer any of thoſe Nations ſtraggled. And whereas S. Hierome ſetteth Emath, which he confoundeth with Epiphania, in the Tribe of Neptali: it is maniſteſt, that Epiphania, which ſtandeth to the North of Emath, hath all the Province of Laodicea, betweene it and any part of the Land diuided. And if Libanon it ſelfe were not ſhared among the Tribes, then could not Epiphania belong vnto them: for both the Provinces Laodicea and Libanica, are betweene Epiphania and any part of the holy Land: and therefore Emath ſo taken could not be a part of Neptali, as in the thirtieth of Ieſus is directly proſed. For Ieſus counting the lands that remained vnpoſſeſt, reckoneth all Mount Libanon towards the Sunne-rising, from Baalged vnder mount Hermon, vntill we come to Hamath. And this reaſon (among others) is vied, that Emath was not in Neptalim, or any way belonging to the children of Iſrael: becauſe Dauid accepted the preſents of

Toba King of Emath, and (therewithall) conditions of peace: which he would not have done, if that Territorie had ever belonged to the children of Israel, but would have recovered it without composition, and by strong hand, as he did the reit. But this Argument (as I take it) hath no great weight. For if the promise which God made, be considered, as it is written in Deuteronomie, then might Emath be comprehended, though feared altogether without the bounds of the Land promised, according to the description of Moſes: and Iofa: for Emath is indecde ſituate on the o- ther ſide of the Mountayne of Hermos, which ioyneth to Libanus: and is otherwiſe called Iurea. But whereas Hamath is named in Iofa the 19. v. 35. and written in the 10 Latine conuerſion Emath, therein (ſaith Beroaldus) was S. Hierome miſtaken. Emath or Iurea is that ouer the Mountaynes, and the Citie in Nephtalim ſhould be written Hamath: and ſo the Septuagint (vnderſtanding the difference) writ it Amath and not Emath, the ſame which indecde belonged to the Nephtalims, feared on the South ſide of Libanus, to the Eaſt of Aſſedim: which Citie S. Hierome writes Emath; Iofephus, Hamath; others, Emathin, or Amatheos; and the people Amathin; of which (as I take it) Rabſſach vaunted in the ſecond of KINGS: Where is the god of Hamath? cap. 18. v. 24. cap. 18. v. 29.

†. I.

That the most of the Sonnes of CHUSH were seated in Arabia the Happy: and of the Sabaeans that robbed IOB: and of the Queene that came to SALOMON.

SEBA was the eldest fonne of Chus, the eldest fonne of Han, to make a difference betwene Him and his Nephew Sheba, the fonne of his brother Raama, or Regma (or Ragma after Montanus) his name is written with a fingle (S) Samech, and Sheba the fonne of Regma with an (S) alephete, which is the Hebrew Schin. Seba the eldest fonne of Chus, Regma his brother, and Sheba the fonne of Regma posselt both the fhores of Arabia Felix. Saba tooke that part toward the Red Sea, as neerest his Father Chus, and the Land of the Chusites: Regma and Sheba the East coast of the fame Arabia, which looketh into the Gulfe of Perfus; of which *P*LINE: Sabæi Arabum populi propter thura clarissimi ad vitas, maria porrecti gentibus habitant; The Sabæan people of Arabia, famous for their Frankincense, extending their Nations, dwell along both the Seas, (to wit) the Perfian, and the Arabian, or Red Sea. This Countrey was afterwards called Arabia, & populi mixtionē, faith Pollusius. To this agreeeth Ptoleme, who setteth the Citie of Saba towards the Arabian or Red Sea, and the Citie Rhegama towards the Perfian, with whom also we may leave Saba for so much Montanus gatheredeth out of Ptoleme, because he remembereth a Nation (called Stabæi) neere the Perfian Sea; and Massabathe which defended the same. But Montanus hath sent Regma, or (as he calls him Rabma) into Carmania, for which I see no reason. Iosphus, who onely attended his owne families, hath banished Saba or Saba to the border of Ethiopia.

But Beroaldus thinks it strange, that the Sabei, which stole away Iob's Cattle, should runne through all Egypt, and all Arabia Petrea, and finde out Iob in Traconitis, betweene Palestina and Calefyria 1200. miles off. Now, as this coniecture was more then ridiculous, so doe I thinke, that neither the Sabei on the Red Sea, nor those toward the Persian Sea, could by any meanes execute the stealth upon Iob, which sooner Beroaldus shall take for necesse. But these were the Sabei of Arabia the Desart, where Guilandinus Melchior affirmeth out of his owne experience, that the Citie Saba is seated: the fame which Ptoleme calls Saua, now Semiscasae: and from this Saba in Arabia the Desart, came those Magi or Wise-men which worshipped Christ, faith Melchior, whose wordes are these: The Magi came neither out of Mesopotamia (as 10 Chrysostome, Hierome, and Ambrose supposed) nor out of Arabia the Happie, as many wise men doe beleue, but out of Saba in Arabia the Desart: which Cite when my selfe was there, was (as I indged it) called Semiscasae. And to approue this opinion of Guilandinus, it appeareth that these Sabei were neighbours to Iob, and lay fit to invade and rob him. For both the other Nations (I will those on the Persian Sea, as those on the Red Sea) are so disioyned with large Desarts, as there is no possibilitie for strangers to passe them, especially with any numbers of Cattle, both in respect of the mountaines, of the sands, and of the extreme want of water in those parts: Vbi nec homines, nec bestia videntur, nec aues, in d. nec a bores, nec germen aliquod, sed non nisi montes saxosi, altissimi, asperissimi; Where there are found neither men, nor beasts, no not so much as birds, 20 altrissimi, asperissimi; Where there are found neither men, nor beasts, no not so much as birds, or trees, nor any pasture or grasse, but only sharpe, and high stonie, and craggie mountaines. Beroaldus and Pererius conceiue, that the Queene of Saba which came to visite Salomon, was of the Sabei on the East side of Arabia Felix; but the contrarie seemeth more probable, and that shee was Queene of Saba towards the Red Sea: for Salomon at that time commanding all that part of Arabia Petrea, twixt Idumaea and the Red Sea, as farre downe as Adisan or Maadian, and Ezion Gaber: and this Queene of Saba which inhabited the West part of Arabia Felix, being his neighbour, might without any farre trouble enter his Territories, free from all danger of surpris by any other Prince or Nation.

But to avoid tediousnesse, it is manifest that Seba or Saba, Sabta, Raama, or Regma, 30 with his Sonnes Sheba and Dedan, and Sabteca, were all the possellers of Arabia the Happie, and the Desart: onely Hauilah and Nimrod dwelt together on the East side Chus, who held Arabia Petrea. Now for Sabta, there is found of his name the Citie of Sabbatha or Sabota in the fame Arabia: of which both Plinie and Ptoleme; who withall nameth Sabotale, within the walls whereof there were sometimes found sixtie Temples. Ezechiel ioyneeth the Father and the Sonne together, The Merchants of Sheba and Raama were thy Merchants. And that they wereth the Eastern Arabians their merchandise witnesseth, formerly repeated in the Chapter of Paradise. For Iosephus his fancies, that Saba was the parent of the Ethiopiens about Meroe, and Sabta of the Ethiopiens Asiabari, they bee not worthe any farther answer then 40 hath already bene given: especially seeing these Citties preferring the memorie of the names of Saba, and of Sabta in Arabia were yet remaining in Ptolemies time, though in some letters changed. As also in the coastes adioyning, the names of other of the brethren of the familie of Chus, with little alterations are preferred. In Arabia the Desart is found the Citie Saba or Saua, (now Semiscasae) with the Citie of Rhegma for Rhegma; and the Nation by Ptoleme himselfe called Rabeni of Raamah. In Arabia the Happie is found the Citie of Rhegama, and Rabana; which also keepeth the sound of Rhegma, the Citie of Saptha or Saptah, not far from the East coast of Arabia: as also the Metropolis and chiefe Citie in the body of the South part of Arabia, called without difference or alteration Sabatha; and to the West of Sabatha towards the Red Sea the great Citie of Saba; and the Nation adioyning, Sabei: & to the South thereof againe toward the freight entrance of the Red Sea, the Region of Saba. To all these his Brothers and Nephewes which were seated on the East side of Arabia, Hauilah by the passage of Tigris was a neighbour, to whom he might passe by Bore 50 euen

¶ II.

IOSEPHVS his opinion of DEDAN, one of the issue of CHUS to haue bene seated in the West Ethiopia, disproued out of EZECHIEL: and HIEREMIE.

10 AND whereas Iosephus (whom in this S. Hierome followeth, as not curious herein) sent Dedan the sonne of Raamah into West Ethiopia, it is strange that Ezechiel should couple Sheba, Raamah, and Dedan together; Dedan in the 15. Verse, and Sheba, and Raamah in the 22. Verses to be the Merchants of Tyre; if Dedan had dwelt in West Ethiopia, which is distant from Raamah and Sheba (the habitation of his father and brother) about 4000. miles. Besides which the merchandise that the Dedanites brought to Tyre doth not make them naked Black-mores. For they of Dedan (faith Ezechiel) were thy Merchants in precious clothes for thy Chariots; and these Western Ethiopiens neuer saw cloth, till the Portugals seeking those Coastes traded with them: the merchandise of the Countie being Hides, Elephants teeth, some 20 Gold and Amber, Ciuer Cats, and Rice, but nothing at all of any manufacture: and all these they exchanged for linnen, or yron chieflie.

But in those dayes the West part of Africa within the body of the land was known onely by imagination: and, being vnder the burnt Zone was held vninhabitable. And therefore that the Negros of the West Ethiopia, which inhabite about Serra Liona, or Niger, could either passe by Sea or Land to Tyre in the bottome of the Mediterranean Sea, was a strange, or rather a foolish fancie. Now to put it out of dispute that Dedan also dwelt by the rest of the children of Chus, which feates they held by that name in the time of Hieremie the Prophet, let vs heare Hieremie his owne words: Hee, yee Inhabitants of Dedan, for I haue brought the destruction of Esau upon him. 30 Hereby it appeareth that Dedan was a Neighbour to the Idumeans: and Idumaea is a Prouince of Arabia Petrea: and Dedan which dwelt on the North part of Arabia Felix, ioyne'd in that part to Petrea, the seat of his Grand-father Chus; which neighbourhood and fellowship of Dedan and the Idumeans, is also confirmed by Ezechiel: Ezech. cap. 35. I will stretch out mine hand vpon Edom, and destroy Man and Beast out of it, and I will make it desolate from Teman: and they of Dedan shall fall by the sword. ver. 13.

¶ XIII.

of the issue of MIZRAIM: and of the place of HIEREMIE, Chap. 9. Vers. 7.

FTER Chus it followeth to speake of Mizraims sonnes, whose names (faith Saint Augustine) were plurall, to signifie the Nations, which came of them. Ludim, the eldest sonne of Mizraim, was the father of the Lybians in Africa: and the rest of his brothers disperfed themselves into all Regions adioyning. Among the sonnes of Shem there is also Lud; but he is differenced from Lud the sonne of Mizraim by the singular number: the sonne of Shem being written Lud, the sonne of Mizraim, Ludim: and yet these Names and Nations are often confounded, notwithstanding the apparent difference 50 both of Names and Nations. For that Ludim the sonne of Mizraim was the parent of the Lybians in Africa, and that he was seated not farre from Mizraim his father, appeareth by the Prophet Hieremie, who ioyneeth them in this fort together: Come vp ye Horses, and rage ye Chariots, and let the valiant men come forth, the Black-moors, and the Lybians which beare the shield: for those Nations assisted the Egyptians being of one one parent defended. And in Ezechiel, Phus and Lud are ioyned together. Ethiopia (or Chus) saith Ezechiel c. 30. v. 3. And Phut and Lyd, and all the common people, and the men of the Land that are in league (shall fall with them by the sword : as it is much to say, as the fonnnes of Chus) (which were the Chusites) the fonnnes of Afrazaim, which were the Egyptians and the Lybians (defended of his fonne Lud) with other the inhabitants of Egypt and Africa shall fall together. Hieroglymitanus findes also in Africa a Nation of the Lydians. And I beleue it: because Hieronymus ioyneth the Lybians and Lydians together in the place before remembred. But Lybia in Africa is by the Hebrewes called Ludim (saith Arias Montanus) though 2.Chron. 12.3. they seeme to be called Lubim or Lubei, a name somewhat neerer the word Lybie, and by which it may seeme that the truer writing is, not Lybie, but Lybies. Neither is it here to be omitted, that Pintus (vpon the thirtieth of Ezechiel) vnderstandeth that which is spoken in the third Verse of Lud, not to be meane of the Lybians at all : for he will haue this threatening to be meane againt the people of Lydia, a Citie (saith he) betwene Egypt and Palestina, which opinion I could not mislike if the Citie of Lyda were so leated. But Lyda (which should be written Lydda with a double D, and is the same Citie which was afterward Diaspolis, in which S.Petr cured Aenes of the palsey; standeth neere the Torrent Gaza, not farre from Joppe the Port of Hiera/Alem. Yet it is not impossible but that this Citie might haue Lud for the Founder. For there are many Cities of one name founded in all the Regions of the World, and farre asunder; as after the names of Alexander, Seleucus, and Antiochus, many Cities called Alexandria, Seleucia, and Antiochia, so of diuers others. S. Hierome maketh Lebanim to be the Father of Lilya, who was the third fonne of Afrazaim: and so doth Poellius; and either opinion may be true.

The rest of Mizraims Sonnes haue no proper Countries given them in the Scriptures, saving Cassabim and Caphthorim, of whom came the Philistims, whom the Scriptures call Peleset.

These Cassibim inhabited Cassotis, a Region lying in the entrance of Aegypt from Palestina, in which the Lake Sirbonis, and the Mountayne Cassius are found: not farre from whence Pompey was buried.

from whence Pompey was buried. Capthorim called neere Caslabim in that Tract of Egypt called Sethbrois, not farre from Pelufum. Strabo calls it Sethbrois; Stephanus and Plinie, Sethbrois, of the Cite Sethron: whome Orelus takes to be the same which Ptoleme calls Hercules parva. Of the Caslabim and Capthorim came the Philistims, which are called by the Septuaginta Apholyti (which is) Alienigena, Strangers, or of a frange kindred. These Philistims inhabited the South part of the holy Land towards Egypt, of whom Psallina tooke name. For the Hebrewes (saith Iffidore) doe not vnder the letter (P) but in read of it (ph). Their principall Cities were Gaza, Afalon, Azotus, Gerth, and Accaron: and the people of them called Gasai, Afalomatici, Azotij, Gebei, and Accaronites. Iffidore affirms, that Afalon was first called Philistim: and of that Cite the Countrie adioyning. But where Iffidore had it, I know not.

The first known King of the Philistims was that Abimelech, who had a liking to Abrahams wife; with whom Abraham made a covenant and league. This Abimelech dwelt indeed at this time in Gerar; but it is written that he was also King of the Philistims, in these wordes: Wherefore ISAAC went to ABIMELECH King of the Philistims unto Gerar. Now in regard that this or some ancient Abimelech governed the commonwealth greatly to his glorie, the rest of his successors called themselves by the same name. The Philistims commanded that Traict of land upon the Mediterranean Sea to the Northward, from the Caffe of Pilgrims (otherwise Casarea Palestina, or Stratons Towre) which was the South-border of Phenicia, to Gaza, or to the River of Egypt. The Anakims or strong Gyants were of these Philistims: and Goliath was of Geth one of the five Cities above named. They had sometimes five Kings, kept Lyrans. They mastered the Israelites at severall times above 150. yeeres, and seized their Tributaries, till they were weakened by Sampson and Samuel, but in in the end this yoke was taken off by David, and laid on themselves.

It is objected, that because these Cities and the Countries adjoining, were held by the Ionnes of Mizraim, therefore did the Israelites dispossesse the Ionnes of Mizraim, and not of Canaan, by forcing those places.

To this faith Pererius, that although the Palestines or Philistims held it in the time of Iefus, yet at the time of the promise it was posselt by the Canaanites; as in the second of Deuteronomi. The Heuteis dwelt in the Villages vnto Gaza. And what maruaile, if (the Canaanites being the greater part) the denomination were from them? For that the Philistims were of Caphor, and so of Mizraim and not of Canaan, beides Mofes the Prophet Heremie witnesleth: The Lord will destroy the Philistims, the remnant of the issue of Caphor; and in like manner in the ninth of Amos, the Philistims are said to beeth reliques of Caphorims; Have not I brought up ISRAEL out of the Land of Egypt, and the Philistims from Caphor, and ARAM from Kir? So I reade this place with diuers of the learned. For whereas the Vulgar hath, & Palestines of Cappadocia, & Syros of Cyrene, this conuerfion Berosius condemneth; where Caphor is taken for Cappadocia, and Cyrene for Kir. For Cyrene is a Citie directly Welt from Egypt, betweene Ptolemus or Bace and Apollonia; but Kir in Afia vnder the Alfyrians: Iustus hath it Kir, and not Cyrene; and so hath the Geneua. But Pererius calls Caphorim Cappadocia, according to the Vulgar translation, to which he is bound: and yet it is not altogether improbable if he meane Cappadocia in Palestina, and not that Cappadocia by the Sea Pontus in the North of Afia the lesse. For whether they inhabited Sethreites, or Cappadocin of Palestina, it is not certainly knowne. And sure in this manner he may expound Cappadocia to be ambiguous, as well as he doth Cyrene: taking it here not for Cyrene in Affica, but for a place in Media. For it is written in the second of King, that Teglatphalaser King of the Affyrians carried away the Inhabitants of Daniasus into Kir; and so Iofephus seemes to vnderland this Kir, for Cyrene in Media, calling this Cyrene, Media superior: for it was the manner and policie of the Affyrians to transplant the people conquered by them, as they did the Samaritans or Israelites, and other Nations. And hereof it came that Kir was called Syro-Media: because the Syrians by the Affyrians were therein captiued.

It remayneth lastly to speake of the Sonnes of Sem; who were these:

1. Alam, or Elam,
2. Ashur,
3. Arphaxad,
4. Lud, and
5. Aram.

50 He posteritie of Sem, Moses recounteth after the rest: because from them he proceedeth in order with the Genealogie and Storie of the

Of these five sonnes the Scriptures remember the length of the life of Arphaxad only, and only the children of him and Aram, the rest are barely spoken of by rehearsal of their names, sauing that it may be gathered, that Assur (who was supposed to found Ninive) was also said to be the Father of the Assyrians, whose issues, and the issues of Cham, infantly contended for the Empire of the East: which sometimes the Assyrians; sometimes the Babylonians obeyed, according to the vertue of their Princes. This is the common opinion, which also teacheth vs, that all the East parts of the World were peopled by Assur, Elam, and Lud (sauiug India) which I beleuee Noah himselfe first inhabited: and to whom Ophir and Hauilah the sonnes of Isack afterward repayed. Hij filij Sem ab Euphrate flauio partem Asia usq; ad Oceanum Indicum tenuerunt; These sonnes of SEM (saith S. Hierome) held all those Regions from Euphrates to the Indian Ocean.

10^{of Ant. l. 6. c. 7.}

Of Elam came the Elamites, remembered Acts 2. vers. 9. and the Princes of Persia; which namethen began to be out of vse and lost, when the Persians became Masters of Babylonia: the East Monarchie being established in them. Some prophane Writers distinguish Elam from Persia, and make the Elamites a people apart. But Susa (which the Scriptures call Susan) in Elam was the Kings seat of Persia (witnesseth Daniel). And I saw (saith he) in a vision, and when I saw it, I was in the Palace of Susan, which is in the Province of Elam. This Citie is embraced by the River Euleus (according to Ptoleme) in Daniel, Plai; and seated in the border of Susiana.

cap. 8. vers. 2.

Phil. 4. 3. 1. 6. Dan. 8. 2.

Assur (as most Historians beleuee) the second sonne of Sem, was Father of the Assyrians, who disdayning the pride of Nimrod, parted from Babel, and built Ninive, 20 of equall beautie and magnitude with Babylon, or exceeding it. But we shall in due place disprove that opinion. Euery mans hand hath bene in this Storie, and therefore I shall not neede herein to speake much: for the Assyrians so often invaded and spoyled the Israelites, destroyed their Cities, and led them Captiues, as both in Diuine and Humane letters there is large and often mention of this Nation.

But howsoever Herodotus and D. Siculus extend this Empire, and honor this Nation with ample Dominion; yet was not the state of the Assyrians of any such power, after such time as Sardanapalus lost the Empire. For Senacherib who was one of the powerfullst Princes among them, had yet the Mountayne Taurus for the vtmost of his Dominion toward the North-east, and Syria bounded him toward the West, 30 notwithstanding those vaunts of Senacherib in Esay the 37. Hence the gods of the Nations deluered them whom my Fathers haue destroyed? as GOZAN, and HARAN, and RESEPH, and the Children of EDEN which were at Telsassar. Where is the King of Hamath, and the King of Arphad, and the King of the Citie Sepharuaim, Hens and Inab? All these were indeede but pettie Kings of Cities, and small Countries; as Harar in Mesopotamia: Reseph in Palmyrena: Hamath or Emath in Itura, vnder Libanus: the Ile of Eden: Sepher, and others of this sort. Yea, Nabuchodonosor, who was most powerfull, before the conquest of Agypt had but Chaldea, Mesopotamia, and Syria, with Palestina and Phenicia parts thereof. But in this question of Assur, I will speake my opinion freely when I come to Nimrod, whose plantation I haue omitted among 40 the rest of the Chusites, because he established the first Empire: from whom the most memorable storie of the World taketh beginning.

Of Arphaxad came the Chaldeans, saith S. Hierome, and Iosephus, but it must be those Chaldeans about Ur: for the sonnes of Cham posselt the rest. It is true that he was the Father of the Hebreues: for Arphaxad begat Shela; and Shela, Heber; of whom hereafter.

And that Lud, the fourth Sonne of Shem, gaue name to the Lydians in Asia the lesse, is the common opinion, taken from Iosephus and S. Hierome; but I see not by what reason he was moued to straggle thither from his friends.

†. II.

†. II.

Of ARAM, and his Sonnes.

ARAM the fifth and last Sonne of Shem was the parent of the Syrians: of which Damasus was head. Their name was changed from Aram or Aramites by Syrus (sayth Eusebius out of Iosephus) which Syrus liued before Moses was borne; the same which others call the sonne of Apollo. Mesopotamia also being but a Province of Syria had the name of Aram Nabariym, which is as much to say, as Syria duorum flumium, Syria compassed with two Riues: (to wit) Tigris and Euphrates. The Scriptures call it Mesopotamia, Syria, and Padan Aram: and the Greekes Mesopotamia simply.

Euseb. 7. 2. 8. Euseb. p. 10. 6.

Arise and get thee to Padan Aram (sayth Isaac to Jacob) to the house of BETHUEL thy mothers father, and thence take thee a wife. Strabo also remembreth it by the ancient name of Aram or Aramea, as these his owne words conuerted witnesseth: Quoniam Syri vocantur, ipsi Syri Armenios & Arames vocant; These which we call Syrians (sayth hee) themselves call Armenians and Arameans.

Gen. 28. 2. See Gen. 25. 10. Allo Dent. 33. 4. Ind. 3. Ptol. 1. 19. Plal. 59. Strabo 1. 1.

Against this opinion, that Aram the sonne of Sem was the Father and Denominator of the Syrians in generall; (and not only of those in Syria, Inter-amnis, which is 20 Mesopotamia) some reade, Genes 22. 21. Kemuel, the Father of the Syrians: where other out of the originall read Kemuel, the sonne of Aram. Neither is it any inconuenience for vs to vnderstand the word (Aram) here, not for the Nation, but for the name of some one of note; the rather, because in the Historie of Abraham and Isaac (which was in time long before *Kemuel*s Posteritie could bee famous) wee find Mesopotamia called Aram; and that with an addition: sometimes with Nabariym, and sometimes of Padan, to distinguish it from another Aram, which (as it seemes) then also was called Aram. For whereas Iunius thinkes in his note vpon Genes 25. 20. that Padan Aram ought to bee restrained to some part of Mesopotamia, (to wit) to that part which Ptoleme calls Ancobartus (so called from the River Chaboras, which 30 diuiding it runneth into Euphrates) the promiscuous vse of Padan Aram, and Aram Nabariym (which latter appellation questionlesse comprehends the whole Mesopotamia) may seeme to refute this opinion: especially seeing the signification of this appellation agreeeth with the whole Region. For it signifieth as much as the yoke of Syria, which name agrees with this Region: because the two Riues, (as it were) yoked together goe along it. The Reliques of the name Padan appeare in the name of two Cities in Ptoleme, called Aphadana: (as Iunius hath well noted) the one vpon Chaboras, the other vpon Euphrates.

The Sonnes of Aram were,

Vz or Hus,
Hul, Gether, and Mesh or Mes.

Vz or Hus inhabited about Damasus, and built that Citie, saith Iosephus and Saint Hierome. But Tostatus mistaking this opinion, both in them and in Lyra, who also followeth Iosephus, affirmeth that *Abraham*s Steward Eliezer was the Founder thereof; though it were likely that Hus the eldest sonne of Aram dwelt neere vnto his father, who inhabited the bodie of Syria. For Hus was a Region of the same adioyning to Arabia the Desert, and to Batanea or Traconitis: whereof the Prophet Hieremie; 50 Reioyce and be glad O Daughter of Edom that dwellest in the Land of Hus. Hus therefore is seated beyond Jordan, in the East Region of Traconitis, adioyning to Batana, hauiug Batanea Gaulonitis, and the Mountaine Seir to the East, Edrai to the South, Damasus North, and Jordan West: hauiug in it many Cities and people, as may also bee gathered out of Hieremie: And all sorts of people: and all the Kings of the Land of Hus.

In

In this Region dwelt Iob, descended of Hus, the sonne of Nabor, the brother of Abraham (sayth Saint Hierome) and married Dina the Daughter of Jacob, sayth Philo.

Hul the second sonne of Aram, Saint Hierome makes the Father of the Armenians; and Gether the third sonne, parent to the Armenians or Carians: which opinion, (because I find not where to set him) I do not disprove, though I see no reason why Gether should leave the fellowship of his owne brethren, and dwell among Strangers in Asia the lesse. Iunius giues Hul (whom hee writes Chul) the Desart of Palmirena, as farreas Euphrates, where Ptolomie setteth the Citie of Chole.

Gether (sayth Iosephus) founded the Bactrians; but Iosephus gaue all Nubis children feathers, to carrie them farre away in all haste. For mine owne opinion I alwayes keepe the rule of Neighbour-hood, and thinke with Iunius: (to wit) That Gether seated himselfe neere his brothers, in the bodie of Syria, and in the Prouince of Cassotis, and Selenis, where Ptolomie placeth Gindarus, and the Nation by Plinie called Gindareni.

Iunius also giueth to Mes or Mesob the North part of Syria, betweene Cilicia and Mesopotamia, neere the Mountaine Mafius. The certaintie of those Plantations can no otherwise be knowne then by this probabilitie, that Aram the father (of whom that great Region tooke name) planted his sonnes in the same Land about him: for hee wanted no scope of Territorie for himselfe and them; neither then when the World was newly planted, nor in many hundred yeeres after: and therefore theris no reason to cast them in the Desart parts of the World, so farre asunder. And as necessitie and policie held them together for a while: so Ambition (which began to gather with Angels and Men) inhabiting the hearts of their children, set them asunder. For although these sonnes of Aram, and the sonnes of the rest of Nashis children, kept themselves within the bounds of some one large Kingdome; yet therein euery one also fought a Prouince apart, and to themselves giuing to the Cities there-in built their owne names, thereby to leaue their memorie to their Posteritie: the vie of Letters being then rare, and knowne to few.

In this sort did the pride of the Spaniards in America cast them into so many Prouinces: euery one emulating and disdayning the greatnesse of other, as they are thereby to this day subiect to inuasion, expulsion, and destruction: so as (Nova Hispania and Peru excepted, because those Countries are vnaccessable to Strangers) an easie force will cast them out of all the rest.

Mes the fourth sonne made the parent of the Moonians: of whom something hath bene spoken already. Arphaxad the third sonne of Shem, begat Shelub, and Heber. Heber had two sonnes, Phaleg and Ischaw: and in Phaleg's time was the Earth diuided.

Chap. 8. §. 7.

†. III.

Of the diuision of the Earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the sonnes of Heber, of the issue of Shem.

THE many people which at the diuision (at Phaleg's birth) were then liuing, and the through Plantation of all the East part of the World (at his death) hath made a doubt, whether the Earth were diuided at eyther. The Hebrewes (sayth Pererius out of Sedar Holam, one of their Chronicles) affirme that this partition happened at the death of Phaleg: and Phaleg was borne in the yeere after the Flood 101. and liued in all 239. yeeres, which numbers added makes 340. And therefore was it so many yeeres after the Flood, ere the children of Noah seuered themselves. But so to this opinion of the Hebrewes, and the doubt they make, how in so few yeeres as 101. (the time of Phaleg's birth) so many people could be increased, Pererius giues this answer, that if 70. persons of the Family of Jacob increased to 600000. fighting men in 215. yeeres, (besides women, children, and impotent persons) how much more more is it likely, that so soone after the Flood the children of Noah might in a shorter time bring forth many multitudes, hauing receiued the blessing of God, increase and multiply, and fill the Earth? What strength this answer hath, let others iudge: for the children of Israel were 70. and had 215. yeeres time: and the sonnes of Noah were but three, and had but 101. yeeres of time, to the birth of Phaleg.

Others conceiue that Phaleg tooke that name after the diuision, in memorie thereof: as Iosephus and Saint Augustine, who reason in this manner. If the diuision were at Phaleg's death (which happened in the yeere, which is commonly held to be the 48. of Abraham, but was by more likely computation 12. yeeres before his birth) then was the diuision 38. yeeres after Ninus, who gouerned 52. yeeres in the 43. yeere of whose raigne Abraham was borne. But when Ninus began to rule the Assyrians, 80. yeeres before this diuision (as this diuision is placed by the Hebrewes, Hierome and Chrysostome) then was the earth so peopled in all the East and Northerne parts, as greater numbers haue not bene found at any time since. For Ninus associating to himselfe Arius King of Arabia, a people who at that time (sayth Diod. Siculus) plurimum opibus atq; armis prestant, Exceeded both in riches and bodies of men, subdued many Cities in Armenia; receiued Babylon into grace; then invaded Media, and crucified Pharnus the King thereof, with his Wife and seuen Children; vanquished all those Regions betweene Nilus and Tanais, the Aegyptians, Phenicians, the Kingdomes of Syria, and all the Nations of Persia, to the Hyrcanian Sea. For the numbers which followed Ninus (alreadie remembered out of Ctesias) against Zoroaster and others: and Zoroaster on the other side, who made resistance with foure hundred thousand, prouoe it sufficiently, that if the diuision had not happened before the death of Phaleg, there had needed no diuision at that time at all. For some of them were so ill satisfied with their partitions, as they fought to be Masters of all, and greater Armies were there neuer gathered then by Ninus and Semiramis: wherefore in this opinion there is little appearance of the truth.

But for that conceit that if the diuision had bene made at the birth of Phaleg, there were not then sufficient numbers borne to fill the earth: It was neuer meant that the earth could be filled euery where at the instant, but by times and degrees: And surely whatsoeuer mens opinions haue bene herein, yet it is certaine, that the diuision of tongues and of men must goe neere together with the ceasing of the worke at Babel: and that the enterprize of Babel was left off instantly vpon the confusion of Languages, where followed the execution of the diuision; and so neyther at the birth nor death of Phaleg: for Phaleg was borne in the yeere 101. after the Flood, which was the yeere that Nimrod came into Shinaar, or 10. yeeres after hee arrived, sayth Berosus.

Now if it bee objected that Phaleg (the Etymologie of whose name signifieth diuision) must haue liued without a name, except the name had bene giuen him at the time of this confusion and partition: to this objection it may be answered, That the change of names vpon diuers accidents is not rare in the Scriptures: for Jacob was called Israel after he had wrestled with the Angell; Abraham was first Abram; and Eodem Esau; and that Phaleg being a principall man in this diuision had his first name vpon this accident changed, it is most probable.

And lastly, whereas the Hebrewes, Saint Hierome and Chrysostome account Heber a great Prophet, if that by giuing his sonne the name of Phaleg, hee foretold the diuision which followed: to this I say, I do not find that Heber deserved any such honour, if he had thereupon so called his sonne: for diuision and dispersion followeth increase of people of necessitie; and this Prophesie (if any such had bene) might also haue reference to the diuision, which afterwards fell among the Hebrewes themselves.

But if we giue a reasonable time to the building of the Towre and Citie of Babel, by which time many people (by reason and by demonstratiue prooue) might be increased: and that vpon the fall thereof the confusion and diuision followed (where-

Of the sonnes of IOCTAN, the other sonne of HEBER.

1. Elmedad.
2. Saleph, or Seleph, or Sheleph.
3. Asamath, or Chatzar.
4. Iere, or Ierabb, or Ierath.
5. Hadoram.
6. Vzal, or Vzal.
7. Dicklach, or Dicla.
8. Obal, or Ebal, or Hobal.
9. Abimael.
10. Sheba, or Seba.
11. Ophir, or Opir.
12. Haulah, or Chauila, and 13. Jobab.

The sonnes of Ioctan were

ALL those sonnes of Ioctan (according to Saint Hierome) dwelled in the East parts of the World, or India, euen from the Riuer Cophe or Chous, which is one of the branches or heads of Indus.

But the certaine places of those thirteene Sonnes cannot bee gathered out of the Scriptures, the words of Moses being generall. And their dwelling was from Mesha as thou goest vnto Sephar a Mount in the East. Of all these thirteene Sonnes, there were only three memorable, (to wit) Sheba, Ophir, and Haulah. Concerning whose names, to auoide confusion it is to be obserued, that among the Sonnes of Chush, two of them had also the names of Seba and Haulah. Abraham had also a third Saba, his grand-child by his wife Ketura. But Seba the sonne of Chush, and Sheba the sonne of Rhexma his Nephew, wee haue left in Arabia Felix: and Haulah the sonne of Chush vpon Tigris. Saba the grand-child of Abraham was (as some haue thought) the Father of the Sabaens in Persia: of which Nations Dionysius de Orbis situ, maketh mention. Primum Sabai; post hoc sunt Passagardae; prope verò hos sunt Tasci. The first are Sabaens: after these be Passagardae; and neere these be Tasci. And whereas it is written: But vnto the Sonnes of the Concubines which ABRAHAM had, ABRAHAM gave gifts, and sent them away from ISAAC his sonne (while hee yet liued) Eastward to the East-Country: hereupon it is supposed, that this Saba the sonne of Abraham wandered into Persia: for Persia was accounted the furthestmost East-Country in respect of India; which also Ouid setteth vnder the Sun-rising. Yet seeing the rest of Abraham's sonnes seated themselves on the borders of India, I rather choose to leaue Saba the sonne of Abraham in Arabia the Desert, where Ptolomie setteth a Citie of that name.

But Saba the sonne of Ioctan, the sonne of Heber, (as I conceiue) inhabited India itselfe. For Dionysius Afer in his Periegesis, (or description of the World) which he wrote in Greeke Verse, among the Regions of India findeth a Nation called the Sabai. Taxilus has intermedios habitati Sabaei: In the middle of these dwell the Sabai, and so the Taxili, sayth this Dionysius.

Of OPHIR one of IOCTANS sonnes, and of Peru, and of that voyage of SALOMON.

OPHIR also was an Inhabitant of the East India, and (as S. Hierome vnderstands it) in one of the Ilands plentifull of gold, which are now knowne by the name of Molucca. Iosephus vnderstands Ophir to be one of those great head-lands in India, which by a generall name are called Cherfoneis, or Peninsula: of which there are two very notorious; Calicut, and Malacca. Ptolemy takes it rightly for an Iland, as Saint Hierome doth, but he sets it at the head-land of Malacca. But Ophir is found among the Moluccas farther East.

Arias Montanus out of the second of Chronicles, the third Chapter and sixt Verse, gathers that Ophir was Peru in America, looking into the West Ocean, commonly called Mare del Sur, or the South Sea; by others Mare pacificum. The wordes in the second of the Chronicles are these: And he overlaid the house with precious stones for beantie; and the gold was gold of Parauim. Ivnivs takes this gold to be the gold of Haulah, remembered by Moses in the description of Paradise: And the gold of that Land is good: finding a Towne in Characene a Province of Susiana called Barbatia; Gen 2.11. & 12. Plin. lib. 6. c. 28. so called (as he thinks) by corruption for Parauim: from whence those Kings subiects by David brought this gold, with which they presented him; and which David preferred for the enriching of the Temple.

But this fancie of Peru hath deceived many men, before Montanus, and Plesir, who also tooke Ophir for Peru. And that this question may be a subject of no farther dispute; it is very true, that there is no Region in the World of that name: sure I am that at least America hath none, no not any Citie, Village, or Mountayne so called. But when Francis Pizarro first discovered those Lands to the South of Panama, arriving in that Region which Atabaliba commanded (a Prince of magnificence, Riches and Dominion inferior to none) some of the Spaniards vnto the ignorance of that language, demanding by signes (as they could) the name of the Countrey, and pointing with their hand athwart a Riuer, or Torrent, or Brooke that ranne by, the Indians answered Peru, which was either the name of that Brooke, or of water in generall. The Spaniards thereupon conceiuing that the people had rightly vnderstood them, set it downe in the Diurnall of their enterprise, and so in the first description made, and sent ouer to Charles the Emperour, all that West part of America to the South of Panama had the name of Peru, which hath continued euer since as diuers Spaniards in the Indies assured me; which also Acosta the Iesuite in his naturall and morall Historie of the Indies confirmeth. And whereas Montanus also findeth, that a part of the Indies (called Incastin) tooke that name of Ioctan, who as he supposed navigated from the vtmost East of India to America: it is most true, that Incastan is nothing else in the language of that Countrey, but (What is this) or (What say you?) For when the Spaniards asked the name of that place (no man conceiuing their meaning) one of the Saluages answered Incastan (which is) What aske you, or what say you? The like hapned touching Paria, a mountaynous Countrey on the South side of Trinidad and Margotia: for when the Spaniards inquiring (as all men doe) the names of those new Regions which they discovered, pointed to the Hills as farre off, one of the people answered, Paria, which is as much to say; as high Hills or Mountaynes. For at Paria begins that maruailous ledge of Mountaynes, which from thence are continued to the Strait of Magellan: from eight degrees of North latitude to 52. of South; and so hath that Countrey euer since retayned the name of Paria.

The same hapned among the English, which I sent vnder Sir Richard Greenenile to inhabit Virginia. For when some of my people asked the name of that Countrey, one of the Saluages answered, Wingandacon, which is as much to say, as, You were good.

good clothes, or gay clothes. The same hapned to the Spaniard in asking the name of the Island Trinidad: for a Spaniard demanding the name of that selfe place which the Sea incompassed, they answered, Caer, which signifieth an Island. And in this manner haue many places newly discovered bene intitled, of which Peru is one. And therefore we must leaue Ophir among the Moluccas, whereabout such an Island is credibly affirmed to be.

Now although there may be found gold in Arabia it selfe (towards Persia) in Hanilah, now Sassana, and all along that East Indian shore; yet the greatest plentie is taken vp at the Philippines, certayne Islands planted by the Spaniards, from the West India. And by the length of the passage which Salomons ships made from the Red Sea, (which was three yeeres in going and coming) it seemeth they went to the uttermost East, as the Moluccas or Philippines. Indeede these that now goe from Portugall, or from hence, finish that navigation in two yeere, and sometimes lesse: and Salomons ships went not about a tenth part of this our course from hence. But we must consider, that they euermore kept the coast, and crept by the shores, which made the way exceeding long. For before the vse of the Compasse was knowne, it was impossible to navigate athwart the Ocean; and therefore Salomons ships could not finde Peru in America. Neither was it needfull for the Spaniards themselves (had it not bene for the plentie of gold in the East India Islands, farre about the mines of any one place of America) to saile euery yeere from the West part of America thither, and there to haue strongly planted, and inhabited the richest of those Islands: wherein they haue built a Citie called Manila. Salomon therefore needed not to haue gone farther off then Ophir in the East, to haue sped worse: neither could he navigate from the East to the West in those dayes, whereas he had no coast to haue guided him.

Flaccus, lib. 6.
Diod. Sicul. l. 26.

To Strabo also gathereth a fantastick opinion out of Rabanus, who makes Ophir to be a Countrey, whose Mountaynes of gold are kept by Griffins: which Mountaynes Solinus affirmeth to be in Scythia Asiatica, in these wordes: Nam cum aura & gemmis affluant, Griphes tenent vniuersa, distes ferocissima, Arimaspi cum his dimicant, &c. For whereas these Countreys abound in gold, and rich stone, the Griffins defend the one and the other: a kinde of Fowle the fiercest of all other; with which Griffins a Nation of people called Arimaspi make warre. These Arimaspi are said to haue been men with one eye only, like vnto the Cyclopes of Sicilia: of which Cyclopes, Herodotus and Aristotle make mention: and so doth Lucan in his third Booke: and Valerius Flaccus: and D. Siculus in the storie of Alexander Macedon. But (for mine owne opinion) I beleue none of them. And for these Arimaspi, I take it that this name signifying One-eyed, was first giuen them by reason that they vsed to weare a vizard of defence, with one sight in them by middle to serue both eyes; and not that they had by nature any such defect. But Solinus borroweth these things out of Plinie, who speakes of such a Nation in the extreme North, at a place called Gysitram, or the Cape of the Northeast winde. For the rest, as all fables were commonly grounded vpon some true stories or other things done: so might these tales of the Griffins receiue this Morall. That if those men which fight against so many dangerous passages for gold, or other riches of this World, had their perfect senses, and were not deprived of halfe their eye-sight (at least of the eye of right reason and vnderstanding) they would content themselves with a quiet and moderate estate; and not subiect themselves to famine, corrupt aire, violent heate, and cold, and to all sorts of miserable diseases. And though this fable be fayned in this place, yet if such a tale were told of some other places of the World, where wild Beasts or Serpents defend Mountaines of gold, it might be auowed. For there are in many places of the world, especially in America, many high and so impassable Mountaynes which are very rich and full of gold, inhabited only with Tygres, Lyons, and other rauenous and cruell beasts: into which if any man ascend (except his strength be very great) he shall be sure to finde the same warre, which the Arimaspi make against the Griffins: not that the one or other had any sense of gold, gold, or seeke to defend that metall, but being disquieted, or made afraide of themselves or their yong-ones, they grow irraged and aduenturous. In like sort it may be said that the Alegarios, (which the Egyptians call the Crocodyles) defend those Pearles which lye in the Lakes of the Inland: for many times the poore Indians are eaten vp by them, when they die for the pearle. And though the Alegarios know not the pearle, yet they finde fauour in the flesh and bloud of the Indians, whom they deuoure.

†. VI.

Of HAVILAH the sonne of IOCTAN, who also passed into the East Indies: and of MESHA and SEPHAR named in the bordering of the Families of IOCTAN: with a Conclusion of this discourse touching the plantation of the World.

OF Havilah the sonne of Ioctan, there is nothing else to be said, but that the generall opinion is, that he also inhabited in the East India in the Continent, from which Ophir passeth into the Lands adioyning. And whereas Ganges is said to water Havilah, it is meant by Havilah in the East India, which tooke name of Havilah the sonne of Ioctan: but Havilah, which Pisbon compasseth, was so called of Havilah, the sonne of Chush, as is formerly proued by this place of Scripture: SAVE (smote the) Amalekites from Havilah, as thou comest to Shur, which is before Egypt. But that Sau cuer made Warre in the East India, no man hath suspected. For an end we may conclude, that of the thirteene sonnes of Ioctan, these three, Saba, Havilah, and Ophir; though at the first seated by their brethren about the hill Mafius or Mesb, Gen. 10. 30 (to wit) betwene Cilicia and Mesopotamia; yet at length either themselves or their issues remoued into East India, leauing the other Families of Ioctan, to fill the Countreys of their first plantation, which the Scripture defines to haue bene from Mesb vnto Sephar. And although S. Hierome take Mesb to be a Region of the East India, and Sephar a Mountaine of the same (which Mountaine, Apollonius would haue to be the Andes in America) those fancies are farre beyond my vnderstanding. For the word (Eysb) in the Scriptures, wher it hath reference to Iudea, is neuer farther extended then into Persia. But Mesb is that part of the Mountaynes of Mafius in the North of Mesopotamia, out of which the Riuier Chaboras springeth which runneth by Charran: and in the same Region we also finde for Sephar (remembered by Moses) Sipphara by Ptoleme, standing to the East of the Mountaynes Mafius; from whence Ioctan hauing many sonnes, some of them might passe into India, hearing of the beaurie and riches thereof. But this was in procelle of time.

The other falshood of planting I vnderstand not, being grounded but vpon mens 40 imaginations, contrarie to reason and possibilitie. And that this Mountaine in the East was no farther off then in those Regions before remembered, it appeareth by many places of the Scripture where the same phrase is vsed: as in Numbers 23. BA. Perst. LAC the King of Moab hath brought me from Aram, out of the Mountaine of the East; which was from the East part of Mesopotamia. For Balaam brought Balaam out of Mesopotamia, (witnesseth this place of DEUTERONOMIE) Because they hyred Balaam the sonne of Beor, of Pethor in Aram Nabarajim, to curse thee: for Aram Nabarajim was Syria fluniorum, which is Mesopotamia, as aforesaid.

This plantation of the World after the flood doth best agree (as to me it seemes) with all the places of Scripture compared together. And these be the reports of 50 Reason and probable coniecture; the Guides which I haue followed herein, and which I haue chosen to goe after, making no valuation of the opinions of men, conducted by their owne fancies, be they ancient or moderne. Neither haue I any end herein, priuate, or publike, other then the discouerie of truth. For as the partialitie of man to himselfe hath disguised all things: so the factious and hireling Historians of of all Ages (especially of these latter times) haue by their many Volumes of vntre reports left Honor without a Monument, and Virtue without Memorie: and (in stead thereof) haue erected Statues and Trophies to those, whom the darkeſt forgetfulneſſe ought to haue buried, and couered ouer for euermore. And although the length and diſſolving Nature of Time, hath worne out or changed the Names and memorie of the Worlds firſt planters after the flood (I meane the greateſt number and moſt part of them) yet all the foot-ſteps of Antiquitie (as appeares by that which hath bene ſpoken) are not quite worne out nor ouer-growne: for Babylon hath to this day the found of Babel; Phenicia hath Zidon, to which Citie the eldeſt Sonne of Canaan gaue name; ſo hath Cilicia Thaſis; and the Armenians, Medes, Hibernians, Cappadocians, Phrygians, the Syrians, Idumeans, Libyans, Moores, and other Nations, haue preſerued from the death of forgetfulneſſe ſome ſignes of their firſt Founders and true Parents.

CHAP. IX.

Of the beginning and eſta bliſhing of Gouernement.

20

Of the proceeding from the firſt Gouernement vnder the eldeſt of Families to Regall, and from Regall abſolute, to Regall tempered with Lawes.

T followeth now to entreate how the World beganne³⁰ to receiue Rule and Gouernement, which (while it had ſcarcitie of People) vnder-went no other Dominion then Paternitic and Eldership. For the Fathers of Nations were then as Kings, and the eldeſt of Families as Princes. Hereof it came, that the word (Elder) was alwayes vſed both for the Magiſtrate, & for thoſe of Age and Grauitie: the ſame bearing one ſignification almoſt in all languages. For in the eleuenth of Numbers God commanded Moses to gather together⁴⁰ 70. of the Elders of the people, and Gouernours ouer them: the Hebrew bearing the ſame ſenſe, which the Latine word Senes or Seniores doth. So it is written in Sysanna, Then the Aſſembly beleued them as thoſe that were the Elders and Iudges of the People. And ſo in the words of thoſe falſe Iudges and witrneſſes to Daniel, Shew it vnto vs, ſeeing God hath giuen thee the office of an Elder. Demosthenes vſeth the ſame word for the Magiſtrate among the Gracians. Cicero in Cato giueth two other reaſons for this appellation: Apud Lacedaemonios qui ampliffimum Magiſtratum gerunt, ut ſunt, ſic etiam appellantur Senes; Among the Lacedaemonians the chiefe Magiſtrates, as they are, ſo are they called Eldermen: and againe, Ratio & prudentia niſi eſſent in ſenibus, non ſummum Concilium Maiores noſtri appellaffent Senatum; If reaſon and aduiſement were not in old men, our Anceſters had neuer called the higheſt Councell by the name of a Senate. But though theſe reaſons may well be giuen, yet we doubt not but in this name of (Elders) for Gouernours or Counſailers of State,⁵⁰ there is a ſigne that the firſt Gouernours were the Fathers of Families; and vnder them them the eldest Sonnes. And from thence did the French, Italian, and Spaniard take the word (Signor) and out of it (Seignourie) for Lordship and Dominion: signifying (according to Loysan) puissance in proprietic, or proper power. The kinds of this Seignourie, Seneca makes two: the one, Potestas aut imperium; Power or command: the other, Proprietas aut dominium; Proprietie or Mastership: the correlative of the one is the subject, of the other the slave. Ad Cesarem (saith he) potestas omnium pertinet, ad singulos proprietat; Cesar hath power over all, and every man proprietie in his owne: and againe, Cesar omnis imperio possidet, singuli dominio; Cesar holdeth all in his power, and every man possesseth his owne. But as men and vice beganne abundantly to increase: so obedience, (the fruit of naturall reuerence, which but from excellent seede felldome ripeneth) being exceedingly overhadowed with pride, and ill examples vterly withered and fell away. And the soft weapons of paternall persuasions (after mankind beganne to neglect and forget the originall and first giuer of life) became in all ouer-weake, either to resist the first inclination of euill, or after 'when it became habituall) to constraime it. So that now, when the hearts of men were onely guided and steered by their owne fancies, and tost to and fro on the tempestuous Seas of the world, while wisdome was seuered from power, and strength from charitie: Necessitie (which bindeth euery nature but the immortall) made both the Wife and Foolish vnderstand at once, that the estate of reasonable men would become farre more miserable then that of beasts, and that a generall flood of confusion would a second time ouerflow them, did they not by a generall obedience to order and dominion prevent it. For the Mightie, who trusted in their owne strengths, found others againe (by interchange of times) more mightie then themselves: the feeble fell vnder the forcible; and the equall from equall receiued equall harmes. In so much that licentious disorder (which seemed to promise a libertie vpon the first acquaintance) proued vpon a better tryall, no lesse perillous then an vniuersall bondage.

*Necessitas est simon iudicium, & immutabilis providentia po-

These Arguments by Necessitie propounded, and by Reason maintained and confirmed perswaded all Nations which the Heauens couer, to subiect themselves to a Master, and to Magistracie in some degree. Vnder which Government, as the change (which brought with it lesse euill, then the former mischiefes) was generally pleasing: so time (making all men wise that obserue it) found some imperfection and corrosiue in this cure. And therefore the same Necessitie which inuented, and the same Reason which approoued soueraigne power, bethought it selfe of certaine equall rules, in which Dominion (in the beginning boundlesse) might also discern her owne limits. For before the inuention of Lawes, private affections in supreme Rulers made their owne fancies both their Treasurers and Hangmen: measuring by this yard, and waighing in this ballance both good and euill.

For as wisdome in Eldership preceded the rule of Kings; so the will of Kings fore-went the inuentions of Lawes. Populus nullis legibus tenebatur: arbitria principum pro legibus erant; The people were not gouerned by any other lawes then the willes of Princes: Hereof it followed, that when Kings left to be good, neither did those mens vertues: value them which were not fancied by their Kings, nor those mens vices deforme them that were. Amor interdum nimis videt, interdum nihil videt, Lone sees one while too much, another while starke nothing. Hence it came to passe, that after a few yeeres (for direction and restraint of Royall power) Lawes were established: and that government which had this mixture of equalitie (holding in an even ballance supreme power and common right) acquired the title of Regall: the other (which had it not) was knowne for Tyrannicall: the one God established in fauour of his people: the other he permitted for their affliction.

In the infancie of this Regall authoritie, Princes as they were chosen for their virtues only so did they measure their powers by a great deale of moderation. And therefore (saith Fabius Pictor) Principes, quia iusti erant, & religionibus dediti, iure habiti De aucto ferule.
Dij & dicti; Princes, because they were iust and religious, were rightly accounted and called patri.
Gods.

And though (speaking humanely) the beginning of Empire may be ascribed to Reason and Necessitie; yet it was God himselfe that first kindled this light in the mindes of men, whereby they saw that they could not live and be preferred without a Ruler and Conduer: God himselfe by his eternall providence haue ordained Kings; and the law of Nature Leaders, and Rulers over others. For the very Bees haue their Prince; the Deere their Leaders; and Cranes (by order imposed) watch for their owne safetie. The most High beareth rule over the Kingdome of Men; and appointeth ouer it whom he will. By me (saith Wisdome, spoken by the Sonne of God) Kings reigne; By me Princes rule; and it is God (saith DANIEL) that setteth up Kings; and taketh away Kings; and that this power is giuen from God, 10 CHRIST himselfe witnesseth, speaking to PILATE: Thou couldest haue no power as thou art against me, except it were giuen thee from above.

It was therefore by a threefold Iustice that the world hath beene gouerned from the beginning, (to wit) by a Iustice naturall: by which the Parents and Elders of families gouerned their Children, and Nephewes, and Families, in which gouernment the Obedience was called naturall Pietie: Again, by a Iustice diuine, drawne from the Lawes and Ordinances of God: and the Obedience hereunto was called Conscience: And lastly, by a Iustice ciuill, begotten by both the former: and the Obedience to this we call Dutie. That by these three thole of the eldest times were commanded: and that the rule in general was Paternal, it is most euident: for Adam 20 being Lord over his owne Children, instructed them in the seruice of God his Creator; as we read, Cain and Abel brought Oblations before God, as they had been taught by their Parent, the Father of mankind.

§. II.

Of the three commendable sorts of Gouernement with their opposites: and of the degrees of humane societie.

What other Policie was exercised, or State founded after such time as 30 mankind was greatly multiplied before the flood, it cannot be certainly knowne, though it seeme by probable coniecture, that the same was not without Kings in that first age: it being possible that many Princes of the Egyptians (remembered among their antiquities) were before the general flood; and very likely, that the cruell Oppressions in that Age proceeded from some tyrannie in Gouernement, or from some rougher forme of Rule, then the Paternal.

Berosus ascribeth the rule of the World in those dayes to the Gyants of Libanus, who maltred (saith he) all Nations from the Sunne-rising to the Sunne-set. But in the second Age of the World, and after such time as the rule of Eldership fayled, 40 three feuerall sorts of Gouernement were in feuerall times established among men, according to the diuers natures of Places and People.

The first, the most ancient, most generall, and most approued, was the Gouernement of one, ruling by iust Lawes, called Monarchie: to which Tyrannie is opposed, being also a sole and absolute Rule, exercised according to the will of the Commander, without respect or obseruation of the Lawes of God, or Men. For a lawfull Prince or Magistrate (saith Aristotle) is the Keeper of Right and Equitie: and of this condition ought euery Magistrate to be, according to the rule of Gods word: 50 Judges and Officers shalt thou make thee in thy Cities: And these shall iudge the people with righteous iudgement.

The second Gouernement is of diuers principall Persons established by order, and ruling by Lawes, called Aristocracie, or Optimum potestas; to which Oligarchia (or the particular faction and usurpation of a few great-ones) is opposed: as the Decemviri, or Triumviri, and the like.

The

The third is a State popular, (or Gouernment of the people) called Democratia, to which is opposed Ochlocratia, or the turbulent vniuersit ruling of the confused multitude, seditiously swaying the State, contrarie to their owne Lawes and Ordinances. These three kinds of Gouernement are briefly exprest by Tholofanius; Vnus, paucorum, & multorum, Of one, of few, of many.

Now as touching the beginning and order of policie since the second increase of Mankind, the same grew in this sort: First of all, euery Father, or eldest of the Family, gaue Lawes to his owne issues, and to the people from him and them increased. These as they were multiplied into many Households (man by nature louing societie) 10 ioynted their Cottages together in one common Field or Village, which the Latines call Vici; of the Greeke vicus, which signifieth a House, or of the word (Via) because it hath diuers wayes and paths leading to it. And as the first House grew into a Village, so the Village into that which is called Pagus, (being a societie of diuers Villages) so called of the Greeke paidion, which signifieth a Fountaine: because many people (haueing their habitations not farre asunder) dranke of one Spring or Streame of water. To this word the English Hundreds, or (as some thinke) Shires answereth not vnfitly.

But as men and impetie beganne to gather strength, and as emulation and pride betweene the Races of the one and the other daily increased: so both to defend themselves from outrage, and to preserve such goods as they had gathered, they beganne to ioyne and set together diuers of their Villages, inuironing them first with banks and ditches, and afterwards with wals: which being so compassed were then called Oppida; cyther ab opponendo se hostibus, Because wals were opposed against Enemies, or ab opibus, because thither they gathered their riches for safetie and defence: as also they were called Vrbes, ab orbe, because when they were to build a Citie, they made a Circle with a Plough (sayth Varro) therewith measuring and compassing the ground which they went to inclose or fortifie. And although Vrbs and Civitas bee often confounded, yet the difference was anciently in this, that Vrbs signified no other then the very wals and buildings, and Civitas was taken for the Citizens, inhabiting therein: so called of Civis; and that, ab eo quod multitudo coit, of coming together. But all inhabitants within these wals are not properly Citizens, but only such as are called Free-men: who bearing proportionably the charge of the Citie, may by turnes become Officers and Magistrats thereof: the rest goe vnder the name of Subiects, though Citizens by the same generall name of Subiects are also knowne. For euery Citizen is also a subiect, but not euery Subiect a Citizen: perhaps also some Citizen (as the chiefe Magistrate, if hee bee to bee termed one of the Citizens) is no subiect; but of this wee need not stand to inquire. The word (Magistrate) is taken 10 Magistro, from a Master, and the word (Master) from the Aduerbe Magis (as also Magisteria, Precepts of Art) or else from the Greeke word (Μεγιστος;) and 40 of the Greekes call them Μεγιστανες, whom the Latines call Magnates, or Magistratus.

The office and dutie of euery Magistrate Aristotle hath written in few wordes. Ethic. 1. A Magistrate or Prince (sayth hee) is the keeper of right and equitie; but the same is best taught by Saint Paul, who expresth both the cause efficient, and final, (that is) by whom Magistrates and Princes are ordained, together with their duties and offices. A Magistrate is the Minister of God for thy wealth; but if thou dost euill, feare: for he beareth not the sword for naught. For hee is the Minister of God, to take vengeance on him that doth euill. He also teacheth in the same place; That euery soule ought to be 15 subiect to the higher powers, because they are by God ordained; and that who soeuer resisteth that power, resisteth God, the giuer and fountaine thereof: and shall not only be therefore subiect to the iudgement and condemnation of Man, but of God: For ye must be subiect (saith he) not because of wrath only, but also for conscience sake. Rom. 13. 4. Ps. 8. 13. 14. 15. 16. 17. 18. 19. 20. 21. 22. 23. 24. 25. 26. 27. 28. 29. 30. 31. 32. 33. 34. 35. 36. 37. 38. 39. 40. 41. 42. 43. 44. 45. 46. 47. 48. 49. 50. 51. 52. 53. 54. 55. 56. 57. 58. 59. 60. 61. 62. 63. 64. 65. 66. 67. 68. 69. 70. 71. 72. 73. 74. 75. 76. 77. 78. 79. 80. 81. 82. 83. 84. 85. 86. 87. 88. 89. 90. 91. 92. 93. 94. 95. 96. 97. 98. 99. 100.

The examples are not to be numbred of Gods punishments vpon those that haue resisted Authoritie, by God ordained and established. Neyther ought any subiect therefore

therefore to resist the power of Kings, because they may be taxed with iniustice or cruelty: for it pleaseth God sometimes to punish his people by a tyrannous hand; and the Commandement of obedience is without distinction. The Prophets and Christ himselfe subiected themselves to the power of Magistracie. Christ commanded that all due to Caesar should be giuen vnto him: and he payed Tribute for himselfe and Peter. Hieremie commanded the Israelites (euen those that were Captiues vnder Heathen Kings) to pray for them, and for the peace of Babylon. So Abraham prayed for Abimelech; and Iacob blessed the King of Egypt: And it is acceptable in the sight of our Saviour (sayth PAVL) that yee make Supplications and Prayers for Kings, and for all that are in autoritie: and if for such Kings as were Idolatrous, much more for Christian Kings and Magistrates. And so much did Saint Chrysostome in his Homily to the people preferre Monarchicall Government, as hee rather commended the rule of Kings (though Tyrants) then that they should be wanting: Præstat Regem tyrannum habere, quam nullum; Better a tyrannous King, then no King: to which also Tacitus subscribeth: Præstat (sayth Tacitus in the first of his Historie) sub malo Principe esse quam nullo; It is better to haue a bad Prince then none at all. And bee they good Kings (which is generally presupposed) then is there no libertie more safe, then to serue them: Neg enim libertas tutor villa est (sayth CLAVDIAN) quam Domino seruire bono: No libertie (sayth hee) more safe for vs then to be seruants to the vertuous. And certainly howsoever it may be disputed, yet is it safer to liue vnder one Tyrant, then vnder 100000. Tyrants: vnder a wife man that is cruell, then vnder the foolish and barbarous cruelty of the multitude. For as Agesthus answered a Citizen of Sparta that desired an alteration of the Government, That kind of rule which a man would disdaine in his owne houle, were very vnfit to gouerne great Regions by.

Lastly, as many Fathers erected many Cottages for their many children: and as (for the reason before remembred) many Houholds ioyned themselves together, and made Villages; many Villages made Cities: so when these Cities and Citizens ioyned together, and established Lawes by consent, associating themselves vnder one Governour and Government, they so ioyned were called a Commonwealth: the same being sometimes gouerned by Kings; sometimes by Magistrates; sometimes by the people themselves.

¶ III.

Of the good Government of the first Kings.

Now this first Age after the Flood, and after such time as the people were increased, and the Families became strong and dispersed into severall parts of the World, was by ancient Historians called Golden: Ambition and Couetousnesse being as then but greene, and newly growne vp, the seeds and effects wherof were as yet but potential, and in the blowth and bud. For while the Law of Nature was the rule of mans life, they then fought for no larger Territorie then themselves could compasse and manure: they erected no other magnificent buildings, then sufficient to defend them from cold and tempest: they cared for no other delicacie of fare, or curiositie of dyet, then to maintaine life: nor for any other apparell then to couer them from the cold, the Raine and the Sunne.

And sure if wee understand by that Age (which was called Golden) the ancient simplicitie of our Fore-fathers, this name may then truly be cast vpon those elder times: but if it be taken otherwise, then, whether the same may bee attributed more to any one time then to another, (I meane to one limited time and none else) it may bee doubted. For good and Golden Kings make good and Golden Ages: and all times haue brought forth of both sorts. And as the infancy of Empire, (when Princes played their Prizes, and did then only woo men to obedience) might bee called called the Golden Age: so may the beginning of all Princes times bee truly called Golden. For be it that men affect honour, it is then best purchased; or if honour affect men, it is then that good desertings haue commonly the least impediments: and if euer Liberalitie ouerflow her bankes and bounds, the same is then best warranted both by policie and example. But Age and Time doe not only harden and shrinke the openest and most Iouiall hearts, but the experience which it bringeth with it, layeth Princes toorne citates before their eyes, and (withall) perswadeth them to compassionate themselves. And although there bee no Kings vnder the Sunne whose meanes are answerable vnto other mens desires; yet such as value all things by their owne respects, doe no sooner find their appetites vnanswered, but they complain of alteration, and account the times iniurious and yron. And as this falsh out in the Raigne of every King, so doth it in the life of every man, if his dayes be many: for our younger yeeres are our Golden Age; which being eaten vp by time, we praise those seasons which our youth accompanied: and (indeed) the grievous alterations in our selues, and the paines and diseases which neuer part from vs but at the graue, make the times seeme so differing and displeasing: especially the qualitie of mans nature being also such, as it adoreth and extollereth the passages of the former, and condemneth the present state how iust soeuer: Fit humana malignitas visio, ut semper vetera in laude, presentia in fastidio sint; It comes to passe (sayth TACITVS) by the vice of our malignitie, that we alwayes extoll the time past, and hold the present fastidious: For it is one of the errorours of wayward Age: Quod sint laudatores temporis acti; That they are prayes of fore-past times, forgetting this aduice of SALOMON: Say not then, Why is it that the former dayes were better then these? for thou dost not inquire wisely of this thing: to which purpose SENECA; Maiores nostri quæsti sunt, & nos querimus, posteri queruntur, cures esse mores, regnare nequitiam, in deterius res hominum & in omne nefas labi: Our Ancesters haue complained, wee doe complaine, our children will complaine, that good manners are gone, that wickednesse doth raigne, and all things grow worse and worse, and fall into all euill. These are the vnuall discourses of Age and misfortune. But here of what can we adde to this of ARNOLDVS? Nomares quædæq; vetus fiet, & vetus tempus peribit quibus caput noua fuit & repentina: What soeuer is new, in time shall be made old: and the ancientest things when they tooke beginning were also new and sodaine. Wherefore not to stand in much admiration of these first times, which the discontentments of present times haue made Golden, this wee may set downe for certaine, That as it was the vertue of the first Kings, which (after God) gaue them Crownes: so the loue of their people thereby purchased, held the same Crownes on their heads. And as God gaue the obedience of Subiects to Princes: so (relatiuely) hee gaue the care and iniustice of Kings to the Subiects; hauing respect, not only to the Kings themselves, but euen to the meanest of his Creatures: Quoniam particulari bono seruit omne bonum; The infinite goodnesse of God doth not attend any one only: for hee that made the small and great, careth for all alike: and it is the care which Kings haue of all theirs, which makes them beloued of all theirs; and by a general loue it is, that Princes hold a generall obedience: For Potestas humana raditur in voluntatibus hominum: All humane power is rooted in the will or dispositions of men.

§. IIII.

Of the beginning of Nobilitie: and of the vaine vaunt thereof without vertue.

Vetus nobilitas non nisi in seculo fit.

AND with this Supreme Rule and Kingly authoritie beganne also other degrees and differences among Subiects. For Princes made election of others by the same Rule, by which themselves were chosen; vnto whom they gaue place, trust, and power. From which employments and Offices sprang those Titles, and those degrees of Honour, which haue continued from Age to Age to these dayes. But this Nobilitie, or difference from the Vulgar, was not in the beginning giuen to the Succession of Bloud, but to Succession of Vertue, as hereafter may be prooued. Though at length it was sufficient for those whose Parents were aduanced, to bee knowne for the Sonnes of such Fathers: and so there needed then no endeavour of well-doing at all, or any contention for them to excell, vpon whom glorie or worldly Nobilitie necessarily descended. Yet hereof had Nobilitie denomination in the beginning, That such as excelled others in vertue, were so called: Hinc dictus Nobilitas, quasi virtute pre alijs nobilitas. But after such time as the deferred Honour of the Father was giuen in reward to his Posteritie, Saint Hierome iudged of the Succession in this manner: Quia si aliud video in Nobilitate appendum, nisi quod Nobiles quadam necessitate constringuntur, ne ab antiquorum probitate degenerent; I see no other thing to be affected in Nobilitie, then that Noblemen are by a kind of necessitie bound, not to degenerate from the vertue of their Ancesters. For if Nobilitie be Virtus & antiqua diuitie; Vertue and ancient riches, then to exceed in all those things which are extra hominem, as riches, power, glorie, and the like, doe no otherwise define Nobilitie, then the word (animal) alone doth define a reasonable man. Or if honour (according to L. Vines) be a witness of vertue and well-doing: and Nobilitie (after Plutarch) the continuance of vertue in a Race or Linage: then are those in whom Vertue is extinguished, but like vnto painted and printed Papers, which ignorant men worship in stead of Christ our Ladie, and other Saints: men, in whom there remaine but the dregges and vices of ancient Vertue: Flowers, and Herbes, which by change of soile and want of manuring are turned to Weeds. For what is found prayse-worthy in those waters, which had their beginning out of pure Fountaines, if in all the rest of their course they runne foule, filthie, and defiled? Ex terra fertilis produciuntur aliquando Cienta venenosa, & ex terra sterili pretiosum aurum; Out of fruitful ground ariseth sometimes possoning Henbane: and out of barren soile precious Gold. For as all things consist of matter and forme, so doth Charon (in his Chapter of Nobilitie) call the Race and Linage but the matter of Nobilitie: the forme (which giues life and perfect being) he maketh to be Vertue, and Qualitie, profitable to the Commonweale. For he is truly and entirely Noble, who maketh a singular profession of public Vertue, seruing his Prince and Countrey, and being descended of Parents and Ancesters that haue done the like. And although that Nobilitie, which the same Authour calleth personall, (the same which our selues acquire by our Vertue and well deseruings) cannot bee ballanced with that which is both naturall by Descent, and also personall; yet if Vertue be wanting to the naturall, then is the personall and acquired Nobilitie by many degrees to be preferred: For (sayth this Charon) this Honour (to wit) by Descent, may light vpon such a one, as in his owne nature is a true Villaine. There is also a third Nobilitie which hee calleth Nobilitie in Parchment, bought with Silver or fauour: and these bee indeed but Honours of affection, which Kings with the change of their fancies by which they knew well how to wipe off againe. But surely, if wee had as much sence of our degenerating in worthinesse, as we haue of vanitie in deriuing our selues of such and such Parents, wee should rather know such Nobilitie (without Vertue) to bee shame and dishonour, then Noblesse, and glorie to vaunt thereof.

Whit

What calamitie is wanting (sayth Bernard) to him that is borne in sinne, of a Pottshare bodie and barren minde? for (according to the same Father:) Dele fecum sugas bonari huius, & male coronata nitorem gloria, &c. Wipe away the painting of this fleeting honour, and the glittering of the ill-crowned glorie, that then thou maiest consider thy self nakedly: for thou camest naked out of thy Mothers wombe. Camest thou thence with thy Tyes, or glistening with Jewels, or garnished with Silkes, or adorned with Feathers, or suffred with Gold? if thou scatter and blow away all these by thy consideration as certaine morning cloudes, which doe or will soone passe ouer, thou shalt meet with a naked, and poore, and wretched, and miserable man, and blushing, because he is naked, and weeping because hee is borne, and repining because he is borne to labour, and not to honour.

For, as touching the matter of all men, there is no difference betweene it and dust: which if thou dost not beleene (saith Saint Chrysostome) looke into the Sepulchres and Monuments of thy Ancesters, and they shall easily perswade thee by their owne example, that thou art dust and dirt: so that if man seeme more Noble and beautifull then dust, this proceedeth not from the diuersitie of his Nature, but from the cunning of his Creatour.

For true Nobilitie standeth in the Trade
Of vertuous life; not in the fleshly Line:
For bloud is brute, but Gentrie is Diuine.

And howsoeuer the custome of the World haue made it good, that Honours be cast by birth vpon vnworthy Issues: yet Salomon (as wise as any King) reprehendeth the same in his Fellow-Princes: There is an euill (sayth hee) that I haue seene vnder the Sun, which is as an error that proceedeth from the face of him that ruleth. Folly is set in great excellencie,

CHAP. X.

Of NIMROD, BELVS, and NINVS: and of memorable things about those times.

§. I.

That NIMROD was the first after the Flood that raigned like Soueraigne Lord: and that his beginning seemeth to haue bene of iust authoritie.

HE first of all that raigned as Soueraigne Lord after the Flood was Nimrod, the Sonne of Cub, distinguished by Moses from the rest (according to Saint Augustine) in one of these two respects: eyther for his eminencie, and because hee was the first of fame, and that tooke on him to command others: or else in that hee was begotten by Cub, after his other children were also become Fathers; and of a later time then some of his Grand-children and Nephewes. Howsoeuer, seeing Moses in expresse wordes callth Nimrod the Sonne of Cub, other mens coniectures to the contrarie ought to haue no respect. This Empire of Nimrod, both the Fathers and many later Writers call tyrannicall: the same beginning in Babel, (which is) confusion.

But

But it seemeth to mee that Melanchton conceived not amiss herof: the same exposition being also made by the Author of that worke called Onomasticum Theologicum, who affirms that Nimrod was therefore called Amarus Dominator, A bitter or fureur Gouverneur, because his forme of rule seemed at first farre more terrible then Paternall authoritie. And therefore is he in this respect also called a mightie Hunter; because he tooke and destroyed both Beasts and Theeves. But Saint Augustine vnderstands it otherwise, and conuerts the word (ante) by (contra) affirming therein, that Nimrod was a mightie Hunter against God: Sic ergo intelligentius est Gigante, Venator contra Dominum; So is that Giant to be vnderstood, a Hunter against the Lord. But howsoeuer this word (a mightie Hunter) bee vnderstood; yet it rather appeareth, that 10 Nimrod had the command of all those, which went with him from the East into Shinar: so, this charge was rather giuen him, then by him vsurped. For it is no where found, that Nab himselfe, or any of the Sonnes of his owne bodie, came with this troupe into Babylonia: no mention at all being made of Noah (the yeeres of his life excepted) in the succeeding storie of the Hebrewes: nor that Sem was in this disobedient Troupe, or among the builders of Babel.

The same is also confirmed by diuers ancient Historians, that Nimrod, Suplus, and Ishtar were the Captaines and Leaders of all those which came from the East. And though Sem came not himselfe so farre West as Shinar (his lot being cast on the East parts) yet from his Sonnes Nephew Heber, the name and Nation of the Hebreus (according to the generall opinion) tooke beginning, who inhabited the Southermost parts of Chaldea about the Citie of Ur; from whence Abraham was by God called into Charran, and thence into Canaan.

And because those of the Race of Sem which came into Chaldea, were no partners in the vnbelaueing worke of the Towre: therefore (as many of the Fathers coniecture) did they retain the first and most ancient language, which the Fathers of the first Age had left to Noah; and Noah to Sem and his Illues: In familia HEBER remansit hebraica; in the Family of HEBER this Language remained (saith Saint Augustine out of Epiphanius;) and this Language Abraham vsed: yea it was anciently and before the Flood the generall speech: and therefore first called (saith Cassiodorus) lingua humana: the humane tongue.

We know that Gregorius Becanus following Theodoret, Rabbi Moses, Egyptian, Virgata, and others, is of another opinion; but howsoeuer we determine of this point, we may with good probability resolve, that none of the godly seed of Sem were the chiefe Leaders of this presumptuous multitude. And seeing it is not likely but that some one was by order appointed for this charge, we may imagine that Nimrod rather had it by iust authoritie, then by violence of vsurpation.

§. II.

That NIMROD, BELUS, and NINUS were three distinct persons.

De Cinit. Di.

BENZO, and out of him Nanderus with others make many Nimrods. Eusebius confounds him with Belus; and so doth Saint Hierome vpon Ose; and these wordes of S. Augustine seeme to make him of the same opinion: ibi autem NINUS regnabat post mortem patris sui BELI, qui primus ille regnauit 65. annos; There after NINUS reigne after the death of his Father BELUS, who first governed in Babylon sixty five yeeres. But it could not bee vnkowne to Saint Augustine, that Nimrod was the Establisher of that Empire: Moses being plaine and direct therein. For the beginning of Nimrod's Kingdome (saith he) was Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalne in the Land of Shinar. Wherefore Nimrod was the first King of Babel. And certainly it best agreeth with reason; that Ninus was the third, and not one with Nimrod, as Alerator (led by Clement) supposed: for in Ninus time the World was maruailously replenished. And if S. Augustine had had vndoubtedly taken Belus for Nimrod, he would haue giuen him the name which the Scriptures giue him, rather then haue borrowed any thing out of prophane Authors. And for those wordes of S. AUGUSTINE (qui primus ille regnauit; who was the first that reigned there) supposed to be meant by Belus: those wordes doe not disprove that Nimrod was the Founder of the Babylonian Empire. For although Julius Caesar ouerthrew the libertie of the Roman Commonwealt, making himselfe a perpetuall Dictator, yet Augustus was the first established Emperor: and the first that reigned absolutely by soveraigne authoritie ouer the Romans, as an Emperor. The like may be said of Nimrod, that he first brake the rule of Eldership and Paternitie, laying the foundation of soveraigne Rule, as Caesar did; and yet Belus was the first, who peaceably, and with a generall allowance exercised such a power. Paterius is of opinion, that Belus and Nimrod were the same, because many things are said of them both agreeing in time: for it was about 200. yeeres after the flood (as they account) that Belus reigned: but such agreement of times proues it not. For to Edward the Third, and his grand-child Richard the Second, were Kings both in one yeere: the one dyed; the other in the same yeere was crowned King.

And yet the opinion (that Nimrod and Belus were one) is farre more probable then that of Alerator, who makes Ninus and Nimrod to be the same. For it is plaine that the beginning of Nimrod's Kingdome was Babel, and the Townes adioyning: but the first and most famous worke of Ninus was the Citie of Ninia.

Now whereas D. Siculus affirmeth, that Ninus ouercame and suppressed the Babylonians, the same rather proueth the contrarie, then that Ninus and Nimrod were one person. For Ninus established the seate of his Empire at Ninie in Assyria, whence the Babylonians might (perchance) in disdayne thereof fall from his obedience, whom he recovered againe by strong hand; which was calic: Babylon being not walled till Semiramis time.

Dictur atam
Cottitulus maris circiffi SEMIRAMIS Urbem.

SEMIRAMIS with walls of bricke the Citie did inclose.

Further, where it is alledged, that as the Scriptures call Nimrod mightie: so Infinite hath the fame of Ninus, which is one of Alerator's arguments; It may be answered, that such an addition might haue bene giuen to many other Kings aswell. For if we may beleue Iustine; then were Ptolemy King of Egypt, and Tamius of Scythia mightie Kings before Ninus was borne. And if we may compare the wordes of Moses (touching Nimrod) with the vnder takings of Ninus, there will be found great difference betweene them. For whereas Alerator conceiueth, that it was too early for any that liued about the time of the confusion of languages, to haue invaded and mastered those Cities so farre removed from Babel, namely, Erech, Accad, and Chalne: which worke he therefore ascribeth to Ninus, as a man of the greatest vnder taking; and consequently would haue Nimrod to haue bene long after the time, in which we suppose he flourished; and both those names of Nimrod and Ninus to belong to one person, to wit, to Ninus: to these things to make some answer. First, I doe not finde that supposition true, That euer Nimrod invaded any of these Cities; but that hee founded them and built them from the ground, being the first after the flood, that conducted the children of Noah into those parts: and therefore had nothing built or erected to his hands.

Besides, whereas these Cities in many mens opinions are found to stand farre away from Babylon, I finde no reason to bring me to that beliefe. The Citie of Accad which the Septuagint calls Archard, and Epiphanius, Arphal; Tamius takes to be Nisibis in Mesopotamia (for the Region thereabout the Cosmographers (saith he) call Acabene for Acadene, Others vnderstand Nisibis and Ninive to be one Citie: so doe Strabo and Stephanus confound it with Charran; but all mistaken. For Nisibis, Accad, and Charran are distinct places. Though I cannot deny Accad to be a Region of Mesopotamia, the same which Arias Montanus out of S. Hierome calls Achad; and so doe the Hebrewes also call Nisibis, which seemeth to be the cause of this mistaking. As for the Citie of Erec, which the Septuagint call Orech; S. Augustine, Oreg, and Pagninus, Erec; this place Iunius vnderstands for Araca in Susiana: but there is also a Citie in Comagena called Araca: and indeede likelihood of name is no certaine proofe, without the assistance of other circumstances.

Lib. 23.

Concerning the third Citie (called Chalneh) some take it for Calinis: of which Am. Marcellinus, S. Hierome takes it for Seleucia; Hierosolymitanus for Ctesiphon: others doe think it to be the Agrani vpon Euphrates, destroyed and razed by the Persians. But let Moses be the Moderator and Iudge of this dispute, who teacheth vs directly, that these Citie are not seated in so diuers and distant Regions; for these be his wordes: And the beginning of his Kingdom (speaking of Nimrod) was Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalneh, in the land of Shinar: so as in this Valley of Shinar, or Babylonia, or Chaldea (being all one) we must finde them. And therefore I could (rather of the two) thinke with Viterbienfis, that these foure made but one Babylon, then that they were Citie farre removed, and in seuerall Prouinces, did not the Prophet Amos precisely distinguish Chalne from Babylon. Goe you (saith Amos) to Chalne, and from thence goe you to Hamath, and then to Gath of the Philistines. The Geneua translation fauouring the former opinion, to set these Citie out of Shinar, hath a marginal note expresseing that Shinar was here named: not that all these Citie were therein seated, but to distinguish Babylon of Chaldea, from Babylon in Egypt; but I finde little substance in that conceit. For sure I am, that in the beginning of Nimrod's Empire there was no such Babylon, nor any Citie at all to be found in Egypt: Babylon of Egypt being all one with the great Citie of Cairo, which was built long after, not farre from the place where stood A Memphis the ancient Citie, but not so ancient as Babylon vpon Euphrates. Now that Chalne is situate in the Valley of Shinar, it hath beene formerly proued in the Chapter of Paradis. So as for any argument that may be brought to the contrary, from the remote situation of these three Citie from Babylon, we may continue in our opinion, That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were distinct and successiue Kings.

§. III.

That Nimrod, not Assyr, built Ninine: and that it is probable out of ESAY 23. 13. that Assyr built Pr of the Chaldees.

Now as of Nimrod: so are the opinions of Writers different touching Assur, and touching the beginning of that great state of Babylon and Assyria: a controuersie wearisomely disputed without any direct proofe, conclusion, or certaintie. But to me (of whom) where the Scriptures are silent, the voyce of Reason hath the best hearing) the interpretation of Iunius is most agreeable; who besides all necessarie consequence doth not disioyne the sense of the Scriptures therein, nor confute the vnderstanding thereof. For in this sort he conuerteth the Hebrew Text: Erut enim principum regni eius Babel, & Erech, & Accad, & Chalneh, in terra Shinaris; & terra hac prociuit in Assyriam ubi edificauit Ninnum; (which is) For the beginning of this Kingdom was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Chalneh, in the land of Shinar: and he went forth of this land into Assyria, and built Ninine. So as Iunius takes Assur in this place, not for any person, but for the Region of Assyria: the land being so called in Moses time, and before it. For certainly, the other construction, (where the word (Assur) is taken for Assur the Sonne of Sem) doth not answer the order which Moses obserueth through all the Bookes of Genesis, but is quite contrary vnto it. For in the beginning of the tenth

tenth Chapter he setteth downe the sonnes of Noah, in these wordes: New these are the Generations of the sonnes of Noah: SEM, HAM, and JAPHETH, vnto whom sonnes were borne after the flood: then it followeth immediately: The sonnes of JAPHETH were GOMER, &c. so as Japheth is last named among Noah's sonnes, be he eldest or youngest: because he was first to be spoken of: with whom (hauing last named him) he proceedes and sets downe his issue, and then the issue of his sonnes: first, the issue of Gomer, Japheth's eldest sonne; and then speakes of Iaan and his sonnes: for of the rest of that Familie hee is silent. Anon after hee numbrell the sonnes of Ham, of which Cush was the eldest: and then the sonnes of Cush and Misraim; and afterward of Canaan; leaving Shem for the last, because he would not disioyne the Storie of the Hebrewes. But after he beginneth with Sem, he continueth from thence by Arphaxad, Shela, and Heber, vnto Abraham, and so to Iacob, and the Fathers of that Nation. But to haue brought in one of the sonnes of Shem in the middle of the generations of Ham, had beene against order; neither would Moses haue pait ouer so lightly the erection of the Assyrian Empire, in one of the sonnes of Shem, if he had had any such meaning: it being the storie of Shem's sonnes which he most attended. For he nameth Nimrod apart, after the rest of the sonnes of Cush, because he founded the Babylonian and Assyrian Empire: and in the eleventh Chapter he returnes to speake of the building of Babel in particular, hauing formerly named it in the tenth Chapter, with those other Citie which Nimrod founded in Shinar. And as he did in the tenth Chapter, so also in the eleventh he maketh no report of Shem, till such time as he had finished so much of Nimrod as he meant to touch: and then he beginneth with the issue of Shem, which he continueth to Abraham and Israd. And of Iunius opinion touching Assur, was Caluin: to which I conceiue that P. Comestor, in his historia Scholastica, gaue an entrance, who after he had deliuered this place in some other sense, he vseth these wordes: Vel intelligendum non est de ASSYR filio SEM, &c. sed ASSYR (id est) Regnum Assyriorum inde egressum est, quod tempore SARVG prout ABRAHAM factum est, (which is) Or else it is not to be understood of ASSYR the sonne of SEM, &c. but ASSYR (that is, the Kingdome of the Assyrians) came from thence (videlicet, from Babylon) or was made out of it: which happened in the time of SARVG the great grand-father of ABRAHAM. After which he reconcileth the differences in this sort: If you take the ancient Belus (meaning Nimrod) to be the first Erector of the Assyrian Empire, or the first Founder thereof, it is true, Quantum ad initium; Respecting the beginning; but others conceiue that it had beginning from Ninus, which is also true, Quantum ad regni ampliationem; Regarding the enlargement of the Empire. To this I may adde the opinion of Epphanus, confirmed by Cedrenus, who takes Assur to be the sonne of Nimrod: and so doth Aethobodus, and Vitehenfis, S. Hierome, and Cyrillus, and now lastly Tornelius: who saith he tooke vpon him that name of Assur after he had beaten the Assyrians, as Seipio did of Africans, after his conquest in Africa: and that Assur was a common name to the Kings of Assyria, as it appeareth by many Scriptures, as Psalm 81. Esay 10. Ose 5. &c. but to helpe the matter, he makes Nimrod of the race of Shem, and the sonne of Irari. But Rabanus Maurus, who was Arch-Bishop of Metz in the yeere of Christ 854. an ancient and learned Writer, vnderstands this place with Comestor, or Comestor with him, agreeing in substance with that translation of Iunius: to which wordes of Moses he giueth this sense: De hac terra Assyriorum pullulant imperium, qui ex nomine NINI, BELI filij, Ninum condiderunt, urbem magnam, &c. Out of this land grew the Empire of the Assyrians, who built Ninus the great Citie, so named of NINUS the sonne of BELEVS. On the contrary Caluin obiectioneth this place of ESAY: Behold the land of the Chaldeans, this was no people, ASSYR founded it by the inhabitants of the Wilderness; then which there is no one place in the Scriptures, that hath a greater diuersitie in the translation and vnderstanding; in so much as Michel de Palatio vpon Esay (though in all euer diligent) passeth it ouer. But Caluin seemeth hereby to inforce, that because Assur founded the state of the Chaldeans, therefore also Assur rather Tornell. Annot. facit in Gen. 10.

23. 13.

ther then Nimrod established the Assyrian Empire, and built Nimue: contrarie to the former translation of Innus, and to his owne opinion. Now out of the Vulgar (called Hieromes translation) it may be gathered that Assur both founded and ruined this Estate or Citie of the Chaldeans; by Esay remembred: vnto which Citie, People, or State, he plainly telleth the Tyrians that they cannot trust, or hope for reliefe thence. Or rather it may be taken, that the Prophet maketh this Citie of Chaldea, and that Estate, an example vnto those Phenicians, whom in this place he foretelleth of their ruine: which Citie of Chaldea being of strength, and carefully defended, was (notwithstanding) by the Assyrians vterly wasted and destroyed: where-by he giueth them knowledge, and foretelleth them, that their owne Citie of Tyre, 10 (inuinible, as themselves thought) should also soone after be ouer-turned by the same Assyrians: as (indeede) it was by Nabuchodonosor. And these be the wordes after Hierome: Ecc terra Chaldeorum, talis populus non fuit, Assur fundauit eam, in captiuitatem traduxerunt robulos eius, suffoderunt domos eius, posuerunt eam in ruinam, (which is) Behold the Land of the Chaldeans, such a people there were not (or, this was no people, after the Geneva) Assur (or the Assyrians) founded it, they carried away their strong men captiue, they vndermined their houses, and ruined their Citie. The Septuagint expresse it but in a part of another Verse, in these wordes: *Et in terra Chaldeorum, & hec desolata est ab Assyrijs, quoniam murus eius corruit, making the sense perfect by the preceding Verse, which all together may be thus vnderstood: If thou goe ouer to Chittim (which is Macedonia or Greece) yet thou shalt haue no rest (speaking to the Tyrians) neither in the Land of the Chaldeans, for this is made desolate by the Assyrians, because their walls fell together to the ground. Pagninus and Vatablus conuert it thus: Ecc terra Chaldym, iste populus non erat illic olim; nam Assur fundauit eam manibus, erexerunt arces illius: contriuerunt ades eius, posuit eam in ruinam: which may be thus Englished: Behold the Land of the Chaldeans, this people was not once therein inhabiting: for Assur built it a harbour for ships, they erected the Towers thereof, and againe brake downe the houses thereof, and ruined it. Iuuius in the place of ships sets the word (pro Barbaris) that is, for the Barbarians: and the Geneva, by the Barbarians. But this is vnderstood that the Prophet Esay (as may be gathered by all the sense of the Chap- 30 ter) did therein assure the Tyrians of their future destruction, which (accordingly) fell on them: wherein (for the more terror) he maketh choice to note the calamities of those Places, Cities, and Regions, by whose Trade the state and greatnesse of the Tyrians was maintayned; as by the Cilicians from Tharsis; from the Macedonians, and other Gracians vnder the name of Cittim; also by the Egyptians, the Chaldeans, and the rest. For Tyre was then the Mart Towne of the World most renowned. And (as it appeares in our discourse of Paradise) not the least part of her chiefe merchandize came in by the Citie Tyre or Tyrechoa in Chaldea, where the body or chiefe streame of Euphrates (euē that frame which runneth through Babylon and Otrū, which now falleth into Tigris) had his passage into the Persian Gulfe: though now 40 it be stopped vp. For (as we haue heretofore noted) the Arabians (that descended from Sheba and Ramah) dwelling on the East banks of the Persian Gulfe, trading with the Tyrians (as those of Eden, Charran, and Chalne did) transported their merchandise by the mouth of Tigris, that is, from Teredon, and of Euphrates, that is, from Tyre or Tyrechoa: and then by Babylon, and thence by Riuer and ouer Land they conueyed it into Syria, and so to Tyre: as they doe this day to Aleppo. So then Tyre of the Chaldees was a Port Towne, and one of those Cities which had Intelligence, Trade, and Exchange with the Tyrians: for it stood by the great Lakes of Chaldea, through which that part of Euphrates ranne, which passage is now stop vp. Eius cursum velis- 50 tas aboleuit (saith Niger.) And P. Line, Locus ubi Euphratis estum fuit, flumen salum, 50 Time habi worne away the channell of Euphrates: and the place where the mouth thereof was, is a Bay of salt water. These things being thus, certainly (not without good probability) we may expound the Citie of the Chaldees, whose calamities Esay here noteth for terror of the Tyrians, to be the Citie anciently called Tyre; and (by Heateus)*

Camarina:

Camarina; by Ptolemie, Tyrechoa: and by the Greekes, Chaldaeopolis, The Citie of Chaldea: which the sonnes of Shem, vntill Abrahams time, inhabited. And whereas in all the Translations it is said, that Assur both founded it and ruined it: it may be vnderstood, that Assur the Founder was the sonne of Shem; and Assur the destroyers were the Assyrians, by whom those that inhabited Tyre of Chaldea, were at length oppressed and brought to ruine: which thing God fore-seeing commanded Abraham thence to Charran, and so into Canaan. And if the Hebrew word by Vatablus and Pagninus conuerted (by ships) doe beare that sense, the same may be the better approved; because it was a Port Towne: and the Riuer so farre vp as this Citie of 10 Tyre was in ancient time nauigable, as both by Plinie and Niger appeareth. And if the word (for the Barbarians) or (by the Barbarians) be allo in the Hebrew Text, it is no lesse manifest, that the most barbarous Arabians of the Desert were and are the confronting, and next people of all other vnto it. For Chaldea is now called Arachalder, which signifieth desert Lands, because it ioyneeth to that part of Arabia so called: and Cicero (calling those Arabians by the name of Iuraans) addeeth, that they are of all other people the most saluage; calling them, Homines omnium maxime barbaros.

So as this place of Esay, which breedeth some doubt in Caluin, proueth in nothing the contrarie opinion, nor in any part weakeneth the former translation of In- 20 nus, nor the interpretation of Comestor and Rabanus. For though other men haue not conceived (for any thing that I haue read) that Assur is in this place diuerly taken (as for the sonne of Shem, when he is spoken of as a Builder of Tyre; and when as a Destroyer thereof, then for the Assyrian Nation) yet certainly the euidence of the truth, and agreement of circumstances seeme to enforce it. And so this Founding of the Citie of the Chaldees by Assur (into which the most of the posteritie of Sem that came into Shinar, and were separate for the Idolatrie of the Chusites and Nimrodians, retired themselves) hath nothing in it to proue that the same Assur built Nimue, or that the same Assur was all one with Ninus; except wee will make Assur, who wasthe sonne of Shem, both an Idolater, and the sonne of Belus. For (out of doubt) 30 Ninus was the first notorious Sacrificer to Idols; and the first that set vp a Statue to be honored as god. Now if Assur must be of that Race, and not of the Familie of Sem, as he must be if he founded Nimue, then all those which seeke to giue him the honor thereof, doe him by a thousand parts more iniurie, by taking from him his true Parent and Religion.

Besides, if this supposed Assur whom they make the Founder of Nimue (and so the sonne of Belus) were any other, and not the same with Ninus; then what became of him? Certainly he was very vnworthy and obscure, and not like to be the Founder of such an Empire and such a Citie, if no man haue vouchsafed to leaue to posteritie his expulsiō thence, and how he lost that Empire againe or quitted it to Ni- 40 nus: whose acts and conquests are so largely written, and (according to my apprehension) farre differing from truth. It will therefore be found best agreeing to Scripture and to Reason, and best agreeing with the storie of that age written by prophane Authors, that Nimrod founded Babel, Erech, and Accad, and Chalne, the first workes and beginnings of his Empire, according to Moses, and that these workes being finished within the Valley of Shinar, he looked farther abroad, and set in hand the worke of Ninus, lying neere vnto the same frame that Babel and Chalne did: which worke his grand-child Ninus afterward amplified and finished, as Semiramis (this Ninus his wife) did Babylon. Hence it came to passe, that as Semiramis was counted the Foundresse of the Citie: which shee only finished: so also Ninus of Nimue: Quam 50 quidem Babylonem potuit instaurare; She might repaire or renew Babylon, saith S. Augustine. For so did Nabuchodonosor vaunt himselfe to be the Founder of Babylon also, because he built vp againe some part of the wall, ouer-borne by the furie of the Riuer: which worke of his stood till Alexanders time, whereupon he vaunted thus: Is Dan. 4. 27. not this great Babel which I haue built?

§. IIII.

Of the acts of NIMROD and BELVS, as farre as now they are knowne.

BVt to returne to the Storie, it is plaine in Moses, that Nimrod (whom Philo interpreteth transugum; and Iulius Africanus surnamed Saturne) was the establisher of the Babylonian Monarchie, of whom there is no other thing written, then that his Empire in the beginning consisted of those foure Cities before remembred, Babel, Erec, Accad, and Chalne: and that from hence he propagated his Empire into Affryia; and in Affryia built foure more Cities (to wit) Nimue, Rebobo, Celab, and Resen. And seeing that he spent much time in building Babel it selfe and those adioyning, and that his traualles were many ere he came into Shinaar: that worke of Babel (such as it was) with the other three Cities, and the large foundation of Nimue, and the other Cities of Affryia which he builded (considered with the want of materials, and with other impediments) were of greater difficultie then any thing performed by his Successors in many yeeres after: to whose undertakings time had giuen so great an increase of people; and the examples and patternes of his beginning so great an aduancement and encouragement: in whole time (saith Glycas) all these Nations were called Meropes, à sermonia linguarum terræq; diuisione; By reason that the earth and the speech were then diuided.

Belus, or Bel, or Iupiter Belus, succeeded Nimrod, after he had reigned 114. yeeres; of whose acts and undertakings there is little written. For it is thought that he spent much of his time in disburdening the low Lands of Babylon, and drying and making firme ground of all those great Fennes and ouer-flowne Marishes which adioyned vnto it. For any of his Warres or Conquests there is no report, other then of his begun enterprise against Sabatius King of Armenia, and those parts of Scythia which Bereus calls Scythia Saga, whose sonne and succellor Barzanes became subiect and Tributarie to Ninus, that followed the warre to effect, which was by his Father Belus begunne.

§. V.

That we are not to maruaile how so many Kingdomes could be erected about these times: and of Vexoris of Egypt, and TANAIS of Scythia.

THat so many Kingdomes were erected in all those Easterne parts of the World so soone after Nimrod, (as by the storie of Ninus is made manifest) the causes were threefold, (namely) Opportunitie, Example, and Necessitie. For Opportunitie being a Princeesse liberall and powerfull, bestowed on her first Entertainers many times more benefits, then either Fortune can, or Wisdome ought; by whose presence alone the vnderstanding mindes of men receiue all those helps and supplies, which they either want or wish for: so as euery Leader of a troupe (after the diuision of tongues and dispersion of People) finding these faire offers made vnto them, held the power which they posselt, and governed by discretion all those people, whom they conducted to their destined places. For it cannot be conceiued, that when the Earth was first diuided, mankind straggled abroad like beasts in a Desert; but that by agreement they disposed themselves, and vnder-tooke to inhabite all the knowne parts of the World, and by distinct Families and Nations: otherwise, those remote Regions from Babylon and Shinaar, which had Kings, and were peopled in Ninus time, would not haue bene posselt in many hundreds of yeeres after, as then they were;

were; neyther did those that were sent, and traualled farre off (order being the true parent of prosperous successe) vnder take so difficult enterprizes without a Conduiter or Commander. Secondly, the Example of Nimrod with whom it succeeded well, strengthened euery humour that aspired. Thirdly, Necessitie resolu'd all men by the arguments of common miseries, that with out a Commander and Magistrate, neither could those that were laborious, and of honest dispositions, enioy the harvest of their owne Traualles: nor those which were of little strength, secure themselves against forcible violence: nor those which fought after any proportion of greatesse, eyther possesse the same in quiet, or rule and order their owne Ministers and Attendants.

That these causes had wrought these effects, the vnder takings and Conquests of Ninus (the sonne of Belus) made it apparent: for hee found euery where Kings and Monarches, what way soeuer his Ambition led him in the Warres.

But Nimrod (his Grand-father) had no companion King, to vs knowne, when he first tooke on him Soueraignetic and sole commandement of all those the children of Noah, which came from the East into Babylonia: though in his life time others also rayled themselves to the same estate; of which hereafter. Belus (his sonne and Successour) found Sabatius King of Armenia and Scythia, sufficiently powerfull to resist his attempts: which Sabatius I take to bee the same, which Iustine calls Tanaïs; and should coniecture; that Mizraim had bene his Vexoris, were it not that I vehemently suspect some error, (as Iustine placeth him) in the time of that Vexoris, who by many circumstances seemes to me rightly accounted by the Iudicious and Learned Reineccius all one with the great Sejestrus, that liued certaine Ages after Ninus. This Belus, the second King of Babylon, reigned 65. yeeres, according to the common account.

§. VI.

Of the name of BELVS, and other names affixe vnto it.

WHence this second King and Successour of Nimrod had the name of Bel, or Belus, question hath bene made: for it seemeth rather a name imposed, or (of addition) giuen by Ninus, than assumed by Belus himselfe.

Cyrrillus against Iulian calls the Father of Ninus Arbelus, affirming that hee was the first of all men that caused himselfe to be called a God: which were it so, then might the name of Belus be thence deriued. But Bel, as many Learned Writers haue obserued, signifieth the Sunne in the Chaldean Tongue; and therefore did Ninus and Semiramis giue that name to their Father, that hee might be honoured as the Sunne, which the Babylonians worshipped as a God. And as this Title was assumed in after-times by diuers others of the Chaldean Princes, and Babylonian Satraps: so was it vsed (in imitation) by the chiefe of the Carthaginians and other Nations, as some Historians haue conceiued.

To this Bel, or Belus pertaine (as in affinitie) those voyces of Baal, Baalim, Belphegor, Beelphegor, Belpheub, and Beelzebub. Those that are learned in the Hebrew and Chaldean conuert the word Baal by the Latine, Princeps militie, Chiefe in the Warre; though Daniel was so called (saith SVIDAS) Ob honorem explanationis arcanarum verum; in honorem huius expounding secrets. Saint Ierome makes Bel, Beel, and Baal, to haue the same signification: and sayth, that the Idoll of Babylon was so called, which Ninus in memory of his father set vp to be worshipped: to which that he might adde the more honour and reuerence, he made it a Sanctuarie and refuge for all offenders. Hence (saith Zyranus) came Idolatrie, and the first vse of Images into the World. Isidore is doth interpret Bel by Velus, old or ancient; adding, that as among the Affryians it is taken for Saturne and the Sunne: so in the Punick or Carthaginian Language it signifieth shipping of the Heathen Idols, it is manifest that Moses spake of Images of the living God, and not of Bad and the rest of that nature, for you saw no Image (sayth Moses) that day that the Lord spake unto you in Horeb. Surely it was excellently sayd of Basil; Noli aliquam in illo formam imaginari, ne circumscribas eum mente tua: Doe not imagine any forme to be in God, lest thou limit or circumscribe him in thy minde too. Now, if the great Basil thought it a presumption vnlawfull to represent a patterne of the infinite God to our owne thoughts and mindes, how farre doe those men presume that put him vnder the greazie Pensill of a Painter, or the rustie Axe or other Instrument of a Carpenter or Caruer.

For as this dishonour to the infinite and incomprehensible God beganne in Babel: so did the Deuill transport and speed this inuention into all the Regions adioyning, and into Egypt and Greece.

The Romans for a while refitted the erection of these Idols and Images, refusing to set them in their Temples for 170. yeeres, obseruing therein the Law of Numa: who thought it impetie to relembe things most beautifull, by things most base. But Tarquinus Priscus afterwards preuailing, and following the vanitie of the Gracians (a Nation of all others vnder the Sunne most deluded by Satan) set vp the Images of their Gods; which (as Saint Augustine witnesseth) that Learned Varro both bewailed, and vtterly condemned: and which Seneca thus derideth; Simulacra deorum venerantur, illis supplicat, genu posito illa adorant, & cum hec suspiciant, fabros quoque illa fecere contemnunt; The Images of the Gods are worshipped, those they pray vnto with bended knees; those they adore, and while they so greatly admire them, they contemne the Handicraftsmen that made them: which also Sedulius the Poet in this sort scoffeth at:

*Hec miseri qui vana colunt, qui corde sinistro
Religio sibi sculptunt simulacra, summs
Factorem fugiunt, & que fecere venerantur.
Quis furor est? quanta animos dementia ludit?
Vt volucrem, turpemq; bonem, toruamq; Draconem,
Semi-hominemq; canem supplex homo pronus adoret.*

Ah wretched they that worship vanities,
And consecrate dumbe Idols in their heart,
Who their owne Maker (God on high) despise,
And feare the worke of their owne hands and art.
What furie? what great madnesse doth beguile
Mens minds? that man should vgly shapcs adore,
Of Birds, or Buls, or Dragons, or the vile
Halfe-dogge-halfe-man on knees for aide implore.

And though this deuice was barbarous, and first, and many yeeres practised by Heathen Nations onely, till the Jewes were corrupted in Egypt, yet it is not Seneca alone that laugheth to scorn the ignorant stupiditie of his Nation: but Iustin Martyr remembreth how the Sibyls inuighed against Images: and Hosianus, how Sophocles taught, that it was pernicious to the soules of men to erect and adore those Babels. Strabo and Herodotus witnesseth, that the Persians did not erect or set vp any Statue of their Gods. Zenocrus neuer taught it the Lacedemonians, but thought it impetie to represent immortal natures by mortall Figures. Eusebius also witnesseth in his sixth Booke de preparatione Euangelica, that it was forbidden by a Law in Serica, or among the Brachmans in India, that Images should be worshipped. The same doe Tacitus and Criminus report of the ancient Germans. Many other Authours might be remembered that witness the disdain which the Heathen themselves had of this childish Idolatrie: of which Hosianus hath written at large in his Tract, de originibus imaginum.

imaginum. And it was truly said, Omnia mala exempla bonis initijs orta sunt, All ill examples haue sprung from good beginnings. The Heathen at first made these Statue and Images, but in memorie of such remarkable men, as had deserved best of their Countries and Common-wealths: Effigies hominum (sayth Plinius) non solabant exprimi, nisi aliqua illustri causa perpetuitatem mererentur: Men were not wont to make Pictures, but of men which merited for some notable cause to be perpetually remembered. And though of the more ancient Papists, some haue borrowed of the Gentiles (as appeareth in Lactantius) that defence for Images: That Simulacra are pro elementis literarum, ut per ea discerint homines Deum inuisibilem cognoscere: Images (say they, and so before them the Heathen said) are in stead of Letters, whereby men might learne to know the inuisible God: in which vnderstanding (perhaps they no otherwise cleeme them then Pictures indeed; yet as that of Bad or Bel set vp in memorie of Belus the Babylonian, became afterwards the most reuerenced Idoll of the World, by which so many Nations (and they which were appropriate to God himselfe) were misled and cast away: so those very stocks and stones, and painted Canaues (called the pictures of Christ, our Ladie, and others) were by thousands of ignorant people, not onely adored, but cleemed to haue life, motion, and vnderstanding. On these stockes we call (sayth the Booke of Wisdom) when we passe through the raging vynes, on these stockes more rotten then the Ship that carrieth vs.

This Heathen inuention of Images became so fruitfull in after-times, breeding an infinite multitude of gods, that they were forced to distinguish them into degrees and orders; as Dij Consetes, seu maiorum gentium; selecti, Patricij, in gentiores, dij medi; Counselling Gods, or Gods of the mightiest Nobilitie, select Gods; Patrician, Gods of mark, and common Gods (which the Romans called Medioximi) dij infirmi, and terrstrall Heroes, and multitudes of other Gods: of which Saint Augustine hath made large mention in his Booke de Ciuitate Dei. But (saith Lactantius) among all those miserable foules and rotten bodies, worshipped by men more like to their Idols, did Epimenides Cretensis (by what good Angell moued I know not) erect in the Athenian Fields, Altars to the vnknewne God, which stood with the same title and dedication euen to the times of Saint Paul: who made them first know to whom those Altars belonged, and opened their eyes which were capable of grace, that they might discern the difference betwixt that light which lightenth every man, and the obscure and stinking mist wherein the Deuill had so many yeeres led and misled them. And it sufficed not that the multitude of these Gods was so great in general, or that euery Nation had some one which tooke particular and singular care of them; as Iupiter in Crete, Isis in Egypt, in Athens Minerva, in Samos Inno, in Paphos Venus, and so of all other parts; but euery Cite, and almost euery Family had a God a part. For as it is written in the second of Kings: the men of Babel, made Succoth Benoth, and the men of Cuth made Nergal, and the men of Hamath made Asima, and the Amis made Ribhaz and Tarrak, and the Sephernims burnt their children in the fire to Airamelech. All which how plainly hath the Prophet Esa decided? Men cut downe Trees, rinde them, burne a part of them, make readie their meate, and warme themselves by the fire thereof, and of the residue he maketh a God; an Idoll, and prayeth vnto it: but God hath shut their eyes from sight, and their hearts from vnderstanding. It is therefore safest for a Christian to beleue the Commandements of God so direct against Idolatrie, to beleue the Prophets, and to beleue Saint Paul: who speaketh thus plainly and feelingly, My beloved, flye from Idolatrie, I speake as vnto them which haue vnderstanding, in doe ye what I say.

§. VIII.

Of the Warres of NINUS: and lastly of his warre against ZOROASTER.

NOW this Belus succeeded Ninus, the first that commanded the exercise of Idolatrie, the first that injuriously invaded his Neighbour Princes; and the first that without shame or feare committed adulterie in publique. But as of Belus there is no certaine memorie (as touching particulars:) so of this Ninus (whose storie is gathered out of Pro-¹⁰ phane Authours) I find nothing so warrantable, but that the same may bee disputed, and in the greatest part doubted. For although that piece of Berosus set out and commented vpon by Annius, hath many good things in it, and giueth great light (as others: yet Lodouicus Vives, B. Rhenanus, and others after them haue layed open the imperfection and defects of the Fragment; and procuring directly that it cannot bee the same Berosus which liued in Alexanders time, cited by Athenaus and Iosephus: and whose Statue the Athenians erected, sayth Plinie. Yet it is from him chiefly, that many haue gathered the succession of the Babylonian and Assyrian Princes, euen from Nimrod to the eighteenth King Ascatades, and to the times of Iosua. For of Aetios a Historian, of the Race of the Persian Priests, there are found but certaine Papers, or some few lines of the Chaldean and Assyrian Monarchies: but hee afterwards in the collection of the Persian Kings is not without his errors.

Ctesias of Chnidus (a Citie adioyning to Halicarnassus) who liued together with Cyrus the yonger, and with Artaxerxes Menemon, gathered his Historie out of the Persian Records, and reacheth as farre vpwards as Ninus and Semiramis: and though in the storie of Cyrus the yonger, Xenophon approoueth him in some things, and Athenaus, Pausanias and Tertullian cite him; yet so bafe and apparent are his flatteries of the times and Princes with whom he liued, and so incredible are the numbers which he finds in the Armies of Ninus, and especially of Semiramis; as whatsoeuer his reports were, times haue consumed his workes, sauing some very few exceptions lately published.

And therefore in things vncertaine, seeing a long discourse cannot bee pleasing to men of iudgement, I will passe ouer the Acts of this third Assyrian, in as few words as I can expresse them. Saint Augustine affirmes that Ninus mastered all Asia, India excepted. Others say that he waite it all, saue India, Bactria, and Arabia. For he made Aricus of Arabia the Companion of his Conquests, with whom hee entred into a straight league of amitie, because he commanded many people and was his Kinsman, and a Chusite, and the nearest Prince confronting Babylonia. His first enterprise was vpon Syria, which he might easily subdue, both because hee invaded it on the sodaine, and because it lay next him: and also because the Arabians and their King Aricus (which bordered Syria) assisted him in the Conquest thereof.

The King of Armenia, Barzanes, he forced to acknowledge him, and to aide him in his Warre against Zoroaster: for from Armenia hee bent himselfe that way toward the East; but that euer he commanded the lesser Asia, I do not beleue, for none of his Successors had any possession therein.

His third Warre was against Pharnus, King of the Medes, whom it is sayd that hee ouerthrew, and cruelly murdered with his seuen children, though others affirme that they all dyed in one battaile against him. Whether hee invaded Zoroaster before the building or amplifying of Ninus, or after, it is vncertaine. It is said that hee made two expeditions into Bactria; and that finding little or ill successe in the first, he returned, and set for the worke of Ninus forward: and then a second time entred Bactria with 1700000. Foot, and 200000. Horie, and 10000. fixe hundred Chariots:

riots: being encountered by Zoroaster with 400000. But Ninus preuailing, and Zoroaster slaine, he entred farther into the Countrey, and besieged the chiefe Citie thereof, called Bactra or Bactrian (saith Stephanus:) which by a passage found, and an assault giuen by Semiramis (the wife of Menon) he entred and possesse. Vpon this occasion Ninus both admiring her iudgement and valour, together with her person and externall beautie, fancied her so strongly, as (neglecting all Princely respects) he tooke her from her husband, whose eyes he threatened to thrust out if he refused to consent. He therefore yeelding to the passion of loue in Ninus, and to the passion of sorrow in himselfe, by the strong perswasions of shame and dishon-10 nor, cast himselfe head-long into the water and dyed.

CHAP. XI.

Of ZOROASTER, supposed to haue beene the chiefe Author of Magick arts: and of the diuers Kindes of Magick.

§. I.

That ZOROASTER was not CHAM, nor the first Inuenter of Astrologie, or of Magick: and that there were diuers great Magicians of this name.

ZOROASTER King of the Bactrians, Vincennius supposeth to be Cham, the sonne of Noah: A fancie of little probabilitie. For Cham was the Paternall Ancestor of Ninus, the Father of Chus, the Grand-father of Nimrod, whose sonne was Belus, the Father of Ninus. It may be that Vincennius had heard of that booke which was called Scriptura Cham, deuised by some wicked Knaue, and so intituled: of which Sextus Seneca hath made the due mention.

It is reported by Cassianus, that Serenus Abbas gaue the inuention of Magick to Cham, the sonne of Noah.
Cassian. in Vita. Cal. cap. 21.

so did Comestor in his Scholasticall Historie: which Arte (saith he) with the seuen liberrall Sciences he writ in foureteen Pillers: seuen of which were made of brasle, to resist the defacing by the waters of the Flood; and seuen of brick against the iniurie of fire. There was also another deuised discourse, which went vnder the title of Prophetia Cham. Cassianus out of Serenus hath somewhat like vnto this of Comestor. These be Cassianus wordes: CHAM (filius NOAH) qui superstitionibus istis & sacilegiis fuit artibus infelix, sciens nullum se posse super his memorialem librum in Arcam prefatus inferre, in qua erat cum patre suo, &c. CHAM (the sonne of NOAH) who was infected with these superstitions, and sacrilegious Arts, knowing that he could not bring any booke or memoriall of that nature into the Arke, wherein he was to remayne with his godly Father, caused the Precepts and Rules thereof to be grauen in metall and hard stone.

S. Augustine noteth that Zoroaster was laid to haue laught at his birth, when all other children weepe; which presaged the great knowledge which afterward he attained vnto: being taken for the Inuenter of naturall Magick and other Arts; for the

Corrupter,

Corrupter, faith Plinie and Iustine. But I doe not thinke that Zoroaster inuented the doctrine of the Horoscopes or Natimities; or first found out the nature of herbs, stones, and minerais, or their Sympatheticall or Antipatheticall workings; of which, I know not what King of Chaldea is also made the Inuenter. I rather thinke that these knowledges were farre more ancient, and left by Noah to his sonnes. For Abraham who had not any acquaintance with Zoroaster, (as Iosephus reporteth) was no lesse learned herein then any other in that age, if he exceeded not all men then living: differing from the wisdome of after-times in this, that he knew and acknowledged the true cause, and giuer of life and vertue to nature and all natural things; whereas others (forgetting Gods infinite, dispersed, and vniuersall power) admired to the instruments, and attributed proper strength to the things themselves, (from which the effects were sensible) which belonged to that wisdome, which being one, and remysing in it selfe, can doe all things and reneweth all.

11/ed. c. 7.

Now whether this Zoroaster (ouer-throwne by Ninus) were the same which was so excellent a Naturalist, it is doubted. For Zoroaster the Magician, Cresias calls Oxyartes, whom Plinie findes of a later time. And if Zoroaster were taken away by a Spirit (being in the midt of his Disciples) as some Authors report, then Zoroaster, slaine by Ninus, was not the Magician: which is also the opinion of Sealiger.

Ioseph. lib. 1.
Antiq. c. 44.

Againe, Iosephus and Cedrenus affirme, that Seth first found out the Planets, or wandering Starres, and other Motions of the Heauens: for if this arte had bene inuented by Zoroaster, he could not haue attained to any such excellencie therein, in his owne life time; but being a man (as it seemeth) of singular iudgement, he might adde somewhat to this kinde of knowledge, and leaue it by writing to posteritie.

But of this Zoroaster there is much dispute: and no lesse iangling about the word and arte of Magick. Arnobius remembreth foure, to whom the name of Zoroaster, or Zoroastres was giuen: which by Hermodorus and Dion seemeth to be but a cognomen, or name of arte, and was as much to say, as astrorum cultor. The first, Arnobius calleth the Bactrian, which may be the same that Ninus ouerthrew: the second, a Chaldean, and the Astronomer of Ninus: the third was Zoroaster Pamphilus, who liued in the time of Cyrus, and his familiar: the fourth, Zoroaster Armenius, the Ne-³⁰ phew of Hosianes, which followed Xerxes into Greece: betweene whom and Cyrus there past threecore and eightene yeeeres. Suidas remembreth a fift, called Persimendus sapiens: and Plato speaketh of Zoroaster the sonne of Oromasdes; which Picus Mirandula confirmeth.

Now of what Nation the first and chiefe Zoroaster was, it is doubted. Plinie and Laertius make him a Persian. Gemisthius or Pletho, Ficinus and Stenchius, make him a Chaldean. But by those bookes of one Zoroaster, found by Picus Mirandula, it appeareth plainly, that the Author of them was a Chaldean by Nation, though the word (Chaldean) was as often giuen to the learned Priests peculiarly, as for any distinguishing of Nations. Porphyrus makes the Chaldei and Magi diuers; Picus the same.⁴⁰ But that this Zoroaster was a Chaldean both by Nation and Profession, it appeareth by his Bookes, which (saith Picus) were written in the Chaldean tongue; and the Comment in the same language. Now that the Magi and they were not differing, it may be iudged by the name of those bookes of Zoroaster, which in an Epistle of Mirandula to Ficinus, he saith, to be intituled, Patri Ezre Zoroastrii, & Melchior magorum oracula.

OW for Magick it selfe; which Arte (saith Mirandula) pauci intelligunt, multi reprehendunt; Few vnderstand, and many reprehend. Et sicut Cicero ignotus semper allatur; As Dogs bark at those they know not: so they condemne and hate the things they vnderstand not: I thinke it not amisse (leauing Ninus for awhile) to speake somewhat thereof.

Pic. mir. fol. 81.

It is true that many men abhorre the very name and word (Magus) because of Simon Magus: who being in deede, not Magus, but Gaeus, (that is) familiar with euill spirits, vnrped that title. For Magick, Coniuring, and Witcherie, are farre differing Arts, whereof Plinie being ignorant scoffeth thereat. For Nero (saith Plinie) who had the most excellent Magicians of the East sent him by Tyridates King of Armenia, who held that Kingdome by his grace, found the arte after long studie and labour altogether ridiculous.

Plin. 30. lib. 2.
Nat.

Magus is a Persian word primitiue, whereby is exprest such a one as is altogether conuerfant in things diuine. And (as Plato affirmeth) the arte of Magick is the arte of worshipping God. To which effect apollonius in his Epistles expounding the word (μαγος) saith, that the Persians called their gods μαγος: whence he addeth that Magus is either: 1. magus Sile of Deogratius magus (that is) that Magus is a name sometime of him that is a God by nature; sometimes of him that is in the seruice of God: in which latter sense it is taken, Matth. 2. v. 1. And this is the first and highest kinde: which Piccolominio calleth diuine Magick: and these did the Latines newly intitle Sapientes or Wisemen: For the feare & worship of God is the beginning of knowledge. These Wisemen the Greekes call Philosophers; the Indians, Brachmans: which name they somewhat neerely retyaue to this day, calling their Priests Bramines; among the Aegyptians they were termed Priests; with the Hebrewes they were called Cabalites, Prophets, Scribes, and Pharisees: amongst the Babylonians they were differenced by the name of Chaldeans: and among the Persians, Magicians: of whom Arnobius (speaking of Hosianes, one of the ancient Magicians) vseth these words: Et eorum Decurmeris maiestate persequitur, & Angelos ministros Dei, sed veri, eius uenerationis nouit as-

HIS MAIESTIE also in his first Booke of Demonologie c. 3. acknowledged, that in the Persian tongue the word (Magus) imports as much as a contemplator of diuine & heauenly Sciences; but vniuſly so called, because the Chaldeans were ignorant of the true diuinitie. And it is also right which H IS MAIESTIE auoweth, that vnder the name of Magick al other vnlawfull arts are comprehended, and yet doth H IS MAIESTIE distinguish it from Necromantie, Witchcraft, and the rest: of all which he hath written largely and most learnedly. For the Magick which H IS MAIESTIE condemmeth, is of that kinde whereof the Deuil is a partie. Daniel in his second chapter nameth foure kindes of those Wisemen: Arioli, Magi, Malefici, and Chaldai. Arioli the old Latine translation calleth Sophistes; Vatubius and Pagninus, Genethliacos, or Physici, or Philosophers, or (according to the note of Vatubius) Naturalisti: Nempe sunt Magi apud Barbaros, quod Philosophi apud Grecos (saith) diuinum humanarum rerum scientiam praestantes; For the Magi are the same with the Barbarians, as the Philosophers are with the Grecians (that is) men that proffesse the knowledge of things both diuine and humane. The Greeke and the Englishe call them Inchanters, Iantus, Magicians, Castilions, Coniurers: in the Syrian they are all foure by one name called Sapientes Babyloni; The Wisemen of Babel.

cap. 11.

The

The second sort Fatalibus, Pagnin, Iunius, and our English, call Astrologers; Hierome and the Septuagint, Magicians.

The third kinde are Malefici, or Venefici; in Hierome, Pagnin, and the Septuagint, Witches, or Possoners: in Iunius, Præfagiatores, or Sorcerers, as in English.

That Witches are also rightly fo called Venefici, or Possoners; and that indeede there is a kinde of Malefici, which without any arte of Magicke or Necromantie use the helpe of the Deuill to doe mischiefe, H. I. S. MAIESTIE confirmeth in the first Chapter of his second Booke: speaking also in the fifth Chapter of their practice, to mixe the powder of dead bodies with other things by the Deuill prepared; and at other times to make pictures of Waxe, or Clay, or otherwise (as it were Sacramentaliter) to effect those things, which the Deuill by other meanes bringeth to passe.

The fourth, all Translators call Chaldeans: who tooke vpon them to foretell all things to come, as well naturall as humane, and their euents: and this they vaunted to performe by the influences of the Starres by them obserued, and vnderstood.

Such were, and to this day partly (if not altogether) are the corruptions, which haue made odious the very name of Magicke, hauing chiefly fought (as is the manner of all impostures) to counterfaiit the highest and most noble part of it, yet so as they haue also crept into the inferior degrees.

A second kinde of Magicke was that part of Astrologie, which had respect to sowing and planting, and all kinds of agriculture and husbandrie: which was a knowledge of the motions and influences of the Starres into those lower Elements.

Philo Iudeus goeth farther, affirming, that by this part of Magicke or Astrologie, together with the motions of the Starres and other heauenly bodies, Abraham found out the knowledge of the true God, while he liued in Chaldaea: Qui contemplatione creaturarum cognouit Creatorem, (saith Io. DAMASCEN.) Who knew the Creator by the contemplation of the creature. IOSEPHVS reporteth of Abraham, that he instructed the Egyptians in Arithmetike and Astronomie, who before *ABRAHAM*s coming vnto them knew none of these sciences.

And so doth Archangelus de Burgo, in defence of Marandula against Gorsias: ALEXANDER & EVPOLEMON dicunt, quod ABRAHAM sanctitate & sapientia omnium præstantissimas Chaldaeos primum, deinde Phœnices, demum Ægyptios sacerdotes Astrologum & diuina docuerit, ALEXANDER (saith he, meaning ALEXANDER POLYHISTOR) and EVPOLEMON affirme, that ABRAHAM the holiest and wisest of men, did first teach the Chaldaeos, then the Phœnices; lastly, the Egyptian Priests, Astrologie and diuine knowledge.

The third kinde of Magicke containeth the whole Philosophie of nature; not the brabbings of the Aristotelians, but that which bringeth to light the inmost vertues, and draweth them out of natures hidden bosome to humane vse, Virtutes in centro centri latentes; Virtutes hidden in the center of the center, according to the Chymists. Of this sort were Albertus, Arnoldus de villanova, Raymond, Bacon, and many others: and before these, in elder times, and who better vnderstood the power of nature, and how to apply things that worke to things that suffer, were Zoroaster before spoken of: Apollonius Tyranus remembered by S. Hierome to Paulinus; in some mens opinion Numa Pompilius among the Romans; among the Indians, Thestian: among the Egyptians, Hermes; among the Babylonians, Budda: the Thracians had Zamolxis: the Ethiopi Periborians (as is supposed) Abbari: and the Italians, Petrus Aponeusis. The Magickie which these men profess is thus defined: Magia est connexio à viro sapienti agentium per naturam cum patientibus, sibi congruenter respondentibus, ut inde opera prædant non sine eorum admiratione qui causam ignorant; Magickie is the connexion of naturall agents and patients, answerable each to other, wrought by a wiseman to the bringing forth of such effects, as are wonderfull to those that know not their causes. In all these three kinds which other men diuide into foure, it seemeth that Zoroaster was exceedingly learned: especially in the first and highest. For in his Oracles he confesseth God to be the Creator of the vniuersall: he beleueth of the  Trinitie*, which he could not intellectuallitate negligate by any naturall knowledge: he speaketh of Angels, and of Paradise: approueth the immortallitie of the soule: teacheth Truth, Faith, Hope, and Love, discounting of the Abstinence and Charitie of the Magi: which Oracles of his, Pfellus, Pfell, & Vicin, Flavius, Patritius, and others haue gathered and translated.

Of this Zoroaster, Eusebius in the Theologie of the Phœnicians, vsing *Zoroaster*s owne wordes: Hæc ad verbum scribit (saith EVSEBIUS) Deus primus incorruptibilis, sempiternus, ingenuus, expertus partium, sibiipso similissimus, bonorum omnium auriga, munera non expectans, optimus, prudensissimus, pater iuris, sine doctrina institutum perdoctus, natura perfectus, sapiens, sacra natura vnicus inuentor, &c. Thus writeth ZOROASTER word for word. God the first incorruptible, enuerlasting, vngotten, without parts, most like himselfe, the guide of all good, expecting no reward, the best, the wisest, the father of right, having learn'd iustice without teaching, perfect wise by nature, the only inuentor thereof.

Sextus Senensis speaking of the wisdom of the Chaldeans, doth distinguish those wise men into five orders, (to wit) Chasædum, or Chaldeans: Asaphim, or Magicians: Chartamin; (which he translates Arioli, or Sophists) Alcaphim, or Malefici, or Venefici; Witches, or Possoners; and Gazarim Augures, or Aruspices, or Diuiners.

Chasædum were those which had the name of Chaldeans, which were Astronomers: Hij celorum motus diligentissime spectarunt; These did most diligently contemplate the motions of the heauens: whom Philo in the life of Abraham describeth.

Asaphim were in the old Latine translation called Philosophers: of the Septuagint and of Hierome, Magicians: Qui de omnium tam diuinorum quam humanarum verum causis Philosophati sunt; Who discoursed of the causes of all things, as well diuine as humane: of whom Origen makes Balaam (the sonne of Beor) to be the first: but Laertius ascribeth the inuention of this arte to Zoroaster the Persian.

Chartamin, or Inchanters, the Disciples (saith Saint Augustine, Plinie, and Iustine) of another Zoroaster: who corrupted the admirable wisdom of the Magi, which he receiued from his Ancesters.

Alcaphim, or Venefici, or Witches, are those of which we haue spoken already out of H. I. S. MAIESTIES booke of Demonologia.

Gazarim, or Aruspices (after S. Hierome) which diuine from the entrailes of beasts slaine for sacrifices: or by Gazarim others vnderstand Augures, who diuine by the flying, singing, or feeding of birds.

By this distinction we may perceiue the difference betweene those wise men which the Kings of Babylon entertained; and that the name and profession of the Magi among the ancient Persians was most honest. For as Pencer truly obserueth, Præsertim religioni Persice, ut in populo Dei Leuita, studij, vere Philosophie docti erant: nec quisquam Rex Persarum poterat esse, quin non antea Magorum disciplinam scientiamq; percepisset; The Magi (saith he) were the chiefe Ministers of the Persian Religion, as the Leuites among Gods people, and they were giuen to the studies of true Philosophie: as neither could any be King of the Persians, who had not first bene exercised in the mysteries and knowledge of the Magi. SIXTUS SENENSIS in defence of Origen against Polychronus and Theophilus, hath two kinds of Magickie, his owne wordes are these: *Et ne quem moueat premissa POLYCHRONIJ & THEOPHILI testimonij, scientiam est duplicem esse Magiam; alteram vbiq; ab ORIGINE damnatam, quæ per fœdera cum demonibus inita aut verè aut apparenter operatur; alteram ab ORIGINE laudatam, quæ ad præctiuen naturæ philosophiæ pertinet, docens admirabiles res operari ex applicatione mutua naturalium virtutum ad inuicem agentium ac patientium; That the testimonies of THEOPHILUS and POLYCHRONUS (saith he) may not moue any man, it is to be vnderstood that Magickie is of two sorts, the one euerywhere condemned by ORIGEN; which worketh (whether truly or seemingly) by covenants made with Demills; the other commended by ORIGEN; which appertaineth to the practick part of naturall Philosophie, teaching to worke admirable things by the mutual application of naturall vertues, agent and suffering reciprocally. This partition Hierome doth embrace in the first of his* falsified his doctrine of Characters, Numbers, and Incantations; and taught men to beleue in the strength of Words and Letters: (which without Faith in God are but Inke or common breath) thereby eyther to equall his owne with the All-powerfull Word of God, or to diminish the glorie of Gods creating Word, by whom are all things.

Moreover, hee was neuer ignorant, that both the wise and the simple observe when the Sea-birds forsake the shores and flye into the Land, that commonly some great storme followeth; that the high flying of the Kite and the Swallow betoken faire weather; that the crying of Crows and bathing of Duckes foreshew raine: for they feele the Ayre moistened in their Quills. And it is written in Jeremie 10 the Prophet, Euen the Storke in the ayre knoweth her appointed times, and the Turtle, and the Crane, and the Swallow. Hereupon, this enemy of Mankind working vpon these as vpon the rest of Gods creatures, long time abused the Heathen by teaching them to observe the flying of Fowles, and thereby to iudge of good or ill successe in the Warre: and (withall) to looke into their entrailes for the same, as if God had written the secrets of vnsearchable providence in the liuers and bowels of birds and beasts. Againe, because it pleased God sometimes by Dreames, not only to warne and teach his Prophets and Apostles, but Heathen Princes also; as Abimelech to restore Sara to Abraham; because he admonished Joseph, and by Dreame informed Jacob, Laban, Pharao, Salomon, Paul, Ananias, the Magi of the East, and others. For as it is remembred in Isa: In Dreames and Visions of the night when sleepe falleth vpon men, &c. Then God openeth the eares, that he might cause man to returne from his enterprise: therefore, I say, doth the Deuill also practise his Diuinations by Dreames, or (after Parisenfis) diuinitatis imitationes, his mocke-diuintie. This in the end grew so common, as Aristides compiled an Ephemerides of his owne Dreames: Mithridates of those of his Concubines. Yea the Romanes finding the inconuenience hereof, because all Dreames (without distinction of causes) were drawne to Diuination, forbade the same by a Law, as by the words of prohibition aut narrandis somnijs: occultam aliquam artem diuinandi it may appeare. Likewise by the Law of God in Deuteronomie cap. 13. seducing Dreamers were ordered to be slaine. Yet it is to be contemned, not that Marcus Antonius was told a remedie in his Dreame for two grieuous diseases that opprest him; nor that of Alexander Macedon for the cure of Ptolomies poysoned wound; nor that which Saint Augustine reporteth of a Millanoise; whose sonne (the Father dead) being demanded a debt already payed, was told by his Father in a Dreame where the Acquittance lay to discharge it: nor that of Athyages of his Daughter, and many others of like nature. Of the reason of all which, forasmuch as the cause is notin our felues, this place denieth dispute.

§. III.

That DANIELS misliking NABUCHODONOSORS condemning of the Magicians doth not iustifie all their practices.

Deut. 18. 10. Leuit. 20.

BVt it may be objected, that if such Diuination as the Heathens commonly vsed were to be condemned in them, who tooke on them verie many and strange Ruelations: how came it to passe that Daniel both condemned the haultie sentence of Nabuchodonosor against the Magicians of Chaldeas, and in a sort forbade it? especially considering that such kind of people God himselfe commanded to be slaine. To this diuers answers⁵⁰ may be giuen. First, it seemeth that Daniel had respect to those Chaldeans, because they acknowledged that the Dreame of the King, which himselfe had forgotten, could not be knowne to any man by any Art eyther Natural or Diabolically: For there is none other (sayd the Chaldeans) that can declare it before the King, except the Gods, ^{who} whose dwelling is not with flesh: and herein they confessed the power of the Euer-living God.

Secondly, it may be coniectured (and that with good reason) that among so many learned men, some of them did not exercise themselves in any euill or vnlawfull Artes, but were merely Magicians and Naturalists: and therefore when the King commanded to kill all, Daniel perswaded the contrarie, and called it a haultie iudgement, which proceeded with furie without examination. And that some of those mens studies and professions were lawfull, it may be gathered by Daniels instruction: for himselfe had bene taught by them, and was called chiefe of the Enchanters; of which some were termed Soothsayers, others Astrologians, others Chaldeans, others Magior Wisemen: and therefore of distinct professions.

Thirdly, Daniel misliked and forbade the execution of that iudgement, because it was vniust. For howsoeuer those men might deserue punishment for the practice of vnlawfull Artes (though not vnlawfull according to the Law of that State) yet herein they were altogether guiltlesse. For it exceeded humane power to pierce the Kings thought, which the Deuill himselfe could not know. So then in Daniels dislike, and hindering of the execution of sentence of death pronounced against the Magicians, there is no absolute iustifying of their practice and profession.

§. V.

The abuse of things which may bee found in all kinds, is not so condemne the right vse of them.

NOtwithstanding this mixture euery where of good with euill, of falsehood with truth, of corruption with cleanness and purity: The good, The truth, The puritie in euery kind may well be embraced: As in the ancient worshipping of God by Sacrifice; there was no man knowing God among the Elders, that therefore forbore to offer Sacrifice to the God of all power, because the Deuill in the Image of Baal, Asareth, Chemath, Jupiter, Apollo, and the like was so adored.

Neyther did the abuse of Astrologie terrifie Abraham (if we may beleue the most ancient and religious Historians) from obseruing the motions and natures of heavenly bodies; neyther can it dehorte wise and learned men in these dayes from attributing those vertues, influences, and inclinations to the Starres and other lights of Heauen, which God hath giuen to those his glorious creatures.

The Sympatheticall and Antipatheticall working of Herbes, Plants, Stones, Minerals, with their other vtmost vertues, sometimes taught by the Deuill, and applied by his Ministers to harmefull and vncharitable ends, can neuer terrifie the honest and learned Physician or Magician from the vying of them to the helpe and comfort of Mankind: neyther can the illusions, whereby the Deuill betrayeth such men as are fallen from God, make other men reiect the obseruations of Dreames; so farre as with a good Faith and a Religious caution they may make vse of them.

Lastly, the prohibition to marke flying of Fowles (as signes of good or euill successe) hath no reference at all to the crying of Crows against Raine, or to any obseruation not superstitious, and whereof a reason or cause may bee giuen. For if we confound Artes with the abuse of them, wee shall not only condemne all honest Trades and enterchange among men (for there are that decieve in all professions) but wee shall in a short time burie in forgetfulness all excellent knowledge and all learning, or obscure and couer it ouer with a most scornfull and beggerly ignorance: and (as Plinie teacheth) wee should shew our felues ingrates erga eos, qui laborant curam, lucem nobis aperuerunt in hac luce: Vnthankfull we should shew our felues toward those, who with paines and care haue discovered vnto vs light in this light.

Cusan. Comp.
Theolog. c. 1.

Indeed not only these naturall knowledges are condemned by those that are ignorant; but the Mathematicks also and Professors thereof: though those that are excellently learned iudge of it in this sort: In speculo Mathematico verum illud, quod in omni scibili queritur, relict; non modo remota similitudine, sed fulgida quadam propinquitate: In the Glasse of the Mathematicks that Truth doth shine, which is sought in every kind of knowledge, not in an obscure image, but in a nere and manifest representation.

¶ VI.

Of the diuers kinds of vniuersall Magicke.

IT is true that there are many Artes, if wee may so call them, which are couered with the name of Magicke: and esteemed abusively to bee as branches of that Tree, on whole root they neuer grew. The first of these hath the name of Necromancie or Goetia: and of this againe there are diuers kinds. The one is an Inuocation at the Graues of the dead, to whom the Deuill himselfe giues answer in stead of those that seeme to appeare. For certaine it is, that the immortall soules of men doe not inhabit the dust and dead bodies, but they giue motion and vnderstanding to the liuing: death being nothing else but a separation of the bodie and soule: and therefore the soule is not to be found in the Graues.

A second practice of those men, who pay Tribute or are in league with Satan, is that of coniuring or rayling vp Deuils, of whom they hope to learne what they list. These men are so distrust, as they beleue that by terrible words they make the Deuill to tremble; that being once impaled in a Circle (a Circle which cannot keepe out a Moufe) they therein (as they suppose) inforce themselves against that great Monster. Doubtlesse, they forget that the Deuill is not terrified from doing ill and all that is contrarie to God and goodnesse, no, not by the fearefull Word of the Almighty: and that he feared not to offer to sit in Gods seat, that hee made no scruple to tempt our Sauour Christ, whom himselfe called the Sonne of God. So, forgetting these proud parts of his, an vnworthy wretch will yet resolute himselfe, that hee can draw the Deuill out of Hell, and terrifie him with a Phraze: whereas in verie truth the obedience which Deuils seeme to vse, is but thereby to possesse themselves of the bodies and soules of those which rayle them vp; as His Maiestie in his Booke aforesaid hath excellently taught: That the Deuils obedience is only, secundum quid, scilicet ex pacto; respectiue, that is, vpon bargain.

I cannot tell what they can doe vpon those simple and ignorant Deuils, which inhabit Iamblicus imagination; but sure I am the rest are apt enough to come vncalled: and alwayes attending the cogitations of their seruants and vassals, doe no way need any such inforcement.

Or it may be that these Coniurers deale altogether with Cardans mortall Deuils, as following the opinion of Rabbi Aarnathan and of Porphyrius, who taught that these kind of Deuils liued not aboue a thousand yeares: which Plutarch in his Treatise de Oraculorum defectu confirmeth, making example of the great God Pan. For were it true that the Deuils were in awe of wicked men, or could bee compelled by them, then would they alwayes feare those wordes and threats, by which at other times they are willingly mastered. But the Familiar of Simon Magus when hee had lifted him vp in the Ayre, cast him headlong out of his clawes, when he was sure he should perish with the fall. If this perhaps were done by S. Peters Prayers (of which S. Peter no where vaunteth) yet the same prank at other times vpon his own accord the Deuill played with Theodosius: who transported (as Simon Magus was supposed to haue bene) had the same mortall fall that he had. The like successe had Rudas, a principall pillar of the Manichean Heresie, as Socrates in his Ecclesiasticall Historie witnesseth: and for a manifest prooff hereof wee see it every day, that the Deuill leaves all Witches and Sorcerers at the Gallowes, for whom at other times hee maketh heth himselfe a Pegasus, to conueigh them in haste to places faire distant, or at least makes them so thinke: For to those that receiued not the truth (sayth Saint Paul) God shall send them strong illusions. Of these their supposed transportations (yet agreeing with their confessions) His Maiestie in the second Booke and the fourth Chapter of the Demonologie, hath confirmed by vnanswerable reasons, that they are merely illusive. Another sort there are who take on them to include Spirits in Glassees and Crisall: of whom Cusanus: Falsi sunt incrementores, qui in vngue & vitro volunt spiritum includere: quia Spiritus non clauditur corpore: They are foolish Incubitors which will shut up their spirits within their niles or in Glasse: for a Spirit cannot be inclosed by a body.

There is also another Art besides the afore mentioned, which they call Theurgia, or white Magicke; a pretended conference with good Spirits or Angels, whom by Sacrifice and Inuocation they draw out of Heauen, and Communicate withall. But the administering Spirits of God, as they require not any kind of adoration due vnto their Creatour: so seeing they are most free Spirits; there is no man so absurd to thinke (except the Deuill haue corrupted his vnderstanding) that they can bee constrained or commanded out of Heauen by threats. Wherefore let the professors thereof couer themselves how they please by a professed purtie of life, by the ministerie of Infants, by fasting and abstinence in generall; yet all those that tamper with immateriall Substances and abstract natures, either by Sacrifice, Vow, or inforcement, are men of euill faith and in the power of Satan. For good Spirits or Angels cannot be constrained; and the rest are Deuils which willingly obey.

Other sorts there are of wicked Diuinations: as by fire, called Pyromantia; by water, called Hydromantia; by the ayre, called Atmantia, and the like.

The last, and (indeed) the worst of all other is Fascination or Witchcraft: the Practisers whereof are no lesse enuious and cruell, reuengefull and bloudie, then the Deuill himselfe. And these accursed creatures haue sold their soules to the Deuill, worke two wayes; either by the Deuill immediately, or by the art of poysoning. The difference betweene Necromancers and Witches, His Maiestie hath excellently taught in a word: that the one (in a sort) command; the other obey the Deuill.

There is another kind of pettie Witcherie (if it be not altogether deceit) which they call charming of Beasts and Birds, of which Pythagoras was accused, because an Eagle lighted on his shoulder in the Olympian fields. But if the same exceeded the Art of Falconrie, yet was it no more to be admired then *Mahomet*s Doue, which he had vied to feed with Wheate out of his care: which Doue, when it was hungry, lighted on *Mahomet*s shoulder, and thrust his Bill therein to find his breake-fast: Mahomet perswading the rude and simple Arabians, that it was the Holy Ghost that gaue him aduice. And certainly if Bankes had liued in elder times, hee would haue famed all the Inchanters of the World: for whosoever was most famous among them, could neuer master or instruct any Beast as he did his Horse.

For the drawing of Serpents out of their Dens, or killing of them in the holes by Inchantments (which the Marians a people of Italie practised: Colubros disrumpit Marica cantu: Inchanting Marica makes the Snakes to burst.) That it hath bene vied it appeares, Psal. 58. 6. though I doubt not, but that many Impostures may bee in this kind; and euen by naturall causes it may be done. For there are many Fumes that will either draw them out or destroy them; as womens haire burnt, and the like. So many things may be laied in the entrance of their holes that will allure them: and therein I find no other Magicke or Inchantment, then to draw out a Moufe with a peece of tosted Cheese.

Of diuers wayes by which the Deuill seemeth to worke his wonders.

BVt to the end that we may not dote with the Manichees, who make two powers of gods: that we do not giue to the Deuill any other dominion then he hath (not to speake of his abilitie, when hee is the Minister of Gods vengeance, as when Egypt, according to Dauid, was destroyed by the Deuill) he other wayes worke but three wayes. The first is by mouing the cogitations and affections of men: The second by the exquisite knowledge of Nature: and the third by deceit, illusion, and false semblance. And that they cannot worke what they would, G. Parisiensis giueth three causes: the first, a naturall impotencie; the second, their owne reason disswading them from daring ouermuch, or indeed (and that which is the only certaine cause) the great mercie of the Creatour, Tenens eas ligatas (sayth the same Authour) velut immanissimas belluas. Saint Augustine was of opinion that the Frogs which *Pharao*s Sorcerers produced were not naturall, but that the Deuill (by betraying of their senses that looked on) made them appeare to be such. For as Varro obserueth, those Frogs of the Enchanters were not found corrupted as those of Moses were, which might argue that they were not creatures indeed. Hereof sayth Saint Augustine: Nec sane Damantes naturas creant, sed quæ à Deo creata sunt commutant, ut videantur esse quod non sunt: The Deuill create not any natures, but so change those that are created by God, as they seeme to be that which they be not: of which in the 83. Question he giueth the reason. Demon quidam nebula implet omnes meatus intelligentie, per quos aperire lumen rationis radius mentis solet, (that is) The Deuill fills with certaine cloudes all passages of the vnderstanding, by which the beame of the mind is wont to open the light of reason.

Sint. per se de vniuerso. 2. 2. 70.

Maxima via est phantasia ad errores.

And as Tertullian in his Booke de anima rightly conceiuet, if the Deuill can possesse himselfe of the eyes of our mindes, and blind them, it is not hard for him to dazzle those of the body. For (out of doubt) by the same way that God passeth out, so the Deuill entrench in, beginning with the fantasie, by which he doth more easily betray the other faculties of the soule: for the fantasie is most apt to be abused by vaine apprehensions.

Aquinas on the contrarie held that those Frogs were not imaginarie, but such indeed as they seemed: not made Magice artis ludibrio, which indeed agreeth not with the Art, but (according to Thomas) Per aptam & idoneam agentium & patientium applicationem: By an apt and fit applying of agents and patients. And this I take to be more probable. For Moses could not be deceived by that sleight of false semblance; and Saint Augustine in another case like vnto this, (to wit) of the turning of Diomedes his Companions into Birds, per actus cum passibus, inclineth rather to this opinion: though I am not perfwaded that Saint Augustine beleueed that of Diomedes. And this opinion of Thomas, G. Parisiensis a man very learned also confirmeth. For speaking of naturall Magike hee vseth these words: De huiusmodi autem operibus est subita generatio variorum, & pedicularum, & vermium, aliorumque animalium quorundam: in quibus omnibus sola natura operatur, verum adhibitis adiutorijs, qui ipsa semina natura confortant & acciunt, ita ut opus generationis tantum accelerent, ut cui qui hoc fecerunt non opus natura videatur (que tardius talia efficere consuevit) sed potentia Demonum, &c. to which he addeth: Qui autem in his docti sunt talia non mirantur, sed solum Creatorem in his glorificant: In such workes (sayth he) the Iodaine generation of Frogs, and Lice, and Wormes, and some other creatures is: in all which Nature alone worketh, but by means so strengthening the Seeds of Nature, and quickning them; in such wise that they so hasten the worke of generation, that it seemeth to the ignorant not to be the worke of Nature, which usually worketh more lesurely, but they thinke it is done by the power of Deuils. But they who are learned in these Arts maruaile not at such working, but glorifie the Creatour. Now by these these two wayes the Deuills doe most frequently worke, (to wit) by knowing the vttermost of nature; and by illusion: for there is no incomprehensible or vnsearchable power, but of God only.

D. l. 2. 2. 4. 6. 67.

For shall we say, he causeth sometimes thunders, lightnings, and tempests; and can infect the ayre, as well as moue it or compresse it; who knowes not that these things are also naturall? Or may it be objected that he fore-telleth things before they happen, which exceedeth nature, and is no illusion? It is true, that he sometimes doth it; but how? In elder ages he stole his knowledge out of the predictions of the Prophets: and he fore-told the death of Saul, at such time as he was in his owne possession and power to dispose of. And he that hath liued from the infancy of the world to this day, and obserued the successe of euery counsaile: he that by reason of his swift motions can informe himselfe of all places, and preparations: he that is of counsaile with all those that studie and practise subuersion and destruction: he that is Prince of the ayre, and can thence better iudge, then those that inhabit the earth: if he should not sometimes, yea if he should not very oftentimes gheffe rightly of things to come (where God please not to giue impediment) it were very strange. For we see that wise and learned men doe oftentimes by comparing like causes conceiue rightly of like effects, before they happen: and yet where the Deuill doubteth and would willingly keepe his credit, he euermore answereth by 20 Riddles, as

If Cræsus ouer Halys goe,
Great Kingdomes hee shall ouerthrow.

Which answere may be taken either way: either for the ouerthrow of his owne Kingdom, or of his Enemies. And thus farre we grant the Deuill may proceed in predictions, which (otherwise) belong to God only; as it is in Esay: Show the things that are to come hereafter, that we may know that yee are Gods: show vs at all times and certainly what is to come. Solus enim diuina intelligentia ac sapientia est, occulta mouere & reuelare: It is only proper to Gods vnderstanding and wisdom, to know and reueale hidden things.

§. VIII.

That none was euer rayed from the dead by the power of the Deuill: and that it was not the true SAMUEL which appeared to SAUL.

TO conclude, it may be objected that the Deuill hath rayed from the dead: and that others by his power haue done the like, as in the example giuen of Samuel rayed by the Witch of Endor: which were true, then might it indeed be affirmed, that some of the Deuils acts exceed all the powers of nature, false semblance, and other illusions. Iustine Martyr was sometimes of the opinion, that it was Samuel indeed: and so was Ambrose, Lyra, and Burgenus; from which authorities those men borrow strength which so beleuee. But Martyr changed his opinion: and so did S. Augustine, who at first seemed to be indifferent: For in his questions vpon the Old and New Testament, he accounteth it detestable to thinke that it was Samuel which appeared: and these be his wordes elsewhere to the same effect: In requie sunt animæ piarum à corpore separate, impiorum autem pœnæ launt, donec illarum ad vitam æternam, illarum vero ad æternam mortem que secunda dicitur corpora renouiscant: The soules of the goodly separated from their bodies are at rest, but those of the wicked suffer punishment, till the bodies dies of the iust rise to eternall life, and of the wicked to an eternall and second death. And (besides S. Augustine) Iustine Martyr, Eularius, Tertullian, Athanasius, Chrysostome, and others, beleueed firmly, and taught it: that the soules of men being once separate from their bodies, did not wander on the earth at all: Credere debemus (saith CYRIL) quam a corporibus sanctorum anime abierint, tanquam in manus charissimi patris bonitati diuine commendari; We must beleuee when the soules of holy men are departed from their bodies, that they be commended to the diuine Goodnesse, as into the hands of a most deare Father. If then they be in Heauen, the power of the Deuill cannot stretch so high: if in Hell, Ab inferno nulla est redemptio; From hell there is no redemption. For there are but two habitations after death: Vnum (saith AVGVSTINE) in igne aeterno; alterum in regno aeterno; The one in eternall fire; the other in Gods eternall Kingdom. And though it be written in Iure Pontificio, that many there are who beleuee that the dead haue againe appeared to the liuing; yet the Glosse vpon the same Text findes it ridiculous: Credunt, & male, quia sunt Phantasmata (saith the Glosse) They beleuee, and they beleuee amisse, because they be but Phantasmes, or Apparitions. For where-as any such voice hath beene heard, saying, I am the Soule of such a one: Hac oratio a fraude atq. deceptione diabolica est; That speech is framed by the fraud and deception of the Deuill, saith Chrysostome. Likewise of the same, saith TERTVLLIAN: Abist ut animam cuiuslibet sancti, nedum Prophetæ, a demonio credamus extraham; God forbid that we should thinke that the soule of any holy man, much lesse of a Prophet, should be drawne up againe by a Deuill.

16. q. 5. Epist. 101.

It is true that the Scriptures call that apparition Samuel, so doe they the wooden images Cherubims: and false brazen gods are called gods, and the like. And where-as these of the contrarie opinion build vpon that place of the 26. of Ecclesiasticus (a booke not numbred among the Canonical Scriptures, as S. Augustine himselfe in his Treatise, if it be his, De cura pro mortuis agenda, confesseth) yet Siracides following the literal sense and phrase of the Scriptures, proueth nothing at all: For though the Deuill would willingly perfwade, that the soules (yea euen of iust men) were in his power, yet so farre is it from the promises of the Scriptures, and from Gods iust and mercifull nature, and so contrarie to all diuine reason, as Saint Augustine (or 30 whosoeuer wrote that booke before cited) might rightly terme it a detestable opinion so to thinke. For if God had so absolutely forsaken Saul, that he refused to answer him either by dreames, by Prim, or by his Prophets: it were forth to conceiue, that he would permit the Deuill, or a wicked Witch, to raise a Prophet from the dead in Sauls respect: it being also contrarie to his owne diuine Law to aske counsaile of the dead; as in Deuteronomie 18. and elsewhere. Therefore it was the Deuill, and not the soule of a dead body, that gaue answer and aduice.

2. Kings 4. 34.
Nihil enim

But because Helias and Helizetue had raised some from the dead by the power of God; those Deuils which S. Augustine calleth iudificatores animantium sub iudicio; Mockers of their owne vassals, calling before their eyes a semblance of humane bodies, and framing sounds to their eares like the voyces of men, doe also perfwade their gracelesse and accursed attendants, that themelues both possesse, and haue power ouer the soules of men. Eludit Diabolus aciem tuam speculantium, tum etiam cogitantium, saith L. VIVES; The Deuill beguileth the sense both of the beholders, and of those that so imagine. These then are the bounds of the Deuils power, whom if we wil not feare, we must feare to sinne. For when he is not the instrument of Gods vengeance, he can touch no man that makes not himselfe his voluntarie vassall: Potesi ad malum inuitare, non potes trahere, saith S. AVGVSTINE, he can allure, but he cannot inforce to euill. Such as thinke otherwise, may goe into the number remembered by Lucretius.

CHAP. XII.

Of the memorable buildings of NINVS, and of his wife SEMIRAMIS: and of other of her acts.

§. I.

Of the magnificent building of Ninine by NINVS: and of Babylon by SEMIRAMIS.

Vt to come backe to Ninus the amplifier and finisher of Ninine: whether he performed it before or after the ouerthrow of Zoroaster, it is vncertaine. As for the Citie it selfe, it is agreed by all prophane Writers, and confirmed by the Scriptures, that it exceeded all other in circuit, and answerable magnificence. For it had in compasse 440. stadia, or furlongs; the walls whereof were an hundred foot vpright, and had such a bredth as three Chariots might passe on the Rampire in front: these walls were garnished with 1500. Towres which gaue exceeding beautie to the rest, and a strength no lesse admirable for the nature of those times.

But this Citie (built in the Plaines of Assyria, and on the bankes of Tigris, and in the Region of Eden) was founded long before Ninus time; and (as ancient Historians report, and more lately Naclerus) had the name of Campfor, at such time as Ninus amplified the same, and gaue it a wall, and called it after his owne name.

For these workes of Babylon and Ninine begun by Nimrod in Chaldea, and in Assyria, Ninus and Semiramis made perfect. Ninus finished Ninine, Semiramis Babylon: wherein thee sought to exceede her husband by farre. Indeed in the first Age when Princes were moderate, they neither thought how to inuade others, nor feared to be inuaded: labouring to build Townes and Villages for the vse of themelues and their people, without either Walls or Towres; and how they might discharge the earth of Woods, Bryars, Bushments, and Waters, to make it the more habitable and fertile. But Semiramis liuing in that Age, when Ambition was in strong youth: and purposing to follow the conquest which her husband had vnder-taken, gaue that beautie and strength to Babylon which it had.

§. II.

§. I.

Of the end of NINUS: and beginning of SEMIRAMIS reigne.

His shee did after the death of her husband Ninus: who after he had mastered Bactria, and subiected vnto his Empire all those Regions betwene it and the Mediterranean Sea and Hellespont (Asia the lesse excepted) and finished the worke of Ninus, he left the World in the yeere thereof 2019. after he had reigned 52. yeeres. Plutarch reporteth that Semiramis desired her husband Ninus, that he would grant vnto her the absolute ¹⁵ soveraigne power for one day. Diod. Siculus out of Athenaus, and others, speaks of five dayes. In which time (moued either with desire of rule, or licentious libertie, or with the memorie of her husband Menon, who perished for her) shee caused Ninus her husband to be slaine. But this seemeth rather a scandall cast on her by the Greekes, then that it had any truth.

Howsoeuer Ninus came to his end, Semiramis tooke on her after his death the sole rule of the Assyrian Empire: of which, Ninus was said to be the first Monarch, because he changed his seat from Babylonia in Chaldea to Ninive in Assyria. Justin reports, that Semiramis (the better to invest herselfe, and in her beginning without murmur or offence to take on her so great a charge) presented herselfe to the people ²⁰ in the person of her sonne Ninus or Zameis, who bare her externall forme and proportion without any sensible difference.

This report I take also to be fayned, for which many arguments might be made. But as the ruled long, so she performed all those memorable acts which are written of her by the name of Semiramis, and subscribed that letter which shee sent to the King of India (her last challenge and undertaken conquest) by her owne name. And were it true that her sonne Ninus had such a stature at his Fathers death, as that Semiramis (who was very personable) could be taken for him; yet it is very unlikely that she could haue held the Empire from him 42. yeeres after by any such subtiltie: (for so long shee reigned after the death of her husband:) but it may be true ²⁵ that Ninus or Zameis (being wholly giuen to his pleasures, as it is written of him) was well pleased with his Mothers prosperous gouernement and vnder-takings.

§. III.

Of SEMIRAMIS parentage and education, and Metamorphosis of her Mother.

Some Writers (of which Plutarch is one) make this famous woman to haue bene of base parentage, calling her after the name of her Countrey, a Syrian. Berosus calls her after the name of her Citie wherein shee was borne, Semiramis Ascalonitis; of Ascalon, the ancient Citie and Metropolis of the Philistims. Others report her to be the daughter of Derceta, a Churizian of Ascalon, exceeding beautifull. Others say, that this Derceta or Dercetis, the Mother of Semiramis, was sometimes a Recluse, and had profest a holy and a religious life, to whom there was a Temple dedicated, seated on the bank of a Lake adioyning to Ascalon; and afterward falling in loue with a goodly yong man, she was by him made with child, which (for feare of extreme punishment) she conuayed away, and caused the same to be hidden among the high reedes which grew on the banks of the Lake: in which (while the child was left to the mercy of wild ⁴⁰ beausts) the same was fed by certayne birds, which vied to feede vpon or neere those waters. But I take this tale to be like that of Lupat the Harlot that fostered Romulus. For some one or other adioyning to this Lake, had the charge and fosteridge of this child, who being per chance but some base and obscure creature, the mother might thereby thereby hope the better to couer her dishonor and breach of vow; notwithstanding which shee was cast from the top of her Temple into the Lake adioyning, and (as the Poets haue fayned) changed by Venus into a Fish, all but her face, which still held the same beautie and humane shape. It is thought that from this Derceta the inuention of that Idoll of the Philistims (called Dagon) was taken: for it is true, that Dagon had a mans face, and a fishes body: into whose Temple when the Arke of God was brought, the Idoll fell twice to the ground: and at the second fall there remayned only the Trunke of Dagon, the head being broken off: For so S. Hierome hath conuerted that place. Vatibius, Paginus, and Iunius, write it by Dagon onely, ¹⁰ which signifieth a fish, and so it only appeared: the head thereof by the second fall being sundred from the body.

For my selfe I rather thinke, that this Dagon of the Philistims was an Idoll representing Triton, one of those imaginarie Sea-gods vnder Neptune. For this Citie being maritimate (as all those of the Philistims were, and so were the best of Phoenicia) vied all their deuotions to Neptune, and the rest of the pettie gods which attended him.

§. IIII.

Of her Expedition into India, and death after discomfiture: with a note of the improbabilitie of her vices.

Vt for her Pedigree, I leaue it to the Assyrian Herald: and for her vicious life, I ascribe the report thereof to the enuious and lying Grecians. For delicacie and ease doe more often accompanie licentiousness in men and women, then labour and hazzard doe. And if the one halfe be true which is reported of this Lady, then there neuer liued any Prince or Princesse more worthy of fame then Semiramis was, both for the workes shee did at Babylon and elsewhere, and for the warres shee made with glorious successe: ³⁰ all but her last enterprize of India; from whence both Sirabo and Arianus report that she neuer returned: and that of all her most powerfull Armie there suruiued but onely twentie persons: the rest being either drowned in the Riuer of Indus, dead of the famine, or slaine by the sword of Staurabates. But as the multitude which went out are more then reason hath numbred: so were those that returned lesse then could haue escaped of such an Armie, as consisted of foure millions & vpwards. For these numbers which shee leuiued by her Lieutenant Dercetous (saith Suidas) did consist of Foot-men three millions; of Horse-men one million; of Charriots armed with hookes on each side one hundred thousand; of those which fought vpon Camels as many; of Camels for burden two hundred thousand; of raw Hides for all vses ⁴⁰ three hundred thousand; of Gallies with brazen heads three thousand, by which shee might transport ouer Indus at once three hundred thousand Souldiers: which Gallies were furnished with Syrians, Phenicians, Cilicians, and men of Cyprus. These incredible and impossible numbers, which no one place of the earth was able to nourish (had every man and beaust but fed vpon grasse) are taken from the authority of Ctesias whom Diodorus followeth. But as the one may be taxed with many frivolous reports: so Diodorus himselfe hath nothing of certaintie, but from Xerxes expedition into Greece and afterwards: whose Armie (though the same was farre inferior to that of Semiramis) yet had it weight enough to ouerlode the belief of any reasonable man. For all Authors consent, that Xerxes transported into Greece an Armie of 1700000. and gathered together (therein to passe the Hellespont) three thousand Gallies, as Herodotus out of the severall Provinces whence those Gallies were taken hath collected the number.

But of what multitude soeuer the Armie of Semiramis consisted: the same being broken and ouerthrowen by Staurabates vpon the banks of Indus, cantiones cantauit extremum:

tremum: (hee sang her last song; and (as Antiquitie hath fayned) was changed by the gods into a Dove (the bird of Venus) whence it came that the Babylonians gave a Dove in their enignes.

¶ V.

of the Temple of BELVS built by SEMIRAMIS: and of the Pyramides of Egypt.

Among all her other memorable and more then magnificent workes (besides the wall of the Citie of Babylon) was the Temple of Bel, erected in the middle of this Citie, inuironed with a wall carryed four-square of great heighth and beautie, hauing on each square certayne brazen gates curiously engrauen. In the Core of the square he raised a Towre of a furlong high, which is halfe a quarter of a mile; and vpon it againe (taking a Basis of a lesse circuit) the set a second Towre; and so eight in all, one above another: vpon the top whereof the Chaldeans Priests made the obseruation of the starres, because this Towre ouer-topped the ordinarie cloudes.

By beholding the ruines of this Towre haue many Trauailers beene deceived; who suppose that they haue seene a part of Nimrods Towre, when it was but the foundation of this Temple of Bel: (except this of Bel were founded on that of Nimrod.) There were burnt in this Temple one hundred thousand talents of frankincense euery yeere (saith Herodotus.) This Temple did Nabuchodonosor adorne with the spoiles of Hierusalem, and of the Temple of Salomon: all which vessels and ornaments Cyrus redeliuered. This temple Xerxes euened with the soile; which Alexander is said to haue repaired by the perswasions of the Chaldeans. I denie not that it might haue been in his desire so to doe; but he enioyed but a few yeeres after Babylon taken, and therefore could not performe any such worke. The Egyptians (saith Ptolemy) inhabiting a low and leuell ground, and giuen to the same superstition of the starres who the Chaldeans were, erected in imitation, and for the same seruice and vse, the Pyramides by Memphis, which were conspicua undiq, nauigantibus, saith Plinie. Of these Pyramides, Bellonius a carefull obseruer of rarities (who being in Egypt mounted by steps to the top of the highest) maketh this report: Le meilleur archer qui seroit a la sommite, & tirant une fleche en l'air, a peine pourroit l'envoyer hors de sa base qu'elle ne se tombast sur les degrez; The best archer standing on the top of one of these Pyramides, and shooting an arrow from thence into the ayre as farre as he can, with great difficulty shall be able so to force the same, but that it will fall vpon some of the degrez or steps.

THE SECOND BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

Of the time of the birth of ABRAHAM: and of the vse of this question, for the ordering of the Storye of the Assyrian Empire.

¶ I.

Of some of the successours of SEMIRAMIS: with a brieft transition to the question, about the time of the birth of ABRAHAM.

AFTER the death of Semiramis, Ninias or Zameis succeeded her in the Empire, on whom Berossus Annianus beflowes the conquest of Bactria, and the ouerthrow of Zoroaster; contrary to Diodorus, Iustine, Orosius, and all other approved writers. For Ninias being esteemed no man of warre at all, but altogether feminine, and subiect to ease and delicacie, there is no probability in that opinion. Now because there was nothing performed by this Ninias of any moment, other then that out of ialousie he euery yeere changed his Prouinciall Governours, and built Colledges for the Chaldean Priests, his Astronomers: nor by Arius his successor, whom Suidas calleth Thyras; but that he reduced againe the Bactrians and Caspians, revolted as it seemeth in Ninias as his time: nor of Aralus, the successor of Arius; but that he added sumptuosity, inuented iewels of gold and stone, and some engins for the warre: I will for this present passe them ouer, and a while follow Abraham, whose wayes are warrantable, (till wee meet these Assyrians againe in this story) by whom and by whose issues we shall best giue date to the Kings of Babylon: Abraham liuing at once with Ninus, Ninias, nias, Semiramis, Arius, Aralus, and Xerxes or Balanus: For otherwise if we seeke to proue things certaine by the vncertaine, and iudge of those times, which the Scriptures set vs down without error, by the reignes of the Assyrian Princes: we shall but patch vp the story at adventure, and leaue it in the same confusion, in which to this day it hath remained. For where the Scriptures doe not helpe vs, Misum non est in rebus antiquis Historiam non constare, Nonmiruall if then in things very ancient, History want assurance.

The better therefore to finde out, in what age of the World, and how long these Assyrian Kings reigned, as also for other good causes, we must first assure the time of Abrahams birth, and in what yeere the same hapned after the flood. Now since all agree, that the fortieth three yeere of Nimus was the birth-yeere of Abraham; by prouing directly out of the Scriptures, in what yeere after the flood the birth of Abraham hapned, we shall thereby let all the rest in square and order. But of this time there is much iangling betweene those Chronologers, which follow the Hebrew account, and others: the most part making 291. or 293. yeeres; others 352. yeeres between Abrahams birth and the flood: a matter often disputed, but neuer concluded.

Arctiloctus de temporibus (as we finde him in Annus) makes but 250. yeeres from the flood to Nimus: then seeing that Abraham was borne in the fortieth three yeere of Nimus, according to Ensebius, and S. Augustine, it followeth by the addition of those two numbers, that the yeere of Abrahams birth was in the yeere after the flood 293. or as the most part of all Chronologers gather, the yeere 292.

Now, since I doe here enter into that neuer-resolued question, and Labyrinth of times, it behoueth me to giue reason for my owne opinion: and with lo much the greater care and circumspection, because I walke aside, and in a way apart from the multitude; yet not alone, and without companions, though the fewer in number: with whom I rather choose to endure the wounds of those darts, which Enuie casteth at nouelty, than to goe on safely and sleepily in the easie waies of ancient mistakings: seeing to be learned in many errors, or to be ignorant in all things, hath little diuersity.

§. II.

A proposall of reasons or arguments, that are brought to proue ABRAHAM was borne in the yeere 292. after the Flood, and not in the yeere 352.

THose which seeke to proue this account of 292. yeeres, betweene the generall flood and Abrahams birth, ground themselves, first on these words of the Scripture: So TERAH lived 70. yeeres, and begot ABRAHAM, NAHOR, and HARAN: secondly, vpon the opinion of Iosephus, S. Augustine, Beza, Isidore, and many of the ancient Hebrewes before them: authorities (while they are slightly lookt ouer) seeming of great weight.

From the place of Scripture last remembered, the later Chronologers gather these arguments. First out of the wordes as they lie; that TERAH at 70. yeeres begot ABRAHAM, NAHOR, and HARAN: and that Abraham being the first named, Abraham being the worthiest, Abraham being the sonne of the promise, ought in this respect to be accounted the eldest sonne of Terah, and so necessarily borne in the sevenieth yeere of his life. Secondly, it was of Abraham that Moses had respect, in whom the Church of God was continued, who was heire of the blessing; and not of Nahor and Haran: for the scope of this Chapter was to set downe the Genealogy of Christ, so from Adam to Abraham, without all regard of Nahor, and Haran.

It is thirdly objected, that if Abraham were not the eldest sonne, then there can bee no certainty of his age, and so are all future times made doubtfull. For it can not then be proued, that Abraham was borne more assuredly in the 130. yeere of

Terah

Terah his age, then in the 131. 132. &c. Moses hauing no where set downe precisely that Abraham went into Canaan that very yeere, in which his Father died.

Fourthly, it is thought improbable, that Terah begat Abraham at 130. yeere: seeing Abraham himselfe thought it a wonder to be made a Father at 100. yeeres.

§. III.

The answer to one of the objections proposed, shewing that ABRAHAM made but one iourney out of Mesopotamia into Canaan: and it, after his Fathers death.

TO answer all which objections it is very easie, the way being prepared thereto by diuers learned Diuines long since, and to which I will adde somewhat of mine owne, according to the small talent which God hath giuen me. Now forasmuch as the state of the question cannot well be scanned, vnlesse the time of Abrahams iourney into Canaan be first considered of; before I descend vnto the particular examination of these arguments, I will make bold with order and method so farre, as to search into a strange tradition concerning his trauailes, that seruet as a ground for this opinion, and a bulwarke against all that can be said to the contrary.

But it is conceiued that Abraham made two iournies into Canaan: the latter after his Fathers death, the former presently vpon his calling, which he performed without all delay, not staying for his fathers death at Harar: a coniecture, drawn from a place in the Epistle to the Hebrewes, where it is written, By faith ABRAHAM (when hee was called) obeyed God, to goe out into a place, which he should afterward receive for inheritance: and he went out, not knowing whither hee went. This supposition (if it bee granted) serueth very well to vphold the opinion, that can ill stand without it. Let vs therefore see whether we may giue credit to the supposition it selfe.

Surely, that Abraham first departed Charran or Harar after the death of Terah his Father, the same is proued, without the admission of any distinction, by these words of S. STEPHEN: And after his Father was dead, God brought him into this Land, where ye now dwell, that was, out of Harar into Canaan. Against which place so direct, and plaine, what force hath any mans fancie or supposition, perswading, that Abraham made two iournies into Canaan; one before Terah's death, and another after: n such thing being found in the Scriptures, nor any circumstance, probability, or reason to induce it? For if any man out of this place before alleadged can picke any argument, prouing, or affording any strong presumption, that Abraham past into Canaan, and then returned vnto Harar, from whence he departed a second time: then I thinke it reason, that he be beleueed in the rest. But that hee performed the commandement of God after his Fathers death, leauing Harar and Harar for Canaan, it is as true as the Scriptures themselves are true. For after his Father was dead, (saith the Martyr Stephen) God brought him into this Land. And, as Beza noeth, if Abraham made a double iourney into Canaan, then must it be inferred, that Moses omitted the one, and Stephen afterwards remembered the other: and whence had Stephen, saith Beza, the knowledge of Abrahams coming into Canaan, but out of Moses? For if Stephen had spoken any thing of those times, differing from Moses, he had offered the Iewes his aduersaries too great an occasion both of scandalizing himselfe, and the Gospell of Christ. Indeed we shall finde small reason to make vs thinke that Abraham passed and repassed those wayes, more often than he was enforced so to doe, if we consider, that he had no other guide or comforter in this long and wearisome iourney, than the strength of his faith in Gods promise: in which if any thing would haue brought him to despair, he had more cause then euer man had to fall into it. For hee came into a Region of strong and stubborn nations: a Nation of valiant and resolute Idolaters. He was besieged with famine at his first arrival, and driuen to live into Egypt for reliefe. His wife was olde, and he had no sonne to inherit the promise. And when God had given him Isaac, he commaunded him to offer him vp to himselfe for Sacrifice: all which discomforts hee patiently and constantly vnderwent.

Secondly, let vs consider the wayes themselves, which Abraham had to passe ouer, the length whereof was 300. English miles: and through Countries of which he had no manner of experience. He was to transport himselfe ouer the great riuer of Euphrates, to trauaile through the dangerous and barren Delarts of Palmyrena, and to climbe ouer the great and high mountaines of Libanus, Herman or Gilead: and whether these were easie walks for Abraham to march twice ouer, containing, as aforesaid, 300. miles in length, let euery reasonable man iudge. For if hee traualled twice; then was his iourney in all 1800. miles from Haran: and from Haran twice into Canaan. But were there no other argument to disprove this fancie; the manner of Abrahams departing from Haran hath more prooffe, that hee had not animus reuertendi, not any thought of looking backward, than any mans bare coniecture, be he of what antiquity or authority looser. For thus it is written of him, Then Abraham tooke Sara his wife, and Lot his brothers sonne, and all their substance that they possessed, and the soules that they had gotten in Haran: and they departed to go to the land of Canaan, and to the Land of Canaan they came. Now if Abraham brought all with him that was deare vnto him; his wife, and kinsmen, and his, and their goods: it is not probable that he meant to walke it backe againe for his pleasure, in so warme, dangerous, and barren a Country as that was: or if hee could haue bene thereto moued, it is more likely that he would haue then returned, when he was yet vnsettled, and prest with extreme famine at his first arrivall. For had his Father bene then aliue, he might haue hoped from him to receiue more assured comfort and reliefe, then among the Egyptians, to whom hee was a meere stranger both in Religion and Nation.

What the cause might bee of Abrahams returne to Haran, as I will not enquire of them, that without warrant from the Scriptures haue sent him backe thither, about the time of his fathers death: so they perhaps, if they were vrged, could say little elsse, than that without such a second voyage their opinion were not maintainable. One thing in good reason they should doe well to make plaine if it be not otherwise troublefome. They say that Abraham was in Haran at his Fathers death, or some time after, being then by their account 135. yeeres old, or a little more. How then did it happen, that he left quite vndone the businesse, which as wee reade, was within foure or five yeeres after that time his greatest, or (as may seeme) his onely care? Did not he binde with a very solemne oath his principall seruant, in whom hee reposed most confidence, to trauaile into those parts, and seeke out a wife for Isaac his sonne? and doth it not appeare by all circumstances, that neither he nor his seruant were so well acquainted in Meopotamia, that they could particularly designe any one woman, as a fit match for Isaac? Surely if Abraham had bene there in person so lately, as within foure or five yeeres before, hee would not haue forgotten a matter of such importance; but would haue trusted his owne iudgement, in choosing a woman, fit for her piety, vertue, and other desireable qualities, to be linked in marriage with his onely sonne, who was then 35. yeeres old; before which age most of the Patriarches after the flood had begotten children, rather than haue left all at randome to the consideration of a seruant, that neither knew any, nor was knowne of any in that Country. But let it be supposed (if it may be beleued) that either Abraham forgot this businesse when he was there, or that somewhat hapned which no man can deuise. What might be the reason, that Abrahams man, in doing his masters errand, was faine to lay open the whole story of his masters prosperity, telling it as newes, that Sarah had borne to him a sonne in her old age? If Abraham himselfe, a more certaine Author, had so lately bene among them, would not all this haue bene an idle tale? It were needlesse to stand long vpon a thing so euident Wheret,

Whether it were lawful for Abraham to haue returned back to Haran, would perhaps be a question hardly answerable: considering how auerse hee was from permitting his sonne to be carried thither: euen though a wife of his owne kindred could not haue bene obtained without his personall presence. Isaac indeed was sent thither by his parents, to take a wife of his owne lineage; not without Gods especial approbation, by whose blessing he prospered in that iourney: yet hee liued there as a seruant; suffered many injuries; and finally was driuen to conuey himselfe away from thence by flight. For although it bee not a sentence written, yet out of all written examples it may be obserued, that God alloweth not in his seruants any desire of returning to the place, from whence hee hath taken, and transplanted them. That brieue laying, Remember: Lot's wife, contains much matter. Let vs but consider Meopotamia from whence Abraham was taken, and Egypt, out of which the whole nation of the Israelites was deliuered: wee shall finde, that no blessing issued from either of them, to the posterity of the Hebrewes. When Ezechias was visited with an honourable Embassie from Babel, it seemes that hee conceived great pleasure in his minde, and thought it a piece of his prosperity; but the prophecy which thereupon he heard by Esaie, made him to know, that the counsaile of God was not agreeable to such thoughts: which more plainly appeared in a following generation, when by the waters of Babylon they fate downe and wept. Concerning Egypt we reade, that Seisac and Neco Kings of Egypt brought calamitie vpon Israell: also that their confidence in the Egyptian succours was the cause of their destruction. Where they were forbidden to return into Egypt I doe not remember, nor can readily find; but it is found in Deuteronomie, that God had said, They should no more returne that way; which is giuen, as the reason, why their King might not cause the people to returne to Egypt, for the multiplying of his Horses. Whether the Lord had laied any such imprecation vpon Abraham of not returning to Meopotamia, I cannot say; many things do argue it probably; that hee neuer did returne, all circumstances do (to my vnderstanding) both strongly and necessarily conclude.

But because this double passage of Abrahams is but an imagination: and that imaginations of men are rather valuable among children, than that they can perwade those of iudgement or vnderstanding: I take it sufficient, that S. Stephen hath directly taught vs, that Abraham left Haran, his Father being dead. And for the rest, when they shew any one Scripture to prove it, I will beleuee as they doe. For all the trauailes of Abraham are precisely set downe in the Scriptures: as first from Ur or Comerina in Chaldaea to Haran or Charran: and then from Haran (after his Fathers death) to Siehem; from Siehem hee remoued to a mountaine betwene Bethel and Haie: thence into Egypt: from Egypt hee returned thither againe, where Lot and he parted, because their flocks and herds of Cattle were more, then could bee fed in that part: from thence the second time hee remoued to Mamre, neere Hebron: and thence hauing pursued Amraphel, and rescued Lot, hee after inhabited at Gerar, in the border of Iudamaa, vnder Abimelec: and after neere vnto it at Bethsabe, at which time hee was ready to offer vp his sonne Isaac on the mountaine Moriab. But this fiction of his retreat to Haran or Charran, appeareth not in any one story, either diuine or humane. Now if it may be supposed, that Abraham had made any former iourney into Canaan, as Leuitain his Cabala hath fained; it should in reason bee therewithall beleueed, that he would in those his first trauailes haue provided himselfe of some certaine seat, or place of abiding: and not haue come a second time, with his wife, kinsmen, familie, goods and Cattle, not knowing whereon to rest himselfe. But Abraham, when he came from Charran, past through the North part of Canaan, thence to Siehem, and the Plaine of Moriab: where finding no place to inhabit, he departed thence to Bethel and Haie: and so from Nation to Nation, to discover and finde out some fit habitation: from whence againe, as it is written in Genesis the eleuenth, He went forth, going and iourning towards the South: and alwayes vnstaid. By occasion of which wandering to and fro, some say, the Egyptians gaue him and his his the name of Hebrai. Further, to proue that hee had not formerly bene in the Countrey, we may note, that ere he came to Bethel and Haie, and at his first entrance into Canaan, God appeared vnto him, saying, Vnto thy seed will I giue this Land, shewing it him as vnto a stranger therein, and as a land to him vnknewe. For Abraham without any other prouident care for himselfe, beleueed in the word of the liuing God: neither sending before, nor comming first to discover it; but being arriued, he receiued a second promise from God, that hee would giue those Countreies vnto him and his seede to inhabit and inherit.

Lastly, what should moue any man to thinke, that Moses would haue omitted any such double journey of Abrahams, seeing hee letteth downe all his passages else where, long and short: as when he moued from Sichem, and feated betweene Haie and Bethel: the distance being but twenty miles: and when he moued thence to the valley of Mamre, being but twentie foure miles: and when hee left Mamre, and fate downe at Gerar, being lesse then fixe miles; no, Moses past ouer all the times of the first age with the greater breuitie, to hasten him to the story of Abraham: shunting vp all betweene the Creation and the Flood in six chapters; which age lasted 1656. yeeres: but hee bestoweth on the story of Abraham fourteene chapters, beginning with his birth in the eleuenth, and ending with his death in the fise and twentieth; and this time endured but 175. yeere. It hath therefore no face of truet, that Moses forgot or neglected any thing concerning Abrahams trauailes, or other actions: or that hee would set downe those small remooues of fise miles, and omit those of three hundred. For such a journey in going and comming would haue misliued some variety of matter, or accident, worthe the inserting and adding to Abrahams storie.

p. IIII.

The answer to another of the obiections proposed, shewing that it was not unlikely, that TERAB should beget ABRAHAM in his hundred and thirty yeere.

NOW touching the obiection, where it is said, that it was very vnlike that Terab should beget Abraham in his 130. yeere, seeing Abraham himselfe thought it a wonder to haue a sonne at an hundred: this is hardly worth the answering. This wonder is indeed miscaft, and mistaken: Abraham hauing respect only to Sarah his wife, when he spake of their many yeeres. For when the Angell saide vnto Abraham in his Tent doore at Mamre; Loe, SARAH thy wife shall haue a Sonne, it followeth in the next verse, Now ABRAHAM and SARAH were olde and stricken in age, and it ceased to be with SARAH after 40 the manner of women: therefore SARAH laughed, &c.

So then, in that it is said, it ceased to be with SARAH after the manner of women, it appeareth that the wonder was wrought on her, & not on Abraham. For Abraham by his second wife Keurah had many sons after Sarah's death, as Zimron, Jockhsan, Medan, Adinai, Ischak, and Shuah: and the eldest of these was borne 37. yeeres after Isaac: and the youngest 40. yeeres after. What strangeness then, that Terab being 130. yeeres old should beget Abraham, will they say, may be gathered from this supposed deliaise of Abraham at one hundred yeeres? For Sarah died in the yeere of the world 2145. and Isaac was borne in the yeere 2109: and Abraham did not marry Keurah till Sarah was buried. So if we deduct the number of 2109. out of 2145. there remaineth 36. And therefore if Abraham begat fise sonnes 36. yeeres after this supposed wonder, and when Abraham was 137. yeeres old: it is not strange that his Father Terab should beget Abraham at 130. And if Booz, Obed, and Iesse, who liued so many yeeres and ages after Abraham, begat sons at 100. yeeres, or neere it, it cannot be meruailed at, that Terab begat Abraham at 130. and Abraham others at the same age and seuen yeeres after.

p. V.

The answer to two more of the obiections: shewing that wee may haue certaintie of Abrahams age from the Scripture, though we make not Abraham the eldest Sonne: and that there was great cause, why in the story of Abraham his two brethren should be expected.

IT followeth now to speake something to the obiection, which brings Abrahams age altogether in doubt, except we allow him to be the eldest sonne of Terab, and borne when Terab was 70. yeeres old. For Abrahams age being made vncertaine, all succeeding times are thereby without any perfect rule or knowledge.

But this proposition, That wee cannot be certaine of Abrahams age, vnlesse we make him the eldest sonne, is false. For it is plaine in the Scriptures, that when Terab was 205. which was the yeere of his death, then was Abraham 75. And if you aske, how I can iudge of times, either preceding or succeeding, by knowing that Abraham departed Haran at that age: I answer, that S. Stephen hath told vs, that Abrahams departure followed the death of his Father Terab: and Terab died at 205; so as the 75. yeere of Abraham was the 205. yeere of Terab: which knowne, there can be no error in the account of times succeeding. Now to come to the obiection, where it is said, That Moses had no respect vnto Nachor and Haran, because they were out of the Church, but to Abraham onely, with whom God established the Covenent, and of whom Christ descended according to the flesh, &c. I answer, that Moses for many great and necessary causes had respect of Nachor and Haran. For the succession of Gods Church is not witnessed by Abraham alone, but by the issues of Nachor and Haran, were they Idolaters or otherwise. For Nachor was the Father of Bethuel, & Bethuel of Rebecca, the mother of Israel: & Haran was the parent of Lot, Sarah, and Milcab: and Sarah was mother to Isaac, and grandmother to Jacob: Milcab also the wife of Nachor, and mother of Bethuel, was Jacobs great grandmother: and the age of Sarah the daughter of Haran is especially noted, in that it pleased God to giue her a sonne at 90. yeeres, and when by nature she could not haue concieued. And therefore, though it were not in regard of themselves, yet because both Nachor and Abraham married the daughters of their brother Haran; and because Isaac married Rebecca the grand-child of Nachor; and Jacob, Lea, and Rachel, the daughters of Laban, the grand-child also of Nachor: It was not superfluous in Moses to giue light of these mens times and ages. And though sometime they worshipped strange Gods, as it is 49 1st. 24. 2. yet I see no cause to thinke, that they still continued Idolaters. For they beleued and obeyed the calling of Abraham, leauing their naturall Countrey, and Citie of Ur in Chaldea, as Abraham did, and remooued thence all, except Haran, who died before his Father Terab, ere they left Chaldea; but Lot, his sonne, followed Abraham into Canaan; and Sarah, the sister of Lot, Abraham married. Nachor also, who remained at Charran, gaue his sonnes daughters to Isaac, and Jacob, his own kinsmen: he himselfe hauing also married in his owne family; not thinking it pleasing vnto God to mixe themselves with strangers and Idolaters. And that these men at length beleueed in the God of Abraham, it can no way be doubted. For when Laban had seene the seruant of Abraham standing at the Well beside Charran, hee inuited 50 him to his Fathers house in this manner: Come in, thou blessed of IEHOVAH, &c. And when this seruant of Abrahams demanded an answer as touching Rebecca, then answered Laban and Bethuel, and said, This thing is proceeded of IEHOVAH: meaning that it was the will of the true God it should be so; wherein he acknowledged Gods providence. Likewise in the following verse it is written; Take, take, see that Isaac may be 1b7 thy Masters sonnes wife, euen as IEROVAH hath said. This their often vsing of the name of IEROVAH, which is the proper Name of the true God, is a signe that they had the knowledge of him.

Gen. 24. v. 31.

Gen. 24. v. 50.

Now although it be the opinion of Saint Chrysostome, and some later writers, as Caietan, Olesaster, Anselmus, Caluin, Mercer, and others, that Laban was an Idolater, because he retained certaine Idols, or household Gods, which Rachel stole from him; yet that he believed in the true God it cannot be denied. For hee acknowledged the God of Abraham and of Nahor, and he called Abrahams servant, blessed of IEROVAH, as aforesaid. So as for my selfe I dare not auow, that these men were out of the Church, who sure I am were not out of the faith.

¶ VI.

That the naming of ABRAHAM first of the three brethren, Gen. II. v. 26. doth not prove that he was the eldest: together with diuers reasons proving that ABRAHAM was not the eldest sonne of TERAH.

O the maine obiection which I answer last, because it seemeth of most strength, by which, those that strive to shorten the times, endeavour to prove that Abraham was the eldest sonne of Terah, and borne in the 70. yeere of Terahs life: grounding themselves first and chiefly on this place of the Scripture, And TERAH lived 70. yeeres and begat ABRAHAM, NAHOR, and HARAN: To this I say, that although Abraham in this verse be first named, yet the same is no prooffe at all that he was the eldest & first borne sonne of Terah. For it is no necessary consequence, that the first named in Scripture was therefore eldest in blood and birth, neither doth it appeare, that it pleased God to make especiall choice of the first sonnes in nature and time: for Seth was not the first borne of Adam; nor Isaac of Abraham; nor Jacob of Isaac; nor Iuda and Joseph of Jacob: nor David the eldest of Jesse; nor Salomon of David: as is formerly remembred.

Gen. II. v. 26.

Aug. quæst. super Gen. 25.

But it is written of NOAH; NOAH was 500. yeeres old, and NOAH begat SHEM, HAM, and JAPHET: shewing that at the 500. yeere of his age he began to beget the first of those three sonnes. For according to S. Augustine, speaking generally, Nec attendenda est in his ordo natiuitatis, sed significatio future dignitatis: in qua excellit ABRAHAM. The order of natiuitie is not here to be respected, but the signification of the future dignitie: in which ABRAHAM was preferred. And therefore, as in the order of the sonnes of NOAH: so is it here; where it is said, that TERAH lived 70. yeeres, and begat ABRAHAM, NAHOR, and HARAN: For it was late ere Terah began to beget Sonnes, himselfe being begotten by his Father Nahor at 29. as other his Ancestors were at 30. The like also happened to NOAH: for whereas Adam begat Seth at 130; Enosh 40 Kenan at 90; Kenan Mahalaleel at 70; Mahalaleel Iered at 60: NOAH was yet 500. yeeres old when he began to beget the first of his three sonnes, as aforesaid. And S. Augustine in the place before cited, rather inclineth to the opinion that Abraham was the youngest of Terahs sonnes, then otherwise: though for his excellencie he was worthily named first. His owne words are these: Fieri enim potuit ut posterior sit generatus ABRAHAM: sed merito excellentie, quia in Scripturis valde commendatur, prior sit natus. It might be, saith he, that ABRAHAM was begotten later: but was first named in regard of his excellencie, for which in Scripture he is much commended. So as the naming first or last proveth nothing who was first or last borne: either in those of NOAH, or in these of Terah: Neither hath God any respect of the eldest in nature, as touching his election or spirituall blessing, for Moses nameth first the children of the promise, and the eldest and first in Gods fauour. Pietas ergo vel ipsa potestas electio diuina, quæ comitem secum trahit pietatem, & Dei timorem, primas partes dedit SEMI in liberis NOA, & ABRAHAMO in liberis THAR. Pietie, saith he, or rather diuine election election, which doth euermore draw with it or after it pietie and the feare of God, gave place and predecence to SEM among the children of NOAH, and to ABRAHAM among those of Thare.

For the rest it is manifest, that Abraham entred Canaan in the 75. yeere of his age. And it was in Canaan that Hagar bare him Isaac, when Abraham had liued 86. yeeres. Gen. 12. 4. It was at Gerar (the South border of Canaan) that Sarah bare Isaac, when Abraham Gen. 16. 16. had consumed 100. yeeres. It was from the valley of Mamre in Canaan that Abraham role out, when he rescued Lot and ouerthrew Amraphel: and he had then but the age of 83. yeeres: and it is as manifest that he parted from Haran after his Father 10 Terah was dead. But if Terah begat Abraham at 70. yeere old, then must Abraham Gen. 11. 4. haue bene 135. yeeres when hee first let his foote in Canaan: seeing Terah must be dead ere he parted, and so 70. added to 135. made 205, the true age of Terah, which is contrary to all those places of Scripture before remembred. For hee entred at 75: hee rescued Lot at 83: hee had Isaac at 86: hee had Isaac at 100. proved by the former places.

Moreover, if Abraham were the eldest sonne of Terah, and borne in the 70. yeere of his age: then had Terah liued till Isaac had bene 35. yeeres old, and Isaac, 49. both which must then haue been borne in Mesopotamia, and therein fostered to that age: vnllesse we should either denie credit to S. Stephen, who saith that Abraham 10 departed from Mesopotamia after his Fathers death: or els give credit to the interpretation of Daniel Angelocurator, who in his Chronologia antiochia, saith it was about his Fathers death: because the Greeke word, εὐρημα, may bee, transported by the Latine sub, as well as by post: which though elsewhere it may bee, yet cannot it be so in this place. For it were most improperly spoken, to say that those things were done about Terahs death, which were 60. yeeres before. Wherefore supposing Abraham to haue bene borne in the 70. yeere of Terah, we must giue thosetines and places of birth to Abrahams children, which no authoritie will warrant; For Abraham had no children in Vr of Chaldea, nor in Haran: nor in 10. yeeres after his arrival into Canaan. For the yeere of Terahs death, in which Abraham left Haran, was the yeere of 30 the World 2083. and the yeere of Ismaels birth was the Worlds yeere 2094: which maketh 10. yeeres difference. And that Isaac was borne in Canaan, and was to bee offered vpon the mountaine Moriah therein, 39. miles from Bersabee, where Abraham then inhabited: and that three Angels first of all appeared to Abraham in the valley of Mamre, no man doubteth.

And therefore it cannot be that any of Abrahams sonnes were borne in Mesopotamia; nor while Terah liued; nor in lesse then 10. yeeres after Terahs death: and then consequently was not Abraham the eldest sonne of Terah, nor borne in the 70. yeere of Terahs age.

Thirdly, whereas Abraham came into Canaan at 75: if Terah had begotten him at 40 70, then had Terah liued but 145. for 70. and 75. make 145. which must needs haue been the full age of Terah: but Terah liued 205. yeeres: and therefore was not Abraham borne in the 70. yeere of Terah.

Fourthly, the ages of Lot and Sarah make it manifest, that Haran was the elder; if not the eldest brother of Abraham; for Sarah or Isah wanted but 10. yeeres of Abrahams age: Isaac being borne when Abraham was 100. and Sarah 90. yeeres old.

It followeth then, that if Abraham had bene the elder brother of Haran, Haran must haue begotten Sarah at 9. yeeres old: for granting that Haran was borne but one yeere after Abraham, and Sarah within 10. yeeres as old as Abraham, then of 10 necessity must Haran beget her, when hee had liued but 9. yeeres; which were too ridiculous to imagine.

And that Isah was Sarah, Rab. Solomon affirmeth; both names, saith he, beate the same signification; and names of principallitie. Again, to what end was the word Isah or Iphsah inserted in this place, if Sarah were not meant thereby? for to speake thy Masters sonnes wife, even as IEROVAN hath said. This their often vsing of the name of IEROVAN, which is the proper Name of the true God, is a signe that they had the knowledge of him.

Now although it be the opinion of Saint Chrysostome, and some later writers, as Caietan, Olesfinger, Musculus, Caluin, Mercer, and others, that Laban was an Idolater, because he retained certain Idols, or household Gods; which Rachel stole from him; yet that he beleued in the true God it cannot be denied. For hee acknowledgeth the God of Abraham and of Nahor, and he called Abrahams servant; blessed of IEROVAN, as aforesaid. So as for my selfe I dare not auow, that these men were out of the Church, who sure I am were not out of the faith.

¶ VI.

That the naming of ABRAHAM first of the three brethren, GEN. II. V. 26. doth not prove that hee was the eldest: together with diuers reasons proving that ABRAHAM was not the eldest sonne of TERAH.

GEN. II. V. 26.

O the maine obiection which I answered last, because it seemeth of most strength, by which, those that strive to shorten the times, endeavour to prove that Abraham was the eldest sonne of Terah, and borne in the 70. yeere of Terahs life: grounding themselves first and chiefly on this place of the Scripture, And TERAH liued 70. yeeres and begat ABRAHAM, NAHOR, and HARAN: To this I say, that although Abraham in this verse be first named, yet the same is no prooffe at all that he was the eldest & first born sonne of Terah. For it is no necessary consequence, that the first named in Scriptures was therefore eldest in blood and birth, neither doth it appeare, that it pleased God to make especiall choice of the first sonnes in nature and time: for Seth was not the first borne of Adam; nor Isaac of Abraham; nor Jacob of Isaac; nor Iuda and Joseph of Jacob: nor David the eldest of Jesse; nor Solomon of David: as is formerly remembred.

Aug. quæst. super Gen. 25.

But it is written of NOAH; NOAH was 500. yeeres old, and NOAH begat SHEM, HAM, and JAPHET: shewing that at the 500. yeere of his age he began to beget the first of those three sonnes. For according to S. Augustine, speaking generally, Nec attendendus est in his ordo natiuitatis, sed significatio future dignitatis: in qua excellit ABRAHAM. The order of natiuitie is not here to be respected, but the signification of the future dignitie: in which ABRAHAM was preferred. And therefore, as in the order of the sonnes of Noah: so is it here; where it is said, that TERAH liued 70. yeeres, and begat ABRAHAM, NAHOR, and HARAN: For it was late ere Terah began to beget Sonnes, himselfe being begotten by his Father Nachor at 29. as other his Ancestors were at 30. The like also happened to Noah; for whereas Adam begat Seth at 130; Enosh 40 Kenan at 90; Kenan Mahalaleel at 70; Mahalaleel Jared at 60: Noah was yet 500. yeeres old when he began to beget the first of his three sonnes, as aforesaid. And S. Augustine in the place before cited, rather inclineth to the opinion that Abraham was the youngest of Terahs sonnes, then otherwise: though for his excellencie he was worthily named first. His own words are these: Eueri enim potius vis posterior sit generatus ABRAHAM: sed merito excellencie, quæ in Scripturis valde commendatur, prior iuris nominatus. It might be said he, that ABRAHAM was begotten later: but was first named in regard of his excellencie, for which in Scripture he is much commended. So as the naming first or last proueth nothing who was first or last borne: either in those issues of Noah, or in these of Terah: Neither hath God any respect of the eldest in nature, as touching his election or spirituall blessing, for Moses nameth first the children of the promise, and the eldest and first in Gods fauour. Pietas ergo vel ipsa potius electio diuina, quæ comitem secum trahit pietatem, & Dei timorem, primas partes dat SEMI in libertis NOA, & ABRAHAMO in libertis THAGE. Pietie, saith he, or rather diuine election election, which doth enermore draw with it or after it pietie and the feare of God, gave place and preedencie to SEM among the children of NOAH, and to ABRAHAM among those of THAGE.

For therest it is manifest, that Abraham entred Canaan in the 75. yeere of his age. And it was in Canaan that Hagar bare him Isaac, when Abraham had liued 86. yeeres. Gen. 12. 4. It was at Gerar (the South border of Canaan) that Sarah bare Isaac, when Abraham had consumed 100. yeeres. It was from the valley of Mamre in Canaan that Abraham stole out, when he rescued Lot and ouerthrew Amraphel: and he had then but the age of 83. yeeres: and it is as manifest that he parted from Haran after his Father Terah was dead. But if Terah begat Abraham at 70. yeere old, then must Abraham haue bene 135. yeeres when hee first set his foot in Canaan: seeing Terah must be dead ere he parted, and so 70. added to 135. made 205, the true age of Terah, which is contrary to all those places of Scripture before remembred. For hee entred at 75: hee rescued Lot at 83: hee had Isaac at 86: hee had Isaac at 100. proued by the former places.

Moreover, if Abraham were the eldest sonne of Terah, and borne in the 70. yeere of his age: then had Terah liued till Isaac had bene 35. yeeres old, and Isaac 49. both which must then haue been borne in Mesopotamia, and therein fostered to that age: vnlesse we should either denie credit to S. Stephen, who saith that Abraham departed from Mesopotamia after his Fathers death: or else giue credit to the interpretation of Daniel Angelocrator, who in his Chronologia antoptica, saith it was about his Fathers death: because the Greeke word, may be, transported by the Latine sub, as well as by post: which though elsewhere it may be, yet cannot it be so in this place. For it were most improperly spoken, to say that those things were done about Terahs death, which were 60. yeeres before. Wherefore supposing Abraham to haue bene borne in the 70. yeere of Terah, we must giue thoe times and places of birth to Abrahams children, which no authoritie will warrant; For Abraham had no children in Jr of Chaldeæ, nor in Haran: nor in 10. yeeres after his arrivall into Canaan. For the yeere of Terahs death, in which Abraham left Haran, was the yeere of the World 2083. and the yeere of Isaacs birth was the Worlds yeere 2094: which maketh 10. yeeres difference. And that Isaac was borne in Canaan, and was to be offered vpon the mountaine Moriab therein, 39. miles from Berabe, where Abraham then inhabited: and that three Angels first of all appeared to Abraham in the valley of Mamre, no man doubteth.

And therefore it cannot be that any of Abrahams sonnes were borne in Mesopotamia; nor while Terah liued; nor in lesse then 10. yeeres after Terahs death: and therfore consequently was not Abraham the eldest sonne of Terah, nor borne in the 70. yeere of Terahs age.

Thirdly, whereas Abraham came into Canaan at 75: if Terah had begotten him at 40 70, then had Terah liued but 145. for 70. and 75. make 145, which must haue bene the full age of Terah: but Terah liued 205. yeere: and therefore was not Abraham borne in the 70. yeere of Terah.

Fourthly, the ages of Lot and Sarah make it manifest, that Haran was the eldest, if not the eldest brother of Abraham; for Sarah or Isah wanted but 10. yeeres of Abrahams age: Isaac being borne when Abraham was 100. and Sarah 90. yeeres old.

It followeth then, that if Abraham had bene the elder brother of Haran, Haran must haue begotten Sarah at 9. yeeres old: for granting that Haran was borne but one yeere after Abraham, and Sarah within 10. yeeres as old as Abraham, then of 50 necessitie must Haran beget her, when hee had liued but 9. yeeres; which were too ridiculous to imagine.

And that Isah was Sarah, Rab. Solomon affirmeth; both names, saith he, beate the same signification; and names of principalitie. Again, to what end was the word Isah or Israhel inserted in this place, if Sarah were not meant thereby? for to speake speake of any thing superfluous it is not vsed in Gods Bookes: and if Israh had not belonged to the story, it had been but an idle name to no purpose remembered.

Now if it had been true (as those of the contrary opinion affirme) that Moses had no respect of Nachor and Haran, who were notwithstanding the parents of Bethuel and Rebecca, the mother of Israel, and of Christ: what regard then had Moses of Israh in this place, were he not Israh, but otherwise an idle name of whom there is nothing else first or last.

The age also of Lot disproueth the elderhip of Abraham: for Lot was called an old man when Abraham was but 83. yeeres: And if Lot were of a greater age than Abraham, and Haran were Father to Lot, Sarah, and Milchah, Abraham marrying one of Haran's daughters, and Nabor the other, Sarah also being within ten yeeres as old as Abraham: it may appeare to every reasonable man (not obdurate and preiudicate) that Haran was the eldest sonne of Terah, and not Abraham: who also died first and before his Father left Ur in Chaldea. Also Lyra reasoneth against the opinion of Abraham's elderhip, vpon the same place of Genesis: drawing argument from the age of Sarah, who was but 10. yeeres younger than Abraham himselfe. Lyra his wordes are these: Siguitur HARAN fuit iunior ipso ABRAHAM, sequitur quid non habebat decem annos quando genuit SARAH: imo nec octo, &c. and afterward, & idem melius videtur descendendum, quod ABRAHAM fuit ultimus natus de tribus filijs TERAH, tamen nominatur primus, propter eius dignitatem: & quia ponendus erat caput stirpis & generatio: nus sequentis: & quia primus factus est ei re promissa expressa de CHRISTO, sicut supra dictum est de SEM, &c. If therefore (saith Lyra) Haran was younger then Abraham himselfe, it followeth that he was not ten yeeres old when he begot SARAH: And therefore it seemeth better to be said, that Abraham was the last borne of the three sonnes of TERAH, neuertheless he is named first for his dignitie, both because he was to be ordained head of the stocke and generation following, and because the promise of CHRIST was first made unto him, as before it is said of SEM.

¶ VII.

A conclusion of this dispute moving the Authors on both sides: with an admonition that they which shorten the times, make all ancient stories the more improbable.

AR 3.4.

GM 13.4.

IT therefore agreeth with the Scriptures, with Nature, Time, and Reason, that Haran was the eldest sonne of Terah, and not Abraham: and that Abraham was borne in the 130. yeere of Terah's life, and not in the 70. yeere. For Abraham departing Charran after Terah died, according to S. Stephen, and that journey by Abraham performed when hee was 75. yeeres old, these two numbers added make 205. yeeres, the full age of Terah: seeing that when Terah died, then Abraham entred Canaan. For my selfe, I haue no other end herein then to manifest the truth of the Worlds Story: I reuerence the iudgements of the Fathers: but I know they were mistaken in particulars: Saint Augustine was doubtfull, and could not determine this: controuersie. For whatsoeuer is borrowed from him out of his 16. Booke de Ciuitate Dei §. 15. the same may be answered out of himselfe in his fine and twentieth question vpon Gen. But S. Augustine herein followed Iosephus; and Isidor: and Beda followed S. Augustine. And it was out of a foolish pride and vanitie, that the Hebrews and Iosephus sought to make Abraham the first borne: as if God had had respect to the eldest in nature. So did Iosephus together with Nicholas Damascenus (thinking thereby to glorifie the Jewish Nation) make Abraham a king, entitling Sarah by the name of Queene Sarah: and said that Abraham was followed with 318. Captaines of which euery one had an infinite multitude vnder him; trecentos & octodecem praefectos habuit.

habuit: quorum singulis infinita multitudo parebat. And that Pharao invading him with a great armie, tooke from him his wife Sarah: Such fables argue that Iosephus is not to be beleueed, but with discreet reuerations.

This account of times, allowing no more than 292. yeeres from the Flood to Abraham, is vpheld by many of the Hebrews. But how should wee value the opinion of such Chronologers, as take Amraphel for Nimrod? Surely, if their iudgement in such matters were worthy to be regarded, it would haue appeared in setting downe the succession of the Persian Kings, vnder whom they liued, whose Historie was not so farre remote in time, as these antiquities, nor wanting the light of many good writers. Yet grossly haue they erred therein, and so familiar are their mistakings in all things of like nature, that we feldome finde their opinion rehearsed without the confutation treading on the heeles of it. They of the Romane religion are also generally on the same side: it being a thing vsuall among them, to maintaine whatsoever they haue beene formerly knowne to hold, and beleeue. Contrariwise, of the more ancient, Theodoret, and some following him: of later times Berosus, Codoman, Pencer, Caluin, Insius, Beza, Broughton, Cost, Gibbens, and Moore, with diuers of the Protestants, hold Abraham to haue been borne in the 130. yeere of his Father Terah. From these, (as in a case not concerning any point in Religion) diuers of the same Religion, and those neuertheless good Authours, as Bucholcerus, Chiracius, Franciscus and others, are very averse herein, especially Iosephus Scalger with his Scithus Calistinus, proclaiming Berosus an Arch-heretike in Chronologie, and condemning this opinion of his as poysonous. Contrariwise, Augustinus Tornilius a Priest of the Congregation of S. Paul, a iudicious, diligent and free writer, whose Annales are newly set forth, very earnestly defends the opinion, which I haue already deliuered; not alledging Berosus, nor any Protestant writer, as being perhaps vnwilling to owe thanks to heretikes. For my selfe I doe neither millike the contrary opinion, because commonly those of the Romish Religion labour to vphold it; Nor fauour this larger account of times, because many notable men of the Protestant writers haue approved it; but for the truth it selfe. To strengthen which, after all these former reasons, and testimonies of Scripture, I will adde thus much more to the rest. First, it is apparant to all men of iudgement, that the best approved Historians; Diuine and prophane, labour to inuelligate the truth of times, thereby to approve the stories, and forepast actions of the world: and not the truth of histories to approve the times by. Let vs then make iudgement to our selues, which of these two accounts giue the best reputation to the storie of the Scriptures; teaching the Worlds plantation, and the continuance of Gods Church: either that of Iosephus, and those which follow him; who makes but 292. yeeres, or thereabouts, betweene the flood and birth of Abraham: or this other account, which makes 352. yeeres betweene the one and the other: the one taking Abraham to be the first borne of Thare, in the 70. yeere of his life: the other a younger sonne of Thare, and borne when hee had liued 130. yeeres. And if we looke ouer all, and doe not hastily satisfie our vnderstanding with the first things offered, and thereby being fatiated doe thoughtfully and drowsily sit downe; wee shall finde it more agreeable rather to allow the reckoning of the Septuagint, who, according to some editions make it about 1092. yeeres betweene the Flood and Abraham's birth: then to take away any part of those 352. yeeres giuen. For if we aduisedly consider the state and countenance of the world, such as it was in Abraham's time, yea, before Abraham was borne, wee shall finde that it were very ill done of vs by following opinion without the guide of reason, to pare the times ouer-deeply betweene Abraham and the Flood: because in cutting them 100. neere the quicke, the reputation of the whole storie might perhaps bleed thereby, were not the testimonie of the Scriptures supreme, so as no obiection can approach it: and that wee did not follow withall this precept of S. Augustine, That where soeuer any one place in the Scriptures may be conceived disagreeing to the whole, the same is by ignorance of interpretation misundersstood.

For

For in Abrahams time all the then knowne parts of the World were peopled: all Regions and Countries had their Kings. Egypt had many magnificent Cities: and so had Palestina, and all the bordering Countries: yea, all that part of the World besides, as far as India: and those not built with stickes, but of hewne stones, and defended with walles and rampiers: which magnificence needed a parent of more antiquitie, then those other men haue supposed. And therefore, where the Scriptures are plainest, and best agreeing with reason and nature, to what end should we labour to beget doubts and scruples, or drawe all things into wonders and maruailes? giuing also strength thereby to common cauellers, and to those mens apish braines, who onely bend their wits to finde impossibilities, and monsters in the storie of the World and Mankinde.

A computation of the times of the Affryans and others, grounded upon the times noted in the storie of ABRAHAM.

IN this fort therefore for the reasons before alleaged, I conclude, that from the generall Flood, to the birth of Abraham, 352. yeeres were consumed: and taking the Affryan History with vs, the same number 10 of yeeres were spent from the Flood to the 43. yeere of Ninus: in which 43. yeere of Ninus Abraham was borne: which happened in the yeere of the World, 2009.

Aug. diu. Cui.
Dei,

Gen. 11. 18.

Now of this time of 352. yeeres, we must giue one part as well to the increase of those people which came into Shinar, as to those that layed in the East, to wit, 30. yeere to Chus, ere he begat Seba: of which, though the Scriptures are silent, yet because those of the same time had that age when they begat their first sonnes, we may the more safely giue the like allowance to these. For Eber begat Peleg at 34. Peleg Regu at 30. Regu Seraug at 32. Now after Seba, Chus begat Hauila, Saba, Raama and Sabtecha: and Raama begat Sheba and Dedan, before Nimrod was borne, as it appeareth Gen. 10. which S. Augustine approueth. Giuing then 30. yeeres more to Raama ere hee begat Sheba, and fiue yeeres to the fiue elder brothers of Nimrod, it may be gathered that 65. yeeres were consumed ere Nimrod himselfe was borne: and that Raamah had that age ere any of his sonnes were begotten, it may be gathered, by example and comparision: for Peleg the fourth from Noah, as Raamah was, begat Regu in the same yeere of his life.

Let vs then allow 60. yeeres more after the birth of Nimrod, for two other generations to be brought forth, or else we shal hardly find people to build Babel: for fiue wee are that it was done by hands, and not by miracle: because it displeased God. These two numbers of 65. and 60. make 125. The rest of the time of 131. (in which yeere they arriued in Shinar, whereof there are 6. yeeres remaining) wee may giue them for their travels from the East: because they were pelted with women, children and Cattell: and as some ancient writers haue conceived, and Bezanus of later times, they kept alwaies the mountaines sides, for feare of a second Flood. Now, if we take this number of 131. out of 352. there remains 221. of which number Berofus bewteth 65. on Belus, and 42. on Ninus, before Abraham borne: both which S. Augustine approueth: which two numbers taken againe out of 221. there remaineth 114. yeeres of the 352. from the Flood to Abrahams birth: which number of 114. needeth bewteth on Nimrod.

And if it be objected that this time giuen to Nimrod, is ouer-long: sure if we compare the age of Nimrod with the rest of the same descent from Noah, it will rather appeare ouer-short. For Nimrod, by this account, liued in all but one hundred seuentie nine yeeres: whereof hee reigned one hundred and twelue: whereas Sale who was the sonne of Arphaxad the sonne of Sem, liued foure hundred thirty three yeeres:

yeeres: and of the same age of the World was Nimrod, the sonne of Chus, the sonne of Cham.

Now after Abraham was borne, Ninus reigned 9. yeeres: which added to 43. make 52. Ninus dieth and leaueth Semiramis his succellor.

Semiramis gouerned the Empire of Babylonia and Affrya 42. yeeres, and died in the 52. yeere compleat of Abrahams life. Ninus or Zameus succceeded Semiramis, and ruled 38. yeeres, in the second yeere of whose reigne Abraham left Mesopotamia.

When Abraham was 85. yeeres old, he rescued his nephew Lot, and ouerthrew by surpris Amraphel king of Shinar, or Babylonia. Ninias reigned 38. yeeres, and Abraham came into Canaan but 23. yeeres after Semiramis died: which was the 75. yeere of his age: so that Amraphel may seeme to haue bene this Ninias the sonne of Ninus, and Semiramis, whose 23. yeere, as aforesaid, being the 75. yeere of Abraham, he and his fellow-kings might haue recieued this ouerthrow in the 85. yeere of Abraham, and the 33. yeere of his own reigne: after which he reigned fiue yeeres: which make in all 38. But the trueth is, that the reasons to the contrary, vrging that this Amraphel could not be Ninias, are not easily answered. Howbeit for the times of the Affryan kings, that they are to be ordered as wee haue set them downe, according to the times noted by Moses, in the storie of Abraham, it is most certaine: vniuerselle we will either derogate from the trueth of Moses his computation, which were impietie: or account the whole Historie of Ninus and Semiramis to bee a fiction; which were to condemne all ancient Historians for fablers.

That AMRAPHEL, one of the foure Kings whom ABRAHAM ouerthrew, Gen. 14. may probably be thought to haue bene NINIAS the sonne of NINUS.

AND now touching this Amraphel, whom Moses makes king of Shinar or Babylonia, in the 85. yeere of Abrahams life, that is, in the 33. yeere of the reigne of Ninias Zameus the king of the Affryans, the sonne of Ninus and Semiramis, it is hard to affirme what he was, and how hee could bee at this time king of Babylonia: Ninias Zameus then reigning there. To this doubt the answere which first offereth it selfe as most probable, is that which hath bene already noted, that this Ninias or Zameus, was no other then our Amraphel: who inuaded Traconitis or Bajan, and ouerthrew those fiue kings of Pentapolis, or the valley of Siddim. For the Scriptures tell vs, that Amraphel was king of Shinar, which is Babylonia: and the times before accounted make him to be the succellor of Ninus and Semiramis: and it falleth out with the 85. yeere of Abrahams life: wherein he rescued Lot, slew Chedorlaomer, and ouerthrew the rest. True it is, that this Amraphel was not at this time the greatest Monarke: for Chedorlaomer commanded in chiefe, though Amraphel bee first named in the first verse of the 14. Chapter of Genesis. For the Kings of the valley of Siddim, or of Pentapolis, or of the fiue Cities, were the vassals of Chedor, and not of Amraphel: as it is written. Twelue yeeres were they subiect to Chedorlaomer, but in the 13. yeere they rebelled, and in the 14. yeere came Chedorlaomer and the kings that were with him: and therefore was Chedor, the principall in this enterprise, who was then king of Elam, which is Perfa: Now Perfa being scared ouer Tigris, and to the East of Amraphels Countrey; and the other two kings, which were companions with Amraphel, being scared to the West of Shinar or Babylonia: Amraphel, who held Babylonia it selfe, seemeth at this time to haue had no great scope or large dominion. For had Amraphel bene so great a Prince as prophane Historians make Ninus or Semiramis whom whom hee succeeded, he should not have needed the assistance of three other kings for this expedition. But though Chedorlaomer were the first and greatest of those four Kings, (as it is manifest that hee was: For these little kings of Sodome, Gomora, &c. were his vassals, and not Amraphel) yet this makes not the coniecture lesse probable, but that this Amraphel might be Nimias. For it may be, that the great and potent Empire of Assyria, had now (as we shall see more plainly in that which followeth) received a downe-right fall, at the time of this warre: though not long before it commanded all the kingdomes betwene India and the Phenician Sea: to wit, in the times of Ninus and Semamitis.

Of ARIOCH another of the four Kings, and that ELLAS, whereof he is said to have bene King, lies betwene Coele Syria and Arabia Petrea.

NOW the two other kings ioynd with Amraphel, and Chedorlaomer were Arioch and Tidal; the one King of Ellasar, the other of the Nations. For Ellasar, Aquila and Therome write Pontus: so Tostatus thinketh that it should be Hellepont: which opinion Pererius fauoureth. But this is only to deny the Latine translation. For as Pontus, so is Hellepont farre distant, and out of the way to send any armies into Arabia Petrea, or into Idumea: which Countries these four Kings chiefly invaded: Besides that, it is certain, that the Assyrians (when they were greatest) had neuer any dominion in Asia the lesse. For at such time as the Assyrians feared the invasion of the Medes and Persians, they sent not into Asia the lesse as commanders: but vied all the Arte they had to dwinie Cresus to their assistance: perswading him that nothing could bee more dangerous for himselfe, and the other Kings of those parts, than the successe of the Achæans against the Assyrians. But examine the enterprise what it was. These Kings (saith the Text) made warre with Bera, King of Sodome, Birsah King of Gomora, Shinab King of Admath, and Shemeb King of Zebon, and the King of Bela which is Zoar. All which five Kings had not so much ground as Middlesex: being such a kind of Reguli, as Iosua found in the land long after: namely, Lords of Cities and small territories adioyning; of which Canaan had 33. all slaine or hanged by Iosua. Neither can the other Countries, which in the Text they are said also to have invaded, be imagined to have bene at that time of any great power: and therefore to call in Kings from Pontus or Hellepont, had manifested a great impotencie and weaknesse in the Kings of Babylon and Persia.

And though it be alledged for an example, that diuers kings farre off, came to assist Pempey against Cæsar: yet these same examples without like occasions and circumstances, doe neither lead nor reach. For there was no cause to feare the greatnesse of these pettie kings, or of the other Countries: But the eyes of the world were fixed on Cæsar; and his undertakings and intents were to all other Princes, no lesse doubtfull then fearfull: But the whole Countrey by these four Kings maltreated by the passage, was afterward giuen to the halfe tribe of Manasse, Gad, and Reuben: a narrow valley of ground lying betwene Jordan and the mountaines of Seir: indolled by the riuer of Arnon on the South side, and by Lybanus on the North, consisting of the two small Prouinces of Tracontia or Basra, and the Region of the Mosabites: a conquest farre vnuaileable, and little answering the power of the Assyrian Empire, if the same had remained in any comparable estate with the times of Ninus and Semamitis, who subiected all the great kings of that part of the World, without the assistance of any of the Kings of Hellepont, or any other part of Asia the lesse. But as the Vulgar and Aquila conuert Ellasar by Pontus: so Symmachus makes Arioch a King of the Syrians, a King indeed, as farre fetched to ioyne with the Assyrians in Xenophon.

Gen. 14.

in this warre, as the World had any at that time. The Septuagint doe not change the word of Ellasar at all, but as they keep the word drarat, on the mountaines whereof the Arke did rest, so doe they in this place retain the Hebrew word Ellasar; being doubtfull to giue it a wrong interpretation. And Pererius himselfe remembereth other opinions farre more probable then this of Pontus or Hellepont: yet he dares not auow his liking of them, because the Latine Translation hath it otherwise. For Stephanus de Vrbibus a Graecis Cosmographis findeth the Citie of Ellas in the border of Celestria; and S. Hierome calleth Ellas the Citie of Arioch, as in truth it was. Now although the same be feared by Stephanus in Celestria, yet it standeth on the border of Arabia, of which Arioch was King: who formerly ioynd with Ninus in all his conquests, being of the same familie, and descended from Cham and Chus: after whom the name of Ariu was by the Hebrews written Arioch: and afterward againe Aretas: as in the Machabees: the Kings of Arabia holding that name euen to the time of S. Paul, who was fought to be betrayed by the Lieutenant of Aretas commanding in Damascus. They were Princes for the most part confederate and depending vpon the Assyrian Empire. It is true that wee finde in Daniel, that in the time of Nabuchodonosor, one Arioch was General of his armie, and the principall Commander vnder him, who was a King of Kings: which makes it plaine, that Arioch here spoken of, the sonne of that Arioch confederate of Ninus, was no King of Pontus, nor of Syria: regions farre remooued from the Assyrians and Babylonians. The name also of Arioch who commanded vnder Nabuchodonosor is mentioned in Isaiah, by the name of King of the Elymeans: who are a Nation of Persians bordering India, by the name of King of Arabia, though Plinie sets it betwene the Sea-coast, and Media: and if any brother of the Arabian Kings, or other of that house (knowne by the name of Arius, Arioch, Aretas or Aretas) had the government of that Persian Prouince called Elymais (as it seemeth they had by the places of Daniel and Isaiah) yet the same was in Nabuchodonosor's time. But this Arioch here spoken of may with more reason be taken for the King of Arabia, the sonne of Arius, the confederate of Ninus: whose sonnes held league, as their Fathers did, being the next bordering Prince of all on that side towards the West to Babylonia, and Chaldea: and in amitie with them from the beginning, and of their owne house, and blood: which D. Scaudus also confirmeth.

§. XI.

Of TIDAL another of the four Kings.

THE fourth King by Abraham ouerthrowne was Tidal, King of the Nations. The Hebrew writes it Gogim, which Vatablus takes to be a proper name: Lyra of mixt people: Caluim of runnagates without habitation: Pererius out of Sirabo, findes that Galilee was inhabited by diuers Nations, which were a mixt people: namely of Aegyptians, Arabians, and Phenicians. Nam tales sunt qui Galileam habitant; Such are the inhabitants of Galilee, saith Strabo: and therefore was Tidal called King of these Nations, as they suppose. And it may be so: but the authoritie of Strabo is nothing in this question. For Galilee was not peopled at this time, as it was in the time of Strabo. For when Abraham came into Canaan, the Cananite was then in the Land, howe soeuer they might be afterwards mixt; which I know not. But there are many pettie kingdomes adioyning to Phoenicia, and Palastina; as Palmyrena, Batanea, Leadeene, Apamena, Chalcedice, Cassiotis, Chalibonitis, and all these doe also ioyne themselves to Mesopotamia, on the North, and to Arabia on the East. And that these Nations gathered themselves together vnder Tidal, I take to be the probablest coniecture.

§. XII.

§. XII.

That CHEDORLAOMER the chiefe of the 4. Kings was not of Assyria, but of Persia: and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impaired.

LASTLY, whereas it is conceived that Chedorlaomer was the Assyrian Emperor, and that Amraphel was but a Satrape, Viceroy, or Provinciall governour of Babylon, and that the other kings named were such also, I cannot agree with Perrinus in this. For Moses too well acquainted with the names of Assur, and Shinar, to call the Assyrian a king of Elam: those kings being in the Scriptures evermore called by the name of Chaldeas, Shinar, Babylonia, or Assyria: but never by Elam; and Chedorlaomer or Kedarlaomer was so called of Kidar, from Cidarim which in the Hebrew signifieth Regale: for so Q. Curtius calleth the garment which the Persian kings wore on their heads.

Neither doe I beleue that the Assyrian or Babylonian Empire stood in any greatness at the time of this invasion, and my reasons are these: First, example and experience teach vs, that those things which are set vp hastily, or forced violently, doe not long last: Alexander became Lord of all Asia, on this side of Indus, in a time of so short a life, as it lasted not to ouer-look what it selfe had brought forth. His fortunes were violent, but not perpetual. For his Empire died at once with himselfe: all whose chiefe Commanders became kings after him. Tambrlain conquered Asia and India with a storme-like and terrible successe: but to preualent furie God hath adioined a short life: and whatsoever things Nature herselfe worketh in haste, the rasketh the least care of their continuance. The fruit of his victories perished with him, if not before him.

Ninus being the first whom the madness of boundlesse dominion transported, invaded his neighbour Princes, and became victorious ouer them: a man violent, insolent, and cruell. Semiramis taking the opportunitie, and being more proud, adventurous, and ambitious, then her Paramor: enlarged the Babylonian Empire, and beautified many places therein with buildings vnexampled. But her sonne hauing changed Nature and condition with his Mother, proued no lesse feminine then shee was masculine. And as wounds and wrongs, by their continuall smart, put the Patient in minde how to cure the one, and reuenge the other: so those kings adioyning (whose subiection, and calamities incident were but new, and therefore the more grievous) could not sleepe, when the aduantage was offered by such a successe. For in regno Babylonica hic parum resplenduit, this King shined little (saith Nauclerus of Ninias) in the Babylonian kingdom. And likely it is that the neckes of mortall men hauing bene neuer before galled with the yoke of forraine dominion, Nor hauing euer had experience of that most miserable and detested condition of liuing in slavery: no long descent hauing as yet inuested the Assyrian with a right: nor any other title being for him to be pretended than a strong hand; the foolish and effeminate sonne of a tyrannous and bare Father, could very ill hold so many great Princes and Nations his vassals, with a powerlesse mastering, and a mind lesse industrious than his Father and Mother had viued before him. And hee that was so much giuen ouer to licentious idleness, as to suffer his Mother to raigne 42. yeeres, and thereof the greatest part after he came to mans estate: witnessed thereby to the World, that he so much preferred ease before honour, and bodily pleasures before greatness, as he neither indeoured to gaine what he could not gouerne, nor to keepe what he could not without contentious perill enjoy.

These Considerations being ioyned to the storie of Amraphel, deliuered by Moses, by which we find that Amraphel king of Shinar was rather an inferiour to the king of Persia, than either his superiour, or equall, make it seeme probable, that the Empire of Ninus and Semiramis was at that time broken asunder, and restrained againt to Babylonia.

For

For conclusion I will adde these two arguments confirming the former: First, that at such time as it pleased God to impose that great trouble vpon Abraham, from yr in Chaldea to Charan, and then to Canaan, a passage of 700. miles, or little lesse, with women, children, and carriages: the Countries through which hee wandred were then settled, and in peace. For it was in the 22. yeere of Ninias, when Abraham obeying the voice of God, tooke this great iourney in hand: in which time of 23. yeeres after the death of Semiramis, the neighbour Princes had recovered their libertie and former estates. For Semiramis armie of foure millions, with herselfe vtterly consumed in Indis, and all her armes and engins of war, at the same time lost, gaue an occasion and opportunitie euen to the poorest foules and weakest hearted creatures of the World, to repurchase their former libertie.

Strab. l. 15.

Secondly, it is affirmed by the best and ancientest Historians, that Arius the sonne of Ninias, or Amraphel, invaded the Bactrian and Caspian, and againe subiected them: which needed not if they had not bene reuolted from Ninias, after Ninus death: And as Arioch recovered one part, so did Baleus or Balanus, otherwise Xerxes, reduce the rest reuolted to their former obedience. Of whom it is said that hee conquered from Aegypt to India: and therefore was called Xerxes, id est, Victor & Triumphator, a conquerour and triumpher, which vnder takings had bene no other then the effects of madnesse, had not those Countries freed themselves, from the Babylonian subiection. Now if we shall make any doubt hereof, that is, of the reconquest of Arius and Xerxes, both which liued after Ninus and Ninias, wee may as well thinke the rest of Ninias and Semiramis to be but fained: but if wee graunt this reconquest, then it is true that while Ninus or Amraphel ruled, the Assyrian Empire was torne asunder, according to that which hath bene gathered out of Moses as before remembered.

§. XIII.

That it is not vnprobable that the foure Kings had no dominion in the Countries named, but that they had else-where with their colonies planted themselves: and so retained the names of the Countries whence they came: which if it be so, we neede not say that AMRAPHEL was NINIAS, nor trouble our selues with many other difficulties.

He consent of all writers, whose workes haue come to my perusall, agreeing as they doe, that these 4. kings, Amraphel of Shinar, Chedorlaomer of Elam, and their fellowes were Lords of those Regions, whereunto they are or seeme intituled: doth almost inforce vs to thinke that the Historie must so be vnderstood, as I haue deliuered. But if in this place, as often elsewhere in the Scriptures the names of Countries may be set for people of those lands, or if (as Hierome hath it) Chedorlaomer was king of the Elamites, as Tidal was said to be of the Nations, that is, of people either wanting a fixed habitation, or gathered out of sundrie regions: then may we otherwise conceiue of this Historie: remouing thereby some difficulties which men perhaps haue bene vnwilling to find, because they could not find how to resolve them. For as it had bene a strange coniecture to thinke that Arioch was drawn to assist the Persian, against the Sedomite; as far as from Pontus, where it is very vnlikely that Chedorlaomer was knowne, and almost impossible that the vale of Siddim should haue bene once named: so in true imitation it is a thing of great improbabilitie, that Chedorlaomer, if he were king of Persia alone, should passe through so great a part of the World, as the Countries of Assyria, Chaldea, Mesopotamia, Syria, and part of Arabia, and Canaan, to subdne those five Townes, whose very names how they should come to his care, being distioined by so many great Nations of different languages, a wise man could hardly coniecture. And if all the Countries bordering Persia together with the Babylonian himselfe, yea the kingdom of Elasar, & that of Tidal, so far off removed, were become his dependants, what reason can we finde that might haue induced him to hearken after Sodome and Gomorah: & when he should haue fought the establishment of his new-gotten Empire,

CHAP. II.

Of the Kings of Egypt from the first peopling of it after the Floud, to the time of the deliuerie of the Israelites from thence.

§. I.

A briefe of the names and times of the first Kings of Egypt: with a note of the causes of difficulty in resolving of the truth in these points.

Some after the confusion at Babel (as it seemes) Cham with many of his issue and followers (hauing doubtlesse knowen the fertilitie of Egypt before the Floud) came thither and tooke possession of the Countie:
in which they built many Cities: and beganne the kingdome one hundred ninetie one yeeres after the deluge. The ancient Gouvernours of this Kingdome till such time as Israel departed Egypt are shewen in the Table following.

An. Mundi.	An. dil.
1847.	191.	Cham.
2008.	352.	Osiris.
		Typhon }
2269.	613.	Hercules. }
2276.	620.	Orus.
2391.	735.	Sesoftris the great.
2424.	768.	Sesoftris the blinde.
2438.	782.	Bufris or Orus the second.
2476.	820.	Ascencher or Thermutis or Meris.
2488.	832.	Rathoris or Athoris.
2497.	841.	Chenues drowned in the red Sea.

The Table and especially the Chronologie, is to be confirmed by probabilities and coniectures, because in such obscurity manifest and relesse truth cannot be found.
For S. Augustine, a man of exceeding great iudgement, and incomparable diligence, who had sought into all antiquities, and had read the bookes of Varro, which now are lost, yet omitted the succession of the Egyptian Kings: which he would not have done, if they had not been more vncertaine then the Sicyonians, whom he remem-breth, then whom doubtlesse they were more glorious. One great occasion of this obscurity in the Egyptian Storie, was the ambition of the Priests: who to magnifie their Antiquities, filled the Records (which were in their hands) with many lea-sings, and recounted vnto strangers, the names of many Kings that neuer reigned.
What ground they had for these reports of supposed Kings, it shall appeare anon.
Sure it is that the magnificent workes and royall buildings in Egypt, such as are neuer found but in States that have greatly flourished, witnesseth that their Princes were of marvellous greatnesse: and that the reports of the Priests were not altogether ther false. A second cause of our ignorance in the Egyptian History, was the too much credit of some good Authors, who beleeuing the manifold and contrary reports of sundry Egyptians, & publishing in their own name, such as pleased them best; haue confirmed them, and as it were enforced them vpon vs, by their authori-tie. A third and generall cause of more than Egyptian darknesse in all ancient Histories, is the edition of many Authors by Iohn Anniius, of whom (if to the censures of sundry very learned I may adde mine) I thinke thus; That Anniius hauing scene some fragments of those writers, and added vnto them what he would, may be credited, as an auoucher of true Histories, where approved writers confirme him: but otherwise is to be deemed fabulous. Hereupon it commeth to passe that the account of Authors, either in the Chronologie or Genealogie of the Egyptian Kings, runs three altogether different wayes. The Christian writers, such as are ancient, for the most part follow Eusebius: Many late writers follow the edition of Anniius his Authors:

The prophane Histories follow Herodotus, Diodorus, and such others.

§. II.

That by the account of the Egyptian Dynasties, and otherwise, it appeares that Chams reigne in Egypt began in the yeeres after the Floud, 191.

To reconcile these, or gather out of them the times of the ancient Kings, about whom is most controuersie, the best meane is by helpe of the Dynasties: of whose continuance there is little or no disagreement. The account of the Dynasties (besides the authoritie of approved Authors) hath this good ground, that it agreeth for the most part, if not altogether with the Histories of the Assyrians, Troians, Italians, and others, &c. The beginning of the 16. Dyn. is ioyned by generall consent, with the 43. yeere of 30 Nimus: in which Abraham was borne. The twelue first Dynasties lasted each of them seuen yeeres, vnder the twelue, which were called the greater Gods: so that all the yeeres of their continuance were 84. The thirteenth Dynastie indured fourteene yeeres: the fourteenth 26: the fifteenth 37. These three last, are sayd to haue beene vnder the three younger Gods. So the fifteene first Dynasties lasted one hundred sixty one yeeres. As I doe not therefore beleue that the continuance of these Dyn. was such as hath been mentioned, because Anniius in such-wise limits out their time: so I cannot rectifie the account vpon this onely reason, that Anniius hath it so: considering that both hitherto it hath passed as current, and is greatly strengthened by many good reasons. For, whereas Eusebius placeth the beginning of the sixteenth 40 Dynastie, in the yeere of Abrahams birth, as aforesayd: the reckoning is easily call; by which the summe of 161. yeeres, which according to our account were spent in the fifteene former, being subducted out of the summe of 352. yeeres, which were betweene the Floud and Abrahams birth, sheweth that the beginning of the first Dy-nastie, which was the beginning of Chams reigne in Egypt, was in the yeere 191.
As also by other probabilities the same may appeare. For it is generally agreed, that the multitude of mankind which came into Shinar, arrived at Babel, Anno à diluuiio 131. In building the Tower were consumed fourtie yeeres, as Genesis recordeth:
whose report I haue elsewhere confirmed with diuers probabilities. That Cham was long in passing with his company, their Wiues Children, Cattel, and substance, 50 through all Syria then desolate, and full of Bogges, Forrests, and Bryers (which the Deluge and want of culture in one hundred seuentie one yeeres had brought vpon it) no reasonable man will doubt. To this his passage therefore, and the seating of himselfe in Egypt, wee allow twenty yeere: and these summes being added together, to wit, one hundred thirtie one yeeres after the Floud, before they arrived at Babel,

Babel, 40. yeeres for their stay there; and 20. for Cham's passage into Egypt, and settling there, make vp the summe of 191. yeeres: at which time we said that Cham began his reigne in Egypt, in the beginning of the first Dynastie. And to this summe of 191. yeeres if we adde the 161. yeeres of the 15. first Dynasties, as they are numbered in common account, we shall fall right with the yeere of Abrahams birth, which was Ann. Dil. 354. And hereto omitting many other reasons; which might be brought to proue that these first Dynasties must needs haue bene very short, and not containing in the whole summe of their seuerall times about 161. yeeres: Let it suffice that had they lasted longer, then either must Egypt haue been peopled as soone as Babel after the Flood: or the Dynasties (as Mercator thinks) must haue bene before the Flood. That the arrivall at Babel was many yeeres before the plantation of Egypt, after the Flood, enough hath been said to proue: and that the Dynasties were not before the Flood, the number of the long-lived generations betweene Adam and the Flood, which was lesse than the number of the Dynasties, may sufficiently witness. Or if we will thinke, that one life might (perhaps) bee diuided into many Dynasties, then may this haue bene as well after the Flood, as before: considering that the finnes of Noe. did not in euery Countrey erect such forme of Policie, as had bene vsed in the same ere the Deluge: but such, as the disposition of the people, the authority and power of the Conduiter, together with many other circumstances, did induce or inforce them to.

§. III.

That these Dynasties were not diuers families of Kings, but rather successions of Regents, oft times many under one King.

He shew continuance of the Dynasties, doth shew that they were not seuerall races of Kings, as the vaunting Egyptians were wont to stile them. What they were it cannot certainly bee warranted. For in restitutions of decayed antiquities, it is more easie to denie than to affirm. But this may be said partly vpon good circumstance, partly vpon the surest proofs, That it was the manner of the Egyptian Kings, to put the gouernment of the Countrey into the hands of some trustie Counsellor, onely reseruing the Souerainty to themselves, as the old Kings of France were wont to the Masters of the Palace, and as the Turke doth to the chiefe Vezier. This is confirmed, first, by the number of the Dynasties, whereof many are vnder Cham, and more then one vnder Osiris or Mizraim; and must therefore haue bene successions, not of Kings, but rather of Counsellors and Regents. Secondly, by custome of such Princes borderers to Egypt, as are mentioned in the Scriptures: of whom Abimelech the Philistim in his dealing with Abraham and Isaac about confederation, did nothing without Philistim Captaine of his Hoste; though in taking Abrahams wife, and in his priuate carriage, hee followed his owne pleasure. Likewise of Abimelech the sonne of Gideon it was said: Is not hee the sonne of IERUBBAAL? and ZEBUL his officer? Also Ishobabeb the sonne of Saul, feared Abner the Captaine of the Hoste. Yea, Daud himselfe hating Iab for his crueltye did not punish him, in regard of his greatnesse, which was such, as was feared euen of Hadad the Edomite liuing then in Egypt. Thirdly, this is confirmed by the temper and disposition of Cham, who was lewd, as appears by the Scriptures: therefore likely both for his owne idlenesse and pleasure, to haue layd the burden of gouernement vpon others; and vpon ielousie, the companion of vnworthinesse, to haue changed his Lieutenants often. About all other proofes is the aduancement of Ioseph by Pharaoh. For Pharaoh said to Ioseph; Only in the Kings throne will I be about thee: behold, I haue set thee ouer all the Land of Egypt. William, Archbishop of Tyre, who flourished about the yeere of our Lord, one thousand one hundred eightie, affirmes that like like or very same forme of gouernement by Viceroys, was in his time practised in Egypt, hauing there bene in vse (as he beleued) euer since the time of Ioseph. He plainly shewes, that the Soldans of Egypt were not Lords of the Countrey, how euer they haue bene so deemed; but that they acknowledged and humbly performed the dutie of subjects vnto the Caliphe: who residing in a most magnificent Palace in Cairo, did commit the charge, not onely of ciuill gouernement, but the power of making warre and peace, with the whole office and authority royally into the Soldans hands. He that shall reade in William of Tyre, the state of the Caliphe, or Mulene El-hakim, with the forme of his Court, shall plainly behold the image of the ancient Pharaoh, ruling by a Lieutenant, as great in authoritie as Ioseph was, though firre inferior in wisdome.

To thinke that many names of such Regents or Lieutenants as Ioseph was, haue crept into the List of the Egyptian Kings, were no strange imagination. For Iosephs brethren called him, The man that is Lord of the Land, and the Lord of the Countrey: Besides, it is not vnlike that the vaneglorious Egyptian Priests would as easily report him a King to posterity, as ignorant men and strangers deeme him such, vnder whose hand all dispatches of importance, and royall managing of the State had passed, whilst that the King himselfe intending his quiet, had giuen his office to another. How strangers haue mistaken in this kinde, the example already cited of Iosephs brethren, doth sufficiently witness. The reports of Priests doe appeare in Diodorus, and Herodotus: each of whom, citing their relations, as good authoritie, say; Diodorus, that Sesostris was the nineteenth King after Menes; Herodotus, that hee was the 332. after Menes: which could not haue been, if Menes had been Adam. Therefore we may well conclude, That the Dynasties were not so many races of Kings, but successions of Regents, appointed by the kings of so many sundry lineages or sorts of men. Now by whatsoever meane a Dynastie or Regencie continued: whether in one familie, as being made an hereditary office: or in one order of men, as held by faction: sure it is that it was the Kings gift and free choyce, that gaue the office. But the Crowne royal alwaies passed by descent, & not by election: which (beside consent of Authors) the Scriptures also proue. For whereas Ioseph bought all the land of Egypt for Pharaoh, if the Crowne had passed by election, then should Pharaohs children hereby either haue bene intrahled amongst the rest of the people, to the next successeur: or inioying their Fathers land, though not his estate, haue been more mighty then the King: as Land-lords of all Egypt, and the King himselfe their Tenant. Likewise we find in Exod. 12. that God smote the first borne of PHARAOH, that was to set on his Throne. And in Esay it is said of PHARAOH: I am the sonne of the ancient King.

§. IIII.

Of CHAM, and his sonne MIZRAIM, or OSIRIS.

That the succession of Kings began, and continued in such wise as the Table hath shewed from Cham to Chencres, now it followeth to shew. Egypt is called in the Scripture, the land of Ham. That this name is not giuen to it, because the posterity of Cham did reigne there, but for that himselfe did first plant it; we may gather by many circumstances. For I thinke it is no where found, that the Countries of Cush, Put, or Canaan, as well as Egypt, were called the Land of Ham. Further it is found in Diodorus Siculus, that Osiris calleth himselfe the eldest sonne of Cham, saying, Mhi pater Saturnus decorem omnium minor: alio, Sum Saturni filius antiquior, german ex pulchro & generoso ortum: which must needs be vnderstood of Cham: for this Saturnus Egyptianus was Cham: as it is said, that on the monument of Nimus was an inscription, wherein Cham was called Saturnus Egyptianus. Likewise the Temple of Hammon, not farre from Egypt, doth testifie, that Ham resided in those parts: And S. Hierome in questionibus Hebraicis, his faith, that the Egyptians themselves did in his dayes call their Countrey Ham: as in foure severall places in the Psalmes this Countrey is called the land of Cham. And Ortelius, noting out of Plutarch in Osiride, that in the sacrifices of the Egyptians this Countrey of Egypt was called Chemia, expounds it for Chamis: ut puto (saith he) Chamo NOES filio, to which also he addeth out of Isidore, Egyptum usq; hodie Egyptiarum lingua KAM vocari: that Egypt unto this day in the tongue of the Egyptians is called KAM. For the beginning and continuance of Cham's reigne, the same reasons may suffice to be alleaged, which I have already given in proofe of the time spent in the 15. first Dynasties: Neither is it strange that the reigne of Cham should last so long as 161. yeeres: considering that Sem lived 600. Arpachshad and Sheld 19 each about 400. But strange it had bene, if one Sillis created by Manetho, had in those long-lived generations reigned there 19. yeeres, and with Beon, Apadma, Apochis, and others of the same brood, obscured the fame and glory of Osiris, Orus, and Sesostrius. Reimccius in his Isis placeth Mizraim next, otherwise called Osiris according to Diodorus: who saith hee was the sonne of Hammon: Krentzheimius saith that Mizraim and Osiris are words of neere affinitye and found in the Hebrew tongue. Howsoever it bee, we know that Mizraim the sonne of Cham, was Lord of Egypt, and Reimccius citing good authoritie in this case, affirmeth that Egypt is now called by the naturalls in their owne language, Mizre. Neither doe I see cause of doubt whether Osiris were the same with Mizraim. It is more necessarie, and hard to shew manifestly, how long Mizraim or Osiris reigned. For whereas the yeere of his death is no where precisely set downe, we must be faine to follow probabilities. That he is not vainly saide by Annius his Berosus, to have begun his reigne at the birth of Abraham, when the Dynastie of the Thebes began, it appeareth, first, by the authoritie of Eusebius: who auoucheth as much; next by Diodorus, who saith that he inhabited Thebes: which habitation of Osiris there, that it might be cause of that Dynastie. I can well beleue: assenting so farre to Reimccius, who thinkes the Dynasties were named only, according to the severall seates of the kings.

§. V.

Of the time when OSIRIS reigne ended: and that JACOB came into Egypt in the time of ORUS the sonne of OSIRIS.

THe death of Osiris, when it was, none can certainly affirme. The onely conjecture that I know is made thus: Lekabim the sonne of Mizraim called Hercules Lybius, made warre in Italy, to revenge his Fathers death, on the associates of Typhon, in the 41. yeere of Baleus King of Affrica: before which yeere he had made many great warres in Egypt, Phenicia, Phrygia, Crete, Lybia, and Spain: and having ended his Egyptian warres, 40 left the Kingdome to Orus. Thus saith Berosus, or authors following Berosus. That Orus last of all the Gods (as they were tiled) held the Kingdome of Isis, Diodorus Siculus plainly saith: and Plutarch as much to which all old Histories agree. Krentzheimius hereupon infers, that six yeeres may be allowed to the warres, which Hercules made in so many Countreies, after the Egyptian warres were ended: so should the death of Osiris have bene the 34. of Baleus, when himselfe had reigned 297. yeeres. I thinke that Krentzheimius was a greater Scholler than Souldier. For surely in those dayes when commerce was not such as now, but all Navigation made by coasting, a farre longer time would have been required, to the subduing of so many Countreies. An allowance of more time though it would alter his computation, yet so would it well agree with his intent: which was (doublelesse) to finde the truth. If according to his account the death of Osiris had bene the 34. of Baleus, then must Israel have come into Egypt but seven yeeres before the death of Osiris: and have lived there in the reigne of Typhon. A thing not easily beleueed. For it was the same king Diod. Sic. l. 1. c. 1.

Plut. de Isid.
de Isid.

king who advanced Ioseph, bad him send for his Father; and gaue him leaue to goe into Canaan, to the performance of his Fathers funerall: as may easily bee gathered out of the booke of Genesis. Whereas therefore the reigne of Osiris cannot be extended by any possible allowance in account of times, beyond the seuenth yeere of Isirah coming into Egypt: wee must needs cut off 23. yeeres from that number, which Krentzheimius coniectures his reigne to have continued: namely seven which hee should have lived after Iacob's coming into Egypt: nine in which Ioseph had there flourished, ere his fathers coming; and other seuen in which Typhon and Hercules had reigned after the death of Osiris, yet before Ioseph's advancement.

Neither will this disagree with the time of Hercules's wars. For the warre which Hercules made in Italy, is said to have indured 10. yeeres: After which proportion we may well giue not only sixe yeeres, as Krentzheimius doth, but 23. more to so many wars in so many and so far distant Countreies, as are named before: yea, by this proportion we may attribute vnto Orus the 13. yeeres, which passed betweene the time of Ioseph's being sold into Egypt, vnto his advancement: considering that Putiphar who bought him, and whose daughter he may seeme to have married, continued all that while chiefe Steward vnto Pharaoh: a thing not likely to have been, if so violent alterations had hapned the while in Egypt, as the tyrannous usurpation of Typhon must needs have brought in. If citing some fragment of a lost old author, I should confidently say, that Putiphar for his faithfulness to Orus, the sonne of Osiris, was by him in the beginning of his reigne made his chiefe Steward: at which time buying Ioseph and finding him a iust man, and one vnder whose hand all things did prosper, he rather committed his estate into Ioseph's hands, than vnto any of his Egyptian followers (many of whom he had found either false-hearted, or weak and vnlucky in the troublefom daies of Typhon) I know not what could be objected against this. Perhaps I might proceed further & say, That when the laying of Ioseph pleased Pharaoh, and all his seruants: then Putiphar Priest of On, being chiefe Officer to Pharaoh, did acknowledge in Ioseph, the ancient graces of God: & his iniurious imprisonment: whereupon he gaue him his daughter to wife: and being old, resigned his office of chiefe Steward vnto him: who afterward in regard of Putiphar, did iauour the Priests, when hee bought the lands of all other Egyptians. This might appeare to some a tale not vnlike to the frierly booke of Athenas, Putiphar's daughter: but vnto such as consider that God workes vnuall by means: and that Putiphar was the Steward of that king, vnder whom Iacob died: it would seeme a matter not vnprobable, had it an Author of sufficient credit to auouch it. Concerning the warres of Hercules, in which by this reckoning hee should have spent 42. yeeres after he left Egypt, ere he began in Italy, it is a circumstance which (the length of his Italian wars considered, and his former enterprises & archieuevements proportioned to them) doth not make against vs, but for vs: or if it were against vs, yet could it not so weaken our supposition, as these probabilities collected out of the vndisputable truth of Scripture doe confirme it. Neuertheless I freely grant that all these proofes are no other, than such as may be gathered out of Authors, not well agreeing, nor to be reconciled in such obscuritie, otherwise than by likelihoods, answerable to the holy Text.

§. VI.

Of TYPHON, HERCVLES EGYPTVS, ORUS, and the two SESOSTRES successively reigning after MIZRAIM: and of diuers errors about the former SESOSTRES.

CONCERNING the reigne of Typhon, and of Hercules, I finde none that precisely doth define how long either of them continued. Daniel Angelocrator giueth three yeeres to Typhon, omitting Hercules. But he is so peremptorie without proofe, as if his owne word were sufficient authoritie, in many points very questionable; alleading no witness, but as it were saying, Telle me ipso: yet herein we may thinke him to speake probably, forasmuch as the learned Krentzheimius affirmeth, that Hercules did very soone under-

Exod. 1.

Egyptians; to the Israelites: hee surely did that which to his owne people was very plausible; who (as appears in Exodus) were nothing slack in fulfilling the kings cruelty. Now that Orus the 2. or Busiris was the king that first oppressed Israel, and made the Edict of drowning the Hebrew children, which (saith Cedrenus) lasted tenne moneths: is a common opinion of many great & most learned writers; who also thinke that hereupon grew the fable of Busiris sacrificing strangers. It is also a common interpretation of that place, Ex. 1. that the King who knew not Joseph, was a king of a new family. That Busiris was of a new familie, Reinaccius doth shew: who also thinks him Author of the bloudie edict. Neuertheless, true it is, that Busiris, according to all mens computation, began his reigne 5. yeeres after the birth of Moses; before whose birth it is most manifest, that the Law was made, and much more that, the persecution began: which Bunting thinke to haue lasted 87. yeeres, ere the departure out of Egypt. Let vs therefore consider, besides the blindness of Sesostrius the second, how great the power of the Regents or Viceroyes in Egypt was: and how great confidence the kings did put in them: seeing Joseph ruled with such full power, that he bought all Egypt, & all the Egyptians for bread; giving at the same time the best of the land to his owne father & brethren, for nothing: seeing also that when the Egyptians cried out vnto Pharaoh, for bread: Pharaoh said to all the Egyptians, Go to Joseph: what he saith to you, do ye. If to a stranger borne lately fetcht out of prison, a king well able to haue governed himselfe, would giue such trust, and soueraine authoritie: it is not vnlike that a blind Prince should do it to a man of especial reputation. For God often professes, not only the good (such as Joseph was) but wicked men also, as his instruments against the day of wrath. Therefore perhaps the king did (as many haue done) resigne his kingdom to him, though his reign was not accounted to haue begun, till the death of Sesostrius. But whether Busiris did vlturpe the kingdom, or protection of the land by violence: or whether the blind king resigned it, keeping the title: or whether Busiris were ouely Regent, whilst the king liued, and afterwards (as is acknowledged by all) king himselfe: it might well be said that Pharaohs daughter tooke vp Moses, and that Pharaoh vexed Israel: seeing he both at that time was king in effect, and shortly after king in deed and title both. It were not absurd for vs to say that the blind king & Sesostrius the second oppressed Israel: but forasmuch as it may seeme that the wicked Tyrant shewed his euill nature euen when he first arose: I thinke it more likely, that Busiris did it, vsing at first the power of a king, and shortly after the stile. Thus of the 124. yeeres which passed betwene the beginning of Sesostrius his reigne, and the departure of Israel out of Egypt, 47. being spent: the 75. which remaine, are to be accounted to Busiris or Orus the second, and his children. Busiris himselfe reigned 30. yeeres, according to Eusebius: whom very many iudicious authors heerein approue. After him his daughter, who tooke Moses out of the water, is said by all that I haue read, to haue reigned 12. yeeres: Her name was Thermutis Pheres, or Mulib according to Cedrenus: Euseb. calls her Aceneris: and out of Artabanus his Historie Metris: Iosephus calls her both Aceneris, & Thermutis. Epiphanius in Panario saith that she was honoured afterward of the Egyptians, by the name of Thermutis the daughter of Amenophis, the son of Pharaoh. Of this last title question might be made & much spoken: for the Scriptures call her not Pharaohs sonnes daughter, but Pharaohs daughter. Amenophis indeed is placed next before Busiris or Orus the second by Eusebius and others: but whether hee were a king or onely a Regent I cannot coniecture. For Hierodotus, Diodorus, and the ancient Historians name the sonne of Sesostrius, Pheren. Perhaps his name was Pharaoh Amenophis: and his daughter by the Egyptians called rather the neece or grandchilde, then the daughter of Pharaoh, because of the glory of Sesostrius, and the disreputation of his sonne. If so, and if that Busiris or Orus the second marrying her, pretended any title by her, then is our coniecture strengthened, and then was the both daughter, grandchild, and wife vnto Pharaoh: and furnishing him, Queene of the land, 12. yeeres. But if she were the daughter of Orus the 2. & sister of Athorus, or Rathorus, as many thinke, to whose coniecture I will not oppose mine, then then may it seeme, that either her brethren were degenerate, or too yong to rule, when her Father died.

§. VIII.

of the two brethren of Queene Thermutis: and what king it was, under whom Moses was borne: and who it was that perished in the red Sea.

Hee had two brethren: the one was Rathorus or Athorus, who succeeded her; the other Telegonus, who is onely named by Eusebius: but his lineage and off-spring described by Reinaccius. Rathorus after his sisters death reigned 9. yeeres: after whom Cherres, thought to be his sonne, reigned 10. and then perished in the red Sea. During the reign of Cherres, Eusebius saith, that Telegonus begat Epaphus vpon 10: of which Historie elsewhere he reporteth otherwise. After the death of Cherres (whom some call Aceneres: but all or most do stile Cherres a fighter against God) Cherres reigned 8. yeeres: and then Cherres 15. This descent seemes from Father to sonne. In the 11. yeere of Cherres it is said by Euseb. that Epaphus reigning in the lower part of Egypt, built 10. Memphis. This is an argument of that which otherwise was not vnlike: viz. That Egypt was greatly brought out of order by the plagues which God had laide vpon it, and the destruction of her king and armie in the red Sea: else could it not haue had two reigning in it at once; the later of whom, or his posteritie seemes to haue taken all from Cherres the grand-child of Cherres. For whereas Armais is said to haue reigned 4. yeeres after Cherres: and Armais one after Armais: these two kings are by Eusebius and others accounted as one; and his reigne said to haue bene 5. yeeres. His name is called Armeus, otherwise Danauus: and his pedigree thus described by Reinaccius in Historia Iulia,

Telegonus:

How it might come to passe that the Nephews sons of Epaphus should haue occupied the kingdom after Cherres, it is hard to say: considering that Epaphus himselfe is reported by Eusebius to haue been borne in the time of Cherres. But forasmuch as the Historie of Epaphus his birth, is diuersly related by Eusebius, it may suffice, that Belus the father of Danauus & Egyptus, otherwise called Armeus and Rameses, was equally distant from Busiris or Orus the second, with Cherres the grand-child of Cherres. And that the posteritie of Telegonus did marrie very yong, it appears by the Historie of these two brethren, Danauus & Egyptus: of whom the former had 50. daughters, the later 50. sons: perhaps, or rather questionlesse by diuers women: yet surely they began to beget children in their first youth: How soeuer it were, the generall consent of writers is, that Armenus or Danau did succcede Cherres: and (according to Eusebius and good Authors approving him) reigned fūe yeeres. Rameſſes followed, who reigned 68. yeeres. This Rameſſes or Aegyptius is that Armeſſemianum or Armeſſemianus, vnder whom, in the opinion of Mercator, and of Bunting that folloes Mercator, Moses was borne: and the cruell Edict made of drowning the Hebrew children. The length of his reigne ſeemes to me the chiefe, if not the onely ground of Mercator's opinion. For whereas the Lord ſaid to Moses, Go, returne to Aegypt, for they are all dead which went about to kill thee: Mercator heereupon conceiues, that it was one and the ſame king vnder whom Moses was borne, and vnder whom he ſlew the Aegyptian at the 40. yeere of his age: and fled into the wildeſſe, and there abode for leaſe: 10 all which Circumſtances could agree with none, but this Rameſſes, who reigned ſo long: wherefore deſirous rather to hold a true Paradox, then a common error, hee placeth one Aliſſragmuthoſis (whoſe name is found in the liſt of Aegyptian kings, but the time vncertaine wherein he reigned) in an age 112. or 113. yeeres more ancient than others left him in: and ſo continuing the Catalogue of his ſuccelſours from Themoſis (whom Euf. calls Amoſis) downwards with no other variation of the length of each mans reigne, than is the difference betweene Manetho and Eufeb. hee findes Moses borne vnder Armeſſemianum: and Iſrael deliuered in the dayes of his ſonne Amenophis. The very name of Aliſſragmuthoſis ſeemes to him with little alteration 20 to found like Pharates, of which name one was thought to haue flouriſhed either as a king, or a wife man about the time of Iſaac. For (ſaith he) from Aliſſragmuthoſis to Phragmuthoſis, Pharmuthoſis, Phavetaſis, or Pharates, the change is not great. Mercator was a man of excellent learning and induſtrie: and one to whom the World is bound for his many notable works: yet my aſſent heerein is with-held from him, by theſe reaſons. Firſt, I ſee all other writers agree, that Cherres was the king who was drowned in the red Sea: Secondly, the place Exod. 4. all are dead, &c. may better be vnderſtood of Buſiris and all his children, then of one king alone: Thirdly, S. Cyril in his firſt booke againſt Iulian the Apoſtata, ſaith that Dardanus built Dardania, when Moses was 120. yeeres old: Rameſſes, which was this Armeſſemianum, being 30 then king of Aegypt. After Rameſſes, Amenophis reigned 19. yeeres: who is thought by Mercator, and peremptorily by Bunting pronounced, to be the King that periſhed in the red Sea: of which our opinion being already laid open, I thinke it moſt expedient to referre the kings enſuing to their owne times (which a Chronological Table ſhall lay open) and heere to ſpeake of that great deliuerance of Iſrael out of Aegypt: which for many great conſiderations depending thereupon, wee may not lightly ouer-paſſe.

CHAP. III.

Of the deliury of Iſrael out of Aegypt.

§. I.

Of the time of Moses birth, and how long the Iſraelites were oppressed in Aegypt.

Rue it is that the Hiſtorie ſelle is generally and well knowne: yet concerning the time of Moses his birth, who was the excellent and famous inſtrument of this and other great works of the Higheſt, the different opinions are very neere as many, as the men that haue written of that argument.

L. Vives in his annotations vpon S. Auguſtine citeth many of their coniectures: as that of Porphyrie out of Sanchoniato, that Moses liued in the time of Semiramis: but if hee meant the firſt Semiramis, it was but a ſond conceit: for beſides that the ſame is contrarie to all Stories Diuine and humane; while that Semiramis liued, hee commanded Syria, and all the parts thereof abſolutely: neither were the Ammonites, or Moabites, or Edomites, while hee ruled, in rerum natura.

A ſecond opinion he remembreth of Apion, taken from Ptolomie a Prielt of Mendes, who ſaith that Moses was borne while Inachus ruled the Argiues, and Ameſis in Aegypt.

The third opinion is taken out of Polemon, in his Greeke Hiſtorie the firſt booke: that Moses was borne while Apis the third King ruled Argo.

A fourth is borrowed from Tatianus Aſyrius, who though hee cite ſome authorities, that Moses liued after the Troian warre, is himſelfe of opinion, that Moses was ſame more ancient, prouing it by many arguments.

Fiftly, he ſereth downe the teſtimonie of Numerius the Philoſopher, who tooke Mufeu and Moses to be one: confirming the ſame out of Artapanus, who confeſſeth that Moses was called Mufeu, by the Grecians: and who farther deliuereth that he was adopted by Chenephis, or Thermatis, the daughter of Aegypt: the ſame which Eupolemus calleth Meris; others (as Rabanus Maurus) Thermothos. Eufebius alſo affirmeth, that by Eupolemus in his firſt booke de bono, Moses vir Deo conuictiſſimus is called Mufeu Iudeorum. Eufebius in his Chronologie, finds that Moses was borne while Amenophis ruled Aegypt. The ancient Manetho calls that Pharaon, which liued at Moses birth, Thummoſis or Thmoſis: the ſame perchaunce which Apion the Grammarians will haue to be Amoſis, and elſewhere Amenophis the Father of Sehoſis: to whom Lyſimachus and Cornelius Tacitus giue the name of Bocchoris. To mee it ſeemeth moſt probable, that while Saphrus, called alſo Spherus or Ipherenus, governed Aſyria; Orthopolis Sicyonia; and Criſus the Argiues; that then (Sefoſtris the ſecond ruling in Aegypt) Moses was borne. For if wee beleue S. Auguſtine, it was about the end of Cecrops time, that Moses led Iſrael out of Aegypt. Eduxit MOSES ex Aegypto populum Dei nouiſſimo tempore Cecropis Athenienſium regis: MOSES (ſaith he) led the people of God out of Aegypt, about the end of Cecrops time King of the Athenians. In this ſort therefore is the time of Moses birth, and of his departure out of Aegypt beſt proued. S. Auguſt. affirms (as before remembered) that Moses was borne: Saphrus governing Aſyria; and that hee left Aegypt about the end of Cecrops time.

Now Saphrus ruled 20. yeeres; his successor Mamelus 30. yeeres; Sparetus after him 40. yeeres: in whose fourth yeere Cecrops began to gouerne in Attica: Ascatades followed Sparetus, and held the Empire 41: So as Moses being borne while Saphrus ruled Afyrta; Orthopolis Scyonia; and Criafus Argos (for these three kings liued at once at his birth, saith S. Augusline, as Cecrops did when he departed Egypt) it will follow that the birth of Moses was in the nineteenth yeere of the Afyrta Saphrus: for take one yeere remaining of 20. (for so long Saphrus reigned) to which adde the thirtie yeeres of Mamelus, and the 40. yeeres of Sparetus, these make 71. with which there were wasted three yeeres of Cecrops his 50. yeeres: then take nine yeeres out of the reigne of Ascatades, who was Sparetus successeur, those nine yeeres added to 71. make 80. 13 at which age Moses left Egypt: and adde these nine yeeres to the three yeeres of Cecrops formerly spent, there will remaine but foure yeeres of Cecrops his 50: and lo it falleth right with S. Auguslines words, affirming that towards the end of Cecrops his time, Moses led the people of Israel out of Egypt.

Now the time in which the Hebrewes were oppressed in Egypt, seemeth to haue had beginning some eight or nine yeeres before the birth of Moses, and 54. yeere, or rather more, after Ioseph: betwene whose death and the birth of Moses, there were consumed 64. yeeres: some of which time, and 80. yeeres after, they liued in great seruitude and miserie. For as it is written in Exodus: They set task-masters ouer them, to keepe them vnder with burdens: and they built the Cities Pithom and Ramases, &c. And by crueltie they caused the children of Israel to serue, and made them weary of their liues, by sore labour in clay and bricke, and in all worke of the field, with all manner of bondage. All which laid vpon them by a mastering power and strong hand, they endured to the time by the wisdom of God appointed: euen from 54. yeeres, or not much more after the death of Ioseph, who left the World when it had lasted 2370. yeeres, to the eightieth yeere of Moses, and vntill hee wrought his miracles in the field of Zaan, which he performed in the Worlds age 2514. towards the end thereof, according to Codeman, or after our account, 2513. And because those things which we deliuer of Egypt, may the better bee vnderstood, I thinke it necessary to speake a few 30 words of the principall places therein named, in this discourse.

§. II.

Of diuers Cities and places in Egypt, mentioned in this Story, or else where in the Scripture.

THis Citie which the Hebrewes call Zaan, was built seuen yeeres after Hebron. Ezekiel calleth it Taphnes; and so doth Hieremie; the Septuagint, Tanis; Iosephus, Protatidis; after the name of an Egyptian Queene; Antonius giues it the name of Thunis; Hegesippus, Thamus; and William Tyrrus, Tapius. It adioyneth to the land of Gosen, and is the same, wherein Hieremie the Prophet was stoned to death, for preaching against the Egyptian and Iewish Idolatry.

Zaan or Talnes was in Moses time the Metropolis of the lower Egypt, in which their Pharaohs then commonly resided; and not vnlikly to be the same Citie, where Abraham in his time found him. But Eusebius out of Arianus affirmeth, that Abraham read Astronomie in Helopolis, or On, to Pharates King of Egypt. Alex. Polyhistor, out of Eupolemus hath it otherwise, saying, that Abraham instructed the Egyptian Priests, and not the King; both which authorities Eusebius citeth. The Septuagint, and the Vulgar edition, for Zaan write Helopolis. Pagnin, Vatablus, Iunius, and our English call it On; and Protonie, Onium. There are two Cities of that name; the one on the frontier of the lower Egypt, towards the South; the other somewhat lower on the Easter-most branch of Nilus falling into the Sea at Pelenusium. And it it may be that Helopolis to the South of the riuer Trian, was the same which Vatablus and our English call Zaan. Of the latter it is, that the Scriptures take certaine knowledge: the same, which Pomp. Mela, and Plinie, call Solis oppidum; Tyrrus in the Holy Warre, Mabec; the Arabians, Babalbeth; and Simcon Sethi, Fons Solis. Of this Helopolis, or On, was Putiphys Priest, or Prince, whose daughter Ioseph married. In the Territory adioyning Iacob inhabited, while he liued in Egypt. In the confines of this Citie, Onias, the high Priest of the Iewes, built a Temple, dedicated to the eternal God; not much inferiour to that of Hierusalem (Ptolomee Philopater then gouerning in Egypt) which stood to the time of Vespasian, 333. yeeres after the foundation by Onias, whom Iosephus falsly reporteth, herein to haue fulfilled a prophecie of Esaie. 19. In die illa erit Altare Domini in medio terra Egypti; In that day shall the altar of the Lord bee in the midst of the Land of Egypt. Antiochus Epiphanes at that time of the building tyrannizing ouer the Iewes, gaue the occasion for the erecting of this Temple in Egypt. Lastly, there it was that our Saviour CHRIST IESVS remained, while Ioseph and the Virgin Mary feared the violence of Herod: neere which (Iayth Brochard) the fountaine is still found, called Iesus well, whose streames doe afterward water the Gardens of Balsamum, no where else found in Egypt. And heretofore more in Brochard, in his description of Egypt.

There is also the Citie of Noph, remembered by Esaie and Ezekiel, the same which Hosea the Prophet calleth Moph: which latter name it tooke from a Mountaine adioyning, so called, which Mountaine Herodotus remembreth. And this is that great Citie, which was called Memphis; and so the Septuagint write it. It is knowne to the Arabians by the name of Mazar. The Chaldeans name it Alchabur; and Tudalen, Si, Mazaim.

Pelusium, which Vatablus, Pagnin, Iunius, and our English write, Sin; the Septuagint call Sais; and Montanus, Lebna; is not the same with Damata, as Gul Tyrus witnesseth. In the time of Saladin the third, Pelusium was called Belbeis. Belbeis (saith Tyrrus) quæ olim dicta est Pelusium; Belbeis, that in times past was called Pelusium.

The Citie of No, the Septuagint call Diopolis. Of which name there are two or three in Egypt. Hierome conuerteth it Alexandria, by anticipation, because it was so called in the future.

Bubastus, for so Hierome and Zeigler write it, is the same which the Hebrewes call Pibesth.

To make the storie the more perceivable, I haue added a description of the land of Gosen, in which the Israelites inhabited; with those Cities and places so often remembred in the Scripture: as of Taphnes or Zaan, Helopolis or Bethlemes, Bissephon, Succoth, and the rest; together with Moses passage through the Deserts of Arabia the Stonie. For all storie without the knowledge of the places, wherein the actions were performed, as it wanteth a great part of the pleasure; so it no way enricheth the knowledge and vnderstanding of the Reader; neither doth any thing serue to retain, what we reade, in our memories, so well as these pictures and descriptions doe. In which respect I am driuen to digresse in many places, and to interpose some such discourse, other wise seeming impertinent: taking for my authority, after many others more ancient, that great learned man, Arias Montanus; who in his Preface to the Storie of the Holy Land, hath these words: Si enim absq. locorum obseruatione res gestas narrentur, aut sine Topographia cognitione historia legantur, adeo confusa atq. perturbata erunt omnia, ut ex his nihil non obscurum, nihil non difficile elici possit; If narration (saith he) be made of those things which are performed, without the obseruation of the places, wherein they were done: or if Histories be read without Topographical knowledge; all things will appear so intricate and confused, as wee shall thereby vnderstand nothing but obscurely, nor draw thence any knowledge, but with the greatest difficulty.

§. III.

§. III.

Of the cruelty against the Israelites young children in Egypt: and of MOSES his preservation, and education.

UT to returne to the story it selfe. It appeareth that notwithstanding the labour and slavery, which the Israelites endured, yet they decreased not in numbers: in somuch as Pharaoh considering the danger of discontented pouvertie, and the able bodies of an oppressed multitude, how perillous they might bee to his estate, by suggestion of the Deuill 10 resolued to slaughter all the male children of the Hebrews, as soone as they should be borne. To which end he sent for Sephora and Thua, women the most famous and expert amongst them, que praeant (saith Commestor) multitudini obstericum, who had com- mand given them ouer all mid-wiues; by whom (as it seemeth) he gaue order to all the rest for the execution of his Edict. For to haue called all the mid-wiues of Egypt together, had been a strange Parliament. Now whether these two, before named, were of the Hebrews, or of the Egyptians, it is diuersly disputed. S. Augustine calls them Hebrews, because it is written Exodus the first, The King of Egypt commanded the mid-wiues of the Hebrew women &c. But Iosephus, Abulenſis, and Pererius beleeue them to be Egyptians. Whosoeuer they were, when it pleased God to frustrate the 20 execution of that secret murder, to the end the world might witness both the wickedness of the Egyptians, and the iust cause, thereby made manifest, of his future indignation and reuenge: Pharaoh finding those women filled with pietie, and the feare of God, commanded others of his people to execute his former intent; and publicly, or howsoeuer, to destroy all the male Hebrew children borne within his dominions.

Now besides the doubts, which Pharaoh had of the multitudes of the Hebrews, the greatest part of whom he might haue assured, by affoording them the iustice, which euery King oweth to his vassals, and the rest he might haue employed or sent away at his pleasure; Iosephus giueth another cause of his rage against them, namely, That it was prophetically deliuered him by an Egyptian Priest, that among the Hebrews there should bee borne a childe; who growing to mans estate, should become a plague and terror to his whole Nation. To prevent which, (and presuming that he could resist the ordinance of God, by a meane, contrarie to the lawes of Heauen and of nature) hee stretched out his bloudie and mercilesse hand to the execution of his former intent. The same preuention lasted long after practised, when fearing the spirituall kingdome of Christ, as if it should haue bene temporall, he caused all the male children at that time borne to bee slaughtered. And that Pharaoh had some kinde of foreknowledge of the future successe, it may be gathered by these his owne words, in the tenth verse of the fifth of Exodus. Come, let vs worke wisely with them, lest they multiply; and it come to passe, that if there bee warre, they toyne themselves also vnto our enemies, and fight against vs, and get them out of the Land. But wee see, and time hath told it vs from the beginning, how God derideth the wisdom of the worldly men, when forgetting the Lord of all power, they relye on the inuentions of their owne most feeble, and altogether darkened vnderstanding. For euen by the hands of the dearely beloued daughter of this tyrant, was that great Prophet and minister of Gods merauilous workes taken out of Nilus, being therein turned off, in an Arke of reedes, a sucking and powerlesse infant. And this Princesse hauing beheld the child his forme and beautie, though but yet in the blouth, so pierced her compassion, as she did not onely preserue it, and cause it to be fostered; but 50 commanded that it should bee esteemed as her owne, and with equall care to the sonne of a King nourished. And for memory that it was her deede, shee called the childe Moses, as it were, extractus, or eruptus, taken out, to wit, out of the water: or, after Iosephus and Glieas, Moy, a voice exprelling water, and bijes, as much to say, as that opinion, that Moses was circumcised, before he was put into the Arke of Reedes, and that Amram his father had named him Joachim. In his youth hee was carefully bred, by the care, and at the charge of Pharaohs Daughter, and by men of the most vnderstanding, taught and instructed: quem regio more educant, praefectus ei sapientibus E- gyptiorum Magistris, à quibus erudiretur, saith BASIL. Vnto whom shee gaue princely e- ducation, appointing ouer him wise Masters of the Egyptians for his instructors. Thereby (say Iosephus and Philo) hee became excellently learned in all the doctrine of the Egyptians; which also the Martyr Stephen, in the tenth of the Actes confirmeth;

10 And Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians. Which wisdom or sapience, such as it was, or at least so much thereof as Six. Senecaſis hath gathered, wee haue added, betwene the death of Moses, and the reigne of Iosua.

§. IIII.

Of MOSES his flying out of Egypt; and the opinions of certaine ancient Historians of his warre in Aethiopia; and of his marriage there: PHILLO his iudgement of his Pastoral life: and that of PERERIVS of the Bookes of GENESIS and ION.

HEN Moses was growne to mans estate, Iosephus and Ensebins, out of Artapanus, tell vs of ten yeeres warre that hee made against the Aethiopians: of the besieging of Siba afterward by Cambyſes, called Merops, and how he recovered that Citie by the fauour of Tharbis, a Daughter of Aethiopia, whom he tooke to wife. So hath Commestor a prettie tale of Moses. How after the end of that warre, Tharbis resisting his returne into Egypt, Moses most skilfull in Astronomie, caused two Images to bee ingrauen in two precious stones, whereof the one increased memorie; the other caused forgetfulness. These he set in two rings; whereof he gaue the one, to wit, that of obliuion, 30 to his wife Tharbis, reseruing the other of memorie for himselfe: which ring of forgetfulness, after shee had a while worn, shee beganne to neglect the loue hee bare her husband: and so Moses without danger returned into Egypt. But leauing these fancies to the Authors of them: It is true, that about the 40. yeere of Moses age, when he beheld an Egyptian offering violence to one of the oppressed Hebrews, moved by compassion, in respect of his brother, and stirred vp by disdain against the other, in the contention he slew the Egyptian. Soone after which act, finding a disposition in some of his owne Nation to accuse him, for whose defence hee had thus greatly endangered his owne life: by the ordinance and aduice of God, whose chosen seruant he was, hee fled into Arabia Petrea, the next bordering Countrie to 40
Egypt; where wandering all alone, as a man left and forsaken, in a place vnkowne vnto him, as among a Nation of barbarous strangers; and who in future times were the irreconcilable enemies of the Hebrews: it pleased God (working the greatest things by the weakest worldly meanes) to make the watering of a few sheepe, and the assisting of the Daughters of Raquel the Midianite, an occasion whereby to provide him a wife of one of those, and a father in law, that fed him, and sustained him in a Countrie neereſt Egypt, fittest to returne from: necessarie to bee knowne, because interiaent betwene Egypt and Indea, through which he was to leade the Israelites; and wherein God held him, till the occasion which God presented, best serued, 50 the glorie of God, which shineth most, couered him ouer, and appeared vnto him, not finding him as a Kings sonne, or an adopted child of great Pharaohs daughter, but as a meeke and humble sheepeheard, sitting at a mountaine foote; a keeper and commander of those poore beasts onely.

In that part of Arabia, neere Madian, hee consumed 40. yeeres. And though (as Philo Philo in the story of Moses life obserueth) he did not neglect the care of those flocks, committed to his charge, but that he excelled all others in that Pastorall knowledge, yet in that solitary Desart he enioyed himselfe : and being separate from the presse of the world, and the troublesome affaires thereof, hee gaue himselfe to contemplation, and to make perfect in himselfe all those knowledges, whereof his younger yeeres had gathered the grounds and principles : the same Author also iudging, that his Pastorall life did excellently prepare him for the execution of the Principalltie, which heafterward obtained. Eft enim (saith PHILO) ars Pallorali, quasi prae aludum ad regnum, hoc est, ad regimen hominum, gregis mansueti simi. Quemadmodum belliofa ingenua praerexcent se in venationibus, experientia in feris, quod postea in militia & bello pericula iungit, bruti praerentibus materiam exercitij, tam belli quam pacis tempore. At vnde praefectura mansueti pecoris, habet quiddam simile cum regno in subditis ; ideoq, Reges cognominantur Pastores populorum, non contumelia sed honoris gratia ; The art of keeping sleepe is, as it were, an introductorie exercise vnto a Kingdome, namely, the rule ouer men, the most gentle flocks : Euen as warlike natures doe before-hand exercise themselves in hunting, practising on wild beasts these things, which after they will accomplish in warfare : those brute beasts affording matter, wherein to traine themselves, both in time of warre and of peace. But the gouernment of gentle castell, hath a kinde of resemblance vnto a Kingly rule ouer subjects : therefore, Kings are called shep-herds of the people, not in way of reproch, but for their honour.

That Moses, in this time of his abode at Madian, wrote the Booke of Iob, as Pererius suppoeth, I cannot iudge of it, because it is thought, that Iob was at that time liuing. Neither dare I subscribe to Pererius opinion, That Moses, while hee liued in that part of Arabia, wrote the bookes of Genesis ; although I cannot denie the reason of Pererius coniecture, That by the example of Iob's patience hee might strengthen the oppressed Hebrewes : and by the promises of God to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, put them in assurance of their deliuerie from the Egyptian slavery, and of the Land of rest, and plentie promised.

Of his calling backe into Egypt by the Angel of God, and the maruailes and wonders which hee performed, thereby to perswade Pharaoh, that he was the messenger of the most High, the particulars are written in the first fourteene Chapters of Exodus ; and therefore to treat of all the particulars therein contained, it were needlesse. But for the first, it is to be noted, that when Moses desired to be taught by God, by wat name hee should make him knowne, and by whom hee was sent ; hee received from God so much, as man could comprehend of his infinite and euere-being nature. Out of which he deliuered him in the first part of his answer, a name to be considered of by the wisest ; and in his second, to bee vnderstood by all. For there is nothing that is, or hath being of it selfe, but the eternall : which truly is ; which is aboue all ; which is immutable. The bodies of men are changed euery moment : their substance waltereth, and is repaired by nutriment ; neuer continuing at one stay, nor being the same so long as while one may say, Now. Likewise, whatsoever is consumed in the longest continuance of time, the same in euery short piece of time suffereth decay ; neither doth any thing abide in onestate. Vna est Des & sol natura, quae uere est : id enim quod subsistit, non habet aliud, sed suum est. Cetera quae creata sunt, etiamsi uidentur esse, non sunt, quia aliquando non fuerunt. & potest rursus non esse, quod non fuit ; It is the one and onely nature of God, which truly is, for hee hath his being of himselfe, and not from any thing without him. Other things that are created, although they seeme to be, yet they are not ; for sometimes they were not : and that which hath not being, may againe want being. And with this, in respect of the Diuine nature, the saying of Zeno Eleates excellently agreeth : Tota rerum natura umbra est, aut inanis, aut fallax ; The whole nature of things is but a shadow, either empty or deceitfull : in comparison of whom (saith E/ay) all Nations are as nothing, lesse then nothing, and vanitie.

Of the tenne plagues wherewith the Egyptians were stricken, the first was by changing changing the Rivers into blood : God punishing them by those waters, into which their Forefathers had throwne, and in which they had drowned, the innocent children of the Hebrewes. To which this place of the Reuelation may bee fitly applied : And I heard the Angell of the water say, Lord, thou art iust, which art, and which wast : and he saith, woe, because thou hast iudged these things ; for they shed the blood of the Saints and Prophets, and therefore hast thou giuen them blood to drinke.

The rest of the Plagues by Froegges, Lice, Flies, or stinging Waspes ; by the death of their Cattaile ; by leprous Scabbes, by Haile and Fire ; by Grasshoppers ; by darknesse ; after which Pharaoh forbade Moses his presence : moued the hardened heart of the vnbeleeuing King no longer, then the paine and perill lasted, till such time as his owne first-borne, and the first-borne of all his Nation perished. He then, while he feared his owne life, (a time wherein wee remember God perforce) stood vpon no condition : whereas before, hee first yielded but to the departure of the men ; then of the men, women and children, reseruing their bestiall ; but hee was now content for the present, that the Israelites should not only depart with all their owne, but with a part of the Siluer, Gold, and Jewels of his owne people : of which (the feare being past) hee suddainly repeated him, as his pursuit after them proved. For when euery one of the Hebrewes had (according to direction from Moses received) slaine a Lambe, without spot or blemish, for the Passouer, a Sacrament of the most cleane and vnspotted Saviour) and with the blood thereof coloured the poste and linterne of the doores ; the Angell of God in the dead of the night smote euery first-borne of Egypt, from the sonne of the King, to that of the Begger and Slave : the children of the Israelites excepted. At which terrible iudgement of God, Pharaoh being more then euer amazed, yielded, as before is sayd, to their departure. The Egyptians (saith Epiphanius) did in after-times imitate this colouring with blood, which the Israelites vsed after the Passouer ; ascribing an exceeding vertue to the Red Colour : and therefore they did not only marke their Sheepe and Cattell, but their Trees bearing Fruit, to preferue them from lightning and other harmes.

¶ V.
Of PHARAOH'S pursuit of the Israelites : and of their passage towards the Red Sea, so farre as Succoth.

NOW, when the people were remooued, and on their way, (his heart being hardened by God) hee bethought him atwell of the Honour lost, as of the shame remaining after so many Calamities and Plagues, in suffering them to depart with the spoiles of his people, and in despoight of himselfe. And hauing before this time great Companies of 40 Souldiers in readinesse, hee consulted with himselfe, what way the Israelites were like to take. Hee knew that the shortest and fairest passage was through the Countrey of the Philistims. But because these people were very strong, and a warlike Nation, and in all probability of his Allies, hee suspected that Moses meant to find some other outlet, to wit, through the Desart of Eibam ; and there, because the Countrey was exceeding Mountainous, and of hard access, and that Moses was pestered with multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattell, hee thought it impossible for the Israelites to escape him that way. In the meane-while hauing gathered together all the Chariots of Egypt, and 600. of his owne, and Captaines ouer them ; hee determined to set vpon them in the Plainses of Gosen, which way soeuer 50 they turned themselves. For it was the ancient manner to fight in those Chariots, armed with broad and sharpe Hoores on both sides, in fashion like the Mowers Sythe. Which kind of fight in Chariots, but not hooked, the Brittains vsed against the Romans, while they made the Warre for the Conquest of this Land. Of this Armie of PHARAOH, IOSEPHVS affirmeth, that it consisted of 50000. 10th ant. l. c. 6.

Horle,

Horse, and 20000. foot, which, were it true, then it cannot be doubted, but that Pharaoh intended long before to assault the Hebrewes at their departure, or to destroy them in Gosen; and refused them passage, till such time as hee had prepared an Armie, to set on them. For, as it is written in the first of Exodus, hee doubted two things, either that the Hebrewes might ioine themselves to his enemies within the Land, or being so multiplied, as they were, might leave his seruice, and get themselves thence at their pleasure. But the plagues which God grieved him withall, enforced him at this time to give an assent to their departure: perchance fore-running his intent. But were it otherwise, and Josephus partiall in this affaire, yet by the wordes of the Text it appeareth, that he gathered all the Chariots of Egypt: which could not be done 10 in haile. For Moses made but three dayes march, ere Pharaoh was at his heeles; and yet the last day he went on fixteene miles: which, in so hot a Countrey, and to driue their Cattell and Sheep with them, pestered with a world of Women and Children, was a march witnessing the dread of a powerfull Enemy at hand. Now, as Moses well knew, that hee went out with a mightie hand, and that God guided his vnderstanding in all his Enterprizes: so he lay not still in the ditch crying for helpe, but vnto the vnderstanding which God had giuen him, hee left nothing vnperformed, becoming a naturall wiseman, a valiant and a skilfull Conducter; as by all his actions and counsailes from this day to his death well appeared.

When Moses perceived that Pharaoh was enraged against him, and commanded 10 him not to dare to come thenceforth into his presence: after hee had warned Israel of the Passouer, he appointed a generall Assembly or Rendez-vous of all the Hebrewes at Ramases, in the Territorie of Gosen; a Citie standing indifferent to recieve from all other parts of the Countrey the dispersed Hebrewes: and gave commandement, that euery Family should bring with them such store as they had, of Dow and Palle, not staying to make it into bread: knowing then that Pharaoh was on foot, and on his way towards them. Which done, and hauing considered the great strength of Pharaohs Horse-men and Chariots, of which kind of defence Moses was vtterly vnprovided (though as it is written, the Israelites went vp armed) hee marched from Ramases Eastward, towards the Desarts of Etham, and incamped at Succoth, which 30 he performed on the fifteenth day of the Moneth Abib. Which Moneth from that time forward they were commanded to account, as the first Moneth of the yeere. Whether in former times they had beene accustomed to begin their yeere in some other Moneth, following the manner of the Egyptians, and were now recalled by Moses to the rule of their Forefathers, it is vncertaine. Certaine it is, that they had, and retained, another beginning of their politike yeere, which was not now abrogated, but rather by some solemnities thereunto annexed, was confirmed, and still continued in vs. Wherefore in referring things done, or happening among them, vnto the beginning, middle, or ending of the yeere; that distinction of the Sacred, and the Politike yeere is not to be neglected. Concerning the number of dayes in euery Moneth, and the whole forme of their yeere, like enough it is that Moses himselfe in fortie yeeres space, did sufficiently instruct the Priests, to whose care the ordering thereof (as common opinion holds) was giuen in trust: but that any rule of framing their Kalendar, was made publike, before the captiuitie of Babylon, I doe not find. Now because time and motion beginne together, it will not, I thinke, be any great breach of order, to shew here at their first setting forth, what was the forme of the Hebrew yeere: with the difference betwene them and other Nations, in ordering the accompt of time.

¶ VI.

Of the Solarie and Lunarie yeeres: and how they are reconciled: with the forme of the Hebrew yeere, and their manner of intercalation.

The Hebrew Moneths are thus named.

The first Moneth, Nisan, or Abib.	1. March.
The second, Iar, or Tiar, Zio, or Zin.	2. April.
The third, Sivan, or Sinan, or Siban.	3. Maie.
The fourth, Tamuz.	4. Iune.
The fifth, Ab.	5. Iulie.
The sixth, Elul.	6. August.
The seventh, Tysri, or Ethauin, or Ethanim.	7. September.
The eighth, Marchesuan, or Mechusuan, or Bul, or with Josephus, Marisanan.	8. October. 1. Ant.
The ninth, Chisleu, or Casleu.	9. Nouember.
The tenth, Tebeth, or Thobeth.	10. December.
The eleventh, Sebeth, or Sabath.	11. Ianuarie.
The twelfth, Adar, and Ve Adar.	12. February.

THE Adar was an intercalarie Moneth, added, some yeeres, vnto the other twelue, to make the Solarie and Lunarie yeere agree; which (besides the generall inconuenience that would otherwise haue risen, by casting the Moneths of Summer into the Winter season, to the great confusion of all account) was more necessarily to be regarded of the Hebrewes, because of the diuine Precept. For God appointed especiall Feasts to be celebrated precisely in such a Moneth of the yeere, and withall on a set day, both of the Moone and of the Moneth: as the Feast of the first fruits; the new Moones, and the like: which could not haue so beene kept, if either the day of the Moone had 30 fallen in some other part of the Moneth, or the Moneth it selfe beene found farre distant from his place in the season of the yeere.

Other Nations, the better to obserue their Solemnities in the due time, and to ascertain all reckonings and remembrances, (which is the principall commoditie of time, that is the measure of endurance) were driuen in like manner to make their yeeres vnequall, by adding sometimes, and sometimes abating one or more dayes, as the error committed in foregoing yeeres required. The error grew at first, by not knowing what number of dayes made vp a compleat yeere. For though by the continuall course of the Sunne, causing Summer and Winter duly to succeed each other, it is plaine enough euen to the most sauage of all people, when a yeere hath 40 passed ouer them; yet the necessitie of ordinarie occurrences, that are to be numbered by a shorter Tally, makes this long measure of whole yeeres insufficient for the smaller sort of more daily affaires. Therefore men obserued the Monethly conspicuous reuolution of the Moone, by which they diuided the yeere into twelue parts, subdiuiding the Moneth into 29. dayes and nights, and those againe into their quarters and houres. But as the markes of time are sensible and easily discerned: so the exact calculation of it is very intricate, and worketh much perplexitie in the vnderstanding. Twelue reuolutions of the Moone, containing lesse time by eleven dayes or thereabout, than the yeerely course of the Sunne, through the Zodiacke, in the space of fixteene yeeres, euery Moneth was found in the quite contrarie part of the 50 yeere, to that wherein it was placed at the first. This caused them to adde some daies to the yeere, making it to consist of twelue Moneths, and as many daies more, as they thought would make the courses of the Sunne and Moone to agree. But herein were committed many new errors. For neither did the Sunne determine his yeerely reuolution by any set number of whole dayes; neyther did the Moone changeable wayes at one houre; but the verie minutes and lesser fractions were to bee observed by him, that would seeke to reduce their motions (which motions also were not full alike) into any certaine rule. Here lay much wisdom and deepe art, which could not loone bee brought to perfection. Yet as making an estimate at random, the Athenians held the yeere to containe 360. dayes, wherein most of the Greekes concurred with them. That 360. dayes filled vp the Gracian yeere (besides many collateral proofes) it is manifest by that which Plinie directly affirmeth, telling of the Statues, erected in honour of Demetrius Phalerens, which were (sayth he) 360, whilst as yet the yeere exceeded not that number of dayes. By this account neyther did any certaintie of the Moone beginne or end their Moneths; neyther could their Moneths continue many yeeres, in their owne places: but must needs bee shifted by little and little, from Winter to Summer, and from Summer to Winter, as the dayes forgotten to be inserted into the Almanacke by men, but not forgotten by the superiour bodies in their courses, should occupie their owne rooms in their due turnes. Now, because the solemnities of the Olympian Games was to be held at the full Moone, and withall on the 15. day of the Moneth Heatemban (which answerein a manner to our Iune) they were carefull to take order, that this Moneth might euer beginne with the new Moone; which they effected by adding some two daies to the last Moneth of every yeere: those Games being held once in foure yeeres. This intercalation sufficed not to make the matter euen; which caused them sometimes to omit one day in the fourth yeere, which was the second of the Moneth Baedromian; (agreeing neerly with our August) sometimes not to omit it, or (which is all one) to insert another for it into the fourth Lunare yeere, accounting by the Moone, after a manner that was not vulgar. All this notwithstanding, their Moneth of Iune would every yeere haue growne colder and colder, had they not sought to keepe all vpright, by intercalating in each other Olympiad, that is, each eighth yeere one whole Moneth, which they called the second Pojideon or December; which was the device of Harpalus, who also taught them to make one Moneth of 29. dayes, another of 30. and so successiue through the whole yeere. Thus with much labour they kept their yeere as neere as they could, vnto the high way of the Planets; but these marks which they obserued, were found at length to bee deceitfull Guides. For it was not possible so to fashion this eighth yeeres intercalation, that it should not deceiue them in 11. houres and 18. minutes at the least, or some wayes in 34. houres and 10. minutes, or 36. and 41. minutes; which differences would, in few Ages, haue bred much confusion. The first that introduced a good methode, likely to continue, was Meton the Athenian, who not regarding the Olympiads, and the eighth yeeres intercalation, deuised a Cycle of 19. yeeres, wherein the Moone hauing 235. times runne her circuit, met with the Sunne in the same place, and on the same day of the yeere, as in the 19. yeere before past shee had done. This inuention of Meton was entertained with great applause, and passing from Greece to Rome, was there inserted into the Kalender in Golden Letters, being called the Golden Number, which name it retaineth vnto this day. Hereby were annoyed the great and vncertaine intercalations that formerly had bene vsed; for by the intercalation of 7. Moneths in the 19. yeeres, all was so euen, that no sensible difference could bee found. Yet that error which in one yeere could not be perceived, was very apparent in a few of those Cycles; the new Moones anticipating in one Cycle 7. houres, and some minutes of the precise rule. Therefore Calippus deuised a new Cycle containing foure of Metons, that is to say, 76. yeeres; and afterwards Hipparchus, a Noble Astrologer, framed another, containing foure of Calippus his Periods, each of them finding some error in the former obseruations, which they diligently corrected. The last reformation of the Kalender was that which Iulius Caesar made, who by aduice of the best Mathematicians, then to be found, examining the courses of those heauenly bodies, reduced the yeere vnto the forme which is now in vse with vs, containing 365. dayes and sixe houres, which houres in foure yeeres make

vp one whole day, that is intercalated euery fourth yeere, the 24. of Februarie. The correction of the Julian yeere by Pope Gregorie the 13. Anno Domini 1582. is not as yet entertained by generall consent; it was indeed, but as a note added vnto the worke of Cesar: yet a note of great importance. For whereas it was obserued, that the Sunne, which at the time of the Nicene Council, Anno Dom. 324. entered the Aequinoctiall on the 21. day of March, was in the yeere 1582. ten dayes sooner found in that time, Pope Gregory strooke out of the Kalender ten dayes, following the fourth of October, so that in stead of the fifth day was written the fifteenth; by which means the mouable Feasts depending on the Sunnes entrance into Aries, were againe celebrated in such time, as at the Nicene Council they had bene. And the better to preuent the like alterations, it was by the Council of Trent ordained, that from thence forward in euery hundreth yeere, the Leape day should be omitted, excepting till the fourth hundred: because the Sunne doth not in his yeerely course take vp full sixe houres aboue the 365. dayes; but faileth so many minutes, as in 400. yeeres make about three whole dayes.

But the Cycle of 19. yeeres, which the Hebrewes vsed, was such as neyther did need any nice curiosities of houres, minutes, and other lesser Fractions to helpe it; neyther did in summing vp the dayes of the whole yeere, neglect the dayes of the Moone, confounding one Moneth with another. For with them it fell out so, that 20 alwayes the Kalends or first day of the Moneth was at the new Moone, and because that day was festiuall, they were very carefull awfull to obserue the short yeere of the Moone, passing through all the 12. Signes in one Moneth, as that longer of the Sunne, which is needfully regarded in greater accounts. First, therefore they gaue to Nisan their first Moneth, which is about our March or April, 30. dayes; to Iar their second Moneth 29. dayes; and so successiue 30. to one, 29. to another. Hereby it came to passe, that euery two Moneths of theirs contained somewhat euenly two reuolutions of the Moone, allowing 29. dayes, 12. houres, and odde minutes, from change to change. The spare minutes were bestowed among the superfluous or Epact dayes, which made vp 7. Moneths in 19. yeeres; to 6. of which 7. 30 were commonly giuen 30. dayes; to one of them 29. dayes, or otherwise as was found requisite. Their common yeere (as appeareth by the severall dayes of each Moneth) contained 354. dayes, which faile of the yeere, wherein the Sunne finisheth his course, 11. whole dayes, with some fractions of time. But these dayes, and other broken pieces, howsoeuer they were neglected in one yeere, yet in the Cycle of 19. yeeres were so disposed of by conuenient Intercalations, that still at the end of that Cycle, both the Sunne and Moone were found on the same day of the yeere, Moneth and weeke, yea commonly on the same houre of the day, where they had bene at the beginning of it 19. yeeres before.

Diuers haue diuersly set downe the forme of the Hebrew yeere, with the manner 40 of their Intercalations. SIGONIVS tells vs, that euery second yeere they did adde a Moneth of 22. dayes; euery fourth yeere a Moneth of 23. in the regard of 11. dayes and a halfe wanting in 12. Moones to fulfill a yeere of the Sunne. But herein SIGONIVS was very much deceiued. For the Moone doth neuer finish her course in 22. or 23. dayes; and therefore to haue added so many dayes to the end of the yeere, had bene the way to change the fashion of all the Moneths in the yeeres following, which could not haue begunne as they ought, with the new Moone. Genebrard saith, that euery third yeere, or second yeere, as need required, they did intercalate one Moneth, adding it at the yeeres end vnto the other 12. This I beleeeue to haue bene true; but in which of the yeeres the intercalation was (if it bee worthy of consideration) 50 he thinks they doe not probably deliuer, who keepe all farre from euennesse vntill the very last of the 19. yeeres. For (to omit such as erre grossely) some there are who say, that after three yeeres, when besides the dayes spent in 36. courses of the Moone, 33. dayes are left remaining, that is, 11. dayes of each yeere; then did the Hebrewes adde a Moneth of 30. dayes; keeping three dayes, as it were in plussage vnto the next account. The like, say they, was done at the end of the sixt yeere; at which time, besides the Intercalarie Moneth, remained fixe daies, namely, three summing that Moneth, and the Epact of three yeeres, besides the three formerly referred. Thus they goe on to the 18. yeere; at which time they haue 18. daies in hand: all which with the Epact of the 19. yeere make vp a Moneth of 29. daies, that being intercalated at the end of the Cycle makes all euen.

Whether this were the practice, I can neither affirme nor denie; yet surely it must needes haue bred a great confusion, if in the 18. yeere every Moneth were removed from his owne place by the distance of 48. daies, that is, halfe a quarter of the yeere and more; which inconuenience by such a reckoning was vnaoydable. Wherefore, to I preferre the common opinion, which preuenteth such dislocation of the Moneths, by setting downe a more conuenient way of Intercalation in the 8. yeere. For the 6. daies remaining after the two former Intercalations made in the third and sixth yeeres, added vnto the 22. daies, arising out of the Epacts of the seuenth and eighth yeeres, doe fitly serue to make vp a Moneth, with the borrowing of one day or two from the yeere following; and this borrowing of two daies is so farre from causing any disorder, that indeed it helpe to make the yeeres ensuing way the lesse from the proper season of euery Moneth. This may suffice to bee spoken of the Hebrew Moneths and Yeeres, by which they guided their accounts.

§. VII.

Of the passage of Israel from Succoth towards the Red Sea: and of the diuers wayes leading out of Egypt.

From Succoth in the morning following, Moses led the Israelites towards the Defart of Etham, to recouer the Mountaine foot, by the edge of that Wildernesse, though hee intended nothing lesse then to goe out that way, of all other the nearest. But being assured of the multitude of Horien men and armed Chariots, that followed him, hee kept himselfe 30 from being incompassed, by keeping the rough and Mountainous ground on his left hand. At Etham hee rested but one night, and then hee reflected backe from the entrance thereof, and marched away directly towards the South; the distance betweene it and Succoth being about eight mile. That hee forbore to enter Arabia being then in sight thereof, it seemeth to proceed from three respects; the first two naturall; the third diuine. For Pharaoh being then at hand, and hauing received intelligence of the way which Moses tooke, perswaded himselfe, that the numbers which Moses led, consisting of about a Million, if not two Millions of foules, (for as it is written Exod. the 12. Great multitudes of sundry sorts of people went out with them) could not possibly passe ouer those Defart and high Mountaines with so great multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattell, but that at the very entrance of that fastnesse he should haue ouer-taken them, and destroyed the greatest numbers of them. For these his owne wordes: They are tangled in the Land, the Wildernesse hath shut them in, doe shew his hopes and intents; which Moses by turning another way did frustrate. Secondly, Moses by offering to enter Arabia that way, drew Pharaoh towards the East-side of the Land of Gosen, or Rameses: from whence (missing Moses there) his pursuit after him with his Chariots was more difficult, by reason of the roughnesse of the way; and howeouer, yet while the Hebrewes kept the Mountaine foot on the left hand, they were better secured from the ouer-bearing violence both of the Horie and Chariots. Thirdly, Moses confidence in the Al-powerfull God was such, by whose spirit, only wise, he was directed, as hee rather made choice to leaue the glory of his deliuerance and victorie to Almighty God, than eyther by an escape the next way, or by the strength of his multitude, consisting of 600000. men, to caft the successe vpon his owne vnderstanding, wise conduction, or valour: The third day day he marched with a double pace from Etham towards the Valley of Pihacherath, 16. mile distant; and fate downe betweene two ledges of Mountaynes adioyning to the Red Sea, to wit, the Mountaynes of Etham on the North, and Baalzepon towards the South: the same which Orosius calleth Climax: on the top whereof there stood a Temple dedicated to Baal. And, as Phagius noteth, the word so compounded, is as much to say, as, Domine specula, sine custodia; Lord of the watch-towe. For the Egyptian beleueed, or at least made their laues beleue, that if any of them offered to escape that way into Arabia, this Idoll would both arrest them, and force them to returne to their Lords and Masters. For the Egyptians had gods for all turnes. 10 Egyptij dijs sacandi; The Egyptians were fruitfull in gods, saith Saint Hierome. But Moses, who incamped at the foot of this Mountayne with a million of foules, or as other conceiue, with two millions, found this Lord of the watch-towe asleepe, or out of countenance.

It is probable that all those Egyptian and others brought by the Hebrews to the knowledge of the true God, followed Moses at his departure.

Climax is rather so called in respect of a passage vpon downe, then that it is any proper name.

Now these two passages leading out of Egypt into Arabia vpon the firme land, Moses refused, as well that of Pelusium and Casotis, the sayrest and shortest of all other, in respect of Iudea, as the other by Etham, from which he reflected, for the reasons before remembred, and tooke the way by the Valley of Pihacherath, between the Mountaynes, which made a straight entrance towards the Sea. After whom Pharaoh made so great speede with his Horse-men and Chariots, as he gaue the Hebrewes no time at all to rest them after so long a march; but gate sight of them, and they of him, euen at the very brink and wath of the Sea: inlomuch as the Hebrewes being terrified with Pharaohs sudden approach, beganne to despaire, and to mutine, at that time when it behoued them most to haue taken courage for their owne defence; laying it to Moses charge, that themselves foresaw those perills in which they were wrapped. And feare, which, saith the booke of WISDOME, is the betraying of those succours which reason offereth, made them both despaire in Gods former promises, and to be forgetfull of their owne strength and multitudes.

§. VIII.

Of their passage ouer the Red Sea: and of the Red Sea it selfe.

BVt Moses who feared nothing but God himselfe, perswaded them to be confident in his goodnesse, who hath neuer abandoned those, that assuredly trust in him; vnto this comfortable and resolute speech: Feare not, for the Egyptians whom yee haue seene this day, yee shall neuer see them againe. The Lord shall fight for you. After which Moses calling on God for succour, received encouragement, and commandement to goe on, in these wordes: Wherefore cryest thou vnto me? speake vnto the children of Israel that they goe forward; and lift thou vp thy rod, and stretch out thy hand vpon the Sea, and divide it, and let the children of Israel goe on drie ground through the middle of the Sea. Moses obeying the voice of God, in the darke of the night finding the sands vncovered, past on towards the other side and coast of Arabia: two parts of the night being spent ere he entred the Foord, which it pleased God by a forcible Easterne winde, and by Moses rod to prepare.

Exod. 14. v. 13.

Exod. 14. v. 16.

Pharaoh followed him euen at the heeles, finding the same drie ground which Moses trod on. Therefore, as it is written: The Angell of God which went before the Host of Israel, remoned, and went behinde them: also the pillar of the cloud went from before them, and stood behinde them; which is, that it pleased God therein either by his immediate power, or by the ministerie of his Angell, to interpose his defence betweene the Hebrewes and their Enemies; to the end that the Egyptians might hereby be blinded, in such sort, as they could not pursue Israel with any harmefull speede. But in the morning watch Moses seized the other banke of Arabia side: and Pharaoh (as the dawne of day beganne to illighten the obscure ayre) finding a beginning of the Seas

Isaia 24. v. 7.

Exod. 14. v. 27.

Seas returne, hasted himselfe towards his owne Coast: But Moses stretched forth his hand, and the Sea returned to his force, that is, the Sea moued by the power of God, ranne backe towards the land with vnresistible furie and swiftnesse, and overwhelmed the whole Armie of Pharaoh, so as not one escaped. For it is written, that God tooke off their Chariot wheels, that is, when the waters began to couer the lands, the Egyptians being stricken with feare of death, ranne one athwart another, and missing the path by which they had past on after the Hebrewes, their wheeles stuck fast in the mudde and quick-sands, and could not be drawne out: the Sea comming against them with supernaturall violence.

Lyranus vpon Exod. 14. and others, following the opinions or old Traditions of the Hebrewes, conceived, that after Moses had by the power of God diuided the Red Sea, and that the children of Israel were fearefull to enter it, Aminadab Prince or Leader of the Tribe of Iuda first made the aduventure, and that therefore was that Tribe euer after honored aboue the rest, according to the prophetic of IACOB, Gen. 49. 8. Thy fathers sonnes shall bow downe vnto thee. But Hierome vpon the 11. of Hossee condemnes this opinion. And though it be true, that Iuda had the first place in all their marches in the Desart, and as we now call it, led the Vanguard; (wherevpon it may be inferred, that he also led the way through the Red Sea), yet that Moses himselfe was the Conductor of Israel at that time, it is generally received. For, as it is written in the 77. P. SALME: Thou didst leade thy people like sheepe by the hand of MOSES and AARON.

The Hebrewes haue also another fancie, that the Red Sea was diuided into twelue parts, and that euery Tribe past ouer in a path apart, because it is written in the 135. Psalme, according to the vulgar: Diuisit mare rubrum in diuisiones; He diuided the Red Sea in diuisions. Also that the bottome of the Sea became as a Greene Field or Pasture. But Origen, Epiphanius, Abulensis, and Genebrard, fauouring this conceit, had forgotten to consider, that there were not twelue Pillers, nor twelue Armies of the Egyptians. It is written in the 77. Psalme, v. 16. Thy way is in the Sea; not thy wayes; and in the last of the booke of Wisdom, vers. 7. In the Red Sea there was a way.

Now this Sea, through which Moses past, and in which Pharaoh, otherwise called Chenchres, perished in the 16. yeere of his reigne, is commonly knowne by the name of the Red Sea, though the same differ nothing at all in naturall colour from other waters. But as Philostratus in his third booke noteth, and our selues know by experience, it is of a bluish colour, as other Seas are. It entreth at a narrow strait betweene Arabia the Happy and Ethiopia, or the land of the Abyssins: the mouth of the indraught from the Cape, which Ptolemie calleth Possodium, to the other Land of Ethiopia, hath not aboue fixe leagues in breadth, and the same also filled everywhere with Ilands, but afterwards it extendeth it selfe 58. Leagues from Coast to Coast, and it runneth vp betweene Arabia the Happy, and Arabia Petraea, on one side, and Ethiopia and Egypt on the other, as farre as Suet, the vtermoist end and indraught of that Sea: where the Turke now keepeth his fleet of Gallies. The Cosmographers commonly giue it the name of the Arabian Gulfe: but the North part towards Troy, and of later times Suet. Plinie calls it Cambisus, by which name it was knowne, such he, before it was called Hero many yeeres. The Arabians call this Sea towards the North Apocopa, Eccant, and Eant. Artemidorus writes it Eleniticum: King Iuba Lenticum, others more properly Elaniticum, of the Port and Citie Elana: which the Septuagint call Elath: Ptolemie, Elana: Plinie, Lena: Iosephus, Ilana, and Marius Niger, Aila: there is also Ilalah in Assyria, to which Salmanassar carryed the Israelites captiue, Kings 2. c. 8. v. 11. which Ilalah in Assyria, the Septuagint call Elana: and in the first of Chron. the 5. Aila. But as for this Red Sea or the parts thereof, thus diuersly named, the Moors and Arabians (Vassals to the Turke) know it by no other appellation, then the Gulfe of Mecca, after the name of Mahomets Towne Mecca. The Greekes write it the Sea Erythraeus, of a King called Erythraus, or Erythraus: and because Erythraus ibros in the Greeke signifieth Red: hence it is, that, being denominated of this Erythraeus, the sonne of Perseus and Andromeda, yet it tooke the name of the Red Sea, as Quintus Curtius coniectureth: which Arianus and Strabo confirme. But it seemeth to me by the view of a discoverie of that Sea in the yeere 1544. performed by Steen Gama, Viceroy of the East India for the King of Portugall, that this Sea was so called from a reflection of rednesse, both from the banks, cliffs, and sands of many Ilands, and part of the Continent bordering it. For I finde by the report of Cassio, a principall Commander vnder Gama (which discourse I gaue Master Richard Haklitt to publish) that there is an Iland called Dalagna, sometime Leques, containyng in length 25 Leagues, and 12. in breadth, the earth, sands, and cliffs, of which Iland, being of a reddish colour, serue for a soile to the waters about it: and make it seeme altogether of the same colour. Secondly, the same Cassio reporteth, that from 24. degrees of Septentrionall Latitude, to 27. (which make in length of Coast 180. mile, lying as it doth Northerly and Southerly) all the cliffs and bankes are of red earth, or stone, which by reflection of the Sunne-beames, giue a kinde of reddith lustre to the waters. Thirdly, those Portugals report, and we know it by many testimonies, that there are found in the bottome of this Sea towards the shore, great abundance of red stones, on which the greatest store of Corrall growes, which is carryed into most parts of Europe, and elsewhere. There are also on the Ilands of this Sea many red Trees, saith Strabo, and those growing vnder water, may also be a cause of such a colour. Of these appearances of rednesse by the shaddowes of these stones, sands, earth, and cliffs, I suppose that it first tooke the name of the Red Sea, because in so many places it seemeth to be such: which Iohannes Barros in his second Decade, eight Booke and first Chapter, confirmeth.

The breadth of this Sea from Elana, or Ezion Gaber adioynyng, now Toro, called by the ancient Cosmographers Sinus Euaniticus, which walcheth the banks of Madian or Midian, is for 16. or 17. Leagues together, along Northward towards Suez, some three Leagues or nine English mile ouer, and from this Port of Toro to Suez, and the end of this Sea it is in length about 28. Leagues, of which the first 26. haue nine miles breadth, as aforesaid, and afterward the lands both from Egypt and Arabia, thrust themselves into the Sea, and straiten it so fast, as for fixe miles together, it is not about three mile ouer; from thence vpwrd the land on Egypt side, falleth away and makes a kinde of Bay or Coue for some ten miles together, after which the land growes vpon the Sea againe, and so bindes it into the very end thereof, at foure miles breadth or thereabout, in which tract it was that Moses past it ouer, though others would haue it to be ouer-against Elana or Toro; but without iudgement: for from Ramases to Pihacheroth and Baalcephon, there is not about 30. miles interjacent, or 35. miles at most, which Moses past ouer in three dayes: and betwene the land of Egypt opposite to Elana or Toro, the distance is about 80. miles. For Ramases, to which Citie Moses came (being the Metropolis of Gosen), when he left Pharao at Zaan, and tooke his last leaue, standeth in 30. degrees five minutes of Septentrionall Latitude: and Migdal, or the Valley of Pihacheroth, at the foot of the Mountayne Climax, or Baalcephon, in nine and twentie and a halfe, which made a difference of five and thirtie English mile, the way lying in effect North and South.

That the passage through the Red Sea was miraculous, and not at a low Ebbe.

He Egyptians, and of them the Memphites, and other Heathen Writers, who in hatred of the Hebrewes haue objected that Moses past ouer the Red Sea at a low ebbe, vpon a great spring-tyde, and that Pharao conducted more by furie then discretion, pursued him so far as, before he could recouer the coast of Egypt, he was ouer-taken by the flood and therein perished, did not well consider the nature of this place with other circumstances. For not to borrow strength from that part of the Scriptures, which makes it plaine, that the Waters were diuided, and that God wrought this miracle by an Easterly winde, and by the hand and rod of Moses (which authoritie to men that beleeeue not therein perfwadeth nothing) I say, that by the same naturall reason vnto which they fasten themselves, it is made manifest, that had there beene no other working power from above, or assistance giuen from God himselfe to Moses, and the children of Israel than ordinarie and casuall, then could not Pharao and all his Armie haue perished in that pursuit.

For wheretoer there is any ebbing of the Sea in any gulf, or indraught, there do the waters fall away from the Land, and runne downeward towards the Ocean, leauing all that part towards the Land as farre as the Sea can ebbe, or fall off, to be drie Land. Now Moses entering the Sea at Migdal vnder Baalzephon (if he had taken the aduantage and opportunitie of the tyde) must haue left all that end of the Red Sea towards Sues, on his left hand drie and vncouered. For if a passage were made by falling away of the water, ten or twelue mile farther into the Sea then Sues, much more was it made at Sues, and betwene it and where Moses past: who entred the same so farre below it, and towards the body of the same Sea. It followeth then, that if all that part of the Sleue or Strait, had beene by the ebbe of a spring-tyde discovered, when Pharao found the flood increasing, he needed not to haue returned so by the same way toward Egypt side, but might haue gone on in his returne before the tyde, on his right hand: and so taken ground againe at the end of that Sea, at Sues it selfe, or elsewhere. But the Scriptures doe truly witness the contrarie, that is, That the Sea did not fall away from the Land, as naturally it doth; but that Moses past on betwene two Seas, and that the waters were diuided. Otherwise, Pharao by any returne of waters could not haue perished, as he did: and therefore the effects of that great Armes destruction, proue the cause to haue beene a power aboue nature, and the miraculous worke of God himselfe. Again, those wordes of the Scriptures, that God caused the Sea to runne backe by a strong East-winde, doe rather proue the miracle, than that thereby was caused an ebbe more then ordinarie: for that Sea doth not lye East and West, but, in effect North and South. And it must haue beene a West and North-west winde, that must haue driuen those waters away through their proper Channels, and to the South-east into the Sea. But the East-winde blew athwart the Sea, and cut it asunder: so as one part fell backe towards the South, and mayne body thereof the other part remayned towards Sues, and the North. Which being vnkowne to Pharao: while he was cheekt by that Sea, which vied in all times before to ebbe away, the flood prest him and ouerwhelmed him. Thirdly, seeing Iosephus auoweth, that Moses was not only of excellent iudgement generally, but also, so great a Captayne, as he ouer-threw the Ethiopiens in many battels, being employed by Pharao, and wan diuers Cities seeming impregnable: it were barbarous to condemne him of this grossefesse, and distraction: that rather then he would haue endured the hardnesse of a Mountaynous passage at hand (had not God commanded him to take that way, and foretold him of the honor which he would there winne vpon Pharao) he would haue trusted to the aduantage of an ebbing water.

For

For he knew not the contrarie, but that Pharao might haue found him, and prest him, as well when it flowed as when it ebbed, as it seemeth he did. For the people, beholding *Pharao*s approach, cryed out against Moses, and despaired altogether of their safetie: and when Moses prayed vnto God for helpe, he was answered by God: Wherefore cryest thou vnto me? speake vnto the children of Israel that they goe forward, and lift thou up thy rod, and stretch out thy hand vpon the Sea, and diuide it: which proues that there was not at the time of Pharao's approach any ebbe at all; but that God did disperse and cut through the weight of waters, by a strong East-winde, whereby the Sands discovered themselves betwene the Sea on the left hand toward Sues, from whence the waters moued not, and the Sea which was towards the South on the right hand, so that the waters were a wall vnto them on the right hand, and on the left hand, that is, the waters so defended them on both sides, as the Egyptians could onely follow them in the same path; not that the waters stood vp right as walls doe, as some of the Schoole-men haue fancied. For had Pharao and the Egyptians perceived any such buildings in the Sea, they would soone haue quitted the chace and pursuit of Israel. Furthermore, there is no man of iudgement, that can thinke, that Pharao and the Egyptians, who then excelled all Nations in the obseruations of heavenly Motions, could be ignorant of the fluxes, and refluxes of the Sea, in his owne Countrey, on his owne Coast, and in his owne most traded and frequented Ports and Hauens, and wherein, his people hauing had so many hundreds of yeeres experience of the tydes, he could not be caught, as he was, through ignorance, nor by any foreknowne or naturall accident, but by Gods powerfull hand only; which then falleth most heauily on all men, when looking through no other spectacle but their owne prosperitie, they least discern it coming, and least feare it. Lastly, if the Armie of the Egyptians had beene ouer-taken by the ordinarie returne of the flood, before they could recouer their owne Coast; their bodies drowned would haue beene carryed with the flood which runneth vp to Sues, and to the end of that Sea, and not haue beene cast ashore on that coast of Arabia where Moses landed, to wit, vpon the Sea-banke ouer against Baalzephon, on Arabia side: where it was that the Israelites saw their dead bodies; and not at the end of the Red Sea, to which place the ordinarie flood would haue carryed them: Which flood doth not any where crosse the Channell, and runne athwart it, as it must haue done from Egypt side to Arabia, to haue cast the Egyptians bodies there; but it keeps the naturall course towards the end of that Sea: and to which their carcasses should haue beene carried, if the worke had not beene supernaturall and miraculous. Apollonius in the liues of the Fathers affirmeth, that those of the Egyptians which staid in the Countrey, and did not follow Pharao in the pursuit of Israel, did euer after honor those Beasts, Birds, Plants, or other Creatures, about which they were busied at the time of *Pharao*s destruction: as he that was then labouring in his Garden, made a God of that Plant or Roote, about which he was occupied: and so of the rest. But how those multitudines of gods were erected among them, a more probable reason shall be giuen elsewhere. Orosius in his first Booke and tenth Chapter against the Pagans, tells vs, that in his time, who liued some 400. yeeres after Christ, the prints of *Pharao*s Chariot wheeles were to be seene at a low water on the Egyptian sands: and though they were sometime defaced by winde and weather, yet soone after they appeared againe. But hereof I leaue euery man to his owne beliefe.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the iourning of the Iſraelites from the Red Sea, to the place where the Law was giuen them: with a discourse of Lawes.

D. I.

A transition, by way of recapitulation of some things touching Chronologie: with a continuance of the storie, untill the Amalekites met with the Iſraelites.

VT to goe on with the storie of Israel, in this sort I collect the times. Moses was borne in the yeere of the World 2434. Saphrus then governing Aſſyria; Orthopolis ſcyonia, or Peloponneſus; Criſus the Argiues; 20 Orus Aegypt; and Deucalion Theſſalie. He fled into Midian when he had liued 40. yeeres, in the yeere of the World 2474. and two yeeres after was Caleb borne. He returned by the commandement and ordinance of God into Aegypt, and wrought his miracles in the fields of Zoan, in the yeere 2514. in the laſt Moneth of that yeere. On the 14. day of the firſt Hebrew moneth Abib, or the 15. of that moneth, beginning the day (as they) at Sunne ſetting, in the yeere of the World 2514. was the celebration of the Paſſeouer: and in the dead of the night of the ſame day were all the firſt-borne ſlaine through 30 Aegypt, or in all thoſe parts where the Hebrewes inhabited. The 15. day of the firſt moneth of the Hebrewes called Abib, being about the beginning of the yeere of the World 2514. Moses with the children of Israel removed from the generall aſſembly at Ramſeſes, and marched to Succoth.

And departing thence they made their third Station at Etham: and iourning from Etham, they incamped in the Valley of Pihacherath, or Midgol, vnder the Mountayne Badzeſephon; and in the ſamenight after mid-night, they paſt the Red Sea: Pharaoh and his Armie perishing in their returne, about the firſt dawne of the day. Moses hauing recovered the bankes of Arabia, gaue thanks vnto God, for the deliuerie of Israel; and making no lay on that coaſt, entred the Deſarts of Arabia Petrea, called 40 Sur. But finding no water in that paſſage, he incamped at Marah, in the Deſart of Etham, which in Exod. 15. v. 22. is alſo called Sur; 25. miles from the Sea: where the children of Israel preſt with extreme thirſt, murmured againſt Moses the ſecond time; firſt at Pharaohs approach in Pihacherath, and now in Arabia. But Moses taking the branches of a tree, growing neere a Lake of bitter water, and caſting the ſame thereinto, made the ſame ſweet: a playne type and figure of our Saviour; who vpon the tree of the Croſſe changed the bitterneſſe of eueralſting death into the ſweetneſſe of eternall life. Plinie remembers theſe bitter Fountaynes in his ſixth Booke and 39. Chapter. From whence to Delta in Aegypt, Seſoſtris firſt, Darius after him, and laſtly Ptolemie the ſecond, began to cut an artificiall Riuer, thereby by Boats and ſmall Shipping to trade and navigate the Red Sea, from the great Cities vpon Nilus. From Marah he removed to Elim, the ſixth Manſion, a march of eight miles: where finding twelue Fountaynes of ſweet water, and three ſcore and ten Palme trees, he reſted diuers dayes.

Whether

Whether this Elim were the name of a Towne or Citie in Moses time, I cannot affirme. And yet the ſcarcitie of waters in that Region was ſuch, as Elim, which had twelue Fountaines, could hardly bee left vnpeopled. William, Arch-Biſhop of Tyre, in his Hiſtorie of the Helie Warre, found at Elim the ruines of a great and ancient Citie. And at ſuch time as Baldwine the firſt paſt that way into Aegypt, Ingreſſus (ſaith he) Elim, Cuiusdam antiquiſſimam populo Iſraelitico aliquando familiarem; ad quam cum perueniſſet, loci illius incolae, Regis aduentu praecognito, nauiculaſque ingredientiſ in mare vicinorum ſe conſulerunt; Entering Elim a very ancient Citie, well knowne ſometime to the people of Israel; whither, when he came, the inhabitants, forewarned of the Kings approach, tooke Boate, and ſuſtained themſelves into the Sea, lying neere them. From Elim hee returned againe towards the South, and ſate downe by the banks of the Red Sea: the ſeuenth Manſion. For it ſeemeth that he had knowledge of Amalech, who prepared to reſiſt his paſſage through that part of Arabia. And Moses who had not as yet trained thoſe of the Hebrewes, appointed to beare armes: nor aſſured the minds of the reſt, who encountering with the leaſt miſerie, were more apt to returne to their quiet ſlauerie, than either to endure the wants and perils which euery where accompanied them in that paſſage, or at this time to vndertake or ſuſtaine ſo dangerous an enemy: he therefore made ſtay at this Manſion, untill the fifteenth of the ſecond Moneth called Zim, or Iar: and made the eighth Manſion in the Deſart of Zim; where the children of Israel mutined againſt Moses the third time, hauing want of foode. In the ſixteenth Chapter of Exodus, Moses omitteth this retreat from Elim to the Red Sea, but in the collection of euery ſeueral incamping, in the 33. of Numbers, it is ſet downe. Here it pleaſed God to ſend ſo many flights of Quailes, as all the Countrie about their incamping was covered with them. The morning following it alſo rained Manna, being the ſixteenth of their Moneth, which ſerued them in ſtead of bread. For now was the ſtore conſumed which the people carried with them out of Aegypt. And though they had great numbers of Cattell, and Sheepe among them, yet it ſeemeth that they durſt not feede themſelves with many of thoſe: but referred them both for the milke to releue the children withall: and for breede to ſtore themſelves when they came to the Land promiſed.

Will. Tyr. l. xxi. cap. 15.

Exod. 16.

From hence towards Raphidim they made two remoues of twentie mile: the one to Daphne, the other to Alus, diſtant from Raphidim ſixe miles. Here being againe preſt with want of water, they murmured the fourth time, and repented them of their departure from Aegypt, where they rather contented themſelves to be fed and beaten after the manner of beaſts, than to ſuffer a caſuall and ſometime neceſſarie want, and to vndergoe the hazards and trauailes which euery manly minde ſeeketh after, for the loue of God and their owne freedomes. But Moses with the ſame rod which hee diuided the Sea withall, in the ſight of the Elders of Israel, brought waters out of the Rocke, wherewith the whole multitude were ſatiſfied.

Of the Amalekites, Madianites, and Kenites, upon occasion of the battell with the Amalekites, and IETHROES coming: who being a Kenite, was Priest of Madian.

Exod. 17.

AND while Moses incamped in this place, the Amalekites who had knowledge of his approach, and ghesled that he meant to leade the children of Israel through their Countrey (which being barren of it selfe, would bee vterly waited by so great a multitude of People and Cattel) thought it most for their aduantage to set vpon them at Raphidim: where the want of water, and all other things needfull for the life of man incleebled them. On the other side Moses perceiuing their resolutions, gaue charge to Iosua, to draw out a sufficient number of the ablest Hebrewes, to encounter Amalech. Betwene whom and Israel, the victorie remained doubtfull, for the most part of the day: the Hebrewes and Amalekites contending with equall hopes and repulses for many houres. And had not the strength of Moses praier to God been of farre greater force, and more preuaient, than all resistance and attempt made by the bodies of men; that valiant and warlike Nation had greatly indangered the whole enterprise. For those bodies which are vnacquainted with scarcitie of food, and those minds whom a seruile education hath dulled, being beaten, & despaird to in their first attempts, will hardly, or neuer be brought again to hazard themselves.

After this victorie Iethro repaired to Moses, bringing with him Moses his wife, and his two Sonnes, which either Iethro forbare to conduct, or Moses to receive, till he had by this ouerthrow of Amalech the better assured himselfe of that part of Arabia. For it is written in the 18. of Exod. v. 1. When IETHRO the Priest of Madian, Moses Father in law, heard all that God had done for Moses, &c. Of which, the last deed, to wit, the ouerthrow of Amalech, gaue Iethro courage and assurance, he then repaired to his sonne in law Moses, at Sinai; where amongst other things, he aduised Moses to appoint Iudges, and other Officers, ouer Israel; being himselfe vnable to giue order in all causes and controuersies, among so many thousands of people, full of discontentment and priuate controuersie.

C. 15. v. 16.

Num. 24. v. 21.

SOM. 1. c. 15. GEN. 35.

This Iethro, although he dwelt amongst the Midianites, yet he was by Nation a Kenite, as in the fourth of Iudges v. 11. & 17. it is made manifest; where it is written; Now HEBER the Kenite, which was of the children of HOBAB, to wit, the sonne of IETHRO, the father in law of MOSES, was departed from the Kenites, and pitched his Tents vntill the Plaine of Zaanaim, which is by Kedesh. Likewise in the first of Samuel, Saul commanded the Kenites to depart from among the Amalekites, lest hee should destroy the with the Amalekites. For the Kenites inhabited the mountaines of Sin Kedesh; and the Amalekites dwelt in the Plaines, according to the saying of Balaam, speaking of the Kenites; Strong is thy dwelling place, and thou hast put thy nest in the Rocks. And that Saul spared this Nation, he giueth for cause, that they shewed mercie to all the children of Israel, when they came vp from Egypt. For these Kenites were a Nation of the Madianites, and the Madianites were of the issues of Madian, one of the fixe sonnes which Abraham begat on Kethura: and might also take that name of Kenites from Kethura, of whom they descended by the Mother, who as it seemeth kept the knowledge of the true God among them, which they received from their parent Abraham. For Moses, when he fled out of Egypt into Midian, and married the daughter of Iethro, would not (had he found them Idolaters) haue made Iethros Daughter the Mother of his children. And although the Kenites are named amongst those Nations, which God promised, that the seede of Abraham should roote out, and inherite their lands; yet it cannot bee meant by these; who are descended from Abraham himselfe: but by some other Nation, bearing the same name; and in all likelihood of the race of Chus. For in the fifteenth of Genes. vers. nineteenth these Kenites or Chusites are listed with the

the Hittites and Perizzites, with the Amorites, Canaanites, Gergesites, and Iebusites, which were indeede afterwards rooted out. But these Kenites, descended from Abraham, had separated themselves from among the rest, which were altogether idolatrous. For, as is before remembred, Iether the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, was departed from the Kenites, that is to say, from those Kenites of Canaan, and inhabited in Zaanaim, which is by Kedesh or Kadesh. Again, Moses nameth that Nation of the Kenites, before Madian, or any of Abrahams other sonnes were borne: which he did (referring my selfe to better iudgement) rather, because they were more ancient, than by anticipation.

And as of the Kenites, so we may consider of the Madianites, parted by Moses into sixe Tribes. For some of them were corrupted, and Heathens; as those of Madian by the River Zared, afterwards destroyed by Moses. But the Madianites neere the banks of the Red Sea, where Moses married his wife Zippora, and with whom he left her and his children, till after the ouerthrow of Amalech, seeme likewise not to haue beene corrupted. For these Madianites with the Kenites assisted Israel, and guided them in the Desarts. But the Madianites in Moab, and to the North of the Metropolis of Arabia, called Petra, were by Israel rooted out, when those adioyning to the Red Sea were not touched.

And though it may be doubted, whether those of Madian, of whom Iethro was Priest, and the other Cities in Moab were the same, yet the contrarie is more probable. For Moses would not haue sent 12000. Israelites, as farre backe as the Red Sea, from the Plaines of Moab, to haue destroyed that Madian, where his wintes kindred inhabited: seeing himselfe coming with 60000. able men, was encountered by Amalech, in that passage. Neither could Moses forget the length of the way through those discomfortable Desarts, wherein himselfe and Israel had wandered 40. yeare.

That Iethro, or Iothor, Raguel, or Reuel, and Hobab, were but one person, the Scriptures teach vs. For the Vulgar and Septuagint, which call him Raguel; and our English Reuel; Exod. 2. 18. calls him Iethro, or Iothor. Exod. 3. & v. 1. c. 4. v. 18. & c. 18. 1. & 6. 9. 10. & 12. and in Numbers c. 10. v. 29. Hobab. Others take Iethro and Hobab to be the same, but not Raguel.

§. III.

Of the time when the Law was giuen: with diuers commendations of the inuention of Lawes.

THE rest of the moneths of this yeare 2515. were spent in the Desart of Sinai, neere the mountaine of Sinai or Horeb, the twelfth Mansion. Eusebius thought that Sinai or Horeb were distinct mountaines: Hierome, to be but one, of a double name. And so it appeareth by many Scriptures. For in Exod. 3. v. 1. it is called Horeb: and in Exod. 24. v. 16. it is written Sinai. In the 100. Psalm v. 19. Horeb: in Exod. 19. 11. Sinai. And so it is called, Galatians 4. 24. and againe, Dent. 4. 10. & 15. & Dent. 5. 2. Horeb. And so it is the first of Kings 8. 6. and the 2. of Chron. 5. 10. and in Malachie 4. 4. Finally, in Ecclesiasticus the 48. 7. they are named as one. Which hearest (saith Ecclesiasticus) the rebuke of the Lord in Sinai, and in Horeb the iudgement of the vengeance. Somewhat they are disioyned at the top by the report of Peter Belonius: who in the yeare 1588. past out of Egypt into Arabia, with Monsieur de Fumet of France, and trauailed to the top both of Sinai and Horeb: Sinai being by farre the higher hill. From the side of Horeb (saith he) there falleth a very faire spring of water into the Valley adioyning: where he found two Monasteries of Christian Maronites, containing some 100. Religious persons of diuers Nations, who had pleasant gardens, delicate

Per. Bel. lib. a.

fruits, and excellent wine. These (saith the same Author) giue entertainment to all strangers, which passe that way.

Now, that there was some such Torrent of water neere Sinai in Moses time, it is very probable: First, because he incamped thereabout almost a yeare, and drew no water, as in other places, by miracle: secondly, because it is written Exod. 32. 20. that when Moses had broken the golden Calfe to powder, which Aaron set vp in his absence, he cast the powder thereof into the water, and made the children of Israel to drinke thereof.

On this mountain, the Law by the Angell of God was giuen to Moses, where he staid a whole yeare, wanting some ten or twelue daies: for he remoued not till the 20. day of the second month of the second yeare; and he arrived about the 45. day after the egression: the Law being giuen the 50. day.

At this Mansion all was done, which is written from the beginning of the 29. Chapter of Exodus, to the end of that booke; all in Leuiticus; and all in Numbers, to the 10. Chapter. Whereof (because there is no storie nor other passage) I will omit the repetition, and in place thereof speake somewhat of the Law, and the kinds and vse thereof: whereby, if the Reader finde the storie any way disioyned, he may turne ouer a few leaues, and, omitting this, finde the continuation thereof. We must first consider, that as there can be neither foundation, building, nor continuance of any Common-wealth, without the rule, keuell, and square of Lawes: so it pleased God to giue thereby vnto Moses the powerfulllest meane (his miraculose grace excepted) to gouerne that multitude which he conducted; to make them victorious in their passage, and to establish them assuredly in their conquest. For as the North starre is the most fixed directour of the Sea-man to his desired Port: so is the Law of God the guide & conductor of all in general, to the haue of eternall life: the Law of nature, from God his eternall law deduced, the rule of all his Creatures: the Law humane, depending on both these, the guard of Kings, Magistrates, and vertuous men; yea, the very spirit, and the very finewes of euery estate in the world, by which they liue and moue: the Law, to wit, a iust law, being resembled to an Heart without affection, to an Eie without lust, and to a Mind 30 without passion; a Treasurer, which keepeth for euery man what he hath, and distributeth to euery man what he ought to haue.

This benefit the Ancient, though barbarous, esteemed so highly, that among them, those which were taken for the first makers of Lawes, were honoured as Gods, or as the sonnes of Gods: and the rest, that made either additions or corrections, were commended to all posteritie for men of no lesse vertue, and no lesse liberally beneficial to their Countries, than the greatest & most prosperous Conquerours that euer gouerned them. The Israelites, the Lacedaemonians, and the Athenians, receiued their Lawes from one: as the Israelites from Moses; the Lacedaemonians from Lycargus; the Athenians from Solon; the Romanes sometime from 40 their first Kings, from their Decemviri, from their Senatours, from their Lawyers, and from the people themselves: others from the Prince, Nobilitie, and People; as in England, France, and in other Christian Monarchies and Estates.

§. IIII.

Of the name and meaning of the words, Law, and Right.

The word Lex, or Law, is not alwaies taken alike, but is diuersly, and so in an indifferent sense vsed. For if we consider it at large, it may be vnderstood for any rule prescribing a necessarie meane, order, and methode, for the attaining of an end. And so the rules of Grammar, or other Arts, are called Lawes. Or it is taken for any private ordinance

nance of Superiours to Inferiours: for the commandements of Tyrants, which they cause to be observed by force, for their decrees doe also vsurpe that title, according to the generall acceptation of the word Law: of which Esay, Wee vnto them that decree wicked decrees, and write grieuous things. Likewise, the word is vsed for the tumultuarie resolutions of the people. For such constitutions doth Aristotle also call lawes, though euill and vsufficient. Mala lex est, quæ tumultuarie posita est; It is an ill law that is made tumultuously. So as all ordinances, good or euill, are called by the name of lawes.

The word Law is also taken for the morall habit of our minde, which doth (as 10 it were) command our thoughts, words, and actions: framing and fashioning them according to it selfe, as to their patterne and platforme. And thus the law of the flesh which the Diuines call legem sensitiuam, is to be vnderstood. For euery law is a kind of patterne of that which is done according vnto it: in which sense as * elsewhere, this morall habit or disposition of the heart is called the frame or signment of the heart: so in St. Paul to the Romanes it is called a Law. But I see another law in my members, rebelling against the law of my minde, and leading me captive vnto the law of sinne. Again, the nature and inclinations of all creatures are sometime called * lawes, so farre as they agree with the reason of the law eternall; as the law of a Lyon, to be fierce or valiant.

Also private contracts among Merchants and other Tradersmen, doe often put 20 to the name of lawes. But law commonly and properly is taken, for a right rule, prescribing a necessarie meane, for the good of a Common-wealth, or Ciuill community. The rest, to wit, the commandements of Tyrants, &c, which haue not the common good for their end, but being leges inique, are by Thomas called violenta magis quam leges; rather compulsions then lawes: And whatsoever is not iust, St. Auguſtine doth not allow for lawes, howsoeuer established: for he calls them iniqua hominum constituta, quæ nec iura dicenda, nec putanda sunt. The vniuersall constitutions of men which are neither to be termed nor thought lawes. For saith ARISTOTLE, Legalia iusta sunt factiua, & conseruatiua felicitatis; Iust lawes are the workers and preseruers of happinesse: because by them we are directed ad vitam quietam, to a quiet 30 life, according to Cicero. Yea, to life euerglasting, according to the Scriptures. For the end of the law, saith Plato, is God and his worship. Finis legis Deus & cultus eius. Lex, or the Law is so called by the Latines à legendo, or à ligando, of reading or binding: Leges quia læta & ad populum lita, saith Farro; For after Lawes were written and published, all men might read them, and behold in them whereto they were bound. The other Etymologie, à ligando, is no lesse agreeable with the nature of a Law: whence in the Scripture it is called also a yoke, and a band: as confringerunt iugum, diruperunt vincula: they haue broken the yoke, they haue broken the bands. And in the second Psalme, Dirumpamus vincula eorum, & projiciamus à nobis funes 40 ipsorum; Let vs breake their bands in iunder, and cast away their cords from vs.

The Covenant it is called, because of the conditional promises of God: and because of Gods peoples voluntarie submission of themselves vnto it: for which word the Septuagint, and the Epistle to the Hebrewes, vse the word Antitheta Testament or last will: which name it hath, because it is not otherwise effectuell for our saluation, but in respect of the death of the Testator, for without the death of the Testator, the Testament is of no force: as Hebr. 9. 17. it is said, Testamentum in mortuis ratum est.

The Hebrewes call the law Thorah of teaching, because euery man is thereby taught his dutie, both to God and Men. The Greekes call it Nemosis of distributing, 50 because it distributeth to euery man his owne due; the power of the law is the power of God: Iustice being an attribute proper vnto God himselfe. Imperium legi imperium Dei est; The raigne of the law, is the raigne of God.

Law in general is thus defined by the Philosophers: Lex est vitæ regula, præcipiens quæ sunt sequenda, & quæ fugienda; Law is the rule of life, commanding what to follow, and what to shunne, or Lex est omnium diuinum & humanum rerum Regina; Law is the Queene or Princesse of things both humane and diuine. But this description is grounded vpon the opinion of ineuitable fate. Law is the very wisdom of Nature: the reason and vnderstanding of the prudent: and the rule of right and wrong. For as a right line is called index sui & curui, the demonstration of it selfe, and of the crooked: so is the law, the Iudge and measure of right and wrong.

Mr. Hooker calls the Law a directiue rule to goodnesse of operation; and though law as touching the substance and essence, consist in vnderstanding: Concludit tamen actum voluntatis; Yet it comprehends the act of our will. The word Ius is also diuerly taken, as sometime for the matter of the law and for common right: sometime for the law it selfe: as Ius Civile, or Ius gentium. Isidore distinguisheth the two generall words Ius and Lex: whereof Ius, saith he, hath reference to men, Lex to God. Lex est diuina, Ius est humana. To goe ouer another mans field, is permitted, by Gods law, not by mans; and therefore in a thing out of controuersie, Virgii vied both those words: as Lex & iura sinunt, God and men permit.

The word Ius or Right, is deriued or taken from the old substantiue Nowme iustus, a bidding or commandement: or perhaps from the Greeke ἰός, which is the name of Iupiter, or of the Latine genitiue case Iouis, because as the Scripture speaks, the iudgement is Gods. For as it is certaine that Ius-iniurandum came of Iouis-iniurandum, (for so we finde it written in Nomius out of the ancient, in which sense the Scripture calls it inamentum Iehoua) so also we may say, that Ius came of Iouis, quia Iouis est: because as God is the Author, and Patterne, and Maintainer of right, so also in his Vicergerents the Magistrates, he is the pronouncer and exequutor of right. Of this Ius the iust are denominated, in Ius à iure, and iustitia à iusto; The right giues name to the righteous: and in iustice takes her name from the iust.

§. V.

Of the definition of Lawes, and of the law eternal.

But because lawes are manifold, and that every kinde hath a proper and peculiar definition, it agreeth with order, first to diuide and distinguish them. I meane those sorts of lawes, from whence all other particulars are drawne: leaving the individuals of humane lawes to their infinite and horrible confusion.

The

The law eternal is thus defined by THOMAS. Lex aeterna est aeternum diuina sapientiae conceptus, secundum quod ordinatur ad gubernationem rerum ab ipso praecognitarum; The eternal law is the eternal concept of Gods wisdom, as it is referred to the gouernment of things foreknowne by himselfe. Or Lex aeterna est summa atque aeterna ratio diuinae sapientiae: quatenus res omnes ad destinatos fines ita dirigat, ut his iuxta conditionem ipsorum modum aliquem necessitatis adferat; It is the high and eternal reason of diuine sapience: as it directeth all things in such sort to their proper ends, imposing a kinde of necessitie according to their severall natures, or conditions. Now the difference lieth in this: That as the same diuine vnderstanding directeth all these to their proper ends; so it is called prouidence; but as it imposeth a necessitie according to the natures of all things which it directeth, so it is called a law.

Of this eternall law Cicero tooke knowledge, when in his booke of Lawes, hee wrote in this manner. Erat ratio per se ipsa, per naturam, & ad recte faciendum impellens & à delicto auocans: quae non tum incipit lex esse cum scripta est: sed tum cum orta est. Orta autem simul est cum mente diuina: quamobrem lex vera atque princeps, apta ad iubendum & ad seruandum ratio est rectae iustitiae; That perfect reason and nature of things incouraging or impelling to rightfull actions, and calling vs backe from euill, did not (saith he) then begin to be a law when it was written: but when it had being. Being and beginning it had together with diuine vnderstanding, and therefore a true law and a fit Princeps to command and forbid, is the right reason of the most high God. This eternall law, (if we consider it in God, or as God,) is alwaies one and the same; the nature of God being most simple: but as it is referred to diuers objects, so the reason of man finds it diuers and manifold. It also seemeth one law in respect of things necessarye as the motions of the heauens; stabilitie of the earth, &c. but it appeareth otherwise to things contingent: another law to men: another to other creatures, having life, and to all those that be inanimate.

By this eternall law all things are directed, as by the counsaile and prouidence of God: from this law all lawes are deriued, as from the rule vniuersall: and therefore referred, as the operation of the second to the first.

The eternall, and the diuine Law, differ only in consideration; the eternall directing more largely, as well euery creature, to their proper and naturall ends, as it doth man to his supernaturall: but the diuine law to a supernaturall end only: the Naturall law is thence deriued, but an effect of the eternall, as it were a streame from this fountaine.

The Law humane or temporall is also thence drawne: in that it hath the forme of right reason: from which if it differ, it is then impositio iniqua, a wicked imposition: and only borroweth the name of a law.

To this eternall law all things are subiected, as well Angels and Men, as all other creatures, or things created; whether necessarye or contingent, naturall, or morall, and humane. For the law eternall runneth through all the vniuersall, and therefore it is the law also of things which are simple, naturall, and inanimate.

Hence it is, that all things created are commanded to praise God their Creator and Director: as Praise ye him all ye his Angels: praise ye him Sunne and Moone, all bright Starrs: beuens of beuens, for he hath established them for ever and euer. He hath made an ordinance which shall not passe: Praise ye the Lord from the earth ye Dragons and all depths: Fire and boile, snow and vapours, stormie winds, which execute his Word: mountains, and hills: fruitfull trees and all Cedars: Beasts, and all Cattel, &c. Now as the reasonable Creatures are by this eternall law bound, by the glorie and felicitie propofed vnto them (beatitude being both the attractive, and the end) so all other naturall things and creatures, haue in them felices, and in their owne natures, an obedience formall to it, without any proper intention, knowne cause, or end propofed. For beasts are led by sense, and naturall instinct: things without life by their created forme, or formall appetites, as that which is heauie to fall downward: things light to mount vpward, &c. and fire to hence whatsoeuer is appofed. This kinde kinde of working the Aristotelians ascribe to common nature: others to fate; a difference vsed in termes only; it being no other then Gods generall providence: for as it is truly said of God, that he is omnia super omnia: so are all things which appear in themselves thence deriued: there vnder subiected: thence from by his eternall law and providence directed, euen from the greatest to the least of his creatures, in heauen and in earth.

The Schoolemen are very curious and ample in the consideration of these lawes: and in discourse of the profit, and of the matter, and object of the eternall law. But as the profit is manifest in the good of all creatures, who haue thence from, either reason, sense, vegetation, or appetite, to conduct them: so is the object and matter of the law, the whole creature. For according to Saint Augustine, Lex aeterna est, quia inuitum est ut omnia sint ordinatissima; The law eternall is that, whereby it is infit, that all things should be disposed in the best and goodliest order.

Lastly, it is disputed, whether the eternall law be immutable, yea or no? But the resolution is, that it chargeth not; for which St. Augustine vseth a sufficient argument in his first Booke of Free-will the sixth Chapter. For the law of Moses which had a time prefixed, was eternally by God ordained to last vntill the time of the Pedagogia of Gods people, or introduction to Christ should be expired; which time of expiration some thinke our Saviour noted to be come, when on the Crosse he said, Consummatum est. But I rather thinke these words of our Saviour to haue no other signification, then that now the prophetic of their giuing him Vinegar to drinke was fulfilled. For so St. John expounds it, when he saith v. 28. That Christ seeing all (other) things to be fulfilled, vt consummaretur Scriptura, That the Scripture in this also might be fulfilled, said, I thirst: though I denie not, but at the same time also the date of the Law was expired, to wit, of the law ceremoniall, and of so much of the iudicial, as appertained peculiarly to the Jewes, and agreeth not with the law of the new Testament and Gospell of Christ. For the immutable law of God, though prescribing things mutable, is not therefore changed in it selfe; but the things prescribed change according to this eternall ordinance, of which the Wisedome of Solomon, And being one she can doe all things, and remaining in her selfe reneweth all.

Of the Law of Nature.

¶ De iustitia
& iure. l. i. tit.*

F the law of Nature as it is taken in generall, I finde no definition among the Schoolemen: only as it is considered in man, it is called the impression of diuine light, and a participation of the eternall law in the reasonable creature. Lex naturalis est impressio diuini luminis in nobis, & participatio legis aeternae in rationali creatura. VLEBIAN defines the natural law to be the same which nature hath taught all liuing creatures; Lex naturalis est quod Natura omnia animalia docuit: and he afterward addeth, Lex ista non humani generis proprium, sed omnium animalium quae terra maris, nascuntur, animam quoque communem est; The law of nature is not proper to man alone, but the same is common to all liuing creatures, as well to birds, as to those which the Land and Sea produceth. But this definition is not generall, but of the naturall law in things of life.

The law of nature in generall, I take to be that disposition, instinct, and formall qualitie, which God in his eternall providence hath giuen & imprinted in the nature of euery creature, animate, and inanimate. And as it is diuinum lumen in men, enlightning our formal reason; so is it more then sense in beasts; and more then vegetation in plants. For it is not sense alone in beasts, which teacheth them at first sight, & without experience or instruction, to flie from the enemies of their liues: seeing that Bulls & Horses appear vnto the sense more fearefull and terrible, then the least kinde of Dogs; and yet the Hare and Deere feedeth by the one, and flieh from from the other, yea though by them neuer scene before, and that as soone as they fall from their Dammes. Neither is it sense which hath taught other Beasts to provide for Winter, Birds to build their nests, high or low, according to the tempestuous or quiet seasons: or the Birds of India to make their nests on the smallest twigs which hang ouer Rivers, & not on any other part of the tree, or elsewhere: to saue their eggs and yong ones from the Monkeys, and other beasts, whose weight such a twig will not beare: and which would feare to fall into the water. The instances in this kinde are exceeding many which may bee giuen. Neither is it out of the vegetable or growing nature of plants, that some trees, as the female of the Palm-tree, will not beare any fruit except the male grow in sight. But this they doe by that law, which the infinite and vnsearchable wisedome of God had in all eternitie provided for them, and for euery nature created. In man this law is double, corrupt, and incorrupt; corrupt, where the reason of man hath made it selfe subiect, and a Vassal to passions, and affections brutall: and incorrupt, where time and custom hath bred in men a new nature, which also, as is aforesaid, is a kinde of Law. For it was not by the law of Nature incorrupt, which St. Augustine calleth the law of reason, but by a nature blinded and corrupted, that the Germans did anciently allow of theft: and that other Nations were by law constrained to become Idolaters; that by the lawes of Lycorgus it was permitted to men to vse one anothers wife, and to the woman to chooſe them others besides their husbands, to beget their with child: which law in those parts hath lasted long, and is not forgotten to this day.

The Seythians, and the people of both Indies, hold it lawfull to burie with them the best beloued wiues: as also they haue many other customes remembered by G. Valentia, against nature and right reason.

And I know not from what authoritie it is that these lawes some men auow to be naturall: except it be of this corrupt nature, as (among others) to pay guilt with guile: to become faithlesse among the faithlesse: to provide for our selues by another mans destruction: that iniurie is not done to him that is willing: to destroy those whom we feare, and the like. For taking the definition of naturall lawes, either out of St. Augustine or Aquinas, (the one calling it the impression of diuine light, the other, the dictate or sentence of practique reason;) the same can reach vs, or incline vs to no other thing, then to the exercise of Iustice & vprightnesse: and not to offer or performe any thing toward others, saue that which we would be content should be offered or performed toward our selues. For such is the law of nature to the mind, as the cie is to the bodie; and that which according to David sheweth vs good, that is, the obseruation of those things which lead vs thereby to our last end; which is eternall life: though of themselves not sufficient without faith and grace.

Now, that which is truly and properly the law of Nature, where the corruption is not taken for the law, is, as aforesaid, the impression of Gods diuine light in men, and a participation of the law increased and eternall. For without any law written the right reason and vnderstanding, which God hath giuen vs, are abilities within our selues, sufficient to giue vs knowledge of the good and euill, which by our gratitude to God, and distribution of right to men, or by the contrarie, wee prepare and purchase for our selues. For when the Gentiles (saith S. PAVL) which haue not the Law, doe by nature those things contained in the law: they hauiug not the law, are a law vnto themselves. Now, to loue God by whom we are, and to doe the same right to all men, which we desire should be done vnto vs, is an effect of the purest reason: in whose highest Turrets, the quiet of conscience hath made her resting place, and habitation. In aree altissima rationis quiet habitat; Therefore, the Gentiles (saith S. PAVL) which shew the effects of the law written in their hearts, haue their consciences for a witness of these effects: and the reprobate their thoughts to accuse them.

And it is most true, that who soeuer is not a law vnto him selfe (while he hopeth to abuse the world by the aduantage of hypocrisie) worketh nothing else, but the betraying betraying of his owne soule; by craftie vnrighteousnesse, purchasing eternall perdition. For it helpeth vs not to hide our corrupt hearts from the worlds eie, seeing from him, who is an infinite eie, we cannot hide them: some Garlands wee may gather in this May-game of the world, Sed flos ille, dum loquimur, arefcit; These flowers wither while we discourse of their colours, or are in gathering them. That wee should therefore inhabit and dwell within our selues, and become fearefull wretchednes of our secret euils, did that reuerend Philosopher Pythagoras teach in this golden precept: Ni turpe committas, neque coram alijs, neque tecum, maxime omnium verere teipsum; Commit nothing foule or dishonest, faith he, neither to be knowne to others, nor to thine owne heart: but aboue all men reuerence thine owne conscience. And this may be a precept of nature and right reason: by which law, men, and all creatures, and bodies, are inclined to those operations, which are answerable to their owne forme; as fire to giue heate. Now, as the reasonable minde is the forme of man, so is he aptly moued to those things which his proper forme presenteth vnto him: to wit, to that which right reason offereth; and the acts of right reason, are the acts of vertue: and in the breach of the rules of this reason, is man least excusable: as being a reasonable creature. For all else, both sensitiue, growing, and inanimate, obey the law which God imposed on them at their first creation.

Gen. 1.

Job. c. 38.

The Earth performeth her office, according to the Law of God in nature: for it bringeth forth the bud of the hearbe which seedeth seede, &c. and the Beast, which liueth thereon. He gaue a Law to the Seas, and commanded them to keepe their bounds: which they obey. He made a decree for the raine, and a way for the lightning of the thunders. He caused the Sunne to moue, and to giue light, and to serue for signes and for seasons. Were these as rebellious as man, for whose sake they were created, or did they once breake the law of their nature and formes, the whole world would then perish, and all returne to the first Chaos, darkenesse, and confusion.

By this naturall Law, or Law of humane reason, did Caine perceiue his owne wickednesse, and offence, in the murder of Abel: for he not onely feared the displeasure of God, but the reuenge of Men: it being written in his reason, that 30 whatsoeuer he performed towards others, the same by others might bee done vnto him againe. And that this iudgement of well and euill doing, was put into our natures by God, and his eternall law, before the law written: Ad os in the person of God witnesseth Gen. the fourth: If thou doe well, shalt thou not be accepted? and if thou doe not well, sinne lieth at thy dore.

The Schoolemen are large also in this question of the naturall Law: the same being opened amply by Reinerius, Antoninus, and Valentia. But it is not my purpose to write a volume of this subiect.

Tho. 4. 9. 4. 11. 2.

But this law which Thomas Aquinas calleth an act of reason taken properly, and not a habite, as it is an euident naturall iudgement of practique reason: they diuide into indemonstrable, or needing no demonstration (as that good is to be followed, and euill eschewed) and demonstrable, which is euidently proued, out of higher and more vniuersall propositions. Again, as it answereth the naturall appetite, prescribing things to be desired as good, or to be auoided as euill (as of the first, to desire to liue, and to satisfie hunger, &c. and of the second, to eschew paines, sorrow, and death) in this consideration they diuide it, according to the diuers kinds of appetites that are in vs. For in euery man there are 3. sorts of appetites, which answer the three degrees of naturall Law. The first is, to be that which we are; in which is comprehended the desire, both to liue, and to preserve our being & life, also the desire of issue, with care to provide for them: for the Father after his death liues in his children; and therefore the desire of life comprehends the desire of children. And to these appetites are referred the first indemonstrable lawes of nature, for the most part. For it needs no prooue, that all creatures should desire to be, to liue, and to be defended, and to liue in their issue, when they cannot in themselves. And as

man is a being, Ens or Res: so hee doth desire good, and shunne euill. For it is common to all things, to desire things agreeable to their owne natures, which is, to desire their owne good. And so is Good defined by Aristotle, to be that which all desire. Which definition Basil vpon the 44. Isaie approueth: Rectè quidem Bonum definiunt, Quod omnia expetunt; Rightly haue some men defined Good, or Goodnesse, to be that which all things desire. Ethic. 1. c. 2.

The second kinde of appetite is of those things which appertaine to vs, as wee haue sense. Whence, by the law of Nature, wee desire the delights of euery sense; but with such moderation, as may neither glut vs with satietie, nor hurt vs with excess. For as Sense it selfe is for the preservation of life and being: so is it meete, even by the law of nature, that the sensitive appetite should not carrie vs to the destruction, either of our life or being. And although (seeing both these kinds of appetites are in beasts) we may well say, that Nature hath giuen diuers lawes vnto them: In which sense the Ciuitians define Naturall right, or Ius naturale, to be the same which Nature hath taught all liuing creatures; Yet the Schoolemen admit not, that the instincts of beasts can be properly called a Law, but only a Law, or Right, which is the matter, & aime of euery Law. For so they distinguish it; where Vipian affirmeth, that Ius naturale is that, which Nature hath taught all liuing creatures. In this place (saith Valentia) Ius is not to be taken for a Law, but for the 20 matter of the Law. And yet where Vipian also distinguisheth the right belonging to liuing creatures in general, from the right belonging to men; calling the one Ius nature, the other Ius gentium: the Diuines vnderstand the law of nature more largely, that is, for all euident dictates, precepts, or biddings of diuine reason: both in beasts and men; and restraints the law of Nations to a kinde of humane right.

The third appetite is of those things which appertaine properly to man, as he is a liuing creature reasonable: as well with relation to God, and to our Neighbour, as for our selues: and the lawes of this appetite are the Commandements of our religion.

Now although there are many other branches and diuisions of this law of nature answering the diuision of matter, which it prescribeth, and as manifold, as the morall actions are which it commandeth or forbiddeth: yet is the law of nature but one law, according to Aquinas: first, because it hath one fountaine or roote in the naturall or motiue facultie, which is but one, stirring vp to good, and declining the contrarie: secondly, because all is contained in that generally naturall precept, That good is to be followed, and ill auoided: and thirdly, because all the parts are reduced to one and the same last end.

That this law of nature bindeth all creatures, it is manifest: and chiefly man; because he is indued with reason; in whom as reason groweth, so this band of obseruing the law of nature increaseth, Postquam ratio ad perfectum venit, tunc fit Basil.

40 quod scriptum est, Adueniente mandato, peccatum remisit; When reason grew to perfection, then it came to passe, which was written by S. PAVL. When the Commandement came, sinne remitted. Neither is it a small warrant for this law of nature, when those which breake the same, are said by S. PAVL, To be deliuered ouer into a reprobate sense (or minde) to doe those things which are not comendment: and againe, that their consciences beare witness, and their thoughts accuse them. For, though this law of nature stretch not to euery particular: as to command fasting and the like: yet, it commandeth in general all good, and whatsoeuer is agreeable to right reason. And therefore, said DAMASCENE; homines facti sunt mali, declinando in id quod contra naturam est; Men (saith he) are made euill, by declining vnto that which is contrarie to nature: and 50 S. AUGUSTINE, Omne vitium natura nocet, ac per hoc contra naturam est; Euery vice doth wrong to nature, and is therefore contrarie vnto it. Rom. 2. 28. Rom. 2. 15. L. 2. Fid. 18. 6. 30.

Neither yet are the rules of this law of nature so streight, but that they suffer exceptions in some particulars. For whereas by this law all men are borne Lords of the earth, yet it well alloweth inequality of portions, according to vnequal merit: by by taking from the euill, and giuing to the good; and by permitting and commanding that all men shall enioy the fruits of their labours to themselves: according to the rules of iustice and equitie.

And though the law of nature command, that all things bee restored which are left in trust, yet in some causes this her law the suffereth to be broken: as to denie a mad man his weapons, and the like, which he left in keeping while hee was sober. But the vniuersall principles can no more be changed, than the decrees of God are alterable: who according to St. PAVL, abideth faithfull, and cannot denie himselfe.

1 Tim. 2.

Of the written Law of God.

AFTER the eternal, and naturall, the law Positiue or imposed is the next in order, which law, being nothing but an addition, or rather explanation of the former, hath two kinds: Diuine, and Humane. Again, the diuine positiue law is double; the old and new: The old was giuen vnto Moses in Mount Sinai or Horeb, at such time as the world had flood 2513 whole yeeres: and in the 67. day of this yeere when as Asfates or Afades gouerned the Assyrians, Marathus the Syconians, Triopu the Argiues, &c. 10 crops Attica, and Acherres Egypt: to wit, after the promise to Araham 430. yeeres. And this, it seemes, was the first written law which the world receiued. For the very word Nomos, signifying a law, was not then, nor long after inuented by the Gracians: no not in Homer's time: who liued after the fall of Troy 80. yeeres at least: and Troy it selfe was cast downe 335. yeeres, after Moses led Israel out of Egypt. This law, it pleased God to ingraue in stone, that it might remaine a lasting booke of his expreſt will in the Church; and that the Priests and people might haue, whereof to meditate, till the coming of Christ: and that so these children of Israel, though bred among an Idolatrous people in Egypt, might be without excuse: the slight defences of ignorance being taken from them.

The reason knowne to vs why this law was not written before, is, that when the people were few, and their liues long, the Elders of families might easily without any written law instruct their owne children: and yet as they increased, so doubtlesse they had, besides the law of Nature, many precepts from God, before the law written. But now at length, forasmuch as the law of nature did not define all kinds of good, and euil; nor condemne euery sinne in particular: nor sufficiently terrifie the consciences of offenders: nor so expound diuine worship, as for those after-ages was required, who gaue euery day lesse authoritie than other to the naturall law; in these respects it was necessarie, that the law should be written, and set before the eyes of all men: which before, they might, but would not read; in 40 their owne consciences. The Schoolemen, and the Fathers before them, enlarge the causes and necessitie, why the law was written, whereof these are the chiefeſt.

The first, for restraining of sinne, directly grounded vpon this place of DAVID, The law of the Lord is vndefiled, conuerting soules: The testimonies of the Lord are faithfull, giuing wisdom to children. For the humane law, saith St. Augustine, meeteth not with all offences, either by way of prohibition or punishment; seeing thereby it might take away something seeming necessarie, and hinder common profit: but the diuine law written, forbiddeth euery euill, and therefore by David it is called vndefiled.

Secondly, it serueth for the direction of our minds. For the lawes of men can only take knowledge of outward actions, but not of internal motions, or of our disposition and wil: and yet it is required, that we be no lesse cleane in the one, than in the other. And therefore were the words conuerting our soules, added by David: wherein are all our outward acts first generated, according to the Cabalists. Actiōes hominum

hominum nulla essent, nisi prius in mente dicerentur: The actions of men (say they) would be none at all, were they not first conceived in the minde.

Thirdly, it leadeth vs to the knowledge of truth, which by reason of diuersitie of opinion, and difference of peculiar lawes among sundrie Nations, we cannot bee assured of; but the law of God bindeth all men, and is without error: and therefore also said DAVID, That the testimony of the law of God is faithfull: giuing wisdom to children.

p. VIII.

Of the vnwritten law of God, giuen to the Patriarks by Tradition.

NOW, that in all this long tract of time, betwene the creation and the written law, the world and people of God were left altogether to the law of reason and nature, it doth not appeare. For the Patriarks of the first age receiued many precepts from God himselfe, and whatsoeuer was first imposed by Adam, the same was obliued by Seth, who instructed Enos: from whom it descended to Noah, Sem, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Ioseph, and Moses. Yea many particular Commandements afterward written, were formerly imposed and deliuered ouer by Tradition, which kinde of teaching the Iewes afterward called Cabala, or Receptio: precepts receiued from the mouth of their Priests and Elders: to which the Iewes after the law written, added the interpretation of secret myteries, referred in the bosomes of their Priests, and vnaw full to be vterred to the people. But the true Cabala was not to be concealed from any; as being indeede the diuine law reuealed to the Patriarks, and from them deliuered to the posteritie, when as yet it was vnwritten. The Commandements which God gaue vnto Adam in the beginning, were, that he should impose names to all beasts, according to their natures; to whose perfection of vnderstanding they were sufficiently knowne. For finding the reason of his owne name Adam of Adams, Earth, or 30 red clay, hee gaue other names significant, not only to beasts, but to his Children and Nephewes, which after ward his issues imitated; as the name of Seth signifieth, as some take it, one that was laid for the ground or foundation of the Church, or rather, one giuen in recompence for Abel that was slain: and Enosh significant man or miserable, &c. Further, God commanded Adam to till the ground, and to liue by the labour thereof: God also gaue him the choise of all fruits, but the forbidden, and in Adam also was marriage first instituted: all men thence after being commanded to cohabite with their Wiues, rather than with their Father and Mother.

That murder and crueltie was also forbidden, both before the law written, and 40 before the flood it selfe, it is manifest. God himselfe making it appeare, that it was one of the greatest causes of the destruction of mankind by the generall flood. For God said vnto Noah, An end of all flesh is come before mee: for the earth is filled with crueltie through them: and behold, I will destroy them from the earth.* That offence therefore, for which all perished, could not be vknowne to all that perished: Gods mercie and iustice interpoling betwene the vntaught, and reuenge. This commandement God repeated to Noah, after the waters were dried vp from the earth. Whoſo ſheddeth mans blood, by man ſhall his blood be ſhed: for in the Image of God hath he made man.

Also the law of honouring and reuerencing our parents, was obserued among the 50 faithful, and the contrary punished by the fathers curse: as, Cursed be Canaan, ſeruant of ſeruants ſhall he be vnto his brethren. Again, we finde that the vnnatural liue of the Sodomites was punished in the highest degree; as with fire from Heauen. The sinne of Adulterie and Raniſement, was before the law no lesse detested than the rest, as appeareth by that reuenge, taken for Dina's forcing: and by the iudgement which Inda gave against Tamar, That she should be burnt: and by the repentance of Pharaoh and Abimelech, against whom this sentence was pronounced, Thou art but dead, because of the Woman which thou hast taken: for she is a mans Wife: To these we may add the ordinance of Sacrifice, of distinction of cleane and vncleane beasts, of Circumcision, of the Brother to raise vp seed to his brother that left a Widow childlesse, and diuers other constitutions, partly Morall, and partly Ceremoniall, which being deliuered before the written law, were alter by it confirmed. So that this Diuine Law imposed, of which the Law of Moses containeth that which is called The old Testament, may be said, not only to haue been written in the hearts of men, before it was ingrauen in stone, but also in substance to haue bene giuen in precept to the Patriarks. For as S. Paul witnesseth of himselfe, I knew not sinne, but by the Law: so euen the Law naturally preceded, and went before offences, though written after offences committed.

It is true, that all the creatures of God were directed by some kind of vwritten law; the Angels intuitiue; Men by Reason; Beasts by sense and instinct, without discourse; plants by their vegetatiue powers; and things inanimate by their necessary motions, without sense or preception.

Of the Morall, Iudiciall, and Ceremoniall Law, with a note prefixed, How the Scripture speaketh not alway in one sense, when it nameth the Law of MOSES.

20

Rom. 3. v. 19.

OW as the word (Law) in generall, as is aforesaid, hath diuers significations, and is taken for all doctrine which doth prescribe and re- strain: so this Law, called the Law of Moses in particular, is taken by S. Paul diuerly; as sometime for all the old Testament, as, Now we know what soeuer the Law saith, it saith to them which are vnder the Law.

Luc. 24. 44.

When it is opposed, or differenced from the Prophets and Psalmes, it is there taken for the five Bookes of Moses. For so Saint Luke hath distinguished them; as, All must be fulfilled which are written of mee in the Law, in the Prophets, and in the Psalmes.

Rom. 3. 28.

When it is opposed to the Gospell, then it is taken for the Law Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall; as, Therefore we conclude, that a man is iustified by faith without the works of the Law.

Rom. 6. 4. Gal. 3. 18.

When it is opposed to Grace, it signifyeth the declaration of Gods wrath, and our guilt of condemnation; or the extremity of the law, and summum ius: as, For ye are not vnder the Law, but vnder grace.

1 John 1. 17.

When it is opposed to the Truth, namely, where the Ceremonies or signes are taken for the things signified; as the Sacrifice for Christ, and the like: then it signifyeth but shadowes and figures; as, The Law was giuen by MOSES, but grace and truth came by IESVS CHRIST.

Gal. 3. 23.

Luc. 16. 6.

Heb. 7. 12.

Ch. 10. 1.

Lastly, when it is opposed to the time of Christs coming, it signifyeth the whole policie of the Iewes Common-wealth; as, Before faith came, wee were kept vnder the Law, &c. or the Law of the order and institution of the Aaronical Priesthood; as, All the Prophets and the Law, or the Priests, prophesied vnto Iohn. And if the Priesthood bee changed, the Law also, to wit, of the Priesthood, must needs bee changed.

Rom. 8. 2.

Rom. 7. 23.

The word (Law) is sometime also taken by the Figure Metonymia, for Interest, Authority, and Empire, or for constraining force; as, The Law of the Spirit of life, the law or the force of sinne and death, the enforcements of conscience, &c.

But the Written Law of Moses, or the Law of the Old Testament, of which we now speake, is thus defined. The Law is a doctrine, which was first put into the mides of men by God, and afterwards written by Moses, or by him repeated, commanding Holinesse and Iustice, promising eternall life conditionally, that is, to the obseruers of the law, and threatening death to those which breake the law in the least. For according to Saint James, Who soeuer shall keepe the whole, and faileth in one point, is guilty of all. The definition vied by the Schoolemen, in which both the Old and New law are comprehended, is thus giuen. Lex diuina est diuinum decretum, hominibus prescribens modum necessarium ut apte peruenire possint ad supernaturalem beatitudinem, quae est ultimus humanae vitae finis; The diuine law (say they) is the decree of God, prescribing vnto men a necessary meane, whereby they may aptly attaine finally to eternall beatitude, which is the last end of mans life.

the

Lect. 2. 10.

The law of Moses hath three parts: Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall. The Morall part commandeth this or that good to be done, and this or that euill to be avoided, in particular; as also it declareth, for whose sake it is to be done; as Doe this, for I am the Lord, whereas the law of nature commands it but in generall. Again, the Morall law entreateth of vertue and goodnesse; The Ceremoniall of diuine seruice, and of holines; (for external worship, and the order of hallowing our selues vnto God is called Ceremony) and the Iudiciall teacheth the particular gouernment, fit for the Common-wealth of the Iewes, and prescribeth orders for iustice and equity. And therefore was it said of Saint Paul, The commandment is iust, holy, and good: iust, or iustice being referred to the Iudiciall: holy, or holinesse to the Ceremoniall; good, or honest to the Morall. The Iudiciall is touching the gouernment of the commonwealth of the Iewes, in which many things must needs be proper to that estate, as such as were instituted either in respect of place or persons.

Rom. 7. 12.

The Ceremoniall is diuided into foure parts, according to the foure kindes of things of which it speaketh, to wit, Sacrifice, Holy things, Sacraments, and Obseruances. To Sacrifices belong beafts, and the fruits of the earth; to Holy things the Tabernacle, Temple, Vessels, Altars, and the like; to Sacraments, Circumcision, the Passouer, & such like. For the Obseruances, they consisted either in prohibition of certaine meats, as not to cate the bloud and fat of beafts; or in some other outward things, as in washings, purifyings, anointings, and attire, as not to wear mixt garments of Linnen and Woollen; as also it prohibiteth other vnnatural and vnproper commixtions, as Thou shalt not yoke together in a plough an Oxe and an Asse, or cast mingled seed in one field. It also exhorteth natural compassion, and forbideth cruelty euen to beafts, birds, and plants, whereby the creatures of God might be destroyed without any profit to man. For so some referre these precepts, Thou shalt not kill the bird sitting on her nest; nor beate downe the first buddes of the tree, nor muzzle the labouring Oxe, and the like, to the Ceremoniall Law.

Neither is there any of these three parts of the Law of Moses, but it hath as yet in some respects, the same power which it had before the coming of Christ. For the Morall lieth still, and is not abrogated or taken away: sauing in the ability of iustifying or condemning; for therein are wee commanded to loue and worship God; and to vse charitie one towards another: which for euer shall be required at our hands. T herein also are we in particular directed, how this ought to be done: which power of directing by speciall rules and precepts of life, it retaineth still. For these things also are commanded in both Testaments to be obserued, though principally for the feare of God in the one, and for the loue of God in the other.

The Ceremoniall also lieth in the things which it fore-signified. For the shadow is not destroyed, but perfected, when the body it selfe is represented to vs. Besides, it still lieth, in that it giueth both instruction and testimony of Christ, and in that it giueth direction to the Church, for some Ceremonies and Types of holy signification, which are still expedient, though in a farre fewer number than before Christs coming, and in a farre lesse degree of necessity.

Lastly, the Iudiciall lieth in substance, and concerning the end, and the naturall and vniuersall equity thereof.

Bb 2

But

But the Morall faileth in the point of iustification, the Ceremoniall as touching the vfe and externall obseruation (because Christ himselfe is come, of whom the ceremonies were signes and shadowes) and the Iudiciall is taken away, as farre forth as it was peculiar to the Jewes Common-weale, and policie.

§. X.

A proposall of nine other points to be considered, with a touch of the five first.

10

S for that which remaineth in the generall consideration of the diuine written Lawe, it may in effect bee reduced into these nine points.

1. The dignitie and worth of the law.
2. The Maiestie of the law-giuer.
3. The proprietie and peculiaritie of the people receiuing it.
4. The conueniencie of the time in which it was giuen.
5. The efficacie and power thereof.
6. The difference and agreement of the old and new Testament.
7. The end and vfe of the Law.
8. The sense and vnderstanding of the Law.
9. The durance and continuance thereof.

1. The dignitie of the Law is sufficiently prooued by S. Paul, in these wordes: Wherefore the Lawe is holy, and the Commandement is holy, and iust, and good: which three attributes are referred, as aforesaid, to the Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall.

2. The Maiestie of the Law-giuer is approved in all his creatures: who as he hath giuen all things their liues, and beings, so he onely gaue the law, who could so onely giue the end and reward promised, to wit, the saluation of mankind: but he gaue it not to Moses immediatly, but by the ministry of Angels: as it is said. And the Law was ordained by Angels, in the hand of a Mediatour: and in the Acts, Hee gaue the Law by the ordinance of Angels.

Gal. 3. v. 19.

3. The proprietie and peculiaritie of the people, receiuing this Law, is in three respects. First, in that they were prepared: Secondly, in that they were a Nation apart and disaffected: Thirdly, in that they were the children of the promise made to Abraham. Prepared they were, because they had the knowledge of one God, when all other Nations were idolaters. A Nation apart and seuered they were, because of Gods choice and election. Children of the promise they were, for the promise was made by God vnto Abraham, and his seed: not vnto his seedes, as to Elsa and Jacob, but to his seede, as to Jacob, or Israel singularly, of whom Christ. Now to Abraham and his seede were the promises made: he saith not to the seedes, as speaking of many, but to thy seede, as of one, which is Christ.

Gal. 3. v. 6.

4. The conueniencie of the time, in which it was giuen, is noted by S. Augustine: that it was about the middle time, betwene the Law of Nature, and Grace: the law of Nature continued from Adam to Moses: the law written in the Commandements receiued by Moses in the worlds yere 2514. continued to the Baptisme of Iohn: from which time begun the Law of Grace, which shall continue to the worlds end. Other reasons for the conueniencie are formerly giuen.

5. The fifth consideration is of the efficacie of this law, the same being a disposition to, or signe of our iustification: but not by it selfe sufficient, but as a figure of Christ in ceremonies, and a preparation to righteousness in morall precepts. For through the passion of Christ were sinnes forgiven, who taketh away the sinnes of the

the

the world: and therefore S. Paul calleth the rudiments of the law beggerly and weak, Gal. 4. beggerly as containing no grace, weak as not able to forgiue and iustifie. The blood of Goates and Bulles, and the ashes of an Heiter could only cleanse the body; but they were figures of *Christ*s blood, which doth cleanse the inward soule. For if the law could iustifie, then Christ died in vaine.

Heb. 9.

Gal. 4.

§. XI.

Of the sixth point, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the Old and New Testament.

10

He Old and New Testament differ in name, and in the meane and way proposed for attaining to saluation; as the Old by works, the New by grace: but in the thing it selfe, or obiect and remote end, they agree: which is mans happinesse and saluation.

The Old Testament, or Law, or Letter, or the Witnesse of Gods will, was called the Old, because it preceded the New Testament, which is an explanation of the Old: from which the New taketh witnesse. Yet the new of more excellencie, in that it doth more liuely expresse, and openly and directly delineate the wayes of our redemption. It is also called the Old, to shew that in part it was to bee abrogated: in that be saith the New Testament, he hath abrogated the Old. For the old law, though greatly extolled by the Prophets, and deliuered with wonderfull miracles, yet was it constituted in a policie perishable: but the New was giuen in a promise of an euertlasting Kingdome, and therefore called in the Apocalypse, a Testament and Gospel for euer during.

Heb. 8. v. 13.

The Old Testament is called the Law, because the first and chiefe part is the Law of Moses, of which the Prophets and Psalmes are Commentaries, explicating that Law.

The New Testament is called the Gospel, because the first and chiefe part thereof is the glad tidings of our Redemption: the other Bookes, as the Epistles, or Letters of the Apostles, and the Acts or Story of the Apostles, are plentifull interpreters thereof: The word Euangelion signifying a ioyfull, happie and prosperous message, or (as Homer vsed it) the reward giuen to the Messenger, bringing ioyfull newes. It is also sometime taken for a sacrifice, offered after victory, or other pleasing successe, as by Xenophon. In the Scriptures it hath three significations; First, for glad tidings in general, as in Esa the 52. v. 7. concerning peace: Secondly, by an excellencie it is restrained, to signifie that most ioyfull message of saluation, as in Luc 2. 10. whence also by figure it is taken for the History of Christ: and so wee vnderstand the foure Acts Gospels.

Lastly, for the preaching and diuulging the doctrine of Christ, as Cor 1. 9. v. 14. and Cor 2. 8. v. 18.

The agreement of both Testaments (taken, I thinke, as they are diuided in volumes) is by Daneus comprised in these foure.

In their Author.

In the substance of the Couenant, or things promised.

In the foundation, to wit, Christ.

In the effects, that is, in righteousness and iustification.

In the Author they agree, because both are of God, and therefore both one Testament and will of God in substance of doctrine. For as there was euer one Church, so was there one Couenant, one Adoption, and one Doctrine. As the old Law doth point at Christ, so doth the new Law teach Christ: the old proposing him as to come, the new as already come; one and the same thing being promised in both; both tending to one, and the same end: euen the saluation of our soules: which according to S. Peter is the end of our faith. For although it bee said, that Moses did promise

by

by obseruing the law an earthly Kingdome, a land flowing with milke and honic, the propagation of children, and other worldly blessings: yet all these were but figures to teach, and pledges to assure the Fathers of those spiritual blessings by Christ; for by the earthly he raised their mindes to the hope of heavenly. And the Fathers notwithstanding these worldly goods, did yet acknowledge themselves strangers, and pilgrims, expecting the heavenly Hierusalem: according to this place of the Hebrewes: All these died in faith, and received not the promises, but saw them as afar off, and beleueed them: confessing that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth. To which purpose also Saint AUGUSTINE: Omnia panni veterem legem intelligent, non attendentes per promissa terrena eterna promitti: Few (saith hee) doe understand the old law: not attending that by things earthly eternall are promised. And S. HIEROME: Noluit Deus pascere Iudeos more pecorum corporalibus donis opibusque, ut Iudei seminant: God would not feede the Iewes as beasts with corporall gifts and riches, as themselves decree. And this may be gathered out of Gods owne words, Ego sum Deus tuus, & ero vobis in Deum; I am thy God, and I will be your God. For the words, I will be your God, prooueth that it was not for the present, or for perishable things, that God gaue them this promise; but in respect of the future: to wit, the safetie of their soules. For as God created both body and soule, so hath he of his goodnesse, not left the better part vn-cared for, which liueth euer.

The agreement betweene the Old and New Testament in substance, inferresal-²⁰ so for the agreement in foundation. For Christ is called the foundation of the law, laid both by the Apostles and Prophets: in whom all the promises of God in the Old and New, are assured: the fathers having eaten the same spiritual food, which wee eate in our Sacraments.

The agreement in effects is, in that the knowledge of our sinne and miserie, which is taught vs by the law, maketh way, and as it were, serueth in subordination to the Gospel, the proper effects whereof are mercie and saluation: to which the Law seru-³⁰ ing as an introduction (for to those which acknowledge their sinne and miserie, God sheweth his mercie and saluation) may be said to agree with the Gospel in the effect. For otherwise if we seuer the law from subordination to the Gospel, the ef-⁴⁰ fects are very different: the one sheweth the way of righteousnesse by works, the other by faith; the Law woundeth, the Gospel healeth: the Law terrifieth, the Gospel allureth; Moses acculeth, Christ defendeth: Moses condemneth, Christ pardoneth. The Old restraineth the hand, the New the minde. Data est lex quoniam sanaret (saith S. AUGUSTINE) sed quia agrotantes probaret; The Law was giuen, not to helpe but to discouer sicknesses; and S. CHRYSOSTOME, Data est lex, ut se homo inueniret, non ut moribus sanaretur, sed ut medicus quareretur; The law was giuen that men might finde and know his owne imperfection: not that his disease was thereby holpen: but that he might then seeke out the Physician. For Christ came to saue the world, which the law had condemned. And as Moses was but a seruant, and Christ a Sonne, so the⁴⁰ greatest benefit was referred to bee brought, as by the worthiest person, sayth Cyril: for this law made nothing perfect, but was an introduction of a better hope.

¶ XII.

Of the rest of the points proposed.

THe seuenth consideration is of the end, and vse of the law: which is to bring vs to Christ: for finding no righteousnesse in our owne workes, we must seeke it in some other. But this is the last, and remote, and vtmost⁵⁰ end: the next and proper end of the law, is to prescribe righteousnesse, and to exact absolute and perfect obedience to God. Cnfessio is he which continueth not in all the things of this ley.

The second end of the law, is to render vs inexcusable before God: who know-^{ing}

ing to perfect a law, doe not keepe it: the law requiring a perfect and intire, not a broken or halfe obedience: but both inward and outward righteousnesse, and performance of dutie to God and Men.

The third and chiefe end of the law is, as hath beene said, to send vs to Christ, and his grace, being in our selues condemned and lost. For the law was deliuered with thunder, and with a most violent and fearefull tempest, threatening eternall death.

The fourth end of the law was to designe, and prescribe, the place of the Church and true people of God: and to hold them in one Discipline, and awe, till the coming of Christ: after whom the Church was to be dispersed ouer the whole world.

These be the ends of the Morall law. The end and vse of the Ceremoniall law, is to confirme the truth of Christ, and the new Testament. The vse of the Iudiciall, to reach vs natural equitie, and right, whereto we must conforme our selues.

The sense and vnderstanding of the law is double, literall and spirituall: by the literall we are taught the worship and seruice of God: by the spirituall, the figures and mysticall fore-speakings of Christ.

Lastly, for the durance or continuance of the law, the same hath being vntill the passion of Christ: before which time, and while Christ taught in the world, both the old and the new were in force. But after that the true sacrifice was offered vpon the Altar of the Crosse, then the Iewish sacrifices and ceremonies, which were Types and figures of Christ (Christ being the body of those shadows) ceased to binde the consciences any longer: the mylerie of our redemption being now by Christ and in him finished. In token whereof the vail of the Temple rent asunder; noting that the ceremoniall vailles and shadows were now to be removed, not that the morall law of the Commandments was hereby abolished, or weakened at all: otherwise then that it had not power to condemne according to the Iewish doctrine, as afore said. For the obseruing of the law was by Christ himselfe severely commanded: our loue to-³⁰ wards God being thereby to be winced, And herein Dauid so much reioyced, as he preferred the obseruation of the law, before all that the world could yeeld. In via testimonium tuorum delectatus sum, sicut in omnibus diuitijs; I haue bene delighted in thy law as in all manner of riches: And againe, The law of thy mouth is good for me aboue thousands of gold and silver. This is the loue of God (saith S. Iohn) that wee keepe his Commandment. And that there is no excuse for the neglect of the things commanded in the law, God himselfe in Deuteronomie witnesseth. This Commandment (saith hee) which I command thee this day, is not hidde from thee, neither is it farre off. It is not in heauen that thou shouldest say, Who shall goe up for vs to heauen, and bring it vs, and *conferre vs to heare it that we may doe it? neither is it beyond the Sea, that then shouldest say, Who shall goe over the Sea for vs, and bring it vs? &c. but the word is very nether unto thee, even in thy mouth and in thy heart for to doe it. Behold (saith Moses) I haue set before thee this day, life and death, good and euill, in that I command thee this day to loue the Lord thy God, to walke in his wayes, and to keepe his Commandments, and his Ordinances, and his Lawes, that thou maist liue, &c. Neither is it said in vaine in S. MATTHEW. Si vis ad vitam ingredi, serua mandata; If thou wilt enter into life, keepe the Commandments: and in S. Iohn. Scio quia mandatum eius vita eterna est; I know that his Commandment is life everlasting. And if this be the charitie of God, or of Men towards God, as S. Iohn hath taught, to wit, that we keepe his Commandments: certainly he is but a liar, that professeth to loue God, and neglecteth to obserue the word of his will, with all his power. And though I confesse it is not in mans abilitie, without the speciall grace of God, to fulfill the law (Christ onely as man excepted) yet if we rightly consider the mercitull care which God had of his people in those his Com-⁵⁰ mandments, we shall finde in our selues, how we borrow libertie, and rather let slip our affections, and voluntarily loosen them from the chaines of obedience, to which the word of God and diuine reason hath fastened them, than that we are excusable by those difficulties and impossibilities, which our minde (greedie of libertie) propoeth to it selfe. For this is the loue of God, that wee keepe his Commandments,*

§. XIII.

Of the severall Commandments of the Decalogue: and that the difficultie is not in respect of the Commandments, but by our default.

Or by the first wee are commanded to acknowledge, serue, and loue one God. Now, whereby are we inticed to the breach of this precept? seeing euery reasonable man may conceiue and know, that infinite power cannot be diuided into many infinites: and that it is of necessity, that by this almightie Vnitie, all things haue beene caused, and are continued. And if brute beasts had this knowledge of their Creatour, and how in his prouidence he hath also provided for euery of them, which giueth to beasts their foods, &c. there is no doubt but that they would also serue and loue him only.

¶ Al. 147. 10. 9.

Glossa in verb. Caluin.

The second precept is the forbidding of Idolatrie, and worship of Images: the making whereof, out of doubt, was not the invention of an ill intent in the beginning, seeing this is generally true. Omnia mala exempla bonis initijs orta sunt; All ill examples did spring and arise from good beginnings. For their first erection was to keepe the memorie of men famous for their vertue: vntill (saith Lactantius) the Deuill crept into them, and (hauing blotted out the first intent) working in weake and ignorant soules, changed the nature of the one, and the reason of the other, to serue himselfe thereby. For what reasonable man, if he be not forsaken of God, will call on those blinde, deafe, dumbe, and dead stocks, more worthlesse then the most worthlesse of those, that hauing life and reason, implore their helpe, which haue 30 neither: yea, of more vilde prize and baser, then the basest of beasts, who haue sense and estimation? for what doe wee thereby (saith the Wisedome of SALOMON) but call to the weeke for helpe, pray to the dead for life, require aide of him that hath no experience, assistance in our iournies of him that cannot goe, and successe in our affaires of him that hath no power? And whether the Idolater, or the blocke, to which hee prayeth, be more senselesse: Dauid maketh a doubt. For (saith he) they that make them are like vnto them, and so are all the rest that trust in them.

¶ Psal. 13. 19.

The breach of the third Commandment is neither perswaded by worldly pleasure, nor worldly profit: the two greatest inchanters of mortall men. No, wee are no way allured to this horrible disdaine of God, vnlesse the hate of good men, and Gods curse, bee accounted an advantage. For as our corruptest nature giues vs nothing towards it, so can it satisfie no one appetite, except euerclasting sorrow, and Hell dwell in our desire. And therefore this strange custome hath the Deuill brought vp among men, without all subtiltie of argument, or cunning perswasion, taking thereby the greatest and most scornfull advantage ouer vs. For slaughter satisfieth hatred, Theft giues satisfaction to neede, Adulterie to lust, Oppression to couetousnesse: but this contemptuous offence of blasphemie, and the irreuerent abuse of Gods name, as it giueth no helpe to any of our worldly affections, so the most salvage Nations of the world doe not vse it.

The fourth Commandment, to keepe the Sabbath day holy, hath neither paine, 50 burden, nor inconuenience. For it giueth rest to the labourer, and consolation to their Masters. And that this law was imposed on man for his benefit, Moses teacheth in the reason of the law: as in Exod. 23. 12. And in the seventh day thou shalt rest, that thine Ox and thine Ass may rest, and the sonne of thy maide, and the stranger may be refreshed.

The

The first of the second Table to honour our Parents, with whom we are one and the same, is a gratitude which nature it selfe hath taught vs towards them, who after God gaue vs life and being, haue begotten vs, and borne vs, cherished vs in our weak and helpelesse infancie, and bestowed on vs the harvest and profit of their labours and cares. Therefore, in the Temporal and Iudiciall ordinances, cursing of parents, or the offering them violence, was made death.

The next is, that thou shalt not Murther, that is, thou shalt not doe the acts following the affections of hatred. For the law of God, and after it our owne lawes, and in effect the law of all Nations, haue made difference between slaughter casual, 10 all, and furious. Affectio enim tua (saith BRACTON) imponit nomen operis tui; It is the affection and will that makes the worke such as it is. And certainly whosoever cannot forbear to commit murther, hath neither the grace of God, nor any vse of his owne will.

The third of the second Table, commands vs from adulterie. Now, if the preservation of Virginitie haue been possible, for thousands of Men and Women, who in all ages haue mastered their fleshly desires, and haue returned chaste to the graue: It cannot be accounted a burthen, to forbear the dishonour and iniurie, which we offer to others by such a violation, seeing marriage is permitted by the lawes of God, and Men, to all that affect it. And there is no man liuing whom the desire of beautie and forme hath so constrained, but he might with ease forbear the prosequiti- 20 on of this ill: did not himselfe giue sucke to this Infant, and nourish warmth till it grow to strong heate, heate till it turne to fire, and fire to flame.

¶ Super repleti-terum Virginitas Paradysum.

The fourth of the second Table, is, that we shall not steale. And if that kind of violent robberie had been vsed in Moses time, which many Russians practise now-a-daies in England, and to the dishonour of our Nation more in England, than in any Region of the world among Christians, out of doubt, he would haue censured them by death, and not by restitution, though quadruple. For I speake not of the poore and miserable soules, whom hunger and extreme necessity inforceth, but of those detested Theeues, who to maintaine themselves Lord-like, assault, robbe, and wound the Merchant, Artificer, and Labouring man, or breake by violence into o- 30 ther mens houses, and spend in Brauerie, Drunkennesse, and vpon Harlots, in one day, what other men sometime haue laboured for all their liues: impoverishing whole families: and taking the bread and food from the mouths of their children. And that this Commandment might easily be obserued; it would soone appeare, if Princes would resolute, but for a few yeeres to pardon none. For it is the hope of life, and the argument of sparing the first offence, that encourageth these Hell-hounds. And if euery man may presume to be pardoned once, there is no state or Common-wealth, but these men would in a short time impoverish or destroy it.

The fifth Commandment of this second Table, is, the prohibition of false witness: from which if men could not forbear, all surety of estate and life were taken away. And so much did God detest a false witness, and a false accuser, especially in matters criminall, that the law ordained him to suffer the same death or punishment, which he sought by falsehood to lay on his brother.

The last of the ten Commandments forbiddeth vs to couet any thing, which belongeth to another man, either the bodies of their wiues for concupiscence, or their goods for desire of gain. And this precept seemeth the hardest for men to obserue; so esteemed by reason of our fraile affections: and yet if wee iudge hereof tightly, it may be doubted whether it extend to all our inconsiderate fancies and vaine thoughts. For although it be not easie to master all our sudden passions, yet 50 we may restraîne and hinder the growing, and farther increase, if we please to intend our strength, and seeke for grace. How the word Coueting reacheth to all those it is to be considered. For Concupiscentia, according to some, Est effrenatus habendus appetitus; An vbrideled, or vnrestrained appetite of hauiug: And as touching such an appetite, we canot excuse our selues by any our natural frailty, or vnadvised error;

But

But, as I suppose, the word Concupiscence is more largely taken, either for a determinate and unbridled euill intent, or for some vrging inclination thereunto. All the question is of the later sort: which is, Actus imperfectus, id est, non deliberatus ratione, quæ est principium proprium actus boni aut mali; Such passions, or inclinations are concupiscit actus, that is, not deliberated vpon by reason, which is the proper principle of a good or vicious action. And sure, it may seeme, that so long as we resist such motions, they harme vs not: as they say, Quamdiu res fragatur nihil nocent: nocent autem comes dominari permittimus; As long as wee giue no assent vnto them, it is thought by some that they hurt vs not: and that then only they hurt, when we suffer them to beare sway. But these men, as it seemes, make nothing forbidden in this tenth precept, but what hath been forbidden in the other: for in euery Commandement, not only the outward act, but also the inward assent vnto euill, though it breake not out into act, is forbidden: therefore, that wee may know the difference betweene this Commandement and the rest, the distinction of desires is to be held: that some are with assent, and vnbridled; others bridled, and without assent. For so euen the Morall Philosopher can tell vs, that the Continent man hath euill desires, but without assent (for they are bridled by the strength of right reason) as on the other side the Incontinent hath good desires, but restrained and suppressed by contrarie passions. The euill desires when they are accompanied with assent, are in euery Commandement forbidden, together with the outward act: and therefore, if wee will haue any thing proper to this Commandement, we must needs say, that the euill desires of the Continent man (that is, euen those which we resist and bridle) are heere forbidden. For though he that bridleth his euill desires, be much better than he that yeeldeth vnto them: yet such a man, euen according to the Heathen Philosopher, is not worthy the name of a vertuous man. For Aristotle himselfe makes continentia, not to be vertue, but only a degree vnto it: confessing, that though the Continent man do well in bridling his euill affections, yet he doth not all, seeing he ought not so much as to haue them at all. Neither is it much more, that true diuinitie deliuereth touching this matter. For, as he saith, that in the Continent man the hauing of these euill desires, though he resist them, is the cause that he cannot be called a vertuous man: so we, that the hauing of them is a sinne. Only in this we excell him heere: that we are able out of diuinitie to giue the true reason of this doctrine: which is, that euery one sinneth, that doth not loue God with his whole heart and affection: whence it followeth that the euill desires of the Continent man; that is, of him which bridleth them, must needs be sinne: seeing such desires, though bridled, are a pulling away of a part of our heart and affection from God.

Seeing therefore it hath pleased God, to make vs know, that by our faithfull induements to keepe his commandements, we witnesse our loue toward himselfe: wee may not safely giue libertie to our vanities, by calling backe vpon God (who is iustice it selfe) that he hath giuen vs precepts altogether beyond our power, and commandements impossible for vs to keepe. For as hee is assured (saith St. Hierome) that auowes that the law is in all things possible to be obserued: so hee hath made this addition: Male dictus qui dicit impossibilia Deum præcepisse; Accursed is hee that saith that God hath commanded things (in themselves, and not through our fault) impossible. Now, as the places are many which command vs to keepe the law: so is our weakenesse also in the Scriptures laid before vs, and therefore it is thus safely to be vnderstood, that we should without euasion, or without betraying of our selues, do our faithfull induements to obferue them: which if we doe vnfaidly, no doubt, but God will accept our desires therein. For that there is no man iust, Daniel witnesseeth. Enter not into iudgement with thy servant, for in thy sight no flesh that liueth shall be iustified. And in the first of Kings, There is no man that sinneth not: And againe, who can say, I haue made my heart cleane? But seeing there is no sinne grievous without deliberation; let euery mans conscience iudge him, whether he giue way willingly, or restrain himselfe in all that he can; yea, or no? For when a King giues to his subiect a commandement vpon paine of losse of his loue, to performe some seruice: if the subject neglecting the same, seeke to satisfie his Soueraigne with shifting excuses, out of doubt such a Prince will take himselfe to be derided therein.

¶ XIII.

If there were not any Religion nor Iudgement to come, yet the Decalogue were most necessarie to be obserued.

And if we consider aduisedly and soberly, of the Morall law, or ten Commandements, which God by the hand of Moses gaue vnto his people, it will appeare that such was his mercifull prouidence in the choise of them, as were there neither paine, nor profit adioyned to the obseruing, or not obseruing of them, were there no diuine power at all, nor any Religion among men, yet if we did not for our owne sakes struue to obserue these lawes: all societie of men, and all induements, all happinesse and contentment in this life would bee taken away: and euery state and common-weale in the world fall to the ground and dissolue. Therefore, these lawes were not imposed as a burthen, but as a blessing: to the end that the innocent might bee defended, that euery man might enioy the fruits of his owne trauails, that right might be done to all men from all men: that by iustice, order, and peace, wee might liue the liues of reasonable men, and not of beasts; of free-men, and not of slaves; of ciuill men, and not of saluages. And hereof making our humane reason only Iudge, Let vs see the inconueniences in this life which would follow by the breach and neglect of these lawes.

As first, what would the issue be if wee acknowledged many Gods? would not a farre greater hatred, war, and blood-shed follow, than that which the difference of ceremonie, and diuersitie of interpretation, hath already brought into the world, euen among those Nations which acknowledge one God, and one Christ? And what could it profit mankind to pray to Idols, and Images of gold, metall, dead stones, and rotten wood, whence nothing can be hoped, but the losse of time, and an impossibilitie to receiue thence from, either helpe or comfort?

The breach of the third Commandement bringeth there-with this disadvantage, and ill to man, that whosoever taketh the name of God in vaine, shall not at any time benefit himselfe by calling God to witnesse for him, when hee may iustly vse his holy name.

The obseruing the Sabbath holy, giueth rest to men and beasts, and nature herselfe requireth intermission of labour.

If we despise our Parents, who haue giuen vs being, we thereby teach our owne children to scorne and neglect vs, when our aged yeeres require comfort and helpe at their hands.

If murder were not forbidden, and severely punished, the races of mankind would bee extingished: and whosoever would take the libertie to destroy others, giueth libertie to others to destroy himselfe.

If adulterie were lawfull and permitted, no man could say vnto himselfe, This is my sonne: there could be no inheritance proper, no honour descend to posteritie, no induement by vertue and vnder-taking to raise families: murders and poisonings betweene man and wife would be daily committed: and euery man subiect to most filthie and vncleane diseases.

If stealth and violent rapine were suffered, all mankind would shortly after perish, or liue as the saluages, by rootes and acornes. For no man laboureth but to enioy the fruits thereof. And such is the mischiefe of robbrie, as where Moses for lesser crimes appointed restitution foure-fold, policie of State and necessitie hath made it death.

To permit false witnesses, is to take all mens liues and estates from them by corruption: the wicked would sweare against the virtuous: the waster against the wealthie: the idle begger and loiterer, against the careful and painefull labourer: all triall of right were taken away, and iustice thereby banished out of the world.

The coucing of that which belongs to other men, bringeth no other profit than a distraction of minde, with an inward vexation: for while wee couet what appertaines to others, we neglect our owne: our appetites are therein fed with vaine and fruitlesse hopes, so long as we doe but couet; and if we doe attaine to the desire of the one, or the other, to wit, the wifes or goods of our neighbours, wee can looke for no other, but that our selues shall also, either by theft or by strong hand, be depriued of our owne.

Wherein then appeareth the burthen of Gods Commandements, if there be nothing in them, but rules and directions for the generall and particular good of all liuing? Surely, for our owne good, and not in respect of himselfe, did the most mercifull and prouident God ordaine them; without the obseruation of which, the vertues of heavenly bodies, the fertilitie of the earth, with all the blessings given vs in this life, would be vnto vs altogether vnprofitable, and of no vse. For we should remaine but in the state of brute beasts, if not in a farre more vnhappie condition.

§. XV.

Of humane Law, written and vnwritten.

Humane Law, of which now it followeth to speake, is first diuided into two, viz. Written, and Vnwritten. The vnwritten consists of vsage, approved by time: which Isidore calls Mores; and he defines Mores to be Consuetudines vetustate probate, to be customes approved by antiquitie or vnwritten lawes. Now custome differeth from vse, as the cause from the effect: in that custome is by vse and continuance established into a law: but yet so there where the law is defective, saith Isidore.

And of customes there are two generall natures, containing innumerable particulars, the first are written customes, received and exercised by Nations, as the customes of Burgundie, and Normandie: the ancient generall custome of England, and the customes of Castile, and other Prouinces.

The second are these pettie customes, vsed in particular Places, Cities, Hundreds, and Mannors. The generall or National customes are some written, others vnwritten.

The particular or pettie customes are seldome written, but witnessed by testimonie of the inhabitants. The customes of the Duchie of Cornwall comprehending also the Stannerie of Devon, as touching Tin, and Tin causes, are written in Devon, but not in Cornwall. But howsoeuer vse and time hath made these customes as lawes, yet ought every custome to be rationabilis, as well as prescripta. Non firmatur tractu temporis quoad de iure ab initio non subsistit; That which at first was not grounded upon good right, is not made good by continuance of time. And (saith VLIAN) quod ab initio vitiosum est, non potest tractu temporis conualescere; Course of time amends not that which was naught from the first beginning. For these two defences are necessarie in all lawes of custome; the one, that it be not repugnant to the law diuine, and naturall: the other, that the cause and reason be strong, proving a right birth, and necessarie continuance: it being manifest that every custome, which is against the law, had his beginning from cuill deedes, and therefore not without the former considerations to be allowed. And it is true, that all customes of this nature were but tolerated for a time, by the law-makers, though they haue beene since continued, because posteritie is not bound to examine by what cause their Ancestors were thereto moued.

In Reg. l. i. c. 1. s. 1.

V. p. 1. a.

ued. For non sufficit simplex toleratio. And it is in this sort ouer-ruled in the law; Per populum consuetudo contra legem induci non potest, nisi de voluntate illius qui nouam legem, & nouam constitutionem statuere potest, qui solus princeps est; The people cannot bring a new custome against law: saue by his will, who hath power to make a new law and ordinance, which is onely the Prince.

Humane Law generally taken, to wit, humane law written, is by some defined to be the decree or doome of practique reason: by which humane actions are ruled and directed. Papinian calls the Law a common precept, the aduisement of Wifemen, and the restraint of offences committed, either willingly or ignorantly. Isidore calls the Law a Constitution written, agreeing with Religion, fittest for Governance and common profit: And more largely, Omne id quod ratione consistit, illud standi with reason.

Lastly, and more precisely it is thus defined. Humane Law is a righteous decree, agreeing with the Law naturall, and eternall: made by the rationall discourse of those, that exercise publique authoritie: prescribing necessarie obseruances to the subiect. That every law ought to be a righteous decree, S. Augustine teacheth, saying: Nihil lex esse non videtur, quae iusta non fuerit; It seemes to be no law at all to me, which is not iust: and iust it cannot be, except it agree with the law naturall and eternall. For there is no law iust and legitimate (saith S. Augustine) which the Law-makers haue not deriued from the eternall. Nihil iustum atque legitimum est, quod non ab aeterna lege sibi homines deriuauerint.

L. 1. de lib. Arb. cap. 6.

Secondly, it ought to be constituted by discourse of reason, whereby it is distinguished from the law naturall, to wit, the naturall, indemonstrable, or needing no demonstration from whence the law humane is taken and deduced.

Thirdly, that it ought to be made by an authorized Magistracie, it cannot bee doubted, be the Government of what kinde soeuer. For it falleth otherwise vnder the Title of those decrees called Volentia, or iniqua constitutiones; Violentia, or wicked constitutiones.

Of humane Law there are foure properties, especially answering these foure conditions in the former definition. First, as it is drawne out of the law of nature: so every particular of the humane law may be resolved into some principle or rule of the naturall.

4. Parts:

Thom. 2. 2. 2. art. 1. s. 1.

Secondly, it is to be considered as it is referred vnto, and doth respect the common good.

Thirdly, it is to be made by publique authoritie.

Fourthly, concerning the matter of the law, it prescribeth, and directeth, all humane actions. And so is the Law as large and diuers, as all humane actions are diuers, which may fall vnder it. For according to THOMAS, Alia lex IVLIA de Adulterijs, alia CORNELIA de Scaerijs; The law of IVLIAN against Adulterie is one, the CORNELIAN against Ruffians, is another. Now the humane law, generally taken, is in respect of the first of these considerations, diuided into the law of Nations, and the Ciuill.

The Law of Nations is taken lesse or more properly, lesse properly for every law which is not of it selfe, but from other higher principles deduced: and so it seemeth that Vipian vnderstands it: for he defineth Ius gentium, or the law of Nations, to be that which is onely common amongst Men, as Religion, and the worship of God: which is not in the very nature of this law of Nations: but from the principles of the Scriptures, and other diuine Reuelations. But the law of Nations properly taken, is that dictate, or sentence, which is drawne from a very probable, though not from an euident principle, yet so probable, that all Nations doe assent vnto the conclusion, as that the free passage of Ambassadors be graunted betwene enemies, &c. which National law, according to diuers acceptations, and diuers considerations had of the Humane law, may be sometime taken for a Species of the Naturall, sometime of the Humane.

Cc

Ius

Ius Civile, or the Ciuill Law, is not the same in all Common-wealths, but in diuers estates it is also diuers and peculiar, and this Law is not so immediately deriued from the Law of Nature, as the Law of Nations is: For it is partly deduced out of such principles as all Nations doe not agree in, or easily assent vnto; because they depend on particular circumstances, which are diuers, and doe not fit all estates. Hereof V. P. I. A. N. Ius civile, neque in totum à naturali & gentium recedit, neque per omnia ei seruit: itaq; cum aliquod addimus vel detrahimus Iuri communi, Ius proprium, id est, Civile offerimus; The Ciuill Law (saith he) doth neither wholly differ from the Law of Nature, and Nations, nor yet in all points obey it: therefore when wee adde ought to, or take from the Law that is common, we make a Law proper, that is, the Ciuill Law.

The law now commonly called the Ciuill Law, had its birth in Rome; and was first written by the Decem-viri, 303. yeeres after the foundation of the Citie. It was compounded as well out of the Athenian, and other Grecian lawes, as out of the ancient Romane customes and lawes Regall. The Regall lawes were deuised by the first Kings, and called Leges Regie, or Papirianæ, because they were gathered by Papirius, Tarquinius then reigning. For though so many of the former lawes as maintained Kingly authoritie were abolished, with the name; yet those of Seruius Tullius, for Commerce and Contracts, and all that appertained to Religion, and common viltie, were continued, and were a part of the lawes of the twelve Tables. To these lawes of the twelve Tables were added (as the times gaue occasion) those made by the Senate, called Senatus-consulta: those of the common people, called Plebiscita: those of the Lawyers, called responsa prudentum: and the Edicts of the Annual Magistrate: which Edicts being first gathered and interpreted by Iulian, and presented to Adrian the Emperour, they were by him confirmed and made perpetuall lawes; and the Volume stiled Edictum perpetuum; as those and the like Collections of Iulianian after ward were.

The difference anciently between Lawes and Edicts, which the French call Reglements, consisted in this, that lawes are the Constitutions made or confirmed by soveraigne authoritie (bee the soveraigntie in the people, in a few, or in one) and are withall generall and permanent; but an Edict (which is but Iussum Magistratus, vnlesse by authoritie it be made a law) hath end with the Officer, who made the same, saith V. A. R. R. O. Qui plurimum Edicta tribuunt, legem annuam esse dicunt; They who ascribe the most vnto an Edict, say that it is a law for one yeere: Though Isidore doth also expresse by the word Constitutiones or Edictis, those Ordinances called Acts of Prerogatives; as Constitutio vel Edictum est quod Rex, vel Imperator constituit, vel edicit; An Ordinance or Edict is that which a King or Emperour doth ordaine or proclaim.

Lastly, the Humane law is diuided into the Secular, and into the Ecclesiasticall, or Canon. The Secular commanding temporall good, to wit, the peace and tranquillitie of the Common-wealth: the Ecclesiasticall the spirituall good, and right Government of the Ecclesiasticall Common-wealth, or Church, illud nature legem, hoc diuinum à spectat; That respecteth the Law of Nature, this the Law of God. And so may Ius Civile be taken two waies; first, as distinguished from the law of Nations, as in the first diuision; Secondly, as it is the same with the Secular, and diuers from the Ecclesiasticall. But this diuision of the Schoolemen is obscure. For although the Ciuill be the same with the Secular, as the Ciuill is a law, yet the Secular is more generall, & comprehendeth both the Ciuill, and all other lawes not Ecclesiasticall. For of Secular lawes, in vse among Christian Princes, & in Christian Common-wealths, there are three kinds; the Ciuill which hath euerywhere a voyce; and in all Christian estates (England excepted) most powerful; the Lawes of England called Common, and the Lawes of custome or Provinciall. In Spain besides the Law Ciuill, they haue the customes of Castill, and other Provinces. In France besides the Ciuill, the customes of Burgundie, Blois, Berri, Niemois, and Lodunois, &c. Tous lieux situes & assis en Lodunois, seront gouvernez selon les costumes du dit pays; All places lying within the precincts of Lodunois, shall bee governed according to the customes of that place. There

There are also in France the customes of Normandie, and these of two kindes; General, and Local; and all purged and reformed by diuers Acts of the three estates. The Charters of confirmation of these ancient customes, before and since their reformation haue these words; Nos autem, registum prædictum, visus laudabiles, & consuetudines antiquas, &c. Laudamus, approbamus, & auctoritate Regia confirmamus; The Register afore said, laudable use, and ancient customes wee praise, approve, and by our Kingly authoritie confirme. The common law of England is also compounded of the ancient customes of the same, and of certain Maximes by those customes of the Realme approoued. Vpon which customes also are grounded those Courts of Record, of the Chancery, Kings Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, with other small Courts.

These ancient customes of England haue beene approoued by the Kings thereof, from age to age: as that custome by which no man shall be taken, imprisoned, diseised, nor otherwise destroyed, but he must first be put to answer by the law of the Land, was confirmed by the Statute of Magna Charta. It is by the ancient custome of England, that the eldest Sonne should inherite without partition. In Germanie, France, and elsewhere otherwise, and by partition. In Ireland it is the custome for all Lands (that haue not beene resigned into the Kings hands) that the eldest of the house shall enioy the inheritance during his owne life: and so the second and third eldest (if there bee so many brothers) before the Heire in lineall descent: this is called the custome of Tanistrie. For example, if a Lord of Land haue foure sonnes, and the eldest of those foure haue also a sonne, the three brothers of the eldest sonne, shall after the death of their brother, enioy their Fathers lands before the Grand-child: the custome being grounded vpon the reason of necessity. For the tribus in former times hauing alwaies liued in a subdiuided Ciuill warre, not onely the greatest against the greatest, but euery Baron and Gentleman one against another, were inforced to leaue successors of age and abilitie to defend their owne Territories. Now as in Normandie, Burgundie, and other Provinces of France, there are certaine peculiar, and pettie customes, besides the great and generall custome of the Land, so are there in England, and in euery part thereof. But the greatest bulke of our lawes, as I take it, are the Acts of Parliament: lawes propounded and approoued by the three estates of the Realme, and confirmed by the King, to the obedience of which all men are therefore bound, because they are Acts of choise, and selfe-desire. Leges nulla alia causa noventur quam quod iudicio populi recepte sunt; The lawes doe therefore binde the subject, because they are receiued by the iudgement of the subject. Tum demum humane leges habent vim suam, cum fuerint non modo institutæ, sed etiam firmatæ approbatione communitatis; It is then that humane lawes haue their strenght, when they shall not onely be deuised, but by the approbation of the people confirmed.

Isidore fasteneth these properties to euery Christian law, that the same be honest, that it be possible, that it bee according to Nature, and according to the custome of the Countrey; also for the time and place conuenient, profitable, and manifest, and without respect of priuate profit, that it be written for the generall good. Hee also giues foure effects of the law, which Modestinus comprehends in two; to wit, obligation, and instigation: the former binds vs by feare, to auoide vice; the later incourageth with hope, to follow vertue. For according to Cicero; Legem oportet esse vitiorum emendatricem, commendatricemq; virtutum; It becometh the law to be a mender of vices, and a commender of vertues. The part obligatorie or binding vs to the obseruation of things commanded or forbidden, is an effect common to all lawes; and it is two-fold, the one constraineth vs by feare of our consciences, the other by feare of externall punishment. These two effects the law performeth, by the exercise of those two powers, to wit, Coactiue, and Directiue.

The second of these two effects remembered by Modestinus, is Instigation, or incouragement to vertue, as Aristotle makes it the end of the law, to make men vertuous. For lawes being such as they ought to bee, doe both by prescribing and forbidding, bidding, urge vs to well-doing; laying before vs the good and the euill, by the one and the other purchased. And this power affirmatiue, commanding good, and power negatiue, for bidding euill, are those into which the law is diuided, as touching the matter: and in which Dauid comprehendeth the whole body and substance thereof: laying, Declina à malo, & fac bonum; Decline from euill, and doe good.

Plat. 36.

That only the Prince is exempt from humane lawes, and in what sort.

NOW whether the power of the humane Law bee without exception of any person, it is doubtfully disputed among those that haue written of this subiect, as well Diuines as Lawyers: and namely, whether Soueraigne Princes bee compellable; yea, or no? But whereas there are two powers of the law, as aforesaid; the one Directiue, the other Coactiue: to the power Directiue, they ought to be subiect, but not to that which constraineth. For as touching violence or punishments, no man is bound to giue a prejudiciall judgement against himselfe; and it equalls haue not any power ouer each other, much lesse haue inferiours ouer their superiours, from whom they receiue their authoritie and strength.

And speaking of the supreme power of lawes, simply then is the Prince so much about the lawes, as the soule and body vnited, is about a dead and senselesse carcasse. For the King is truly called, ius vniū & lex animata. An animate and liuing law. But this is true, that by giuing authoritie to lawes, Princes both adde great ease to themselves, and conferre it; and therefore was it said of Bracton out of IUSTINIAN: Merito debet Rex tribuere legi quod lex attribuit ei: nam lex fasit ut ipse sit Rex; Rightfully ought the King to attribute that to the law, which the Law first attributeth to the King; for it is the law that doth make Kings.

Bract. l. 2.

But whereas Bracton ascribeth this power to the humane law, he is therein mistaken. For Kings are made by God, and lawes diuine; and by humane lawes onely declared to bee Kings. As for the places remembred by the Diuines and Lawyers, which inferre a kinde of obligation of Princes, they teach no other thing therein, than the bond of conscience, and profit arising from the examples of vertuous Princes, who are to giue an account of their actions to God onely.

Plat. 50.
§. de Leg.

Thi soli peccant, faith DAVID; Against thee onely haue I sinned: therefore, the Prince cannot be said to be subiect to the law; Principes non subijctur legi. For seeing according to the Schoolemen, the law humane is but quoddam organum & instrumentum potestatis gubernatiue: non videtur posse eius obligatio ad eum se extendere, ad quem ipsa vni potestatis humane non pertinet; sed vni potestatis humane non se extendit ad gubernatorem, in quo illa residet. Ergo nec lex comittit per talem potestatem obligare potest ipsum conditorum. Omnis enim potentia actiua, est principium transfundendi alius; Seeing humane law (say they) is but a kinde of organ, or instrument, of the power that governeth, it seemes that it cannot extend it selfe to binde any one whom no humane power can contrall, or lay hold of: but the Governour himselfe, in whom the governing power doth reside, is a person that cannot by himselfe, or by his owne power be controlled. And therefore the law which is made by such a power, cannot binde the law maker himselfe: for every actiue abilitie is a cause or principle of alteration in another body, not in the body in which it selfe resides. And seeing Princes haue power to deliuer others from the obligation of the law: Ergo etiam potest ipsi Princeps sine legislator sua se voluntate pro libito ab obligatione legis liberare; Therefore also may a Prince or law-maker at his owne will and pleasure deliuer himselfe from the bond of the law. Therefore in the rules of the law it is thus con-

concluded. Subditi tenentur leges obseruare necessitate coactionis, Principes vero sola voluntate sua, & intuitu boni communis; The subjects are bound to fulfill the law by necessity of compulsion, but the Prince onely by his owne will, and regard of the common good.

Now concerning the politike lawes, giuen by Moses to the Nation of the Israelites, whether they ought to be a President, from which no ciuill institutions of other people should presume to digresse, I will not presume to determine, but leaue it as a question for such men to decide, whose professions giue them greater abilitie. It thus much I may be bold to affirme, that we ought not to seeme wiser than God himselfe, who hath told vs that there are no lawes so righteous, as those which it pleased him to giue to his Elect people to be governed by. True it is, that all Nations haue their severall qualities, wherein they differ, euen from their next borderers, no lesse than in their peculiar languages: which disagreeable conditions to governe apply, one and the same law very hardly were able. The Roman ciuill lawes did indeede containe in order a great part of the then knowne world, without any notable inconuenience, after such time as once it was receiued and become familiar: yet was not the administration of it alike in all parts, but yielded much vnto the naturall customes of the sundrie people, which it gouerned. For whether it bee through a long continued perswasion, or (as Astrangers more willingly graunt) some influence of the Heauens; or peraduenture some temper of the soile and climate, affording matter of prouocation to vice (as plenty made the Sybarites luxurious: want and opportunitie to steale, makes the Arabians to bee Thieues) very hard it wereto forbid by law an offence so common, with any people, as it wanted a name, whereby to be distinguished from iust and honest. By such rigour was the Kingdome of Congo vnhappy diuerted from the Christian Religion, which it willingly at the first embraced, but after with great furie reiected, because pluralitie of Wiues was denyed vnto them, I know not how necessarily, but more contentiously than seasonably. In such cases, me thinks, it were not amisse to consider that the high God himselfe permitted some things to the Israelites, rather in regard of their natural disposition (for they were hard-hearted) than because they were consonant vnto the ancient rules of the first perfection. So, where euen the generall nature of man doth condemne (as many things it doth) for wicked and vniuit; there may the law, giuen by Moses, worthily bee deemed the most exact reformer of the euill, which forceth man, as neere as may be, to the will and pleasure of his Maker. But where nature or custome hath entertained a vicious, yet not intolerable habite, with so long and so publike approbation, that the vertue opposing it would seeme as vn-couth, as it were to walke naked in England, or to weare the English fashion of apparel in Turkie: there may a wise and vpriht Law-giuer, without presumption, omit somewhat that the rigour of Moses his law required; euen as the good King Hezekiah did, in a matter merely Ecclesiasticall, and therefore the lesse capable of dispensation, praying for the people; The good Lord be mercifull vnto him, that prepareth his whole heart to seeke the Lord God, the God of his Fathers, though he bee not cleansed according to the purification of the Sanctuarie: which praiser the Lord heard and granted.

2 Chron. cap. 30.

21. 19.

To this effect it is well obserued by Maister Doctor Willet, that the morall Iudicialls of Moses doe partly binde, and partly are let free. They doe not hold affirmatiuely that we are tyed to the same seueritie of punishment now, which was inflicted then; but negatiuely they doe hold, that now the punishment of death should not be adiudged, where sentence of death is not giuen by Moses: Christian Magistrates ruling vnder Christ the Prince of peace, that is, of Clemencie and Mercy, may abate of the seueritie of Moses law, and mitigate the punishment of death, but they cannot adde vnto it to make the burden more heauie: for to shew more rigour than Moses, becommeth not the Gospel.

But I will not wander in this copious argument, which hath beene the subiect of

many learned discourses, neither will I take vpon mee, to speake any thing definitively in a case which dependeth, still in some controuersie among worthie Diuines. Thus much (as in honour of the Iudiciall Law, or rather of him that gaue it) I may well and truly say, that the defence of it hath alwaies bene very plausible. And surely howsoeuer they bee not accepted (neither were it expedient) as a generall and onely law; yet shall wee hardly finde any other ground, whereon the conscience of a Iudge may rest, with equall satisfaction, in making interpretation, or giuing sentence vpon doubts, arising out of any Law besides it. Hereof, perhaps, that Iudge could haue bene witnesse, of whom Fortescue that notable Bulwarke of our lawes doth speake, complaining of a judgement giuen against a Gentle-woman at Salisbury, who being accused by her owne Man, without any other prooff, for murdering her Husband, was thereupon condemned, and burnt to ashes: the man who accused her, within a yeere after being Conuict for the same offence, confest that his Mistris was altogether innocent of that cruell fact, whose terrible death hee then (though ouer-late) grievously lamented: but this Iudge, saith the same Authour, Sapius ipse mihi fassus est, quod nunquam in vita sua animam eius de hoc facto ipse purgaret; Hee himselfe often confessed vnto mee, that hee should neuer during his life, be able to cleare his conscience of that fact. Wherefore that acknowledgement which other Sciences yeeld vnto the Metaphysiques, that from thence are drawne propositions, able to prooue the principles of Sciences, which out of the Sciences themselves cannot be proued, may iustly be granted by all other politike institutions, to that of Moses; and so much the more iustly, by how much the subject of the Metaphysiques, which is, Ens quatenus Ens; Being as it is being, is infinitely inferior to the Ens Entium; The being of beings, the only good, the fountaine of truth, whose feare is the beginning of wisdom. To which purpose well saith Saint AUGUSTINE, Conditor legum temporalium se vir bonus est & sapiens; illam ipsam consilii aeternam de qua nulli anima iudicare datum est; The Author of temporall lawes if hee bee good and wise, doth therein consult the law eternall, to determine of which there is no power giuen to any soule. And as well Prince Edward, in Fortescue his discourse, Nemo potest melius aut aliud fundamentum ponere, quam posuit Dominus; No man can lay a better or another foundation, than the Lord hath laid.

The Storie of the Israelites from the receiuing of the Law to the death of MOSES.

§. I.

Of the numbering and disposing of the Hosts of Israel, for their marches through the Wildernesse; with a note of the reuerence giuen to the worship of God, in this ordering of their troupes.

HEN Moses had receiued the Law from God, and published it among the people, and finished the tabernacle of the Arke and Sanctuarie; hee mustered all the Tribes and Families of Israel; and hauing scene what numbers of men fit to beare armes, were found in euery Tribe, from 20. yeeres of age vpwards; hee appointed vnto them, by direction from the Lord, such Princes and Leaders, as in worth and reputation were in euery Tribe most eminent. The number of the whole Armie was 603550. able men for the warres, besides women and children; also, besides the strangers which followed them out of Aegypt. This great Armie was diuided by Moses into foure 30 grosse and mightie Battalions, each of which contained the strength of three whole Tribes.

The first of these containing 186400. able men, consisted of three Regiments; which may well, in respect of their numbers, bee called Armies; as containing the three whole Tribes of Judah, Issachar, and Zabulon. In the Tribe of Judah were 74600 fighting men, led by Nasfon; in Issachar 54400. led by Nathaniel; in Zabulon 57400. led by Eliab. All these marched vnder the Standard of the Tribe of Judah, who held the Vauntguard, and was the first that mooued and marched, being lodged and quartered at their generall incamping on the East side of the Armie, which was held the first place, and of greatest dignity.

The second Battalion or Armie, called in the Scriptures the Host of Reuben, had 151450. able men, in number 151450. All which marched vnder the Standard of Reuben. In the Tribe of Reuben were 46500. vnder Elizur; in Simcon 59300. vnder Shelumiel; in Gad 45650. vnder Elisaph. These had the second place, and incamped on the South side of the Tabernacle.

The third Armie marched vnder the Standard of Ephraim, to whom were ioyned the Regiments of Manasse and Beniamin, who ioyned together, made in number 108100. able men. These marched in the third place, incamping on the West quarter of the Tabernacle. Ephraim had 40500. vnder Elisbana; Manasse 32200. vnder Gamil; Beniamin 35400. vnder Abidan.

The fourth and last Armie, or Squadron, of the generall Armie, containing 157600. able men, marched vnder the Standard of Dan; to whom were ioyned the two Tribes of Nephthali and Asher. And these had the Rearward, and moued last, incamping on the North side. Dan had 62700. vnder Abiezzer; Asher 41500. vnder Pegiel; Nephthali 53400. vnder Abira.

Besides

Besides these Princes of the severall Tribes, there were ordained Captaines over Thousands, over Hundreds, over Fifties, and over Tens; as it may appear by that mutinie and insurrection against Moses, Num. 16. v. 1. & 2. For there arose vp against Moses 250. Captaines of the Assembly, famous in the Congregation, and men of renowne: of which number were Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. Which three principle Mutiners, with those 250. Captaines that followed them, were not any of the twelve Princes of the Tribes, or Generall Colonells before spoken of, as by their names Num. 1. is made manifest.

The blessing which Israel gave to his children, tooke place not onely in the division of the Land of promise, and other things of more consequence, long after following; but even in forcing them vnder their severall Standards in the wilderness it was observed. For Isaiah had the precedence and the greatest Armie, which also was wholly compounded of the sonnes of Lea, Jacobs wife. Ruben having lost his birth-right, followed in the second place, accompanied with his brother Simion, who had undergone his Fathers curse; and with Gad, the sonne of his Mothers Hand-maide. Joseph, who in temporall blessings had the prerogative of the first borne a double portion, was accounted as two Tribes, and divided vnto two Regiments: the younger (according to Jacobs propheticie) taking place before the Elder. He was assisted by Beniamin, his best beloved brother, the other sonne of Rachel. To Dan, the eldest sonne of Jacobs Concubines, was given the leading of the fourth Armie, according to Jacobs propheticie. Hee had with him vnder his Standard none of the children of Lea, or Rachel, but onely the sonnes of the Hand-maides.

In the middle of these foure Armies, was the Tabernacle, or portable Temple of the Congregation carried, surrounded by the Leuites. Neere vnto which, as the Heathens and Pagans could not approach, by reason of these foure powerfull Armies which guarded the same: so was it death for any of the children of Israel to come nere it, who were not of the Leuites, to whom the charge was committed. So sacred was the moveable Temple of God, and with such reverence guarded and transported, as 22000. persons were dedicated to the service and attendance thereof: of which 8580. had the peculiar charge, according to their severall offices and functions; the particulars whereof are written in the third and fourth of Numbers. And as the Armies of the people observed the former order in their incampings: so did the Leuites quarter themselves, as in an inner square, on every side of the Tabernacle; the Gisburites on the West, within the Armie, and Standard of Ephraim, over whom Elisaph commanded, in number 7500. The familie of Cobath on the South side, guided by Elizaphan, within the Armie of Reuben, and betwene him and the Tabernacle, in number 8600. The third companie were of the familie of Merari, over whom Zurriel commaunded, in number 6200. and these were lodged on the North side within the Armie of Dan; On the East side, and next within those Tribes and Forces which Isaiah did, Moses and Aaron lodge, and their children, 40 who were the first and immediate Commanders, both of the Ceremonies and of the People; vnder whom, as the chiefe of all the other Leuiticall families, was Elesazar the sonne of Aaron, his successeur in the high Priest-hood.

This was the order of the Armie of Israel, and of their incamping and marching; the Tabernacle of God being alway set in the middle and center thereof. The reverend care, which Moses the Prophet, and chosen servant of God, had in all that belonged even to the outward and least parts of the Tabernacle, Arke and Sanctuarie, witnessed well the inward and most humble zeale borne towards God himselfe. The industrie vsed in the framing thereof, and every, and the least part thereof; the curious workmanship thereon bestowed; the exceeding charge and expence in the provisions; the dutifull observance in the laying vp and preserving the holic Vessels; the solemne removing thereof; the vigilant attendance thereon, and the proud defence of the same, which all Ages have in some degree imitated, is now so forgotten and cast away in this super-fine Age, by those of the Familie, by the Anabaptist, Brownist, and other Selfaries, as all cost and care bestowed and had of the Church, wherein God is to be served and worshipped, is accounted a kinde of Peperie, and as proceeding from an idolatrous disposition: inso much as Time would soone bring to passe (if it were not resisted) that God would be turned out of Churches into Barnes, and from thence againe into the Fields and Mountaines; and vnder the Hedges; and the Offices of the Ministerie (robbed of all dignitie and respect) bee as contemptible as these places; all Order, Discipline, and Church-governement, left to newnesse of opinion, and mens fancies: yea, and soone after, as many Kindes of Religions would spring vp, as there are Parish Churches within England: every contentious and ignorant person clothing his fancie with the Spirit of God, and his imagination with the gift of Renelation; inso much, as when the Truth, which is but one, shall appear to the simple multitude, no lesse variable than contarie to it selfe, the Faith of men will soone after dye away by degrees, and all Religion bee held in scorne and contempt. Which distraction gave a great Prince of Germanie cause of this answer to those that perswaded him to become a Lutheran, Si me adiungo vobis, tunc condemnor ab alijs: si me alijs adiungo, à vobis condemnor: quid fugiam videro, sed quid sciam, non habeo: si I adiecyne my selfe to you, I am condemned by others; if I ioyne with others, I am condemned by you; What I should avoide I see, but I know not what I should follow.

Anabaptist

The offerings of the twelve Princes: the Passover of the second yeare: The departing of IETHRO.

OW when Moses had taken order for all things necessarie, provided for the service of God, written the Lawes, numbered his Armie, and divided them into the battailes and troupes before remembered, and appointed them Leaders of all forts, The twelve Princes or Commanders of the Tribes brought their offerings before the Lord, to wit, Num. 8. like covered Chariots, and twelve Oxen to draw them, therein to transport, as they marched, the parts of the Tabernacle, with all that belonged therunto: the Sanctuarie excepted, which for reverence was carryed vpon the shoulders of the sonnes of Korah, to whom the charge was committed; and the Chariots in which was continued the other parts of the Tabernacles and Vessels thereto belonging, were delivered to the Leuites for that service, namely to the sonnes of Gershon and Merari. Besides these Chariots, each of these Commanders, Princes, or Heads of Tribes, offered vnto God, and for his service in the Temple, a charger of fine silver, weighing 130. sheekles; a silver Boll of 70. sheekles; after the shekle of the Sanctuarie; and an incense-Cup of gold, of ten sheekles, which they performed at the same time when the Altar was dedicated vnto God by Aaron: and before they marched from Sinai towards their conquest, besides the bealls which they offered for sacrifice, according to the law Ceremoniall, the weight of all the twelve silver chargers, and twelve silver Bolles, amounted vnto 2400. sheekles of silver; and the weight of gold in the incense-Cups, to 120. sheekles of gold; which makes of sheekles of silver 1200. every shekle of gold valuing ten of silver, so that the whole of gold & silver which they offered at this time, was about foure hundredth and twentie pound sterling. This done, Moses, as in all the rest by the Spirit of God conducted, gave order for the celebrating of the Passover, which they performed on the fourteenth day of the second moneth of the second yeare: and on the 20. day of the same, the cloude was lifted vp from above the Tabernacle, as a signe of going forward; Moses beginning his march with this invocation to God; Rise vp, Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered, and let them that hate thee, flee before thee. Then all the people of Israel removed from their incamping at the foote of the Mountaine Sinai, towards Paran the

The Hebrew Gersh weighed each sixe hundred sheekles: so a Gersh of silver is about three halfpence sterling: the Sicle of the Sanctuarie (as it is expounded Exod. 20.33) conceiveth 20. Gersals so a Sanctuarie Sicle of silver is about 7. groats the common Sicle is but halfe so much, to wit ten Gersals: as it is visually expounded 1. Thos. 2. 11. Exod. 20.33 Num. 10. 11. Exod. 20.33 Num. 9. 17.

the Armie, or great Squadron of Juda, led by Nashon, taking the Vauanguard, followed by Nethaneel and Eliab, Leaders of the Tribes of Issachar and Zabulon: after whom the rest marched, as in the figure exprest. And because the passage through so many Desarts and Mountaines, was exceeding difficult: Moses leaving nothing unforethought which might serue for the advancement of his enterprize, he instantly intreated his Father-in-law, whom in the tenth of Numbers hee calleth Hobab, to accompanie them in their journey towards Canaan; promising him such part and profit of the enterprize, as God should bestow on them: for this man, as hee was of great vnderstanding and iudgement (as appeared by the Counsaile he gaue to Moses for the appointing of Iudges ouer the people) so was hee a perfect guide in all those parts, himselfe inhabiting on the frontier thereof, at Midian, or Madian: and (as it seemeth) a man of great yeeres and experience; for he was then the Priest or Prince of Midian, when Moses fled first out of Egypt, and married his Daughter, which was 42. yeeres before this request made. And though Moses himselfe had liued 40. yeeres in these parts of Arabia, through which hee was now to trauell: yet the better to assure his passage, and so great a multitude of soules, which could not bee so few as a Million, it was necessarie to vse many guides, and many conductors. To this request of Moses, it may seeme by the places, Exod. 18. 2. 7. and Num. 10. 30. that Hobab, otherwise called Hobab, yielded not: for it is euident, that he went backe from Moses into his owne Countrie. But because it appeareth by other places of Scripture, that the posteritie of this Hobab was mingled with the Israelites, it is most likely that this his returne to his owne Countrie was rather to fetch away his familie, and to take his leaue of his owne Countrie, by setting things in order, than to abide there.

§. III.

The voiage from Horeb to Kades: the mutinies by the way: and the cause of their turning backe to the red Sea.

FTER this dismissal of Hobab, Israel beganne to march towards the Desarts of Paran: and after three daies wandring, they sate downe at the Sepalehers of Iust, afterward called Tabera, or Incenso: by reason that God consumed with fire those Mutiners and Murmurers which rose vp in this remoue, which happened about the 23. day of the same Moneth. And from this 23. day of the second moneth, of the second yeere, they rested and fed themselves with Quailles (which it pleased God by a Sea-winde to cast vpon them) to the 24. day of the third moneth, to wit, all the moneth of Sinan or Iane: whereof surfaiting there died great numbers: from whence in the following moneth, called Thamus, answering to our Iuly, they went on to Hazereth, where Miriam 40 the sister of Moses was stricken with the leprosie, which continued vpon her seuen daies, after whose recovery Israel remoued toward the border of Idumaea; and incamped at Rithma, neere Kades Barnea, from whence Moses sent the twelue discoverers into the Territorie of Canaan, both to informe themselves of the fertilitie and strength of the Countrie; as also to take knowledge of the Waies, Passages, Riuers, Fords, and Mountaines. For Arad King of the Canaanites surprised diuers companies of the Israelites, by lying in ambush neere those waies, through which the discoverers and searchers of the Land had formerly past. Now, after the returne of the discoverers of Cades, the wrath of God was turned against Israel: whose ingratitude and rebellion after His so many benefits, so many remissions, so many miracles wrought, was such, as they esteemed their deliuerance from the Egyptian sla- 50 uerie, his feeding them, and conducting them through that great and terrible wilderness (for so Moses calleth it) with the victorie which hee gaue them against the powerfull Amalekites, to be no other then the effects of his hatred, thinking that hee led led them on and preserved them, but to bring them, their wiues, and children to be slaughtered, and giuen for a prey and spoile to the Amorites or Canaanites. For it was reported vnto them, by the searchers of the Land, that the Cities of their enemies were walled and defended with many strong Towers and Castles; that many of the people were Giantlike (for they confest that they saw the sonnes of Anac: there who were men of fearefull stature, and so farre ouer-topped the Israelites, as they appeared to them, and to themselves, but as Grashoppers in their respect. Now, as this mutinie exceeded all the rest, wherein they both accused God, and consulted to chooe them a Captaine (or as they call it now-a-daies, an Electio) to carry them 10 backe againe into Egypt; so did God punish the same in a greater measure, than any of the former. For he extinguisht euery soule of the whole multitude (Iosua and Caleb excepted) who being confident in Gods promises, perswaded the people to enter Canaan, being then neere it; and at the mountaine foote of Idumaea; which is but narrow, laying before them the fertilitie thereof; and assuring them of victorie. But as men, whom the passion of feare had bereaued both of reason and common sense, they threatened to stone these encouragers to death; accounting them as 20 men either desperate in themselves, or betrayers of the liues, goods, and children of all their brethren, to their enemies; but God resisted these wicked purposes, and interpoling the feare of his bright glory betweene the vnadvised furie of the multitude, and the innocencie and constancie of his seruants, preserved them thereby from their violence; threatening an intire destruction of the whole Nation, by sending among them a consuming and mercilesse pestilence. For this was the tenth in- 30 surrection and rebellion, which they had made, since God deliuered them from the slaerie of the Egyptians. But Moses (the mildest or meekest of all men) praied vnto God to remember his infinite mercies; alledging, that this so seuer a iudgement, how deseruedly soeuer afflicted, would increase the pride of the Heathen Nations, and giue them occasion to vaunt, that the God of Israel, failing in power to performe his promises, suffered them to perish in these barren and fruitlesse Desarts. Yet as God is no lesse iust than merciful, as God is slow to anger, so is his wrath a consu- 30 ming fire; the same being once kindled by the violent breath of mans ingratitude; & therefore, as with a hand lesse heauy than hoped for, he scourged this iniquitie, so by the measure of his glory (euermore iealous of neglect and desicion) he suffered not the wicked to passe vnpunished; reseruing his compassion for the innocent: whom, because they participated not with the offences of their Fathers, he was pleased to preserve, and in them to performe his promises, which haue neuer bene frustrated.

§. IIII.

Of their unwillingnesse to returne: with the punishment thereof, and of diuers accidents in the returne.

OW when Moses had reuealed the purposes of God to the people, and made them know his heauie displeasure towards them, they beganne to bewaile themselves, though ouer-late: the times of grace and mens repentance, hauing also their appointment. And then when God had left them to themselves, and was no more among them, after they had so often plaid and dallied with his mercifull sufferings, they would needs amend their former disobedience by a second contempt: and make offer to enter the Land contrarie againe to the aduice of Moses, who assured them, 50 that God was not now among them; and that the Arke of his couenant should not moue, but by His direction, who could not erre; and that the enemies sword which God had hitherto bended and rebated, was now left no lesse sharpe than death; and in the hands of the Amalekites, and Canaanites no lesse cruel. But as men from whom God hath with-drawne his grace, doe alwaies follow those counsells which carrie them them to their own destructions: so the Hebrewes, after they had forsaken the opportunity by God and their Conductors offered: and might then have entered India before their enemies were prepared and joyned; did afterward, contrarie to Gods commaundement, vnder take the enterprise of themselves; and ranne headlong and without aduice into the mountaines of Idumaea. There the Canaanites and the Amalekites being joyned and attending their aduantage, set on them, brake them: and of their numbers slaughtered the greatest part: and following their victorie and pursuite, consumed them all the way of their flight even vnto Hormab: the Amalekites in reuenge of their former losse, and ouerthrow at Raphidim: the Canaanites to prevent their displantation and destruction threatned. Of which power, full assemblie of those two Nations (assisted in all likelihood with the neighbour Kings joyned together for their common safetie) it pleased God to forwarne Moses, and to direct him another way, than that formerly intended. For he commaunded him to returne by those painefull passages of the Desarts, through which they had formerly trauelled, till they found the banks of the red Sea againe: in which retraite before they came backe to passe ouer Jordan, there were consumed 38. yeeres; and the whole number of the sixe hundredth and odde thousand, which came out of Egypt (Moses, Ioshua and Caleb excepted) were dead in the Wilderness, the stubborne and carelesse generations were wholly worne out, and the promised Land bestowed on their children; which were increased to 600000. and 20 more. For besides the double fault both of refusing to enter the Land vpon the returne of the discouersers, and the presumption then to attempt it, when they were countermanded: it seemeth that they had committed that horrible Idolatrie of worshipping Moloch, and the Host of heauen. For although Moses doth not mention it, yet Amos doth, and so doth the Martyr Stephen, as also that the Isra. elites worshipped the Sunne and Moone in after-times; it is proued out of sundry other places.

Now after the broken companies were returned to the Campe at Cades, Moses, according to the commaundement received from God, departed towards the South from whence he came, to recover the shoares of the Red Sea. And so from Cades or Rithma he remooued to Remmanparez, so called of abundance of Pomegranates there found and diuided among them. From thence he went on to Libnah, taking that name of the Frankincense there found. From Libnah hee crost the valley, and fate downe at Reffa, neere the foote of the mountaine. And after he had rested there, he bended towards the West, and incamped at Ceclata; where one of the Hebrewes, for gathering broken wood on the Sabbath, was stoned to death. After which, Moses alwaies keeping the valley, between two great ledges of mountaines (those which bound the Desart of Sin, and those of Pharan) crost the same from Ceclata, and marched Eastward to the mountaine of Saffer, or Sepher: this making the Twentieth mansion. From thence he passed on to Harada; then to Maeloth; 40 and then to Thabab; & so to Thara or Thare: the foure & twentieth mansion. Where while Moses rested, the people began that insolent and dangerous mutinie of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram; who for their contempt of God and his Ministers, were some of them swallowed vp alive, and by the earth opening her mouth deuoured; others, euen two hundred and fiftie which offered incense with Korah, were consumed with fire from heauen; & 14700. of their partie, which murmured against Moses, stricken dead with a sudden pestilence: one of the greatest maruailes and iudgements of God, that hath bene shewed in all the time of Moses his gouernment, or before. For among so great a multitude, those lay-men who would haue vsurped Ecclesiasticall authoritie, were suddenly swallowed vp alive into the earth with their families and goods; euen while they sought to ouerthrow the Order, Discipline, and power of the Church, and to make all men alike therein, rebelliously contending against the High Priest and Magistrate, to whom God had committed the gouernment both of his Church and Common-weale of his people. And the better to assure the people, and out of his great mercie to confirme them, it pleased him in this place also to approue by miracle the former election of his seruant Aaron, by the twelue rods giuen in by the Heads of the twelue Tribes; of which Moses receiued one of euerie Head, and Prince of his Tribe: which being all withered and drie Wands, and on euerie rod the name of the Prince of the Tribe written, and Aarons on that of Leui; it pleased God, that the rod of Aaron receiued by his power a vegetable Spirit, and hauing laine in the Tabernacle of the Congregation before the Ark one night, had on it both Buddes, Bloffomes, and ripe Almonds.

10 From Tharab the whole Armie remoued to Meibra; and thence to Ejmona; and thence to Moseroth, (or Masurit after S. Hierome) and from Moseroth to Lenecianan; and so to Gadgad, which Hierome calleth Gadgad; thence to Jetabata, the thirtieth Mansion; where from certaine fountaines of water gathered in one, Adrichomius maketh a Riuer, which falleth into the Red Sea, betwene Madian and Ajsongaber.

Now although it be very probable, that at Ajsongaber, where Salomon furnished his Fleetes for the East India: there was store of fresh water; and though Herodotus maketh mention of a great Riuer in Arabia the sunne, which he calleth Corys, from whence (saith hee) the inhabitants conueigh water in pipes of leather to other places, by which device the King of Arabia relieved the Armie of Cambyses: yet is Adrichomius greatly deceived, as many times he is, in finding these springs at Gadgad, or Jetabata, being the nine and twentieth or thirtieth Mansion. For it was at Punon, that those Springs are spoken of, which in Deut. the 10. v. 7. is also called Jetabata, or Isibath, a Land of running waters, and which by all probability fall into the Riuer Zared, the next adioyning. And that these Springs should fall into the Red Sea, at Ajsongaber, or Eloth, I cannot beleue, for the way is very long. And this I finde in Belonius, that there are diuers Torrents of fresh water in those sandie parts of Arabia: which though they continue their course for a few miles, yet they are drunke vp by the hot and thirstie sand, before they can recover the banks of the Red Sea.

From Jetabata, Moses directed his journey towards the Red Sea, and incamped at Hebronan, and from thence to Ejsongaber: which Citie in Iosephus time had the name of Berenice; and in *Hierom*s Ejsia. From thence keeping the Sea, and Eloth on his right hand, he turned towards the North, as he was by God commanded: Ejsongaber being the farthest place towards the South-East, that Moses traauelled in that passage.

It seemeth that Ejsongaber or Ajsongaber, Eloth and Madian were not at this time in the possession of the Kings of Edom. For it is said, That the Lord spake vnto Moses and Aaron in the Mount Hore; neere the coast of the Land of Edom; so as the Mount Hore was at this time in the South border of Idumaea. And if Ejsongaber, and the other places neere the Red Sea, had at this present been subiect to the Idumaeans, Moses would also haue demanded a free passage through them. It is true, that in the future the Idumaeans obtained those places: for it is said, And they arose out of Midian, and came to Pharan, and tooke men with them; which were those companies that followed yong Aad of Idumaea, into Egypt, when he fled from Isab. Likewise it is said of Salomon, that he made a Nautie of ships in Ejsongaber besides Eloth, in the Land of Edom.

Of Moses arrivall at Zim Kades: and the accidents while they abode there.

10 From Ejsongaber he turned againe towards the North, and pitched in the Wilderness of Zim, which is Kadesh: or in Beroth, of the children of Isaac; where they fate downe in the first Moneth of the fortieth yeere after they left Egypt. For at the next Mansion Aaron died in the first day of the fifth Moneth of the fortieth yeere: the nine and thirtieth yeere taking end at Ezionabab. And at this Citie of Cades (for so it was thought to be) or nere it, died Miriam or Mary, Moses sister, whose Sepulchre was to be seen in Saint Ethermes time, as himselfe auoweth. From hence ere they departed to the Mountaine Hor, all the people murmured most violently against Moses, by reason of the scaritie of water. For neither the punishments by fire from Heauen; by being deuoured and swallowed vp by the earth; by the fudden pestilence, which often seized them; nor any miracle formerly shewing, either the loue or wrath of God, could preuaile with this Nation any longer, than while they were filled and satisfied in euery of their appetites: but in stead of seeking for helpe and reliefe at Gods hands, when they suffered hunger, thirst, or any other want, they murmured, repined, and rebelled, repenting them of their changed estates, and calling vngratefully on Moses all their misaduentures; yea, though they well knew that their owne Fathers had left their bodies in the Desarts, and that they were now entred into the fortieth yeere, wherein all their miseries were to take end. And being, as it were, in the light of the Land promised, they againe as oblatinately tempted God as in former times, and neither trusted his promises, nor feared his indignation. But as the will and purposes of God are without beginning; so his mercies being without end, he commanded Moses to strike a Rocke adioyning with his rod; and the waters issued out in a great abundance, with which both themselves and their cattell were satisfied. Neuertheless, because God perceived a kinde of diffidence both in Moses and Aaron, at this place; therefore he permitted neither of them to enter the Land promised, whereto perchance their worldly desires might inuite them. But it pleased Him to end the troubles of Aaron at the Mountaine Hor, being the next, and foure and thirtieth Station. At which Mountaine of Hor, Aaron was depouled of the Garments of his Priest-hood, and the same put on Eleazar his Sonne, as God had commanded. Which done, Moses and Eleazar descended the Mountaine; but God receiued Aaron on the top thereof, and hee was no more seene.

Of this Mountaine called Hor, otherwile Mosera, as in Deuter. 10. vers. 6. those Horites tooke name, which the Idumeans had formerly vanquished. Some there are, which make Mosera, which was the seuen and twentieth Mansion; and Mosera which they write Moseroth for difference, which was the foure and thirtieth Mansion, and is also called Hor, to betwo distinct places: because Moses in passing from Cadesbarne towards Ezionabab, incamped at Mosera, after he departed from Hefmona, and before hee came to Beniacan. And this Mosera, which is also called Hor, he came vnto after hee left Cades, where Miriam, Moses sister died; the first being the seuen and twentieth, and the second being the foure and thirtieth Mansion. But for Hor, which is also called Mosera, it should haue beene written, Hor iuxta Mosera; Hor neere Mosera: for it is but one roote of a Mountaine, diuided into diuers tops, as Sinai and Horib are: Whereof the West part Moses calleth Mosera, and the East part Horib. By the West part Moses encamped, as he past towards the Red Sea, on his left hand; by the East part, as hee went backe againe North-wards towards Moab: as in the description of Moses his passage through Arabia, the Reader may perceiue.

Now it was from Cades, before they came to Hor, because Hor belonged to Edom, that Moses sent Messengers to the Prince of Idumaea, praying him that hee might passe with the people of Israel through his Territorie into the Land of Canaan, which bordered it. For it was the neereist way of all other from the Citie of Kadesh, where Moses then encamped; whereas otherwile taking his iourney by the Riuers of Zared, Arnon, and Iordan, hee might haue runne into many bazzards in the passage of those Riuers, the farre way about, and the many powerfull Kings, which commaunded in those Regions. Now the better to perswade the Prince of Idumaea hereunto, Moses remembered him, that hee was of the same race and familie with Israel: calling him by the name of Brother, because both the Edomites and Israelites were the Sonnes of one Father, to wit, Isaac; inferring thereby, that hee had more reason to fauour and respect them, than hee had to assault the Canaanites; against whom Esaus his Ancestor had made warre, and driven out the Horites (who were of their ancient races descended of Cham) out of the Region of Scir, calling it by his owne name Edom, or Edumaea. Hee also making a short repetition of Gods blessings bestowed on them, and of his purposes and promises; assured Edom, or the King thereof, that hee would not way offend his people, or waste his Countrey, but that hee would retrain his Armie within the bounds of the Common, and Kings high wayes, paying money for whatsoever hee vsed, yea, euen for the water, which themselves or their Cattell should drinke. For Moses was commaunded by God, not to provoke the children of Esaus. But the King of Edumaea knowing the strength of his owne Countrey, the same being neere Canaan, rampard with high and sharpe mountaines: and without susppecting, as a naturall wise man, that 600000. strangers being once entred his Countrey, it would rest in their wills to giue him law, resolutely refused them passage, and deliuered this answer to the Messengers: That, if they attempted to enter that way, hee would take them for enemies, and resist them by all possible meane. And not knowing whether such a deniall might satisfie or exasperate, hee gathered the strength of his Countrey together, and shewed himselfe prepared to defend their passage. For, as it is written; Then Edom came out against him (to wit, Moses) with much people, and with a mighty power. Whereupon Moses considering, that the end of his enterprise was not the conquest of Seir or Edumaea, and that the Land promised was that of Canaan: like vnto himselfe who was of a naturall vnderstanding the greatest of any man, and the skilfullest man of warre that the world had, hee refused to aduenture the Armie of Israel against a Nation, which being ouer-come, gaue but a passage to invade others; and which by reason of the seate of their mountainous Countrey, could not but haue endangered, or (at least) greatly enfeebled the strength of Israel, and rendred them lesse able, if not altogether powerlesse, to haue conquered the rest.

Edomites

p. VI.

Of their compassing Idumaea, and trauielling to Arnon, the border of Moab.

Et therefore leauing the way of Idumaea, turned himselfe towards the East, and marched towards the Desarts of Moab. Which when Arad King of the Canaanites vnderstood, and that Moses had blanced the way of Edumaea; and knowing that it was Canaan, and not Edom, which Israel aimed at, hee thought it safest, rather to finde his enemies in his neighbours Countrey, than to be found by them in his owne: which he might haue done with a farre greater hope of victorie, had Moses bene enforst first to haue made his way by the sword through Idumaea, and thereby though victorious, greatly haue lessened his numbers. But although it fell out otherwile than Arad hoped for, yet being resolute to make triall, what courage the Israelites brought with them out of Egypt, before they came neerer his owne home, leading the strength of his Nation to the edge of the Desert, hee set vpon some part of the Armie; which, for the multitude occupied a great space, and for the many herds of Cattell that they draue with them, could not encampe so neere together, but that some quarter or other was cuer-more subiect to surpris. By which aduantage, and in that his attempts were then perchance vnexpected, he slew some few of the Israelites, and carried with him many prisoners.

Now it is very probable, that it was this Canaanite, or his Predecessour, which ioyned his forces with the Amalekites, and gaue an ouerthrow to those mutinous Israelites, which without direction from God by Moses would haue entred Canaan from Cadesbarne. For it seemeth that the greatit number of that Armie were of the Canaanites, becaufe in the first of Deuteron. 44. the Amorites are named alone without the Amalekites, and are said to haue beaten the Israelites at that time. And this Arad, if hee were the same that had a victory ouer Israel, neere Cadesbarne, or if it were his Predecessour that then preuailed, this man finding that Moses was returned from the Red Sea, and in his way towards Canaan, and that the South part of Canaan was first to bee inuaded, and in danger of beeing conquered, not knowing of Moses purpose to compass Moab, determined while he was yet in the Desert to trie the quarrell. And whereas it followeth in the third verse of the twelfth Chapter of Numbers, that the Israelites vterly destroyed the Canaanites and their Cities, they are much mistaken that thinke, that this destruction was presently performed by the Israelites. But it is to be vnderstood, to haue bene done in the future, to wit, in the time of Iosua. For had Moses at this time entred Canaan in the pursuit of Arad, hee would not haue fallen backe againe into the Desarts of Zin and Moab, and haue fetcht a wearisome and needelesse compasse, by the Riuer of Zared and Arnon.

NUM. 33. 40.

Neither is their coniecture to bee valued at any thing, which affirme, that Arad did not inhabit any part of Canaan it selfe, but that his Territorie lay without, and neere the Mountain Hor. For Hor and Zin Cades were the South borders of Edom, and not of Canaan. And it was in the South of the Land of Canaan, that Arad dwelt: which South part of Canaan was the North part of Edom.

Again, Horma (for so farre the Israelites after their victory pursued the Canaanites) is located in the South of Iudaea. There is also a Citie of that name in Simen. But there is no such place to the South of Edom. And were there no other argument, but the mutinie which followed presently after the repetition of this victory, it were enough to prooue, that the same was obtained in the future, and in Iosua his time, and not at the instant of Arads assault. For had the Israelites at this time sackt the Cities of Arad, they would not the next day haue complained for want of water and bread. For where there are great Cities, there is also water, and bread. But it was in the time of Iosua, that the Israelites tooke their reuenge, and after they had past Jordan: Iosua then gouerning them; who in the twelfth Chapter and fourteenth Verse, nameth this Arad by the name of his Citie so called; and with him the King of Horma: to which place the Israelites pursued the Canaanites. And hee nameth them amongst those Kings, which hee vanquished, and put to death.

Now after this assault and surpris by Arad, Moses finding that all entrance on that side was defended, heeled the people Eastward to compass Idumaea and the Dead Sea, and to make his entrance by Arnon and the Plaines of Moab, at that time in the possession of the Amorites. But the Israelites, to whom the very name of a Desert was terrible, began againe to rebell against their Leader; till God by a multitude of fiery Serpents, (that is, by the biting of Serpents, whose venom inflamed them, and burnt them as fire) made them know their error, and afterward, according to his plentifull grace cured them againe by their beholding an artificiall Serpent, by his Commandement set vp.

From the Mount Hor, Moses leauing the ordinarie way which lyeth betweene the Red Sea, and Callosyria, encamped at Zalmone: and thence hee remooued to Phunon, where hee erected the Brazen Serpent; making theie journeyes by the edge of Edumaea, but without it. For Phunon was sometime a principall Citie of the Edumites. Now where it is written in Numbers 21. Verse 4. That from Mount Hor they departed by the way of the Red Sea, which grieved the people, it was not thereby meant that the Israelites turned backe towards the Red Sea; neither neither did they march (according to Fonseca) per viam, qua habet à l'extremite rubrum; By the way that sided the Red Sea, but in decde they croit, and went athwart the common way from Galaad, Trachonitis, and the Countries of Moab, to the Red Sea, that is, to Ejiongaber, Eloth, and Midian: which way, as it lay North and South, so Israel to flunne the border of Edom, and to take the vtmost East part of Moab, croit the common way towards the East, and then they turned againe towards the North, as before.

From Phunon he went to Oboth; where they entred the Territory of Moab, adioyning to the Land of Sapha, a Countrey bordering on the Dead Sea; and from thence to Abarim, the eight and thirtieth Manzion, that is, where the Mountaines so called take beginning, and are as yet but small Mountures of Hills, on the East border of Moab; From thence they recouered Dibon Gad, or the Riuer of Zared, which riseth in the mountaines of Arabia, and runneth towards the Dead Sea, not farre from Petra the Metropolis thereof, being the nine and thirtieth Station. And hauing past that Riuer, they lodged at Dibon Gad, and from thence they kept the way to Diblahaim, one of the Cities of Moab; which Hieremie the Prophet e. 48. v. 22. calleth the House of Diblahaim, the same which afterward was destroyed among the rest by Nabuchadnezzar. From thence they came to the Riuer of Arnon, and encamped in the mountaines of Abarim: though in the 22. of Numbers, Moses doth not remember Heimen diblahaim, but speaketh of his remooue from the Riuer of Zared, immediately to the other side of Arnon; calling Arnon the border of Moab, betweene them and the Amorites: speaking, as hee found the state of the Countrie at that time. For Arnon was not anciently the border of Moab, but was lately conquered from the Moabites, by Sehon, King of the Amorites: euen from the Predecessour of Salas Peor then reigning. From Diblahaim, Moses sent Messengers to Sehon, King of the Amorites, to desire a passage through his Countrie: which though he knew would be denied him, yet he desired to giue a reason to the neighbour Nations, of the warre hee vnderooke. And though Edom had refused him as Sehon did, yet hee had no warrant from God to enforce him. Moses also in sending messengers to Sehon, obserued the same precept, which he left to his posteritie, and successors, for a law of the war, namely in Deut. 20. v. 10. in these words, When thou comest neere vnto a Citie to fight against it, thou shalt offer it peace, which if it doe accept of and open vnto thee, then let all the people found therein bee tributaries vnto thee, and serue thee; but if it refuse, &c. thou shalt smite all the males thereof with the edge of the sword. Which ordinance all Commanders of Armies haue obserued to this day, or ought to haue done.

§. VII.

Of the Booke of the battailes of the Lord, mentioned in this storie, and of other Bookes mentioned in Scripture which are lost.

Now concerning the Warre betweene Israel and Sehon, Moses seemeth to referre a great part of this storie to that Booke, entituled, Liber bellorum Domini, The booke of Gods battailes: and therefore passeth ouer many encounters, and other things memorable, with greater breuitie in this place. His wordes after the Geneus translation are these. Wherefore it shall be spoken in the Booke of the battailes of the Lord, what things hee did in the Red Sea, and in the Riuer of Arnon. The Vulgar copie differeth not in sense from this: But the Greeke Septuagint varie. For the Greeke writes it to this effect; For thus it is said Of the countie of Sapha see more Chap. 10 §. 4. 1. 2. of * Sapha, a Countrey bordering the Dead Sea towards the East, as hee coniectureth, The Text hee readeth thus. Idcirco dici solet in recensione bellorum Iehoua, contra VAREBIM in Regione SVPH: & contra flumina, flumina Arnonis; Therefore it is spoken spoken in repeating of the battailes of IEMOAH, against VAMEB in the Countrey of SYPH: and against the Riuers, the Riuers of Arnon. In which words he vnderstands, that amongst the Warres which the Lord disposed for the good of the Israelites, there was in those times a famous memory in the mouth of most men, concerning the Warre of Sehon against Vahab, the King of the Moabites, and of his winning the Countrey neere Arnon, out of the possession of the Moabites. For this Vahab was the immediate Predecessour of Balac, who liued with Moses: though it be written that this Balac was the sonne of Zippor, and not of Vahab. For it seemes (as it is plain in the succession of the Edemites) that these Kingdomes were electiue, and not successiue. And as Iustus in this translation vnderstandeth no special Booke of the battailes of the Lord: so others, as Vatablus in his Annotations, doubt whether in this place any special Booke bee meant; and if any; whether it bee not a prediction of Warres in future ages, to be waged in these places, and to be written in the booke of Judges. Siracides c. 46. tells vs plainly, that those battailes of the Lord were fought by IOVA. Who was there (saith he) before him like to him? for he fought the battailes of the Lord. But seeing the Histories of the Scripture elsewhere often passe ouer matters of great weight in few words, referring the Reader to other Bookes, written of the same matter at large: therefore it seemeth probable, that such a booke as this there was; wherein the seuerall victories by Israel obtained, and also victories of other Kings, making way for the good of the Israelites, were particularly and largely so written. And that the same should now be wanting, it is not strange, seeing so many other Volumes, filled with diuine discourse, haue perished in the long race of time, or haue been destroyed by the ignorant and malicious Heathen Magistrate. For the bookes of Hierome, howsoever they haue been in later ages corrupted, and therefore now suspected, are remembered in an Epistle of Thaddeus, and cited by Origen and Ambrose, and by Tertullian.

That worke also of the Patriarch Abraham, of Formation, which others bestow on Rabbi Achiba, is no where found. The bookes remembered by Iosua c. 10. v. 13. and in the second of Samuel c. 1. v. 18. called the Booke of Iasher, or Iustorum, is also lost; wherein the stay of the Sunne and Moone in the midst of the Heauens is recorded, and how they stood still till Israel had augmented themselves of their enemies: out of which also David tooke the precept, of teaching the children of Juda, to exercise their bowes against their enemies.

Some thinke this to be the booke of eternall Predestination, in which the iust are written, according to the 69. Psalm, v. 28. where it is said, Let them be put out of the booke of life, neither let them bee written with the righteous. Hierome thinks, that David by this booke vnderstood those of Samuel; Rabbi Salomon, that the bookes of the Law are thereby meant, in which the acts of the iust Abraham, of Isaac, Jacob, and Moses, are written; others, that it was the booke of Exodus; others, as Theodoretus, that it was a Commentary vpon Iosua, by an vknowne Author.

The booke of Chozai, concerning Manasse, remembered in the second of Chron. 33. v. 18. & 16. Of this booke, also lost, Hierome conceiues that the Prophet Isey was the Author.

The same mischance came aswell to the Story of Salomon, written by Abia Silonites, who met with Jeroboam, and foretold him of his obtaining the Kingdome of Israel from the sonne of Salomon: as to the bookes of Nathan the Prophet, and to those of Ieda the Seer, remembered in the second of Chron. c. 9. v. 29. with these haue the bookes of Sherataiah and of Iado, remembered in the second of Chron. c. 12. v. 15. perished: and that of Iehu the sonne of Hanani, of the acts of Iehoshaphat, cited in the second of Chron. c. 20. v. 34. Also that booke of Salomon which the Hebrewes write Hajcirim, of 5000. verses, of which that part called Canticum Cantorum onely remaineth, 1 Kings 4. 32. and with this diuers other of Salomons workes haue perished, as his booke of the natures of Trees, Plants, Beasts, Fishes, &c. 1 King 4. 33. with therest remembered by Origen, Iosephus, Hierome, Cedrenus, Cicero, Aulanus, Picus, Mirandula, and others.

Of these and other bookes many were consumed with the same fire, wherewith Nebuchadnessar burnt the Temple of Hierusalem. But let vs returne thither where we left.

§. VIII.

Of Moses his spaying the issue of Lot; and of the Giants in those parts; and of Sehon and OG.

Hen Moses had past Arnon, hee incamped on the other side thereof at Abarim, opposite to the Citie of Nebo, leauing the Citie of Midian on his left hand, and attempting nothing vpon the Moabites on that side. For Moab did at this time inhabit on the South side of Arnon, hauing loit all his ancient and best Territories, which was now in the possession of Sehon the Amorite. For Moses was commanded by God not to molest Moab, neither to prouoke them to battaile, God hauing giuen that Land to the children of Lot; the same which was anciently posselt by the Emims, who were men of great stature, and comparable to those Giants called Anakims, or the sonnes of Anac.

God also commanded Moses to spare the Ammonites, because they likewise were descended of Lot: who had expelled from thence those Giants, which the Ammonites called Zamzummins. For it seemeth that all that part, especially to the East of Jordan, euen to the Desart of Arabia, as well on the West, as on the East side of the Mountaines of Gilead, were inhabited by Giants. And in the plantation of the Land promised, the Israelites did not at any time passe those Mountaines to the East of Basan, but left their Countrey to them, as in the description following is made manifest. We finde also, that as there were many Giants both before and after the flood: so these Nations, which anciently inhabited both the border of Canaan, and the Land it selfe, had among them many families of Giant-like men. For the Anakims dwelt in Hebron, which sometimes was called the Citie of Arbah, which Arbah in Iosua is called the Father of the Anakims; and the greatest man of the Anakims. There had also beene Giants in the Land of the Moabites, called Emims; and their chiefe Citie was Arcoer or Ar, neere the Riuer of Arnon. To the Giants of the Rephaims, the Ammonites gaue the name of Zamzummins; which were of the same ancient Cananites: and their chiefe Citie was Rabba, afterward Philadelphias. They were also called Zuzims, which is as much to say, as Viri robusti, horrendi, Gigantes, Strong men, and fearefull Giants, who inhabited other Cities of Ham, or Ham, in the same Prouince, and not farre to the North of Arcoer.

Now Moses hauing past Arnon, and being incamped at Abarim; and hauing (as before) sent to Sehon, as hee had done to Edom, to pray a passage through his Countrey, was denied it. For Sehon being made proude by his former conquest vpon Vahab the Moabite, which Nation the Amorites esteemed but as strangers and vsurers, (themselues being of the sonnes of Canaan, and the Moabites of Lot) refused to grant Israel any entrance that way; and withall prepared to encounter Moses with as much speed as he could, because Moses incamped in the Countrey of his new conquests, to wit, the Plaines of Moab, the two and fortieth and last Mansion: which Moses waded with the multitude of his people, and cattell. Towards him therefore hasting him selfe, they encountered each other at Iabaz: where Sehon with his children and people were broken and discomfited: and the victorie so pursued by Moses, as few or none of the Amorites escaped. Hee also slaughtered all the Women and Children of the Amorites, which hee found in Esebon, and all the other Cities, Villages, or Fields; they being of the race of Canaan, as those of Basan also were: and defended of Amoreus or Amoreus: for Moses calleth the Basanites also Amorites. And although Israel might now haue taken a ready way and passage into Judaea: being at this time, and after this victorie at the banks of Jordan: yet hee knew it to bee perilous perilous to leaue so great a part of that Nation of the Amorites on his backe, as inhabited all the Region of Bajan or Traconitis: and therefore he led on his Armie to invade Og: a person of exceeding strength and stature: and the only man of mark remaining of the ancient Giants of those parts, and who at that time had 60. Cities walled and defended: lying betwene the mountaine of Hermon (which mountaine saith Moses, the Sidonians call Shirion, and the Amorites Shenir) and the Riuer of Iordan. And it befell vnto the King of Bajan (who attended Moses coming at Edrei) as it did vnto Sihon: for he and his sonnes perished, and all his Cities were taken and posselt. After this, Moses with-drawing himselfe backe againe to the mountaines of Abarim, left the persecution of that warre vnto Jair the sonne of Mansse: 10 who conquering the East parts of Bajan, to wit, the Kingdome of Argob, euen vnto the Nations of the Gessuri and Macchati, 60. walled Cities: called the same after his owne name Hanoth Jair: of all which conquests afterward the halfe Tribe of Manasse posselt the North part as farre as Edrei, but the East part that belonged to Sihon the Amorite, with the mountaines of Gilead adioyning, was given to Reuben and Gad.

Of the troubles about the Midianites, and of Moses his death.

20

FTER these victories, and while Israel sojourned in the valley of Moab, the Midianites and Moabites (ouer both which Nations it seemeth that Balaam King of the Moabites then commanded in chiefe) fought, according to the aduice of Balaam, both by alluring the Hebrewes to the loue of their daughters, and by perswading them to honour and serue their Idols, to diuide them both in Loue and Religion among themselves: thereby the better both to defend their owne interest against them, as also to beate them out of Moab, and the Countries adioyning. The Israelites as they had euer bene inclined, so were they now easily perswaded to these euill courses, and thereby drew on 30 themselves the plague of pestilence, whereof there perished 24000. persons: besides which punishment of God, the most of the offenders among the Hebrewes, were by his commandment put to the sword, or other violent deaths: after this, when that Phineas, the sonne of Eleazar had pierced the bodies of Zimri, a Prince of the Simeonites, together with Cosbi a Daughter of one of the chiefe of the Midianites, the plague ceased, and Gods wrath was appeased. For such was the loue and kindnesse of his all-powerfulnesse, respecting the ardent zeale of Phineas in prosecuting of Zimri (who being a chiefe among the Hebrewes became an Idolater) as hee forgaued the rest of Israel, and staied his hand for his sake.

In this valley it was that Moses caused the people to be numbered the third time: 40 and there remained of able men fit to beare armes, 601730. of which as his last enterprise, he appointed 12000. to bee chosen out, to invade the Cities of Midian, who together with the Moabites practised with Balaam to curse Israel: and after that sought to allure them (as before remembered) from the worship of the true God, to the seruice of Beth-Peor: and to the rest of their barbarous Idolatrie. Ouer which companies of 12000. Moses gaue the charge to Phineas, the sonne of Eleazar the high Priest: who slew the five Princes of the Midianites, which were, or had lately bene, the vassalls of Sehon, as appeareth by Iosuah. These five Princes of the Midianites slaine by Eleazar, were at this time but the vassalls of Sehon the Amorite, to wit, Eui, Rekem, Zur, Hur, and Reba, the Dukes of Sehon, saith Iosua. Hee slew also all the 50 men, male-children, and women: sauing such as had not yet ved the companie of men, but those they saued and disperst them among the children of Israel to serue them.

And Moses hauing now liued 120. yeeres, making both his owne weaknesse of body body knowne to the people, and his vnabilitie to trauaile: and also that he was fore-Deut. 31. v. 2. warned of his ende by the spirit of God: from whom hee receiued a new commandment to ascend the Mountaines of Abarim, and thereon to render vp his life: Hee halsted to settle the Government in Iosua: whom hee perswaded with most liuely arguments to prosecute the conquest begunne, assuring him of Gods fauour and assistance therein. And so hauing spent these his later dayes after the Conquest of Og and Sehon, King of the Amorites, in the repetition and expolition of the Law (or an iteration of the Law, according to S. Augustine) vling both arguments, prayers, and threats vnto the people: which hee often repeated vnto them; thereby to confirme them in knowledge, loue, feare, and seruice, of the all-powerfull God: Hee Deut. 33. blessed the twelue Tribes, that of Simeon excepted, with seuerall and most comfortable blessings: praising the greatnesse and goodnesse of him, vnto whom in his prayers hee commended them: Hee also commanded the Priests to lay vp the booke of the Law, by the side of the Arke of God: The last that hee indited was that Prophetical Song, beginning: Hearken yee Heauens and sayill Speake, and let the earth heare the word of my mouth: and being called by God from the labours and sorrows of this life, vnto that rest which neuer afterward hath disquiet, hee was buried in the Land of Moab, ouer against Beth-peor: but no man knoweth of his Sepulchre to this day, which happened in the yeere of the World 2554.

Observations out of the Storie of Moses, how God disposeth both the smallest occasions, and the greatest resistances, to the effecting of his purpose.

OW let vs a little, for instruction, looke backe to the occasions of fundrie of the great euents, which haue bene mentioned in this Storie of the life of Moses, for (excepting Gods miracles, his promise, and fore-choise of this people) hee wrought in all things else by the medium of mens affections, and naturall appetites. And so we shall find that the feare which Pharao had of the increase of the Hebrewes, multiplied by God to exceeding great numbers, was the next naturall cause of the sorrowes and losse, which befell himselfe, and the Egyptian Nation: which numbers when he sought by cruell and vngodly policies to cut off and lessen, as when hee commanded all the male-children of the Hebrewes to be slaine, God (whose prouidence cannot bee resisted, nor his purposes preuented by all the foolish and sinfull craft of mortall men) moued compassion in the heart of Pharao's owne Daughter, to preferre that child, which afterward became the most wife, and of all men the most gentle and milde, 40 the most excellently learned in all Diuine and Humane knowledge, to be the Conductor and deliuerer of his oppressed Brethren, and the ouerthrow of Pharao, and all the flower of his Nation: euen then, when he sought by the strength of his men of Warre, of his Horse, and Chariots, to tread them vnder and burie them in the dust. The griefe which Moses conceiued of the iniuries, and of the violence offered to one of the Hebrewes in his owne presence, moued him to take reuenge of the Egyptian that offered it: the ingratitude of one of his owne Nation, by threatening him to discover the slaughter of the Egyptian, moued him to sleight into Midian: the contention betwene the sheepe-herds of that place, and Israhel's Daughters, made him knowne to their Father: who not onely entertained him, but married him to one of 50 those Sisters: and in that solitarie life of keeping of his Father in lawes sheepe, farre from the presse of the world, contenting himselfe (though bred as a Kings Sonne) with the lot of a poore Herd-fman, God found him out in that Desert, wherein hee first iustified him to liue many yeeres, the better to know the wayes and passages through which hee purposed that hee should conduct his people, toward the Land promised:

promised: and therein appearing vnto him, he made him know his Will and diuine Pleasure for his returne into Egypt. The like may be said of all things else, which Moses afterward by Gods direction performed in the Storie of Israel before remembered. There is not therefore the smallest accident, which may seeme vnto men as falling out by chance, and of no consequence: but that the same is caused by God to effect somewhat else by: yea, and oftentimes to effect things of the greatest worldly importance, either presently, or in many yeeres after, when the occasions are either not considered, or forgotten.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Nations with whom the Israelites had dealing after their coming out of Egypt; and of the men of renowne in other Nations, about the times of MOSES and IOSVA, with the summe of the Historie of IOSVA.

§. I.

How the Nations with whom the Israelites were to haue warre, were diuers wayes, as it were, prepared to be their enemies.

* It seemeth also that Ios, the Sonne of Nachor, & Euz, his Brother, planted themselves in the Eastside of Jordan, about Basans: where they finde the Land of Huain in which both Ios dwelt, as one of the issue of Itho the Sonne of Nachor, and E-thu, his friend, which is called a Buxit. See hereafter Chap. 10. §. 7.

In like manner if we looke to the qualitie of the Nations, with whom the Israelites, after their coming out of Egypt, had to doe, either in the Wildernesse, or afterward: we shall finde them long before-hand, by the disposing providence of God, as it were prepared for enmitie: partly in respect that they were most of them of the issue of Canaan, or at least of Ham: and the rest (as the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, and Ismaelites) were mingled with them by mutuall marriages: 40 whereas the Israelites still continued strangers, and separate from them: and so partly in this respect, and partly by ancient injuries or enmities, and partly by reason of diuersitie in Religion, were these Nations, as it were prepared to be enemies to the Israelites: and so to serue for such purposes as God had reserved them for. To make these things more manifest, we must vnderstand that this part of Syria bounded by the mountaines of Libanus, and Zidon on the North, by the same mountaines continued as farre as the Springs of Arnon on the East: by the way of Egypt, and the Red Sea on the South: and by the Mediterran Sea on the West: was inhabited and peopled by two Nations, the one springing from the sonnes of Cham, the other from Sem: but those of Sem, were but as strangers therein for a long time, and came thither in effect but with * one familie, to wit, that of Abraham, and a few of his kindred. The other for the greatest part were the Canaanites, the ancient Lords and Possessors of those Territories: by proceffe of time diuided into seuerall families and names: whereof some some of them were of eminent stature and strength, as the Anakims, Zamzummims, or Zuzets, Emims, Horites, and others. These (as men most valiant and able commonly doe) did inhabit the vtter borders and mountaines of their Countries: the rest were the Zidonians, Iebusites, Amorites, Heuites, Heites, and others, who tooke name after the sonnes of Canaan, and after whom the Countrie in general was still called.

As for the Hebrewes which descended of Shem by Abraham, they were of another familie, and strangers in that Countrie: especially the Israelites, and this was some cause that the Canaanites did not affect them, or indure them: no more then the Philistims did, who descended also of Cham by Mizraim. For though Abraham himselfe being a stranger was highly esteemed and honoured among them: especially by the Amorites inhabiting the West part of Jordan: yet now euen they which descended from Abraham, or from his kindred, abode and multiplied in those parts, were alienated in affections from the Israelites: as holding them strangers and intruders: making more account of their alliance with the Canaanites, and the rest of the issue of Cham, with whom they dayly contracted affinity: than of their olde pedigree from Abraham.

True it is that these Nations descended of Abraham, or of his kindred, who had linked themselves and matched with the Canaanites and others, had so farre posst themselves of the borders of those Regions, as they began to bee equal in strength to the bordering Canaanites, if not superiour. For of Lot came those two great families of the Moabites, and Ammonites: of Esa the Edumeans: of Madian the Madianites: of Ismael, the eldest son of Abraham, came the Ismaelites, with whom are ioyned as of the same nation, the Amalekites, whom though the more common opinion thinketh to haue been a tribe of Edom, because Esa had a grand-child of that name, yet manifest reason conuinceth it to haue been otherwise. For the Israelites were forbidden to prouoke the Edomites, or doe them any wrong, whereas contrariwise Amalek was cursed, and endless warre decreed against him: but hercof more elsewhere. Chap. 8. §. 3. Of Ismaels eldest Sonne Ysachar sprung the Arabians of Petrea, called Nabatani. Now euen as Abraham besought God to blesse Ismael, so it pleased him both to promise and performe it. For of him those twelve Princes came, which inhabited, in effect, all that Tract of Land betwene Hanilah vpon Tigris, and Sur which is the West part of the Desert of Arabia Petrea. Yet howsoever the strength of these later named nations, which descended from Abraham, were great: yet it is not vnlkely, but that some reason which moued them not to fauour the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan, was in respect of feare: because all Princes and States doe not willingly permit any stranger or powerfull Nation to enter their Territories. Wherefore, though all these families beforenamed, were not so vnited, in and among themselves, but that they had their ieaousies of each other, and 40 contended for Dominion: yet fearing a third more strong than themselves, whether they stood a-part or vnited, they were taught by the care of their owne preservation, to ioynne themselves together against Israel: though they did it nothing so maliciously and resolutely as the Canaanites did. For the Edumeans only denied the Hebrewes a passage: which the Moabites durst not denie: because their Countrie lay more open; and because themselves had lately beene beaten out of the richest part of their Dominions, by the Amorites: and as for the Ammonites, their Countrie lay altogether out of the way, and the strength of Sehon and Og Kings of the Amorites, was interjacent: and besides that, the border of the Ammonites was strong, by reason of the mountaines which diuided it from Basan. Again, that which moued the 50 Moabites in their owne reason not much to interrupt Israel, in the conquest of Sehon the Amorite, and of Og his Confederat, was that the Moabites might hope after such time as the Amorites were beaten by Moses, that themselves might recouer againe their owne inheritance: to wit, the Vallies and Plaines lying betwene the mountaines of Arabia and Jordan: But as soone as Sehon was slaine, and that the King of Moab, Moshe, Balaam, perceived that Moses allotted that valley to the Tribes of Gad and Ruben, he began to practise with Balaam against Israel, and by the Daughters of Midian; as aforefaide, to allure them to Idolatry: and thus at length the Moabites by speciall location were more and more stirred up to enmitie against Israel. And as for diuers of the rest that were descended from Abrahams kindred, wee may note, how in the beginning, betwene the Authors of their Pettigrees, God permitted some enmities to be as it were prefaces of future quarrells, which in the posteritie might bee the easier incensed, by the memorie of olde grudges: and withall by some disdain from the elder in nature to the younger. For the Ismaelites being descended from the eldest sonne of Abraham, and the Edomites from the eldest sonne of Isaac, Isach, being but a second sonne, of a second brother, those Princes which were descended of the elder Houses being naturall men, might scorne to giue place, much lesse to subiect themselves, to their inferiours, as they tooke it, and for a more aggravation the issues of Eisau Princes of Edomea, might keepe in record that their Parent was bought out of his birth-right by Jacobs taking his advantage, and that he was deceived of his Fathers blessings also by him: and that Jacob after reconciliation came not vnto him as he promised into Seir or Idumea.

So also in the posteritie of Ismael, it might remaine as a seede or pretence of enmitie, that their fore-father was by the instigation of Sara, cast out into the Desarts, with his Mother Hagar: and had therein perished, but that it pleased God by his Angel to relieue them. Ismael also had an Egyptian both to his Mother and to his Wife: and Amalec was also an Horite by his Mother: which Horites were of the ancient Canaanites. The Edumeans also, or Edomites, were by their Maternall line descended of the Canaanites. For Eisau took two Wiues of that Nation: one of them was Adath, the Daughter of Eloah, the Hittite, and the other Abolihamah, the grand-child of Zibeon the Heutite, Lord of Seir, before the same was conquered by Eisau, and called after his name, Edom, or Edumea.

Lastly, it appeareth that all those families of the Ismaelites, Amalekites, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, &c. were in processe of time corrupted, and drawne from the knowledge and worship of God, and became Idolaters, infected and seduced by the conuersion of those people among whom they dwelt, and by those Wiues of the Canaanites which they had married: onely a few of the Kenites and those Madianites, which inhabited on the edge of the Red Sea, wherof Iethro was Priest, or Prince, or both, worshipped the true and euer-living God.

Of the Kings of the Canaanites and Madianites, mentioned in the ancient Warres of the Israelites.

OF the Kings of the Canaanites, descended of Cham, (for Melchizedek may be thought to be of a better Pettigree) wee finde foure named by Moses: and one and thirtie remembered by Iosua, though few of these named, otherwise than by the Cities ouer which they commanded: to which each of them had a small Territorie adioyning, and no other Dominion. These Canaanites in a general consideration are to be vnderstood for all those Nations, descended of Cham by Canaan, as the Hittites, Iebusites, Amorites, Gergesites, Heutites, &c. and so heere wee vnderstand this name in speaking of the Kings of the Canaanites: and so also we call the Countrie of their habitation, the holy Land, or the Land of promise: for God had appointed that the seuen principall Families should bee rooted out: and that his owne people should inherite their Lands and Cities. But if wee consider of the Name and Nation in particular, then is their proper habitation bounded by Jordan, on the East, and by the Mediterranean Sea on the West: in which narrow Countrie, and in the choicest places thereof, those Canaanites which held their Paternall name chiefly inhabited.

The

The first King of these Nations, named in the Scriptures, was Hamer or Hemur, of the Heutites, whom Siméon and Leui slew, together with his Sonne Sichem, in reuenge of their Sisters rauishment.

Arad was the second King which the Scriptures haue remembered, who had that part of Canaan towards the South, neighbouring Edom and the Dead Sea; the same which surpris'd Israel, as they incamped in the Wildernesse in the edge of Edom.

The third named was Sehon King of Essebon, who before Moses arrivall had beaten the Moabites out of the West part of Arabia Petraea or Nabathaea, and thrust them out Arnon into the Desarts, the same whom Moses ouer-threw in the plains of Moab: at which time he tooke Essebon, and all the Cities of the Amorites.

Presently after which victorie, Og was also slaine by Israel, who commaunded the North part of that Valley betwene the Mountaines Traconi or Galaad and Jordan, who was also a King of the Amorites.

The fifth was Adonizedek King of the Iebusites, and of Hierusalem, with whom Iosua nameth foure other Kings.

Hoham, King of Hebron.

Piram, King of Iarmuth.

Iapia, King of Lachis: and Deber, King of Eglon, who were all Amorites ouerthrowne in battell: and hanged by Iosua. After this ouerthrow Iosua nameth Iabin, King of Hazor, and Iobab, King of Madon: whom he also slaughtered, and tooke his Cities: and this Iabin seemed to haue some Dominion ouer the rest, for it is said in the Text, For Iabin before-times was the head of all those Kingdomes.

After these Adonizedek that notorious Tyrant is named: who confest that he had cut off the thumbs of the hands, and feete, of 70. Kings, inforcing them to gather crummes vnder his Table: who, after Iuda and Siméon had vsed the same execution vpon himselfe, acknowledged it to be a iust reuenge of God: this King was carried to Hierusalem where he died.

The last King named is Iabin the second, who as it seemeth had rebuilt Hazor, burnt by Iosua. For at such time as he imploied Sisara against Israel, whom hee oppressed twentie yeeres, after the death of Ehud, He inhabited Hazor. This Iabin, Barac (incouraged by Deborah) ouerthrew; and his Captaine Sisara had by Iael, the Wife of Heber the Kenite, a nail driuen into his head while he slept in her Tent: Iabin himselfe perishing after ward in that warre.

The Madianites had also their Kings at times, but commonly mixt with the Moabites: and they held a corner of Land in Nabathaea: to the South-east of the Dead Sea. They descended from Madian, Abrahams sonne, by Cethura. Raguel surnamed Gethagileu or Iethres, saith Iosephus, called Iethro in Exodus, Kenis in the first of Iudges, the sonne of Dathan, the grand-child of Iexanis, or Iokham, the great grand-child of Abraham by Cethura, was Priest or Prince of the Madianites by the Red Sea: whose Daughter, or Niece, Moses married: and of whom I haue spoken elsewhere more at large. This Iethro if hee were not the same with Hobab, must be his Father: and this Hobab had seuen Daughters. Hee guided Moses in the Wildernesse: and became one of the Israelites: of him descended the Kenites so called of his Father Raguel surname, of which Kenites was Heber, which had peace with Iabin the second, euen now remembered.

At such time as Saul invaded the Amalekites, he knowing the good affection of the Kenites to Israel, gaue them warning to separate themselves: and yet the Kenites had strong feates, and liued in the mountaines of the Desarts.

The Kings of the Canaanites, and Madianites, and the Amalekites, as many as I finde named were these.

 For the Kings of the Amalekites and Iſmaelites, I finde few that are named, and though of the Iſmaelites there were more in number than of the reſt (for they were multiplied into a greater Nation, according to the promiſe of God made vnto Abraham) yet the Amalekites, who together with the Midianites were numbred among them, were more renowned in Moſes time than the reſt of the Iſmaelites. So alſo were they when Saul governed Iſrael. For Saul purſued them from Sur vnto Hauilah, to wit, ouer a great part of Arabia Petraea, and the Deſart. The reaſon to me ſeemeth to be theſe: That the twelue Princes which came of Iſmael, were content to leaue thoſe barren Deſerts of Arabia Petraea, called Sur, Paran, and Sin, to the iſſue of Abraham by Cetura, that ioyned with them (for ſo ſeeme the Amalekites to haue bene, and ſo were the Midianites:) themſelues taking poſſeſſion of a better ſoile in Arabia the Happie, and about the Mountaines of Galaad in Arabia Petraea. For Nabatath the eldeſt of thoſe twelue Princes planted that part of Arabia Petraea, which was very fruitful though adioyning to the Deſart, in which Moſes wandred, afterward called Nabathea: the ſame which neighboureth Iudaea on the Eaſt ſide. Of Duma were the Dumans, betwene the Adubens and Raabens: where the Citie Dumeth ſometimes flood.

Of Maſſa the Maſſani, and of Hadar, or Chadar the Athrits, who bordered the Napatheans in the ſame Happie Arabia.

Thema begat the Themaneans, among the Arabian Mountaines, where alſo the Citie of Thema is ſeated.

Of Ietur the Itureans, or Chamtheans: of whom Tobu was King in Dauids time.

Of Napthri the Nubecian Arabians: inhabiting Syria Zoba: ouer whom Adadezar King commanded, while Dauid ruled Iſrael.

Cadma, the laſt and twelfth of Iſmaels Sonnes, was the Anceſtor of the Cadmonians: who were afterward called Aſſire: becauſe they worſhipped the fire with the Baby-lonians.

The Amalekites gaue their Kings the name of Agag, as the Egyptians the name of Pharaoh to theirs, and the ancient Syrians Adad to theirs, and the Arabian Nabatheans, Aretes, as Names of Honour.

The Amalekites were the firſt that fought with Moſes, after he paſt the Red Sea: Exodus. 17. when of all times they flouriſhed moſt, and yet were vanquiſhed.

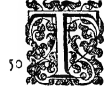

Afterward they ioyned with the Canaanites, and beate the Iſraelites neere Cades-barne. After the Governement of Oihouiel, they ioyned them with the Moabites: after Barak with the Midianites: and invaded Iſrael. God commanded that as ſoone as Iſrael had reſt; they ſhould roote out the name of the Amalekites: which Saul executed in part, when hee waſted them from the border of Egypt, to the border of Chaldaea: from Hauilah to Shur.

In Dauids time they tooke Siklag in Simeon: but Dauid followed them, and ſurpriſed them, recovering his priſoners and ſpoiles. And yet, after Dauid became King, they againe vexed him, but to their owne loſſe.

In Ezekies time as many of them as ioyned to Edumaea were waſted and diſplanted by the children of Simeon.

¶ IIII.

Of the inſpiration of ciuilitie in Europe about the times, and of PROMETHEVS and ATLAS.

 Here liued at this time, and in the ſame age together with Moſes, many men exceeding famous, aſwell in bodily ſtrength, as in all forts of learning. And as the World was but euen now enriched with the written Law of the liuing God, ſo did Art and Ciuilitie (bred and ſuffered farre off in the Eaſt, and in Egypt) beginne at this time to diſcouer a paſſage into Europe, and into thoſe parts of Greece, neighbouring Aſia and Iudaea. For if Pelagius beſides his bodily ſtrength, was choſen King of Arcadia, becauſe he taught thoſe people to erect them ſimple Cottages, to defend them from raine and storme: and learned them withall to make a kinde of Meale, and bread of Acornes, who before liued for the most part, by Hearbs and Rootes: we may thereby iudge how poore, and wretched those times were, and how falsly those Nations haue vaunted of that their antiquities accompanied not onely with ciuill learning, but with all other kinds of knowledge, And it was in this age of the World, as both Eusebius and S. Augusline haue obserued, that Prometheus flourished: Quem propterea ferunt de luto formasse homines, quia optimus sapientie Doctor fuisse perhibetur; Of whom it is reported that he formed men out of clay, because he was an excellent teacher of Wisdome: and so Theophrastus expoundeth the invention of fire ascribed to Prometheus, Ad inuenta sapientia pertinere; To haue reference to wise inventions: and Æschylus affirmeth, That by the stealing of Iupiters fire was meant, that the knowledge of Prometheus reached to the Starres, and other celestiall bodies. Again, it is written of him, that hee had the art so to vse this fire, as thereby hee gaue life to Images of Wood, Stone, and Clay: meaning that before his birth and being, those people among whom hee liued had nothing else worthy of men, but externall forme and figure. By that fiction of Prometheus, being bound on the top of the Hill Caucasus, his entrailes the while deuoured by an Eagle, was meant the inward care and restless desire hee had to inuigilate the Natures, Motions, and Influences of Heauenly bodies, for so it is layde: Ideo altissimum ascendisse Caucasum, ut serena celo quam longissime altra, signorum obitus & ortus spectaret; That hee ascended Caucasus, to the end that hee might in a cleere skie discern a farre off the setting and rising of the Starres: though Diodorus Siculus expound it otherwise, and other diuerly.

Of this mans knowledge ÆSCHYLVS giues this testimonie.

Africanus makes Prometheus farre more ancient, and but 94. yeeres after Ogyges. Porphyrius sayes that hee liued at once with Inachus, who liued with Iphæ.

Aug. lib. 9. de Civ. Dei.

There liued also at once with Moses, that famous Atlas, brother to Prometheus, both being the Sonnes of Iapetus, of whom though it bee saide, that they were borne before Moses dayes, and therefore are by others esteemed of a more ancient date: yet the advantage of their long liues gaue them a part of other ages among Men, which came into the World long after them. Besides these Sonnes of Iapetus, Æschylus findes two other, to wit, Oceanus, and Hesperus, who being famous in the West, gaue name to the Evening, and so to the evening evening Starre. Also besides this Atlas of Libya or Mauritania, there were others, which bare the same name: but of the Libyan, and the brother of Prometheus, it was that those Mountaines which crosse Africa, to the South of Marocco, Sus, and Hea, with the Sea adioyning tooke name, which memorie Plato in Critias bellowes on Atlas, the Sonne of Neptune.

Cicero in the fifth of his Tusculan questions, affirmeth that all things written of Prometheus and Atlas, were but by those names to expresse diuine knowledge. Nec vero ATLAS sustinere calum, nec PROMETHEVS aspicere Causas, nec bellatus CEPHEVS sumptore traderetur, nisi diuina cognitio nomen eorum ad errorum fabulata tra- doxisset; Neither should ATLAS bee said to beare up heauen, nor PROMETHEVS to be fastned to Caucasus, nor CEPHEVS with his wife to bee steeled; vntil these diuine knowledge had raised vpon them names these erroneous fables.

Orpheus sometime exprellt Time by Prometheus, sometime hee tooke him for Saturne; as Rhea coniux alone Promethen. But that the storie of Prometheus was not altogether a fiction: and that he liued about this time, the most approved Historians and Antiquaries, and among them Eusebius and S. Augusline haue not doubted, For the great iudgement which Atlas had in Astronomie, saith S. Augusline, were his Daughters called by the names of constellations, Pleiades and Fyades: Others attribute vnto him the finding out of the Moones course, of which Archas the sonne of Orechomenus challengeth the invention. Of this Archas Aradia in Poloponnissus tooke name, and therefore did the Arcadians vaunt that they were more ancient than the Moone, Et Luna gens prior illa fuit: which is to bee vnderstood, saith Ætalius Comes, before there had bene any obseruation of the Moones course: or of her working in inferior bodies. And though there bee that bellow the finding out thereof vpon Enchyrius: others (as Xenagoras) on Typhon: yet Isacius Tzetzes, a curious searcher of antiquities, gaue it Atlas of Libya: who besides his gifts of minde, was a man of vngualled and incomparable strength: from whom Thales the Milesian, as it is saide, had the ground of his Philosophie.

OF DEUCALION and PHAETON.

ND in this age of the World, and while Moses yet liued, Deucalion reigned in Thessalie, Cratogeus then ruling the Argines. This Deucalion was the Sonne of Prometheus, saith Herodotus, Apollonius, Hesiodus, and Strabo. Hesiodus gaue him Pandora for Mother, the rest Clymene: Homer in the fifteenth of his Odysses makes Deucalion the Sonne of Minos: but he must needs haue meant some other Deucalion; for else either Phyffes was mistaken, or Homer, who put the tale into his mouth. For Phyffes after his returne from Troy faimed himselfe to bee the brother of Idomeneus, who was sonne to this later Deucalion, the sonne of Minos: but this Minos liued but one age before Troy was taken: (for Idomeneus serued in that Warre) and this Deucalion the Sonne of Prometheus, who liued at once with Moses, was long before. In the first Deucalions time happened that great inundation in Thessalie by which in effect every soule, in those parts, perished, but Deucalion, Pyrrha his Wife, and some few others. It is affirmed that at the time of this flood in Thessalie, those people exceeded in all kinde of wickednesse and villanie: and as the impictie of men is the forcible attractiue of Gods vengeance, so did all that Nation for their foule sinnes perish by waters: as in the time of Noah, the corruption and crueltie of all mankind drew on them that generall destruction by the flood vniuersall. Only Deucalion, and Pyrrha his wife, whom God spared, were both of them esteemed to bee louers of Vertue, of Iustice and of Religion. Of whom Ouid:

turous opinions. For what this man was, it is knowne to God. Enuie and aged time hath partly defaced, and partly worne out the certaine knowledge of him: of whom, whosoever he were, Lactantius writeth in this sort: *Hic scripsit libros, & quidem multos, ad cognitionem diuinarum rerum pertinentes, in quibus Maiestatem summi ac singularis Dei asserit, quod scilicet, nominibus appellat, quibus nos, Deum & Patrem; Hic habet written many Bookes belonging to, or expressing the knowledge of diuine things, in which he asseith the Maiesty of the most High and one God, calling him by the same names of God and Father, which we doe. The same Father also feareth not to number him among the Sybils and Prophets. And so contrary are these his acknowledgements to those idolatrous fictions of the Egyptians and Grecians, as for my selfe I am perswaded, that whatfoever is found in him contrary thereunto, was by corruption inserted. For thus much him selfe confesseth: Deus omnium Dominus, & Pater, fons & vita, potentia & lux, & mens, & Spiritus, & omnia in ipso, & sub ipso sunt. Verbum enim ex eo esse prodens, perfectissimum existens, & generator & opifex, &c. God (saith hee) the Lord, and Father of all things, the fountaine, and life, and power, and light, and minde, and Spirit: and all things are in him and vnder him. For his Word out of himselfe proceeding being most perfect, and generative, and operative, falling vpon fruitfull nature, made it also fruitfull and producing. And he was therefore (saith Suidas) called Ter maximus, quia de Trinitate loquens est: in Trinitate vnum esse Deum asserens; Because he spake of the Trinitie, asseing that there is one God in Trinitie. Hicrinam (saith Ficinus) prauitudo profice Religiois, hic ortum nouae fidei, hic aduentum Christi, hic futurum iudicium, resurrectionem sancti, beatorum gloriam, supplicia peccatorum; This Mercury foresaw the ruine of the old or superstitious Religion, and the birth of the new faith, and of the coming of Christ, the future iudgement, the resurrection, the glory of the Blessed, and the torment or affliction of the wicked or damned.*

In Trinitate, Mercurius, Trismeg.

To this I will only adde his two last speeches reported by Calcidius the Platonist, and by Valerian out of Sydus. *Hactenus fili pulvis & patria, vixi peregrinus & exul, nunc incolumis repeto: cumq; post paulum à vobis corporis vinculis absolutus discessero, videte ne me quasi mortuum lugeatis. Nam ad illam optimam beatamq; Ciuitatem redeo: ad quam vniuersi cives mortis condicione venturi sunt. Ibi namq; solus Deus est summus Princeps: qui cives suos replet suauitate mirifica: ad quam haec, quam multis vitam existimant, mors est potius dicenda quam vita; Hicerto, O Sonne, being driuen from my Country, I haue liued a stranger and banished man: but now I am repairing home-ward againe in safety. And when I shall after a few dayes (or in a short time) by being loosed from these bonds of flesh and blond depart from you, see that you doe not bewaile me as a man dead, for I doe but returne to that best and blessed Citie, to which all her Citizens (by the conditio[n] of death) shall repaire. Therein is the only God, the most high and chiefe Prince, who filleth or seedeth his Citizens with a sweetnesse more then maruiculous: in regard whereof this being which others call a life, is rather to be accounted a death then a life. The other and that which seemeth to be his last, is thus conuerted by others, agreeing in sense but not in words with Sydus. O caelum magni Dei sapientis opus, teq; O vox patris quam ille primam emisit, quando vniuersum constituit mundum, adiuro per vniuersum eius verbum, & Spiritum quicquid comprehendem, miseremini mei; I aduise thee O heauen, thou wise worke of the great God, and thee O voyce of the Father, which he first uttered, when he framed the whole world, by his only begotten Word, and Spirit, comprehending all things, Haue mercie vpon mee.*

But Sydus hath his inuocation in these words: Obtestor te caelum magni Dei sapientis opus, obtestor te vocem Patris quam loquutus es primum, cum omnem mundum firmasti, obtestor te per vniuersum Sermonem omnia continentem, propitius, propitius es; I beseech thee O heauen, wise worke of the great God, I beseech thee O voyce of the Father, which he spake first when he established all the World, I beseech thee by the only begotten Word containing all things, be fauourable, be fauourable.

Of IANNES and IAMBRES, and some other thasliued about those times.

Here were also in this age both Esculapius, which after his death became the God of Physicians, being the brother of Mercurius, as Vines thinks in his Commentary vpon Augustine, de Ciuitate Dei lib. 8. and also those two notorious Sorcerers, Iannes and Iambres, who in that impious art excelled all that euer had been heard of to this day: and yet Moses himselfe doth not charge them with any familiaritie with Devils, or ill Spirits: words indeed that seldome came out of his mouth, how euer by the Septuagint they are called Sophista or Venifici and Incantatores, Sophists, poisoners, and Incanters: by Iherome, Sapientes & malefici, Wisemen, and euill doers: and so by Vatablus, who also vseth the word Magi. The Greeke it selfe seemes to attribute somewhat of what they did to natural Magicke: calling them gynaikes, workers by drugges. The Genuesan Sorcerers and Incantatores: LVNIVS Sapientes, Prestigiatores & Magi. Magicians and Wisemen here by him are taken in one sense: and Prestigiatore are such as dazell mens eyes, and make them seeme to see what they see not: as false colours, and false shapies. But as some vertues and some vices are so nicely distinguished, and so resembling each other, as they are often confounded, and the one taken for the other: (Religion and superstition hauing one face and countenance) so did the workes and workings of Moses, and of Pharaon Sorcerers appeare in outward shew, and to the beholders of common capacities, to bee one and the same art and gift of knowledge. For the Deuill changeth himselfe into an Angel of light: and imitateth in all he can the wayes and workings of the most High. And yet on the contrary euery worke which surmounteth the wisdom of moile men, is not to bee condemned as performed by the helpe of ministerie of ill Spirits. For the properties and powers which God hath giuen to naturall things, are such as where hee also bestoweth the knowledge to vnderstand their hid den and best vertues, many things by them are brought to passe, which seeme altogether impossible, and aboue nature or arte: which two speculations of workes of nature, and of miracle, the Caballists distinguished by these names; Opus de Beseñib, & opus de mercana: the one they call Sapientiam naturae, The Wisdome of nature: the other Sapientiam diuinitatis; The Wisdome of diuinity: the one Isaac practised in breeding the pious Lambs in Mesopotamia, the other Moses exercised in his miracles wrought in Egypt, hauing received from God the knowledge of the one in the highest perfection, to wit, the knowledge of nature: of the other so farre as it pleased God to proportion him, both which he vied to his glory, that gaue them: assuming to himselfe nothing at all, either in the least or most. Also S. Augustine noteth, that from the time that Moses left Egypt, to the death of Iosua, diuers other famous men liued in the world, who after their deaths for their eminent vertues and inventions, were numbred among the Gods: as Dionysius otherwise Liber Pater, who taught the Graecians the vse of the Vine in Attica: at which time also there were instituted Musicall playes to Apollo Delphicus: thereby to regaine his fauour, who brought barrenesse and scarcitie vpon that part of Greece, because they resisted not the attempts of Danaus, who spoiled his Temple and set it on fire: so did Erichthonius institute the like games to Minerva: wherein the Victor was rewarded with a present of Oyle, in memory of her that first prest it out of the Oliue.

In this age also Xanthus rauished Europa: and begat on her Radamanthus, Sarpedon, and Minos, which three are also giuen to Iupiter by other Historians. To these Saint Augustine addeth Hercules, the same to whom the twelue labours are ascribed, native of Tyrinthia a Citie of Peloponnesus: (or as others say, only nurfed and brought vp there) who came into Italy, and destroyed many Monsters there; being neither that Hercules, which Eusebius surnameth Delphin, famous in Phanicia; nor that Hercules, cules, according to Philostatus, which came to Gades, whom he calleth an Ægyptian: Manifestum sit, non Thebanum HERCULEM, sed Ægyptium ad Gades peruenisse, & ibi finem statuisse terræ (saith PHILOSTRATUS) It is manifest that it was the Ægyptian HERCULES, and not the Theban, which traualled as farre as the streights of Gades, and there determined the bounds of the earth. In this time also while Moses wandered in the Deserts, Dardanus built Dardania.

But whosoever they were, or how worthy fouer they were that lived in the dayes and age of Moses, there was neuer any man, that was no more than man, by whom it pleased God to worke greater things; whom he fauoured more; to whom (according to the appearing of an infinite God) hee so often appeared; neuer any to man more familiar and conuerfant with Angels; neuer any more learned both in Diuine and Humane knowledge; neuer a greater Prophet in Israell. He was the first that received and deliuered the Law of God entire; the first that left to posteritie by letters, the truth and power of one infinite God; his creating out of nothing the World vniuersall, and all the creatures therein; that taught the detestation of idolatry, and the punishment, vengeance, and eradication, which followed it.

Synag. 45. 12. 3.

Synacides calleth Moses the beloued of God and Men, whose remembrance is blessed. He made him (saith the same Author) like to the glorious Saints; and magnified him by the feare of his enemies, made him glorious in the sight of Kings, shewed him his glorie, caused him to heare his voyce, sanctified him with faithfulness and meeknesse, and chose him out of all men.

He is remembred among prophane Authors; as by Clearchus the Peripatetic: by Megasthenes, and Numenius the Pythagorian. The long liues which the Patriarchs enjoyed before the flood, remembred by Moses, Efien, Hieronymus Ægyptius, Hecatan, Elanicus, Acusilus, Ephorus, and Alexander the Historian, confirme. The vniuersall flood which God reucaled vnto Moses, Berosus, Nicolaus Damasenus, and others haue testified. The building of the Tower of Babel, and confusion of tongues, Abydenus, Efien, and Sybillæ haue approued. Berosus also honoureth Abraham. Hecatanus wrote a Booke of him. Damasenus before cited, speaketh of Abrahams passage from Damasus into Canaan, agreeing with the bookes of Moses. Eupolemon writeth the very same of Abraham, which Moses did. For beginning with the building of Babel, and the ouerthrow thereof by diuine power, hee saith that Abraham, borne in the tenth generation, in the Citie called Camerina, or Prion, excelled all men in wisdom: and by whom the Astrologic of the Chaldeans was inuented. Is in ista pietate sua (saith Eusebius out of the same Author) sic Deo gratus fuit, ut diuino precepto in Phœnicem venerit, ibique habitauerit; For his iustice and piety hee was so pleasing vnto God, as by his commandement he came into Phœnicia, and dwelt there. Likewise Diodorus Siculus in his second Booke and fifth Chapter, speaketh reuerently of Moses: There are many other among prophane Authors, which confirme the Bookes of Moses, as Eusebius hath gathered in the ninth of his Preparation to the Gospel, Chapter the third and fourth, to whom I referre the Reader. Lastly, I cannot but for some things in it commend this notable testimony of Strabo, who writeth of Moses in these words.

Strabo Lib. 6.

Moses enim affirmabat, docebatque, Ægyptios non recte sentire, qui bestiarum & pecorum imagines Deo tribuerunt: itemque, Afros & Græcos, qui Dijs hominum figuram assignerunt: id vero solum esse Deum, quod nos & terram & mare continet, quod caelum & mundum, & verum omnium naturam appellamus: cuius profecto imaginem, nemo sanæ mentis, alicuius earum rerum, quæ penes nos sunt, similem audeat effingere. Proinde (omni simulachrorum effigione repudiata) dignum ei Templum ac Delubrum constituendum, ac sine aliqua figura colendum: Moses is affirmed and taught, that the Ægyptians thought amisse, which attributed vnto God the Images of beasts and cattell: Also that the Africans and Greekes greatly erred in giuing vnto their Gods the shape of men: whereas that onely is God indecde, which containeth both vs, the Earth and Sea, which we call Heauen, the world, and the nature of all things, whose image, doubtlesse, no wise man will dare to fashion out vnto the likeness of those things, which are amongst vs: That therefore (all denying of Idols cast aside) a worthy Temple

Temple an a place of prayer was to be erected vnto him, and he to be worshipped without any figure at all therein.

Now concerning the Ægyptian wisdom, for which the Martyr Stephen commended Moses, saying, That Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Ægyptians, and was mighty in his workes and words; the same is collected (how truly I know not) by Diodorus, Diogenes Laertius, Iamblicus, Philo Iudeus, and Eusebius Casariensis, and diuided into foure parts, viz. Mathematicall, Naturall, Diuine, and Morall.

In the Mathematicall part, which is distinguished into Geometrie, Astronomie, Arithmetike, and Musike; the ancient Ægyptians excelled all others. For Geometrie which is by interpretation, measuring of grounds, was vsfull vnto them: because it consisting of infallible principles, directed them certainly in bounding out their proper Lands, and Territories, when their fields and limits, by the inundations of Nilus, were yeerely ouerflowne and confounded, so as no man could know what in right belonged vnto him.

For the second part, to wit, Astronomie, the site of the Countrey being a leuell and spacious Plaine, free and cleere from cloudes, yielded them delight with case, in observing and contemplating the risings, fallings, and motions of the Starres.

Arithmetike also, which is the knowledge of numbers, they studied; because without it, in Geometrie and Astronomie, nothing can be demonstrated or concluded. But of Musike they made no other account, nor desired further knowledge, than seemed to them sufficient to serue and magnifie their Gods, their Kings, and good Men.

The Naturall part of this Wisdom, which handleth the principles, causes, elements, and operations of naturall things, differs little from Peripateticall Philosophie; teaching, that Materia prima is the beginning of all things; that of it all mixt bodies and liuing creatures haue their beeing; that Heauen is round like a Globe; that all Starres haue a certaine fount heate, and temperate influences, whereby all things grow and are produced; that raines proceede and bee from mutations in the ayre; that the Planets haue their proper soules, &c.

The Diuine part of this wisdom, which is called Theologie, teacheth and beleaueth that the world had a beginning, and shall perish; that men had their first originall in Ægypt; partly by means of the temperatenesse of that Countrey, where neither Winter with cold, nor Summer with heate are offensiue; and partly through the fertilitye, that Nilus giueth in those places; That the soule is immortal, and hath transmigration from body to body; That God is one, the Father and Prince of all Gods; and that from this God, other Gods are, as the Sunne and Moone, whom they worshipped by the names of Osiris and Isis, and erected to them Temples, Statues, and diuers Images, because the true similitudes of the Gods is not knowne; that many of the Gods haue been in the estate of mortall men, and after death, for their vertues, and benefits bestowed on mankind, haue beene Deified; that those beastes, whose Images and formes the Kings did carrie in their Armes, when they obtained victory, were adored for Gods: because vnder those Ensignes they preuailed ouer their enemies. Moreover, the Ægyptian Diuines had a peculiar kinde of writing, mysticall and secret, wherein the highest points of their Religion and worship of God, which was to bee concealed from the vulgar sort, were obscured.

Clement distributeth the whole summe of this later Ægyptian learning into three severall sorts, viz. Episolar, which is vsed in writing common Epistles; Sacerdotal, which is peculiar to their Priests; and Sacred; which Sacred containeth Scripture of two kinds: the one proper, which is exprest by letters Alphabetically in obscure and figuratiue wordes; as for example, where it is written: The Ibis by the Hornet participateth the beauty of the Hawke; which is read thus: That the Moone doth by the Sunne borrow part of the light of God: because Light is an Image of Diuine beauty; the other symbolical, or by signatures, which is three-fold, viz. Imitatiue, Tropicall, and Ænygmaticall: Imitatiue, which designeth things by characters, ractions, like to the things signified, as by a Circle the Sunne; and by the Hornes of the Moone, the Moone it selfe: Tropical or transient, which applies the diuers formes and figures of naturall bodies or creatures, to signifie the dignities, fortunes, conditions, vertues, vices, affections, and actions of their Gods and of men. So with the Egyptian Diuines, the Image of an Hawke signifieth God, the figure of the Hornet signifieth the Sunne, the picture of the Bird Ibis signifieth the Moone: by the forme of a Man, Prudence and Skillfulnesse: by a Lion, Fortitude: by a Horse, Libertie: by a Crocodile, Impudencie: by a Fish, Hatred is to be understood: Ænygmaticall is a composition or mixture of Images or Similitudes: in which sense, the monstrous Image of a Lions body hauing a Mans head, was grauen on their Temples and Altars, to signifie, that to men all diuine things are Ænygmaticall and obscure. So the Image of the Sunne set on the head of a Crocodile, (which liueth aswell in the Waters, as on Land) expresseth that the Sunne nourisheth Meteors in the Ayre, aswell in the Waters as from the Earth. So a Scepter, at the top whereof is made an Eye, and an Eare, signifieth God, Hearing, Seeing, and Governing all things. The Scythians are thought to haue been delighted with this kinde of writing. For Pheredes Syrius reporteth, That when Darius sending letters, threatned Idanthurus, King of the Scythians, with ruine and destruction of his Kingdome, vnlesse he would acknowledge subiection: Idanthurus returned to him a Moule, a Frog, a Bird, a Dart, and a Plough-share: which Orontopagus, Tribune of the Souldiers, interpreted to signifie, that by the Moule, their dwellings: by the Frog, their waters: by the Bird, their aire: by the Dart, their weapons: by the Plough, their lands: were signified to be ready to be deliuered to Darius, as their Soueraigne Lord. But Xyphodres made another construction, viz. that the King meant, That except Darius with his Men did hasten away, as a Bird through the ayre, or creepe into holes as a Moule, or runne into the waters which they had passed as a Frog, they should not escape his armes, but either be slaine, or being made Captiues, Till his grounds. The same Historie is with little difference reported by Herodotus.

The fourth and last part, which is Morall and Politique, doth containe especially 30 the Lawes, which (according to Laertius) Mercurius Trismegistus, or Ter Maximus deuised: who in his Bookes or Dialogues of Pimander and Asclepius, hath written so many things of God, worthy of admiration; aswell (saith Sixtus Senensis) of the Trinitie, and of the coming of Christ, as of the last and fearefull day of iudgement: that (as saith the same Author, the opinion being also ancient) hee is not onely to be accounted a Philosopher, but a Prophet of things to come.

Iamblicus in his Bookes of Mysteries of the Egyptians, taking two very ancient Historians for his Authors, to wit, Seleucus and Mematus, affirmeth that this Mercurius was not onely the Inuentor of the Egyptian Philosophie, but of all other learning, called the Wisedome of the Egyptians before remembred: and that he wrote of that 40 subiect 36525. Bookes, or Pages. Of which there were numbred, of Fiery Spirits, one hundred Bookes; of Aerall Spirits as many, and of Spirits Celestiall a thousand; which because they were out of the Egyptian language conuerted by certaine learned Philosophers into the naturall Greece, they seemed to haue been first written in that Tongue. Clemens Alexandrinus writeth, that among the Bookes of Hermes, to wit, of the Wisedome of the Egyptians, there were extant in his time 36. of Physick 50 fixe bookes; of the orders of Eriffs ten; and of Astrologie foure.

¶ VIII.

A Brieue of the Historie of Iosua; and of the space betwene him and Othoniell: and of the remainders of the Canaanites; with a note of some Contemporaries to Iosua: and of the breach of Faith.

FTER the death of Moses, and in the one and fortieth yeere of the Egreffion, in the first moneth called Nisan, or March, Iosua the sonne of Nun, of the Tribe of Ephraim, being filled with the Spirit of wisdome, tooke on him the Government of Israel: God giuing him comfort, and encouraging him to passe the Riuer of Jordan, and to possesse, and 10 diuide among the Israelites the Land promised.

The beginning of Iosua rule S. Augustine dates with the raigne of Amintas, the eighteenth King in Assyria; with Corax the sixteenth King in Sicionia, when Danaus governed the Argues; and Erichonius, Athens.

Lib. 18. de Ciuit. Dei. c. 11.

Iosua imitating in all things his Predecessor, sent ouer Jordan certaine discoverers 10f. 2. 1. to view the seat and strength of Ierico, the next Citie vnto him on the other side of the Riuer, which hee was to passe ouer. Which discoverers being faued, and sent backe by Rahab, a Woman of ill fame, because she kept a Tauerne or Vitling-houle, made Iosua know, that the Inhabitants of Ierico, and those of the Countrie about it, 10f. 2. 11.

10 hearing of the approach of Israel, had lost courage. Whereupon the day after the re- 10f. 3. 12. turne of the Spies, which was the sixth day of the one and fortieth yeere after the Egreffion, Iosua remooued from Sittim in the Plaines of Moab, and drew downe his

Armie to the banks of the Riuer Jordan; and gaue them commandment to put themselves in order to follow the Arke of God, when the Leuites tooke it vp, and

10 moued towards the Riuer; giuing them withall this forcible encouragement, That they should thereby assure themselves of his fauour and presence who is Lord of all the world, when the Riuer of Jordan should be cut off and diuided, and the waters

10f. 3. 13.

10 coming from aboue should stand still in a heape; whereby those below towards the Dead-sea wanting supply, they might passe ouer into the land of Canaan with dry feet.

He also commanded Reuben, Gad, and the halfe Tribe of Manasse, to prepare

10f. 1. 12.

30 themselves (according to their Couenant made with Moses) to march in the head of the rest, and as we call it in this age, to leade in the Vanguard, which through all the Desarts of Arabie, from the Mount Sinai to this place, those of the Tribe of Indi had performed. For these Tribes being already provided of their habitations, and the Countrie and Cities of the Amorites, by the helpe of the rest, conquered for them: It agreed with iustice & equalitie, that Reuben, Gad, and the halfe of Manasse should also 40 assist their brethren in the obtaining of their parts, as yet in their enemies possession.

On the banks of Jordan they reited themselves from the sixth day to the ninth; and on the tenth day of the first Moneth Nisan, or March, they past ouer to the 40 other side, taking with them twelue stones from the drie ground in the midst of the Riuer: which, for a memorie of that miracle by God wrought, they set vp at Gilgal, on the East side of the Citie of Ierico, where they encamped the first night. At which the neglect whereof S. Augustine giueth for cause, The peoples contempt of their superiours. Thomas excuseth it in this sort; That the Israelites knew not the certaine lived by themselves, and a-part from all Nations.

Sinai; and now at Gilgal. After which being desirous to taste of the fruits of the Countrie, and hauing, as it were, surfeited on Man, they parched of the Corne of the land, being not yet fully ripe, and ate thereof.

And

And as Moses beganne to distribute those Regions beyond Jordan, to wit, the Lands of the Amorites, which Og of Basan, and Sihon held, so did Iosua performe the rest; and after a view and partition made of the Territories, hee gaue to each Tribe his portion by lot. But this partition and distribution was not done at once, but at three severall times; first, by Moses to Gad, Ruben, and the halfe Tribe of Manasse, of the Lands over Jordan; Secondly, by Iosua, to the Tribe of Juda, Ephraim, and the other halfe Tribe of Manasse, about the fifth yeere of his government; proued in the 14. of Iosua. v. 10. and a third diuision was made to the other seuen Tribes at Shilo, where Iosua seated the Tabernacle of the Congregation.

The victories of Iosua against the Kings of the Canaanites, are so particularly set downe in his owne bookes, as I shall not neede to lengthen this by their repetition. In whose storie I chiefly note these particulars. First, how in the beginning of the warre, those little Kings or Regni of the Canaanites, had not so much understanding, as to unite themselves together against the Israelites; but according to the custome of those estates, from whose Governours God hath taken away all wilddome and fore-sight, they left those of their owne Nation, which were next the invaders, to themselves, and to their owne defences; hoping that the fire kindled somewhat farre off, might againe haue beene quenched, ere it could spread it selfe so far as their owne Territories and Cities. But after such times as Jerico and Ai were entred, and the Kings, People, and Cities consumed; five of those 31. Kings (all which at length perished in that warre) ioynted themselves together, first attempting the Gibeonites, who had rendred themselves to Iosua. Onely five (the rest looking on to see the successe) namely, the King of the Iebusites, in Iebus, or Iherusalem, the Kings of Hebron, Jarmoth, Lachis, and Eglon, addrest themselves for resistance: whose Armie being by Iosua surpris'd and broken, themselves despairing to scape by flight, and hopelesse of mercy by submission, creeping into a Caeue vnder ground, were thence by Iosua drawne forth and hanged. In the prosecution of which victorie hee also tooke Makkedah, and Libnah, and Lachis. To the reliefe whereof Horam King of Gozar hastened, and perished. After which Iosua possesst him selfe of Eglon, Hebron, and Debir, destroying the Cities with their Princes.

In the end, and when the South Countries were possesst, the Cities thereof conquered, and their Kings and People made dust: the rest of the Canaanites, guided by the over-late counsailes of necessitie, united themselves, to make one grosse strength and body of an Armie: which Iabin, King of Hazor, practised and gathered together, by Iosua discovered, as the same rested neere the Lake of Merom, hee vsed such diligence, as hee came on them vnawares; and obtaining an absolute victorie over them, he prosecuted the same to the vttermost effect. And, besides the slaughter of the defendants, he entred their Cities, of which hee burnt Hazor only, reseruing the rest for Israel to inhabite and enjoy.

Secondly, I note, that Iosua shewed himselfe a skilfull man of Warre, for that in those ancient times he vsed the stratageme of an ambush in taking of Ai; and in that he broke the Armies of the first five Kings of the Amorites, which attempted Gibeon, by surpris. For he marched all night from his camp at Gilgal, and set on them early the next day, when they suspected no enemy at hand: as hee did also at Merom, when hee overthrew Iabin, and his confederates. After which, making the best profit of his victorie, he assaulted the great Citie of Hazor.

Thirdly, the miracles which God wrought during this warre, were exceeding admirable; as the stay of the Riuer Jordan at the Springs, so as the Armie of Israel pass't it with a drie foote: the fall of Jerico by the sound of the Hornes; the shewes of Haile-stones, which fell vpon the Amorites in their flight from Gibeon, whereby more of them perished, than by the sword of Israel: againe, the arrest of the Sunne in the firmament, whereby the day was so much the more lengthened, as the Israelites had time to execute all those, which fled after the overthrow: a wonder of wonders, and a worke onely proper to the all-powerfull God.

Fourthly, out of the passage betweene Iosua and the Gibeonites, the Doctrine of keeping Faith is so plainly and excellently taught, as it taketh away all euasion, it admitteth no distinction, nor leaueth open any hole or out-let at all to that cunning perfidiousnesse, and horrible deceit of this latter age, called Equiuocation. For, notwithstanding that these Gibeonites were a people of the Hebrews, expressly and by name, by the commandement of God to be rooted out, and notwithstanding that they were liars, and deceiuers, and counterfeiters, and that they did ouer-reach, and as it were, deride Iosua, and the Princes of Israel, by saying to bee sent as Embassadors from a farre Countrey, in which trauaile their clothes were worn; their bread mouldie, which they aowed to haue bene warme for newnesse when they first set out; their barrells and bottles of wine broken; their shoes patcht; and their sacks rent and ragged: Yet Iosua hauing sworn vnto them by the Lord God of Israel, hee durst not, though urged by the murmur of the people, to lay violent hands on them; but hee spared both their Liues, and the Cities of their inheritance.

Now if euery man had warrant to breake Faith, and to retract his promise made, Iosua had it. For first, the commandement which hee receiued from God to roote out this Nation among the rest, preceded by farre the peace which hee had granted them. Secondly, he might iustly haue put these men to the sword, and haue sackt their Cities; if there bee any euasion from a promise made, whereof the liuing God is called to witnesse. For it was not to the Gibeonites that hee gaue peace, because hee knew them to bee a people hated of God. Hee told them, that if they were of the Hebrews, it was not in his power to make a league with them. But it was to a strange people that hee gaue faith, and to a Nation which came from suris, who hearing of the wonders which the God of Israel had done in Egypt and ouer Jordan, sought for peace and protection from his people. Thirdly, the accord, which Israel made with these craftie Canaanites, was without warrant. For it is written in the same place, That the Israelites accepted their tale, that is, beleued what they had said, and counsailed not with the mouth of the Lord. Fourthly, these men who were knowne Idolaters, and serued those Puppets of the Heathen, men of an Apish Religion, as all Worshippers of Images are, could not challenge the witnesse of the true God, in whome they beleued not. I say therefore; that if euery man might haue serued himselfe by any euasion or distinction, Iosua might iustly haue done it. For hee needed not in this case the helpe of Equiuocation, or Mentall Reservation. For what hee swore, hee swore in good Faith; but hee swore nothing, nor made any promise at all to the Gibeonites. And yet, to the end that the faithlesse subtiltie of man should borrow nothing in the future from his example, who knowing well, that the promises hee made in the name of God, were made to the liuing God, and not to the dying Man, hee held them firme, and inuiolable, notwithstanding that they, to whom hee had sworn it, were worshippers of the Deuill.

For it is not, as faithlesse men take it, that he which sweareth to a Man, to a Societie, to a State, or to a King, and sweareth by the name of the liuing Lord, and in his presence, That this promise (if it be broken) is broken to a Man, to a Societie, to a State, or to a Prince; but the promise in the name of God made, is broken to God. It is God, that wee therein neglect: wee therein professe that wee feare him not, and that wee set him at nought and desie him. If hee that without Reservation of honour giueth a lie in the presence of the King, or of his Superiour, doth in point of Honour giue the lie to the King himselfe, or to his Superiour; how much more doth he breake Faith with God, that giueth Faith in the presence of God, promise in his name, and makes him a witnesse of the Couenant made?

Or of doubt, it is a fearefull thing for a Sonne to breake the Promise, Will, or Deed of the Father; for a State, or Kingdome, to breake those Contracts which haue beene made in former times, and confirmed by publique faith. For though it were 400. yeeres after Iosua, that Saul, even out of deuotion, slaughtered some of those people descended of the Gibronites: yet God who forgot not what the Predecessours and Fore-fathers of Saul & the Israelites had sworne in his name, afflicted the whole Nation with a consuming famine; and could not be appeased, till seuen of Sauls sonnes were deliuered to the Gibonites grieved, and by them hanged vp.

And certainly, if it be permitted by the helpe of a ridiculous distinction, or by a God-mocking equiuocation, to tware one thing by the name of the liuing God, and to referre in silence a contrarie intent: the life of man, the estates of men, the faith of Subjects to Kings, of Seruants to their Masters, of Vallalls to their Lords, of Wiues to their Husbands, and of Children to their Parents, and of all trials of right, will not onely be made vncertaine, but all the chaines, whereby freemen are tied in the world, be torne asunder. It is by oath (when Kings and Armies cannot passe) that we enter into the Cities of our enemies, and into their Armies: it is by oath that warres take ende, which weapons cannot ende. And what is it or ought it to be that makes an oath thus powerfull, but this; That he that sweareth by the name of God, doth assure others that his words are true, as the Lord of all the World is true whom he calleth for a witnesse, and in whose presence he that taketh the oath hath promised? I am not ignorant of their poore euasions, which play with the seueritie of Gods Commandements in this kinde: But this indeed is the best answer, That he breakes no faith, that hath none to breake. For whosoever hath faith and the feare of God, dares not doe it.

The Christians in the Holie Land when they were at the greatest, and had brought the Calph of Egypt to pay them tribute, did not only lose it againe, but were soon after beaten out of the Holie Land it selfe: by reason (saith William of Tyre, a reuerend Bishop which wrote that storie) that Almerick the fiftieth King after Godfrey brake faith with the Caliph Elhadach, and his Vicegerent, The Soldan Sana; who being suddenly invaded by Almerick, drew in the Turke Syracon to their aide: whole Nephew Seladine, after he had made Egypt his owne, beat the Christians out of the Holie Land; neither would the wooden Crosse (the very Crosse, say they that Christ died on) giue them victorie ouer Seladine, when they brought it into the field as their last refuge: seeing they had forsworne themselves in his name, that was crucified thereon. And if it be a direction from the holy Ghost, That he that speaketh lies, shall be destroyed, and that the mouth which uttereth them, shall be the first: how much more perilous is it (if any perill be greater than to destroy the soule) to sweare a lie? It was Eugenius the Pope, that perswaded, or rather commanded the King of Hungarie after his great victorie ouer Amurath the Turke, and when the said King had compelled him to peace, the most aduantageous that euer was made for the Christians, to breake his faith, and to prouoke the Turke to renew the warre. And though the said King was farre stronger in the field than euer; yet he lost the battaile with 30000. Christians, and his owne life. But I will stay my hand: For this first volume will not hold the repetition of Gods iudgements vpon faith-breakers; bee it against Infidels, Turkes, or Christians of diuers Religions. Lamentable it is, that the taking of oathes now-a-daies, is rather made a matter of custome than of conscience.

It is also very remarkable; That it pleased God to leaue so many Cities of the Canaanites vnconquered by Israel, to scourge and afflict them, by fore-seeing their Idolatry, and as it is said in the Scriptures, To bee Thornes in their eyes to proue them, and to teach them to make Warre. For these Cities hereafter named did not onely remaine in the Canaanites possession all the time of Iosua; but soon after his death, the Children of Dan were beaten out of the plaine Countries, and enforced to inhabite the Mountaines, and places of hardest access. And those of Iuda were not able to bee Masters of their owne Vallies; because, as it is written in the Judges, The Canaanites had Chariots of yron. And those principall Cities which flood on the Sea-side, adioyning vnto Iuda, were still held by the remainder of the Amukims, or Philistims: as Azzab, Gath, Aldod; out of one of which Cities came Goliath, remembered in Samuel.

Neither did the children of Manasse ouer Jordan expell the Geshurites, nor the Maachabites: which inhabited the North parts of Basun, afterward Tracomon.

Nor the Rephaim possessed themselves of Bethjehem: nor of Bethanab, but they inorist those Canaanites to pay them tribute. Neither did Asher expell the Zidonians, nor those of Acho, or Acon, Athlab, Achab; Heblab, Asphike, and Rehob, nor in-10 force them to tribute.

No more could Zabulon enioy Kitron, and Nahalol, but receiued tribute from them. All the Canaanites dwelt in Gezer among the Ephraims: and among the children of Manasse, on the West of Jordan, the Canaanites held Bethjehem, Taanach, Dor, Ib-15 leam, and Megado; yea Hierusalem it selfe did the Iebusites defend about foure hundred yeeres, even till Danids time.

Now Iosua liued one hundred and ten yeeres, eightene of which he gouerned Israel, and then changed this life for a better. The time of his rule is not exprest in the Scriptures, which causeth diuers to coniecture diuersly of the continuance. Iosephus giues him five and twentie yeeres, Seder Olam Rabbi the Authors of the He-20 brew Chronologie eight and twentie: And Masius fixe and twentie: Maimonius cited by Masius, fourteene: Ioannes Lucidus, leuenteene: Caletanus, ten: Eusebius giueth him seuen and twentie: and so doth S. Augustine: Melancthon, two and thirtie: Codoman, five and twentie. But whereas there passed 480. yeeres from the deliue-15 rance of Israel out of Egypt, vnto the building of the Temple, it is necessarie that we allow to Iosua onely eighteene of them; as finding the rest supplied other-10 wise, which to mee seemes the most likely, and as I thinke, a well approoued opinion.

The same necessitie of retaining precisely 480. yeeres from the departure out of Egypt vnto the building of the Temple, conuinceth of error, such as haue infer-30 red yeeres betweene Iosua and Othniel, of whom Eusebius findes eight yeere, to which Arius Montanus adhereth; and for which hee giueth his reason in his foure and twentieth and last Chapters vpon Iosua: Bunting reckons it nine yeere: Bucholzer and Neufster but one, Codoman twentie, and Nicephorus no lesse than three and thirtie: whereas following the sure direction of these 480. yeeres, there can be no void yeeres found betweene Iosua and Othniel, vnlesse they be taken out of those eighteen ascri-40 bed vnto Iosua by the account already specified. The prayes and acts of Iosua are briefly written in the fixe and fortieth Chapter of Ecclesiasticus, where among many other things it is said of him, Who was there before him like to him, for hee fought the battells of the Lord?

That he wrote the booke called by this name, it was the opinion of Arius Monta-40 nus, because it is said in the last Chapter ver. 26. And Iosua wrote these wordes in the booke of the law of God: which seemeth rather to haue beene meant by the couenant which Iosua made with Israel in Siechem, where they all promised to serue and obey the Lord: which promise Iosua caused to be written in the booke of the Law: and of this opinion were Caletanus and Abulenius: Theodoret doth likewise conceiue that the booke of Iosua was collected out of an ancient Volume, intituled Liber Inferum; 1. 10. 13. remembered by Iosua himselfe, and others, that it was the worke of Samuel: for whereas Montanus groundeth his opinion vpon these wordes of the 26. verse, And Iosua wrote these wordes, &c. this place bath nothing in it to proue it, for when the50 people had answered Iosua a; The Lord our God will we serue, and his voice will we obey, it followeth that Iosua made a couenant with the people, and wrote the same in the booke of the Law of God.

There liued at once with Iosua, Eriethonius in Attica, who taught that Nation to yoke beafts together, thereby to till the ground with more ease and speede: And about the same time the fittie Daughters of Danaius (as it is said) slew the fittie Sonnes of Aegyptus, all but Lyncus who succeeded Danaius, if the tale be true. There liued also with Iofua, Phoenix and Cadmus, and neere the end of Iofua's life, Iupiter is said to haue rauished Europa the Daughter of Phoenix, (afterward married to Asiarius King of Creta) and begar on her Minos, Radamanthus, and Sarpedon. But S. Augustine reports this rauishment to be committed by Xanthus, and yet they are more commonly taken for the Sonnes of Iupiter. But it may be doubted whether Minos was Father to Daedalion, and Daedalion to Idomeneus, who was an old man at the war of Troy, and Sarpedon was in person a young or strong man at the same Troian warre. And so doth Nestor reckon vp in the Councell of the Greekes, Thesus and Perithous for men of antiquity, and of ages past: Minos being yet more ancient than any of these. But hercof elsewhere.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Tribes of Israell, that were planted in the borders of Phœnicia, with sundrie Stories depending vpon those places.

§. I.

The Proeme to the description of the whole Land of Canaan, with an exposition of the name of Syria.

THE Storie of the Judges ought to follow that of Iofua, after whome the Common-wealth of the Jewes was gouerned by Kings, of which for many of them as ruled the tenne Tribes, shall be remembered when wee come to the description of Samaria: but because the Land of Canaan, and the borders thereof, were the Stages and Theaters, whereon the greatest part of the Storie past, with that which followeth, hath bene acted, I thinke it very pertinent (for the better vnderstanding of both) to make a *Geographi*all description of those Regions: that all things therein performed by the places knowne, may the better bee vnderstood, and conceiued. To which purpose (besides the addition of the Neighbour Countries) I haue bestowed ouer euerie Tribe his proper portion: and doe shew what Cities and Places of strength, were by the Jewes obtained: and what numbers it pleased God to leaue vnconquered: by whom he might correct and scourge them, when vngratefull for his many graces, they at sundry times forgot or neglected the Lord of all power, and adored those deafe and dead Idols of the Heathen. Diuina bonitas (saith AUGUSTINE) ideo maxime irascitur in hoc seculo, ne irascatur in futuro: & misericorditer temporalem aduict severitatem, ne eternam iussu inferat ultionem; The diuine goodnesse is especially therefore so angrie in this world, that it may not be angrie in the world to come, and doth mercifully use temporall severitie, that it may not iustly bring vpon vs eternall vengeance.

To the Cities herein described, I haue added a short Storie of the beginnings and ends of diuers Kingdomes and common-wealths: and to helpe my selfe herein,

I haue

I haue perused diuers of the best Authors vpon this subiect: among whom, because I finde so great disagreement in many particulars, I haue rather in such cases aduentured to follow mine owne reason, than to borrow any one of their olde patterns. And because Canaan, with Palestina of the Philistins, and the Lands of Og and Sihon Kings of Basan, and the Arabian Amorites, were but small Provinces of Syria: it shall be necessarie, first to diuide and bound the generall, and so to defend to this particular, now called the holy Land.

Syria, now Soria, according to the largest description, and as it was anciently taken, embraced all those Regions from the Euxine Sea, to the Red Sea: and therefore were the Cappadocians, which looke into Pontus, called Leucosyrius, or white Syrians. But taking it shorter, and from the coast of Cilicia, which is the North border, vnto Idumaea towards the South, Tigris towards the Sunne rising, and the Mediterranean Sea Westward: it then containeth besides Babylonia, Chaldea, Arabia the Desart, and Arabia Petrea; that Region also which the Greekes call Asiopotamia; the Hebrewes Syria, of the two Riuer, to wit, Tigris and Euphrates, for so Adam-Nabirejim is expounded: also Padan Aram: that is, Ingen Syria, because the two Riuer goe along in it as it were in a yoke.

Edessa, sometime Rages, now Rage, was the Metropolis of this Region of Syria. In Syria taken largely, there were many small Provinces, as Calefrya which the Latines call Syria Cana, because it lay in that fruitfull Valley betwene the Mountaines of Lybanus, and Anti-lybanus, in which the famous Cities of Antioch, Laodicea, Apamea, with many others were seated. Then Damascena or Syria Lybonica, taking name of the Citie Damascus, and the Mountaines of Lybanus, the Regall fate of the Adides, the first Kings of Syria. Adioyning to it was the Province of Sephene, or Syria Sobab, Choba, or Zobal: ouer which Adideser commanded in Salomon's time. Then Phœnicia and the people Syrpharines: and lastly Syria Palestine bordering Aegypt: of which Ptolomie maketh Iudea also a part: and to that Province which Moses calleth Seir and Edom, Pomponius Mela giueth the name of Syria Iudea.

§. II.

Of the bound of the Land of Canaan, and of the promises touching this Land.

BEVt that Land which was anciently Canaan, taketh a part of Phœnicia, and stretcheth from behinde Lybanus to the great Desart: betwene Idumaea and Aegypt: bounded by the Mid-land Sea on the West, and the Mountaines of Hermos, Galaad, and Arnon towards the East: the same Hills which Strabo calleth Traceni or Traceni, and Ptolomie Hippur. The name of Canaan it had from Canaan the Sonne of CHAM, & lingua appellata fuit CANAN; The language was also called CANAN, saith Montanus: and after Hebraea of the Hebrewes: who tooke name from Heber, the Sonne of Sade, according to S. Augustine. But Arias Montanus not so well allowing of this derivation, makes it a common name to all those of Noahs Sonnes, which past ouer Euphrates towards the West Sea. For the word Heber, saith hee, is as much as transiens or transmissus, of going or passing ouer. And because the children of Abraham had for a long time no certaine abiding: therefore as he thinks, they were by the Aegyptians called Hebraei, as it were passengers, which is also the opinion of C. Sigontus, and of Eusebius long before them both. It had also the name of Iudea from Iuda; and then afterwards intitled The holy Land, because therein our Saviour Christ was borne and buried. Now this part of Syria was againe diuided into foure; namely, into Edom, (otherwise Seir, or Edumaea) Galilee, Samaria, and Iudea. Galilee is double; the superior called Gentium, and the inferiour: and that Galilee and Iudea are distinguished, it is plain in the Euangelists, though both of them belong to Phœnicia.

Now

Now besides these provinces of Phenicia, and Palesine (both which the River of Jordan boundeth; sauing that Phenicia stretcheth a little more Easterly towards Damascus) that part also to the East of Jordan, and within the Mountaines of Hermus, Gilead and Arnon, otherwise Traconi, fell to the possession of half Manasse, Gad, and Ruben, and therefore are accounted a part of Canaan also: aswell because anciently possesed by the Amorites, as for that they were conquered and enioyed by the Israelites, which Eastermost parts are againe divided into Basan or Balanea, into Gilead, Masch, Midian, Ammon, and the Territories of the Machabiz, Gessuri, Argobe, &c. They are knowne to the later Cosmographers by the name of Arabia in generall; and by the names of Tracantia, Petria, Batanea, &c. of which I will speake in their proper places.

Deut. 11. 24.

But where Moses describeth the Land of Canaan in the tenth of Genesis, he maketh no mention of the later Prouinces, which fell to Manasse, Gad, and Ruben, for these be his words, Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon, as thou comest to Gerar vntill Ascalab (which is Gaza) and this was the length of the Countrey North and South: then it followeth in the Text; And as thou goest vnto Sodome and Gomorah, and Admah, and Sebojim, euen vnto Lasfa: by which words Moses setteth downe the breadth, to wit, from thd Dead Sea to the Mediterran. But in Deuteronomie it seemeth to be farre more large: For it is therein written; All the places whereon the sole of your feet shall tread, shall be yours: your coast shall be from the wilderness and to from Libanon, and from the River Perah, vnto the vntermost Sea. Now for the length of the Countrey North and South, this description agreeth with the former: onely Libanon is put for Zidon: and the Wildernesse for Gerar and Ascalab, which make no difference: for to the breadth and extent East and West, if Perah bee taken for Euphrates: then the Land promised stretcheth it selfe both ouer Arabia Petrea, and the Desart as farre as the border of Babylon: which the Israelites neuer possesed: nor at any time did so much as invade or attempt. And therefore Vadianus doth conceiue that by the River Perah, was meant Jordan, and not Euphrates: taking light from this place of Iosv. 1: Behold, I haue diuided vnto you by lot these Nations, that remaine to be an inheritance according to your Tribes: from Jordan with all the Nations that I haue destroyed, euen vnto the great Sea Westward.

And though it bee true that Dauid greatly enlarged the Territorie of the holy Land: yet as Vadianus well noteth, if Perah in the former place be taken for Euphrates, then was it put per gentes in amicitiam receptas. For Dauid did not at any time enter so farre to the East as Assyria, or Babylonia. Neither doth the not possessing of all these Countries giue advantage to those that would make any irreligious cauil, as touching the promise of God to the Israelites vnperformed: For when both their Kings, Magistrates, and People, fell from his worship and seruice, it pleased him not onely to inclose them within that Territorie, which was for so many people exceeding narrow; but therein and elsewhere to subiect them vnto those Idolatrous Nations, whose false and foolish Gods themselves also serued and obeyed. And sure the promise by which the Hebrewes claimed the inheritance of Canaan, and the lastling inioying thereof, to wit, as long as the heauens were aboute the earth, was tied to those conditions, both in the Verses preceding, and subsequent; which the Israelites neuer performed. And therefore they could not hope for other than all mankind could or can expect; who know that all sorts of comforts from the mercifull goodness of God looked for, aswell in this life as after it, are no longer to bee attended, than while wee perseuer in his loue, seruice, and obedience. So in the eighth Verse of the eleuenth of Deuteronomie, the keeping of Gods Commandements was a condition ioynted to the prosperity of Israel. For therein it is written; Therefore shall yee keepe all the Commandements which I commaund you this day: that ye may be strong, and get in, and possesse the Land, whither yee goe to possesse it. Also that you may prolong your dayes in the Land which the Lord swore vnto your Fathers, &c.

Deut. 11. 24.

The like condition was also annexed to the enioying of the land conquered, and the

the possession thereof, so long as the heauens were aboute the earth. For if yee keepe diligently, saith he, all these commandements, which I commaund you to doe, that is, to loue the Lord your God, &c. then will the Lord cast out all these Nations before you, and yee shall possesse great Nations, and mightier than you. And heere, though it bee manifest, that by reason of the breach of Gods Commandements, and their falling away from the worship of his all-powerfull Majestie, to the Idolatrie of the Heathen, the conditional promises of God were absolutely void, as depending vpon obedience vnperformed: yet I cannot mislike that expolition of Mel. nichon: For saith he, ostendit promissionem precipuum non esse de hoc Politico regno; ille sheweth that his chiefe promise is not of a ciuill Kingdom. To which agrees that answere, which S. Hierome made to a certaine Heretique in his Epistle ad Dardanum, who accused S. Hierome that he ouerthrew the reputation of the Iewes Storice, and brought the truth thereof in question, by drawing it altogether into an Allegorie, and ad illam duntaxat vinctum terram que in calis est; (that is) Onely to that Land of the liuing which is in Heauen. Quoniam tota Iudeorum Regio adeo angusta sit ambitu, ut vix longitudinem habeat 160. miliarium, latitudinem vero 40. & in his citam regiones, loca, rybes & oppida sunt plurima, nunquam à Iudeis occupata, sed tantum diuina pollicitatione promissa; Because the whole Countrey of the Iewes is so narrow in compass, that it scarce hath 160. miles in length, and 40. miles in breadth, and in these are Countreies, Places, Cities, and many Townes, which the Iewes neuer possesed, but were only granted by diuine promise. In like manner the same Father speaketh vpon Eysy touching the blessings promised vnto Hierusalem: where hee hath these words: De quo dicimus Hierusalem nequam in Palastina Regione petendam: quæ totius Prævincia deterrima est. & saxosis montibus asperatur. & penuriam patitur suis: ita ut celestibus utatur pluujs, & raritatem fontium æternarum extructione solatur: sed in Dei manibus ad quam dicitur sessinauerunt structores tui. From whence, saith he, we learne, that Hierusalem is not to be sought in that Region of Palesine, which is the worst of the whole Prouince, and ragged with craggie Mountaines, and suffereth the penurie of thirst: so as it preferueth raine water, and supplieth the scarcitie of Wells by building Cisternes, but this Hierusalem is in Gods hands, to which it is said, Thy builders haue hastened, so farre S. Hierome, where also to preuent mistaking, hee thus expoundeth himselfe. Neque hoc dico in succillationem terre Iudeæ, ut Hereticus Syrophanta mentitur: aut quo auctorem historiarum veritatem: que fundamentum est intelligentia spiritualis, sed ut decuit supercilium Iudeorum: qui Synagoge angustias latitudini Ecclesiæ preferunt. Si enim occiderint tantum sequuntur literam, & non spiritum viuificantem: ostendunt terram promissionis lacte & melle manantem; & eiber (saith he) say I this to disgrace the land of Iudæa (as the Hereticall Syrophant doth belie me) or to take away the truth of the Historie, which is the foundation of spiritual vnderstanding, but to beate downe the pride of the Iewes: which enlarge the straits of the Synagogue farther then the breadth of the Church: for if they follow onely the killing letter, and not the quickening spirit, let them siew the Land of promise, flowing with milke and honnie.

By this it may also be gathered, how fouler it be vnlike (seeing the West-bound in the place, Deut. 11. 24. had his truth in the littall sense, that Euphrates or Perah, which is made the East bound, should be taken only in a spiritual sense) yet neuertheless that Hieroms opinion inclineth to this, as if this Perah were not to be vnderstood for Euphrates: and that the promise it selfe was neuer so large: much lesse the plantation and conquest of Israel.

And now for a more particular description of this Holy Land, because Asher, Nephthaim, and Zabulon, held the Northernmost part, and were seated in Phenicia, I will begin with these three, taking Asher for the first: of which Tribe yet before I speake, I must admonish the Reader touching the names of places in this, and the other Tribes to be mentioned, that he remember that many names by reason of the diuers fancies of Translators, are diuersly expressed, so that to the vnskillfull they may seeme diuers, when they are one and the same: the reason of this diuersitie (as by those learned in the Hebrew I am taught) is, partly because the ancient Editions tions of the Hebrew want vowels, the old Translators imagined other vowels than now the Hebrew Editions have; and partly because the Ancient expressed or omitted diuers consonants, otherwise than the latter thinke fit.

S. III.

THE TRIBE OF ASHER.

†. I.

The bounds of the Tribe of Asher.

THe Asherites descended of Asher the Sonne of Jacob by Zelpha, the hand-maid of Lea, were increased while they abode in Aegypt, to the number of 41500. and odde persons, all men about twentie yeeres of age, and able to beare armes at the time, when they were mustered by Moses at Mount Sinai: all which number perishing in the Deserts, 20 there remained of their issues, besides women and children 53400. bodies fit for the warres: which past the River of Arnon, into the Plaines of Moab, and after the Conquest of Canaan, had for their portion that part of Phanicia, from Zidon and the fields of Lithanus, vnto Ptolomai Acon alongh the Sea-coast: containing thirtie English miles or thereabout: and from the Mid-land sea to the East border some twelue miles: though Antoninus makes it somewhat larger. This part of Canaan was very fruitful, abounding in Wine, Oile, and Wheate, besides the Balsamum, with other pleasant and profitable commodities: according to that Prophetie, Gen. 49. Asher pinguis panis: concerning Asher, his bread shall be fat: And he shall give pleasures for a King.

†. II.

Of Zidon.

THe first Citie seated on the North border of the Territorie of Asher, was Zidon, which Iosua calleth the great Zidon, both for strength and magnitude. The Greekes and Quintus make Agenor the founder thereof: and Iosime deriues the name from the abundance of Fish found on those shores: whereof it hath been called Zidonia. But that it was farre more ancient, Moses, Iosua, and Iosephus witnesse, 40 the same being founded by Zidon the eldest of *Canaan*s Sonnes: and so strong it was in *Iosua*s time, as neither did himselfe attempt it, neither could the Asherites, or any of their Successors master it: but it continued all the time of the Iudges and Kings, euen vnto the coming of Christ, a Citie interchangeably gouerned, by their owne Princes or other Magistrates: though according to the warnings and threats of the Prophets Esay, Hieremie, Ezekiel, and Zacharie, it was often afflicted both by the enemies sword, and by the pestilence.

Zidon is seated on the very wath of the Phenician Sea, which is a part of the Mediterran or Mid-land Sea. It hath to the North the Citie of Berythus, and the River Leontis: and to the South Sarepta, or Sophat: which standeth betwene it and Tyre, the distance betwene which two great and famous Cities, to wit, Zidon and Tyre, is fourteene thousand paces, saith Seiglerus: but Adrianus maketh it two hundred furlongs, and so doth Weslingius in his description of the holy Land, and both from Strabo: which two hundred furlongs make fise and twentie miles. This difference of distance as well betwene these two knowne Cities, as all the rest, make it ouer difficult to deuise any new scale to the Map, and description of the holy Land.

What Kings it had till Agenors time there is no memorie: The Storie which Zeno the Philosopher, who was a Zidonian, wrote thereof, being by time consumed and lost. It seemeth to bee more ancient than Tyre: which was also built by the Zidonians. For as Strabo noteth, Plomer speaking of Zidon, neglecteth the memorie of Tyre: because it was but a member of Zidon, and a Citie subiect to the Kings thereof: though it be true that in after-times it contended with Zidon for Primacie, and became farre more renowned, opulent, and strong: From Zidon had Salomon and Zorobabel, their principall workmen, both in Timber and Stone; for the building of the Temple. For as it flourished in all sorts of learning, so did it in all other Mechanicall Arts and Trades: the Prophet Zacharie calling them the wise Zidonians. The Citie was both by nature and art exceeding strong, hauing a Castle or Citadell on the North-side, standing vpon an vnaccessible Rocke, and compassed by the Sea, which after the Citizens became Christians, was held and defended by the Knights of the Dutch Order: and another Cattle it hath on the South side by the Port of Aegypt, which the Templers guarded. It also feine many other Colonies besides that of Tyre, into places remote: as vnto Thibes, and Sephira, Cities of Iudicia in Greece. Strabo and Plinie giue the Zidonians the invention of the Glasse, which they vld to make of those sands which are taken out of the River Belus, falling into the Mediterran Sea, neere Ptolomais or Acon: and from whence the Venetians fetch the matter of those cleare Glasses which they make at Murano: of which S. Hierome and Plinie. Zidon insignis artifex vitri: Zidon vitarys officinis Nobilis: Zidon a famous Glasse-maker, or a skilfull worker in Glasse-houses.

They were in Religion Idolaters (as the rest of the Canaanites) worshippers of Baal and Astarte: which Idols though common to the other of the issue of Canaan (as Pineda gathers out of 1. Sam. 31. 10. and Iud. 10. 6.) yet especially and peculiarly were accounted the Gods of the Zidonians: as appears 1. Kings 17. 5. in the storie of Salomons Idolatrie: where Astarte is called the God of the Zidonians: and 2. Reg. 16. 33 in the storie of Achab, the chiefe worshipper of Baal, where it is said that hee marrying Iezabel the Daughter of the King of the Zidonians, worshipped their Baal. Diuers Baals and diuers Astartes in their Idolatries they acknowledged: as it appears by the plural names of Baalim and Astartes, 1. Sam. 12. 10. and else where: for euen the name Astarte, as I am informed by a skilfull Hevritian, is plural: the singular being Astartis: whence Iud. 2. 13. the Septuagint readeth idolatrias eius astartis: They worshipped the Astarties. The occasion of this their multiplying of their Baals, and Astartes, may be diuersly vnderstood: either in respect of the diuersitie of the formes of the Images, or of the worship in diuers places, or of the stories depending vpon them: which (as fables vnto bee) were doubtlesse in diuers Cities diuers. Antiquit. quest. 16. in Iudg. thinkes Baal and Astarte to bee Iupiter and Iuno. For the Carthaginians (which were Tyrants) call Iuno by some such name as Astarte. Tullie lib. 3. de Nat. Deorum, making diuers Goddes of the name of Venus, expounds the fourth to be Astarte: whom hee makes to be borne of Tyrrus and Syria, and to haue bene the wife of Adonis: as also Macrobius. 2. Saturn. cap. 21. saies that Adonis was with great veneration commonly worshipped of the Affrians: and Hierome vpon Ezek. 8. 44. notes that Thammuz (whom there the Idolatrous women are noted to bewaile) is the name of Adonis among the Syrians. So that it may seeme that in the worship of Astarte, or Venus, they did bewaile her husband Adonis: as also the Gracians did in their songs of Adonis. Mourne for Adonis is the faire, dead is Adonis the faire.

Howbeit others in that place of Ezekiel not without good probability, expound the mourning for Thammuz, to be the mourning for Osiris in the sacrifices of Isis: whose losse of her husband Osiris, was as famous in the Aegyptian Idolatrie, as with the Gracians, Venus losse of Adonis. And to this agreeeth that which Pistarch hath, de Isidis & Osiridis: that Osiris with the Aegyptians is called Ammuz: which word may seeme seeme to be the same with Ezekiels Thammuz. But howsoever these Zidonians were thus anciently sowered with the milke of Idolatry: yet they were more apt to receive the Doctrine and Gospell of Christ after his Ascension, than the Jewes: who had beene taught by Moses, and the Prophets for many yeeres, whereof our Saviour in Matth. 12. v. 10. Ivce bee to thee Corazin, &c. for if the great works which were done in thee, had beene done in Tyrrus and Zidon, they had repented long ago, &c. but I say unto you, it shall be easier for Tyrrus and Zidon, at the day of iudgement than for you.

Lastly, in the yeere 1289. it was reconquered by the Saracens: and is now in possession of the Turke, and hath the name of Zai.

Of Sarepta, with a briefe Historie of Tyre in the same coast.

Sarepta, or after the Hebrew, Sarpath, is the next Citie Southward from Zidon, betwene it and the River called Aar, or Fons hortorum Libani (of which more hereafter) standing in the way towards Tyre, a Citie very famous for the excellent Winegrowing neere it: of which Strabo writes.

Vina mihon sunt Gazetia, Chia, Falerna, Quæq; Sareptano palmite missa bibas.

I haue no wine of Gaza, nor Falerna wine,
Nor any for thy drinking of Sarepta's vine.

This Citie had also a Bishop of the Diocesse of Tyre: after it came to the Saracens and Turkes, as thereft: and is now called Saphet, saith Possellus.

Virgil.

Not farre from Sarepta was situate that sometime famous Citie of Tyre, whose fleets of ships commanded, and gaue the law ouer all the Mediterran Sea, and the borders thereof: during which time of greatnesse and power, the Tyrians erected Tyris, Leptis, and Carthage in Africa, of which Virgil. Vrbs antiqua fuit Tyrrum Coloni Carthago. And Carthage was therefore called Punica quasi Phœnicum, a Colonic of the Phœnicians. In Spain they founded Gades, now Cadiz. In Italie, Nola: in Asia the lesse, Dromos Achilles, which Citie the Schoolast of Apollonius placeth neere the River Phyllis, in Bithynia.

Gellius. l. 4. c. 6.

It had anciently the name of Zor, or Tzor: and so it is written in Iosua the 19. taking name from the situation: because built on a high Rocke, sharpe at one end. The Latines, as it seemes, knew it by the name of Sarra; for Virgil calleth the purple of Tyre, gl'rum Sarranum, by which name Iuuenal and Silius remember it. The Zidonians built it vpon a high Hill, whereof many ruines remaine to this day; the place being still knowne by the name of the ancient Tyre: and because it was a Colonic of the Zidonians, the Prophet Esay calleth it the Daughter of Zidon; which Trogus also confirmeth, though Berosus by affinitie of name makes Thiras the Sonne of Iaphet to be the Parent thereof: and though no doubt it was very ancient (for so much the Prophet Esay also witnesseth, It is not this your glorious Citie whose antiquitie is of ancient daies?) daies;) yet, that Thiras the sonne of Iaphet set himselfe in the bosome of the Canaanites who built Zidon, and peopled all that Region: I see nothing to perfwade mee.

But that new Tyre in after-times so renowned, seemeth to bee the worke of Agenor: and of this opinion was Curcius: and Iosephus, and Eusebius make this Citie elder than Salomons Temple 240. yeeres: Cedrenus 361. who also addeth that Tyrrus the Wife of Agenor gaue it her name: but of Agenor I will speake more at large in the storie of their Kings.

For strength and for the commoditie of the harbour, and the better to receive Trade from all places, it was in this new erection founded in an Iland, 700. paces from the continent: and therefore Ezekiel placeth it in the middelt of the Sea, as some read, or as others in the inner-most part of the Sea, whence hee calleth it situate at the entrie of the Sea, as also the same Prophet calleth it the Mart of the people for many isles: and Esay a Mart of the Nations: and so Proude, Wealthie, and Magnificent was this Citie, as the Prophet Esay calleth the Merchants thereof Princes, and their Chapmen the Nobles of the world.

It excelled both in learning, and in manufecture: especially in the making and dying of Purple, and Scarlet-cloth: which, saith Iulius Pollux, was first found out by Hercules Dogge, who passing alongst the Sea-coast, and eating of the Fish Conchili or Purpura: the haire of his lips became of that colour. It worshipped the same Idolls that Zidon did: sauing that Hercules became their Tatrou in after-times: For Alexander Macedon, when the Tyrians presented him with a crowne of gold; and other gifts, desiring to remaine his friends and allies, answered them, that he had vowed a sacrifice to Hercules, the Defender of their Citie: and the Ancestor of the Macedonians Kings: and must therefore enter it. Whereupon they sent him word, that Hercules his Temple was in the Mountaine of old Tyre: where he might performe that ceremonie: but this auailed not. For Alexander was not so superstitious, as ambitious, hee desired to enter the Towne, which being denied, hee saw whom no perill could feare, nor labour wearie, gathered together as many ships as he could; and brought from Libanus so great a number of Cedars, and so many waightie Stones, from the old Citie of Tyre adioyning, as notwithstanding that his materials were often walst away with the strength of the Sea, and the Tides, yet he neuer rested, till hee had made a foote passage from the Continent to the Iland: and hauing once approached their Walls, hee ouer-topt them with Turrets of wood, and other frames: from whence (hauing filled the body of force with the violent mouing Spirit of resolution) he became Lord thereof, putting all to the sword that resisted, after which he caused 2000. more to bee hung vpon a ranke all alongst the Sea-shore: which execution vpon cold blood hee performed (as some Authors affirm) vpon the issues of those slaues which had formerly slaine all their Masters, taking their Wiues, Children, Riches, and power of Gouernement to themselves. This victorie of Alexander ouer the Tyrians, Iosephus remembreth: and how Sannaballat revolted from Darius, and came to Alexander with 8000. Soldiers: who was the last Satrapa or Prouinciall Gouernour, which Darius leated in Samarita: the same who hauing married his Daughter to Manasse, brother to Iaddus the high Priest of Hierusalem, obtained of Alexander that a Temple might bee built on the Mountaines Garizim ouer Samarita: that the forces of the Jewes being diuided, Alexander might the better hold them in obedience. The Honour of which Priesthood he bestowed on his sonne-in-law Manasse, whom the Jewes oppugned, for that he had married out of their Tribes, and with a Gentile: but while Alexander belieged Gaza, Sannaballat, whom Gail. Tyrrus calleth Sannabals, died.

Long before this desolation of Tyre, by the crueltie of Alexander, it was attempted by Salmanser the Assyrian King: when the growing pride of the Assyrians, after that they had conquered the ten Tribes, with the rest of Syria, became enuious of the beautie, riches, and power of that Citie. Hee besieged it both on the Land-side, and with three-score ships of Warre held the Port: to the end that neither any v.

 Qualls nor any supply of men might enter it: but the Tyrians with twelve saile scattered that flecte, and tooke 500. prisoners of the Assyrians: notwithstanding, the Assyrian continued his resolution and lay before it by his Lieutenants five yeeres, but with ill successe. And this sieg Menander Ephesus, cited by Iosephus, made report of in his Chronicles, as hee found the Storie among the Annals of the Tyrians (which the said Menander converted into Greeke) adding that Eulamus, whom Tyrius calleth Helsamus, was then King of Tyre, having gouerned the same fixe and twentie yeeres. Soone after this repulse of Salmansassar, and about 200. yeeres before the victorie of Alexander, Nabuchodonosor at such time as hee destroyed Hierusalem with the Temple, came before this Citie: who indeed gaue to Alexander the example of that despairfull worke, of ioyning it to the Continent. For Nabuchodonosor had formerly done it: though by the diligence of the Citizens, and the strength of the Sea, the same cawley and passage was againe broken downe, and demolished.

Against Nabuchodonosor, for many yeeres, the Tyrians defended themselves: for so long did these Babylonians continue before it, As every head was made bald, and euery shoulder made bare, saith Ezekiel, who with the Prophet Elay had manifestly foretold the destruction of this proude place. In the end and after thirteene yeeres siege or more, the Tyrians despoiled of all their hopes, and remembering ouer-late the predictions and threatnings of Gods Prophets, hauing prepared a convenient number of ships, abandoned their Citie, transporting with themselves the ablest of all that remained: and with their wiues, children, and portable riches sailed thence into Cyprus, Carthage, and other Maritimate Cities of their Tributaries, or Confederates: so as the Babylonians finding nothing therein, either to satisfie so many labours and perills, or any person vpon whom to auenge themselves for the losse of so many bodies in that Warre: It pleased God, in recompence thereof (who strenghtened this resolution, as in a worke of his owne) to make Nabuchodonosor victorious ouer the Egyptians: and gaue him that Kingdome and the spoile thereof, as it were in wages for his Armie. Whereupon Saint Hierome noteth, that God leauech not the good deeds of the Heathen vnrwarded: who though they cannot hope by any laudable worldly action, to attaine vnto that eternall happinesse reserved for his Servants and Saints: yet such is the boundlesse goodnesse of God, as he often repaisth them with many worldly gilts and temporal blessings.

Now of this enterprife of Nabuchodonosors against Tyre, prophane Historians haue not bene silent. For both Diodor, and Philostratus (as Iosephus citeth them) the one in his second Booke, the other in his Phenician Histories remember it.

After these two great Rassations by the Kings of Babylon and Macedon: this Citie of Tyre repaired and recovered it selfe againe: and continued in great glorie about 300. yeeres, euen to the coming of our Sauour Christ: and after him flourished in the Christian Faith neere 600. yeeres: the Archbishop whereof gaue place to none great Citie, with their Bishops and Suffragans: namely Caipha, otherwise Perphoria, Acon or Ptolomais, Sarepta, Zidon, Casarea, Philippi, Berytus, Byblus, Botrys, Tripolis, Orthofia, Archis, Aradus, Antaradus (or Tortosa) and Maraclea. But in the yeere 636. it was with the rest of that beautifull Region of Phenicia and Palaestina, subiect to the cruell and faithlesse Saracen. Vnder the burthen and yoke of whose tyrannic it suffered with the other Palestine Cities 488. yeeres.

In the yeere 1112. it was attempted by Baldwine King of Hierusalem; but in vaine: yet in the yeere 1124. by Gueremonde, Patriarke of Hierusalem, Vicegerent to Baldwine the second, with the assistance of the Venetians, and their flecte of Gallies, it was againe recovered, and subiect to the Kings of Hierusalem, and so it remained 165. yeeres.

Finally, in the yeere 1189. Saladin hauing first taken Hierusalem, removed his whole Armie and late downe before Tyre: drawing his flecte of ships and Gallies from from Alexandria into the port, this Citie as then onely remaining in the Christian power.

The citizens finding themselves reduced into great famine, and many other miseries, they at once with certaine rafters of timber, fiered, burnt, and brake the Saracens flecte, and falling out resolutely vpon his armie, flew to great numbers of them, and followed their victorie with such furie, as that the Saracens forsaking their Trenches and Tents, remoued in great disorder and dishonour. Two yeeres after which victorie the bodie of that famous Fredricke Barbarossa (who by the lamentable accident of following the Christians enemies ouer a Riuier vnfoordable, perished by the weight of his armor therein) was brought and interred in the Cathedral church of Tyre, neere vnto that glorious Sepulchre of Origen, garnished and grauen with guilt pillars of Marble, 940. yeeres before therein buried: but in the yeere 1289. the Saracens againe attempted it, and carried it, and it now remaineth subiect to the Turks.

†. IIII. Of Ptolomais or Acon.

The third Citie along the coast of the Sea, which the Assyrites could not obtaine, on the South bound of Affer was Acho, which was the ancient name thereof after Hierome, though other good Authors affirme that it tooke name from Acon the brother of Ptolome. Plinie calleth it Ace: and otherwise the Colonie of Cleudius. It had also the name of Coth or Cod, and by Zeiglerus it is called Hactipos.

But lastly, it was intituled Ptolomais after the name of one of the Egyptian Ptolomes: which Citie also as it is 1. Mac. 11. another of the Ptolomes, infideliouly wrested from his sonne in law Alexander, which called himselfe the sonne of Antiochus Epiphanes: the same Alexander hauing married Cleopatra daughter of the said Ptolome not long before. Therein also was Jonathan Maccabees treacherously surprized and slaine, as it is 1. Macc. 12. 48. by the perfidioulnesse of Tryphon, whom soone after Antiochus pursued as it is in the Storie ensuing: and by like reason about the same time was the aforesaid Alexander in the warre against Demetrius one of the sonnes of Antiochus the great with whom Ptolome ioyned, ouerthrowne and treacherously murdered by Zabdiel the Arabian: to whom he fled for succour: and his head presented vnto his father in law Ptolome: who enioyed not the glory of his victorie and treason about three dayes, for God stricke him by death.

For the beautie and strength of this Citie, this Alexander made it his regall seat; two parts of the same being inuironed by the Sea, and the Port for safetie and capacitie not inferior to any other in all that Traet. This Citie is distant from Hierusalem some foure and thirtie miles: foure miles to the North from the Mountaine Carmel, and as much to the South from Castrum Lancherti: from Tyre, Antoni maketh it two and thirtie Italian miles. In the middle of the Citie there was a Tower of great strength sometime the Temple of Bel-Zabub: and therefore called the Castle of Flies, on the topp whereof there was maintained a perpetuall light, like vnto that called Pharus in Egypt: to giue comfort in the night to those ships, which came neere and sought that part. It had in it a Bishops seate, of the Diocesse of Tyre, after it became Christian: but in the yeere 636. (a fatall yeere to the Christians in those parts) it was forced and taken by Haumarus the Saracen. In the yeere 1104. it was regained by Baldwine the first, by the helpe of the Gallies of Genoa: to whom a third of the reuenue was giuen in recompence. Againe, in the yeere of our Lord God, one thousand one hundred foure-score and seuen Saladin King of Egypt, and Syria, became Lord thereof. In the yeere of Christ, one thousand one hundred ninetie and one, by Richard King of England, and Philip King of France, it was repofessed and redeliuered to the Christians. Lastly, in the yeere 1291. it was by the furie of the Saracens besieged with an Armie of 150000. entred, sackt, and vicerly demolished: though in some sort afterward recified, and it is now Turkish.

Chap. 9. S. 6.

Five miles from Ptolomais towards the East, is the Castle of St. George seated, in which he was borne: the Valley adioyning bearing the same name. And though for the credit of S. Georges killing the Dragon, I leave euery man to his owne beliefe: yet I cannot but thinke, that if the Kings of England had not some probable record of that his memorable act, among many others: it was strange that the Order full of Honour, which Edward the third founded, and which his Successours Royally haue continued, should haue borne his name, seeing the world had not that scarceitie of Saints in those days, as that the English were driuen to make such an erection vpon a Fable, or Person fained. The place is described by Adrichomius in his description of Affer, to haue bene in the fields of Libanus: betweene the River Adonis, and Zidon: his owne wordes are these: *Hoc loco qui ab incolis Cappadocia appellatur, non longe à Beryto, memorant inditum Christi Aditum D. GEORGIUM; Regis filium ab immanissimo Dracone asseruisse: eamq. multata bestia parenti restituisse. In cuius rei memoriam Ecclesia postmodum fuit edificata: In this place, which by the Inhabitants is called Cappadocia, not farre from Berytus, men say that the famous Knight of Christ Saint GEORGE, did rescue the Kings Daughter from a huge Dragon: and hauing killed the best, delivered the Virgin to her Parent. In memorie of which deede a Church was after built there: Thus saith Adrichomius. His Authors he citeth Leonicius Roman. Patri. Navigationum, l. 1. c. 3. and Bridenbach Itin. 5. The Valley vnder this Castle sometime called Affer, was afterward called the Valley of S. George. If this authoritie suffice not, we may rather make the Storie allegoricall, figuring the victorie of Christ, than accept of George the Arrian Bishop, mentioned by Am. Marcellinus.*

Of Acziba, Sandalium, and others.

Betweene Ptolomais and Tyre alongst the Sea coast, was the strong Citie of Acziba, or Achazib, which S. Hierome calleth Achziph, and Iosephus Ecdippus; Plinie Ecdippa, one of those which defended it selfe against the Asserites. Belforrest findes Acziba and Sandalium, or the Castle of Alexander to be one, but I know not whence he had it.

The twelue searchers of the Land which Moses sent from Cadeshbarne, traualled as farre to the North as Roob, or Rechab, in the Tribe of Affer, which Rechab, as also Berothe which by Ezekiel cap. 47. v. 16. is placed in these North borders, belonged in Dauids time to the King Hadarbezer, as it may bee gathered out of the second of Samuel the 8. cap. and 8. vers. 6. and cap. 10. vers. 6. and it defended it selfe against the Asserites, as Zidon, Tyre, Achzib, Ptolomais, Alab, Helbah, and Aphek did.

This Aphek it was, whose Wall falling downe, slew seven and twentie thousand of Benhadads Souldiers, after that a hundred thousand had bene slaughtered by the Israelites, vnder the conduct of Alab. Here Iunius finds that the Philistines incamped a little before the battaile at Gilboa, though in his Note vpon the first of Samuel, the 9. and 1. he takes Aphek there mentioned (at which battaile the Arke was taken) to haue bene in Iuda. Of which Ios. 15. and 53. and in the second of Kings 13. 17. hee reads, Fortiter, for, in Aphek. Where others conuert it, Peruicinus Syrosin Aphek.

The

The next place alongst the coast is Sandalium, first called Schandalium of Schander, which we call Alexander, for Alexander Macedon built it, when hee besieged Tyre: and set it on a point of Land which extendeth it selfe into the Sea, betwene Acziba and Tyre: which Catle Baldwine the first rebuilt and fortified; in the yecre of Christ 1157. when he vnderooke the recouerie of Tyre.

Not much above a mile from this Castle, there ariseth that most plentifull spring of water, which Salomon remembreth, called the Well of living waters: from whence not only all the fields and plaines about Tyre are made fruitful by large pipes hence drawne: but the same Spring, which hath not about a bow-shot of ground to traueile till it recouer the Sea, driueth fixe great Mills in that short passage, saith Brocherd.

Within the Land, and to the East of Acziba, and Sandalium, standeth Hofa: and beyond it, vnder the Mountaines of Tyre, the Citie of Achzaph, or Axab, or after S. Hierome Achaph, a Citie of great strength, whose King amongst the rest was slaine by Ishba, at the waters of Aterom.

†. VII.
Of Thoron, Giscala, and some other places.

Further into the Land towards Jordan, was seated the Castle of Thoron, which Hugo de Sancto Abilemare built on the Easter-moist Hills of Tyre, in the yecre 1107. thereby to restrain the excursions of the Saracens, while they held Tyre against the Christians: the place adioyning being very fruitfull, and exceeding pleasant. From this Castle the Lords of Thoron, famous in the Storie of the Warres for the recouerie of the Holy Land, deriue their names, and take their Nobilitie. It had in it a curious Chappell, dedicated to the blessed Virgin, in which Humphrey of Thoron, Constable to Baldwine the third, King of Hierusalem, lieth buried: There were five Castles besides this within the Territorie of Affer: whereof foure are seated almost of equall distance from each other: to wit, Castrum Lamperti, Montfort, Indin (or Saron) Castrum Regium, and Belfort: The first nere the Sea vnder the Hills of Saron: the next three, to wit, Indin, Montfort, and Regium, stand more within the Land, and belonged to the Brother-hood and Fellowship of the Teutonici, or Dutch Knights (by which they defended themselves, and gaue succour to other Christians as such time as the Saracens posselt the best part of the vpper Galilee) the chiefe of which Order was in Ptolomais Acon. The first Fortresse was for beautie and strength called Belfort, seated in the high ground vpon the River Naar, nere the Citie Rama: of which in this Tribe Ios. 19. 29. for which the Vulgar reads Horma: making the article a part of the word, and mistaking the vowels: from the siege of this Castle of Belfort, the great Saladine King of Syria and Aegypt, was by the Christians Arme raised, and with great losse and dishonour repulsed.

To the East of Belfort, is the strong Citie of Alab (or Achlab) which S. Hierome calleth Chalab, one of those that defended them selfes against Affer, as Roob (or Rechab) not farre thence did.

Towards the South from Roob they place Gabala (which Herod, furnished the Assalonite rebuilt) making it of the Territorie of Chabul, Quod Syrorum lingua disputare significat (saith Wesslenburg) so called, because Hiram of Tyre was ill pleased with those twentie Cities, seated hereabout, which Salomon presented vnto him in recompence of those prouisions sent him for the building of the Temple. Others thinke this Chabul or Cabal, containing a circuit of those twentie Cities giuen to Hiram, to haue bene without the compasse of the holy Land: though bordering Affer on the North side: as it is said, 1. Reg. 9. 11. that they were in Regione limitis: that is, in limite Regionis, in the border of the Countrie: for it was not lawfull, say they, to giue to strangers any part of the possessions allotted to the Israelites: howsoeuer, that as

Cap. 16.

Almost of equal distance from the Castle of Thoron, they place the Cities of Giscala, and Gadara: of which Gadara is rather to be placed ouer Jordan: Giscala was made famous by John the Sonne of Leui, who from a meane estate gathering together foure hundred Theeves, greatly troubled all the vpper Galilee: at such time as the Romans attempted the conquest of Judea: by whose practice Iosephus, who then commanded in the vpper Galilee, was greatly indangered: whereof himselfe hath written at large, in his second Booke of those Warres. This John betraying in all hee could to the Citie of Giscala (whereof he was naturall) to the Roman State: and finding a resistance in the Citie, gaue opportunitie, during the contention, to the Tyrians and Gadarams, to surprize it: who at the same time forst it, and burnt it to the ground; but being by Iosephus authoritie rebuilt, it was afterward rendred to Titus by composition. They finde also the Cities of Cana, Adair, and * Cades: (or Cedessa) of the first was that Syro-phoenician, whose Daughter Christ deliuered of the euill Spirit. Neere the other, they say, it was that Ionathas Machabaeus ouer-threw the Armie of Demetrius.

Others held by the Canaanites, mention is made, Iudg. 1. 30. to which out of Iosua we may adde Ebron, Amhad, and others, on which no storie dependeth; and therefore I will not pester the description with them.

d The word Nabal is ambiguous, either for a Valley or for a River: but this word Ghe is alway a Valley, as in Genimon and Gelemanim.

The rivers to the North of Asher, are Adonis, afterward Canis, to which Ziegler ioyneth Lycus, Ptolomie, Leontis: both which fall into the Sea neere Berytus: which River of Leontis, Montanus drawes neere vnto Zidon: finding his head northward, where Ptolomie doth, betwene Zidon and Tyre. It hath also a River called fons hortorum Libani, which Adrichome out of Brocard intituleth Eleutherus: for which hee also citeth Plinie; and the first of Machabees the 11. Chap. but neither of those authorities proue Eleutherus to be in Asher: for this River falleth into the Sea at the Ile of Aradus: not farre from Balanea, witnesseth Ptolomie: and therefore Pinitus calleth it Valania, and Possellus Valana: which River boundeth Phoenicia on the North side: to which Strabo also agreeth: but this principall River of Asher, Arias Montanus calleth Gabatus. Christianus Schrot out of the mouth and Papers of Peter Laicstan (which Laicstan in this our age both viewed and described the Holy Land) calleth the maine River fons hortorum Libani: and one of the streames which runneth into it from the North side, Naar, and another from the South-west, Chelion: of the Citie adioyning of the same name: for Eleutherus it cannot be. There is also another River described by Adrichome, named Leptach, which I finde in no other Author, and for which hee citeth the nineteenth of Iosua, but the word * Ghe which is added there to Leptach, is not taken for a River, but for a Valley: and fora Valley the the Vulgar, the Genens, and Arias Montanus turne it. There is also found in Asher, the River of Belus, remembered by Iosephus and Tacitus, which is also called Pagidas, saith * Plinie: out of the sands of this River are made the best Glasse, which sometime the Zidonians practised: and now the Venetians at Murana. Arias Montanus makes Belus to be a branch of Chedunim, which it cannot be: for Belus is knowne to flow from out the Lake Cendewia, as all Cosmographers both Ancient and Moderne, and the later Trauailers into those parts witness. It is true that the River of Chisun taketh water from Chedunim: but not in that fashion which Montanus hath described it: neither doth it finde the Sea at Ptolomias Acon: according to Montanus 10 but farther to the South betwene Caiphas and Scamimum, witnesseth Ziegler, Adrichome, and Schrot.

Besides these Rivers there are diuers famous Springs and Fountaines, as that of living waters adioyning to Tyre: and * Maserephot, or after S. Hierome, Maserephot-maim, whose Well filled by the flood of the Sea adioyning, (they say) the Inhabitants by seething the water make salt thereof, as at Neutwich.

The Mountaines which bound Asher on the North, are those of Anti-libanus, which with Libanus bound Celestria: two great ledges of Hills, which from the Sea of Phenicia and Syria, extend themselves farre into the Land Eastward: foure hundred stadia or furlongs, according to Strabo: for that length hee giueth to the Valley 10 of Celestria: which those Mountaines inclose: but Plinie giueth them 1500. furlongs in length from the West (where they beginne at Theiophoon, or Deisaces, neere Tripolis) to the Mountaines of Arabia beyond Damascus: where Anti-libanus turneth towards the South. These ledges where they beginne to part Tracoonitis and Bafania, from the Desert Arabia, are called Herman: which Moses also nameth Sion, the Phoenicians Syrion, and the Amerites Sanir, neither is this any one Mountaine apart; but a continuation of Hills: which running farther Southerly, is in the Scriptures called Galaad or Gilead: the same being still a part of Libanus, as the Prophet Hieremie proueth: Galaad to mibi caput Libani: noting that this Galaad is the highest of those Hills of Libanus. Strabo knowes them by the name of Tracoonitis: and Ptolomie by Hip- 10 pus. Arias Montanus calleth these Mountaines bordering Asher, Libanus, for Anti-libanus, contrary to all other Cosmographers, but hee giueth no reason of his opinion.

They take the name of Libanus from their white tops, because according to Tacitus, the highest of them are couered with Snow all the Summer, the Hebrew word Libanon (saith Weissenburg) significeth whitenesse. Others call them by that name of the Frankincense which those trees yeld: because libanum is also the Greeke word for that Gumme.

Niger out of Aphrodisius affirmeth, that on Libanus, there falleth a kinde of honie dew, which is by the Sunne congealed into hard sugar, which the Inhabitants call 40 Sachar, from whence came the Latine word Saccarum.

The Rivers which Libanus beltoweth on the neighbour Regions are, Chrysor- 40 rhos, Jordan, Eleutherus, Leontes, Lycus, Adonis, fons hortorum Libani, and others.

There of the Mountaines of Asher, are those Hills about Tyre, and the Hills of Saron, both exceeding fruitfull: but those are but of a low stature, compared with Libanus: for from Nabo, or the Mountaine of Abaram, in Reuben, Moses beheld Libanus three-score miles distant.

THE TRIBE OF NEPHTALIM.

†. I.

Of the bounds of Nephtalim, and of Heliopolis, and Abila.

He next Portion of the Land of Canaan bordering Asher, was the upper Galilee: the greatest part whereof fell to the lot of Nephtalim, the Sonne of Jacob by Billa, the hand-maide of Rachel: who while they abode in Egypt, were increased to the number of 53400. persons, able to beare armes, numbered at Mount Sinai: all which leaving their bodies in the Deserts, there entered the Holy Land of their Sonnes 45400. besides, Infants, Women, and Children, vnder twenty yeeres of age. The Land of Nephtalim tooke beginning on the North part, from the Fountaines of Jordan, and the Hills of Libanus adioyning, as farre South as the Sea of Galilee, bounded on the West by Asher, and on the East and South-east by Jordan.

On the North-side of Libanus and adioyning to this Territory of Nephtalim, did the Amorites (or Emorites) also inhabit, in which Tract vnder Libanus, was the Citie of Heliopolis: which the height of the Mountaine adioyning shadowed from the Sunne, the better part of the day. POSTELVS calls it Balbec, NIGER, Marbeck, and LEON CLAVIUS, Belebeeca.

Of this name of Heliopolis, there are two great Cities in Egypt: the first called On, by the Hebrewes, and the Chaldean Paraphrast, otherwise Bethemes, or after the Latines, Solis oppidum, or Domus Solis: The Citie of the Sunne: into which, saith Plinian, Seuerus the Roman Emperour sent a Colonie: the other, Geffelius nameth Deidmarab: 30 and of this name Stephanus also findeth a Citie in Thrace, and Glycas in Phrygia.

There is also in the same Valley adioyning to Nephtalim, Chalcis, and Abila. Chalcis, of whom the Region towards Palmyrena hath the name of Chalcidica, ouer which Herod, Agrippa, and Serenice the Queene commanded.

Abila also gaue name to the Region adioyning, of which Lysanias the Sonne of Herod the elder, became Tetrarch or Governour: whereof Ptolomie gaue it the addition of Lysanij, and called it Abila Lysanij. Polsterran names it Aphila, of which hee notes that one Diogenes, a famous Sophister, was native, who by Polsterran is intituled Aphileus, not Abileus. After that this Citie of Abila or Aphila, had received the Christian Faith, Profillimus became Bishop thereof: flaine afterward by our Brittish Maximus at Treuer. For distinction of this Citie (if it be not the same, as it may be thought to be the same) it is to be remembered that in the Tribe of * Manasse, adioyning vpon the bounds of the Tribe of Nephtalim, there is another Citie of the same name, flaying that it is written with an (E) for an (I) and called Abela, remembered in the 20. Chapter of the second of Samuel. The same Iosephus calls Abelmachaba, and Hierome Bethmachaba. In the place of Samuel for distinction sake it is written, Abel Beth Machaba, (for belike it was the Towne of Machaba, the Wife of Maier, the Sonne of Manasse, the Father of Gilead) in the Chronicles it is called Abel-Majm. This Citie Isaiah belieged: because Seba the sonne of Bichri, who rebelled against Dauid, fled thence into for succour: but a certaine wife woman of the Citie perswading the people to call Seba his head ouer the wall, Isaiah retired his Armie. The same Citie was afterward taken by the King of Damascus, Benadad: and after a while by Teglatphalsar.

The word Abel may be expounded, either to signifie bewailing, or a plaine ground, and therefore no maruell, that many Townes (with some addition for distinction inction sake) were thus called: for euen of bewailing many places tooke name, as Bachin, Iudg. 2.4. and so doubtlesse * Abel-Misaim, Gen. 50. 11. and yet Ianinus in his Note vpon Num. 33. 49. thinks that Abel-Sittim was so called, rather by reason of the plaine ground there (to wit, in the Land of Manab, and so perhaps Abel-Macholah in the Tribe of Ephraim: the Towne of Elisha the Prophet: also Abel-Vinearum of the Ammonites, whither Lepta pursued them.

* And Abel-Magnum.

Of Hazor.

In this Tribe of Nephtalim, was that famous Citie of Tabin, in Isaiah's time called Afor (or after the Chaldean Paraphrast, Hafzor) by Iosephus, Afora; by Iunius, * Chatzor: which Laetan names Hefron; the Regall Citie, and Metropolis of Canaan: seated in the West part of Nephtalim, towards Asher. In this Citie was that great Rendement, and assembly of those foure and twenty Kings against Iofua: who being all overthrowne, flaine, and scattered, this their powerful Citie was by Iofua taken and burnt to dust. But in procelle of time the same being rebuilt by the Canaanites a second King Iabin, 137. yeeres after the death of this first Iabin, invaded the Israelites: and being ordained of God to punish their Idolatry, he prevailed against them, and held them in a miserable seruitude twentie yeeres: till Deborah the Prophetesse overthrew Sisera, Iabins Lieutenant, and his Armie, neere the Mountaine Tabor. This Citie Salomon reedored at such time as he also reedified Gecar, burnt by Pharao of Egypt, with * Megido, Bethoron, and other Cities; but about 260. yeeres after, it fell into the hands of Teglatphalsar, King of the Assyrians. It is now, saith Adrichomius, called Antiochia: it was one of the principall Cities of Decapolis. There is another Citie of this name in the Territory of Beniamin, seated on the confines of Acalen, called the new Hazor, b saith Hierome.

a. Chafar-Sefma, of which, 1. Chron. 4. 31. which also is called Chafar-Sufi, and Chafar-Gadde: and lastly, Chafar-Sheleb, another Citie of Stannus, Jel. 19. 3. 2. 1. Kings. 9. b. Hierom. loc. Hebr. L.E. Out of Nibon, 11. 33. as it seemes.

†. III.

Of Casaria Philippi.

There was also on the border, and within the Territory of Nephtalim, that renowned Citie of Lais, or Laisch, as Iunius writes it, or Leschen, which Citie the children of Dan (being straitened in their Territorie vnder Iuda) invaded and mastered; and gaue it the name of their owne Parent Dan: and by that name it is written in Gen. the fourteenth, at which place Abraham surprized Chedorlaomer and his confederates, and followed his victorie as farre as Sabab, formerly remembered in the diuision of Syria, otherwise called Sophena. And after the possession of the Danites, it had the ioynt name of Leschem-Dan. Weissenburg writes it Lais, the Genena Laisch, Iosephus, Dana; BENIAMIN, Balana; BREITENBACH, Belena: but the now Iudg. 18. Inhabitants know it by the name of Belina to this day: witnesse Neubrigensis, Tyrites, Plattaricus, Brocard the Monke, and Postellus: who also take this Citie to bee the same, which in Marthew the 15. v. 39. in the Vulgar is called Magadan, for which the Greeke Text hath Magdala in that place, and in S. Marke speaking of the same storie, Dulmanutha. At such time as the children of Dan obtained this place, it seemeth that it was either a free Citie, of the alliance and confederacie of the Zidonians, or else subiect vnto the Kings thereof; for it is written in the eighteenth of Iudges, And there was none to helpe, because Lais was farre from Zidon: and they had no businesse with other men, for it was about thirty English miles from the Mediterran Sea, and from Zidon.

In after times when these Regions became subiect to the State of Rome, it had the name of Panæas, from a Fountaine adioyning so called: and therefore Ptolomie calls it Cesaria Panæa. Hegeffippus calls it Parnium, saith Weissenburg: but he had read it in a corrupt copie: for in Hegeffippus set out by Badus, it is written Panæum without an (R); and at such time as Philip the sonne of the elder Herod, brother to Herod, Tetrarch of Galilee, became Gouvernour of Tracanis, sometime Basan; this Citie was by him amplified and fortified; and both to give memorie to his owne name, and to flatter Tiberius Cesar, he called it * Cesaria Philippi: and so it became the Metropolis, and head Citie of Tracanis: and one of the first Cities of Decapolis. And being by Azrippa in the succeeding age greatly adorned: by him in honour of Nerva, it was called Neronia, or Neroniada. But as nothing remained with that Emperour, but the memorie of his impietie: so in S. Hieromes time the Citizens remembered their former Panæas, and so recalled it, with the Territorie adioyning by the ancient name. Of this Citie was that woman whom Christ healed of a bloudie issue, by touching the hemme of his Garment with a constant Faith: who afterward, as there was a woman of great wealth and abilitie, being mindfull of Gods goodnesse, and no lesse grateful for the same, as Eusebius and Nicephorus report, caused two Statues to be cast in pure Copper: the one representing Christ, as nere as it could be moulded: the other made like her self, kneeling at his feete, and holding vp her hands towards him. These three mounted vpon two great Bases or Pedestals of the same Metall, to which these placed by a Fountaine nere her owne house: both which (saith Encheiridion) remained in their first perfection, even to his owne time: which himselfe had seene, who liued in the Reigne of Constantine the Great. But in the yeere after Christ 363, that Monster Julius apostata, caused that worthe Monument to be cast downe, and defaced: setting vp the like of his owne in the same place: which Image of his was with fire from heauen broken into fitters: the head, body, and other parts, sundered and scattered, to the great admiration of the people at that time liuing. The truth of this accident is also confirmed by Sozomenus Salaminius, in his fifth booke, and twentieth Chapter.

This Citie built by the Danites, was nere the ioyning together of those two Ri-39 uers which arise from the Springs of Ior and Dan, the two * apparant Fountaines of Jordan: in a soyle exceeding fruitful, and pleasant; for, as it is written, Iudg. 18. It is a place which doth want nothing that is in the world. In the fields belonging to this Citie, it was that S. Peter acknowledged Christ to be the Sonne of God: whereupon it was answered, Tu es Petrus, & super hanc Petram, &c. After this Citie received the Christian faith, it was honoured with a Bishops seate: and it ranne the same fortune with the rest, for it was after taken and retaken by the Saracens, and Christians: vnder Fuleb the fourth King of Hierusalem, and after the death of Godfrey of Bullion, the King of Damascus wrested it from the Christians; and shortly after by them againe it was recovered. Lastly, now it remaineth with all that part of the world subiect to 40 the Turke.

†. IIII.

Of Capernaum, and the Cities of Decapolis.

Among the remarkable Cities within this Tribe, Capernaum is not the least: so often remembered by the Euangelists. This Citie had the honour of Christ's presence three yeeres: who for that time was as a Citizen thereof, in which he first preached and taught the Doctrine of our saluation: according to that notable Prophecie 50 of Esay 9. The people that walked in darknesse, haue seene a great light: they that dwelt in the Land of the shadow of death, vpon them hath the light shined.

Capernaum was seated on Jordan, even where it entrencheth into the Sea of Galilee: is an excellent and rich soile: of whose destruction Christ himselfe prophecied in-these words. And thou Capernaum which art lifted up vnto heauen, shalt be brought downe to Hell, &c. which shewed the pride and greatness of that Citie: for it was one of the principall Cities of Decapolis, and the Metropolis of Galilee. And although there were some markes of this Cities magnificence in S. Hieromes time, as himselfe confesseth: it being then a reasonable Burge or Towne: yet those that haue since, and long since seene it, as Brochard, Breidenbach, and Salmasius affirme, that it then consisted but of fixe poore Fishers mens houses.
these

The Region of ten principall Cities called Decapolis or Decapolis, is in this description often mentioned, and in S. Matthew, Mark, and Luke, also remembered; but I finde no agreement among the Cosmographers, what proper limits it had: and so Plinie himselfe confesseth; for Martius Riger speaking from others, bounds it to the North by the mountaine Casius in Cassius: and endeth it to the South at Aegypt and Arabia; by which description it embraceth Phoenicia, a part of Calefryia, all Palestina, and Iudæa.

Plinie also makes it large, and for the ten Cities of which it taketh name, he numbreth foure of them to be situated towards Arabia: to wit, first these three, Damascus, Opoto, Raphana, then Philadelpia (which was first called Amman, saith Stephanus, or as I gesse Amman rather, because it was the chiefe Citie of the Ammonites, knowne by the name of Rabbah, before Pro. Philadelphus gaue it this later and new name.)
Then Sychopeis, sometime Nisa, built (as is said) by Bacchus, in memorie of his Nurse, who died therein, anciently knowne by the name of Bethsan, for the sixth he setteth Gadara (not that Gadara in Calefryia, which was also called Antioch and Selenia; but it is Gadara in Basan, which Plinie in this place meaneth, seated on a high hill, neere the Riuer of Hieromais. This Riuer Ortelius takes to be the Riuer Iaboc: which boundeth Gad and Manasse ouer Jordan: but he mistaketh it; for Hieromais falleth into the Sea of Galilee, betwene Hippus and Gerasa, whereas Iaboc entrench the same Sea betwene Ephron and Phanuel. For the seuenth he nameth * Hippus, or Hippian, a Citie so called of a Colonie of Horsemen there garriisoned by Herod, on the East side of the Galilean Sea, described hereafter in the Tribe of Manasse ouer Jor- dan. For the eighth Rela, which is also called Buth, and Berenice, seated in the South border of the Region ouer Jordan, called Peræa. For the ninth Gelasa, which Iosephus takes to be Gerasa: and Gerasa is found in Calefryia by Iosephus, Hegeffippus, and Stepha- nus: but by Ptolomie (whom I rather follow) in Phoenicia. The tenth and last, Plinie nameth Canatha, and so doth Suetonius and Stephanus, which Volaterran calls Gamala, but Hegeffippus rightly Camala, a Citie in the Region of Basan ouer Jordan, so called, because those two Hills on which it is seated, haue the shape of a Camell. But the collection of these ten Cities, whereof this Region tooke name, is better gathered out of Brochard, Breidenbach, and Salmasius, which make them to be these; Cesaria Philippi, and Ajor, before remembered, Cedes Nephthim, Sephet, Corazin, Capernaum, 40 Bethsaida, Tetapata, Tiberias, and Sychopeis, or Bethsan. For all other Authors disagree herein and giue no reason for their opinion. One place of the Euangelists Saint Matthew makes it manifest, that this Region called Decapolis, was all that Tract betwene Zidon, and the Sea of Galilee. For thus it is written: And he departed againe from the coasts of Tyrrus and Zidon, and came vnto the Sea of Galilee, through the middle of the coasts of Decapolis: so that it was bounded by Damascus and Libanus on the North:
by the Phœnician Sea, betwene Zidon and Ptolomais on the West: by the Hills of Gelbo and Bethsan on the South: and by the Mountaines Tracanes, other wise Hermom, Sanir and Galaad, on the East: which is from East to West the whole bredth of the Holy Land: and from the North to the South, neere the same distance which may 50 be each way fortie English miles.

some time it was called Cidissus. Besfores greatly mistakes this Cedes, and confounds it with Cades in the Defart of Pharan.

After the King thereof among other of the Canaanites perished by the hand of Iosua, it was made a Citie of refuge, and given to the Leuites. Herein was Barac borne, who overthrew the Armie of the second Tabin of Hazor, at the Mount Tabor. It was sometime posselt by Teglatphalassar, when hee waited all Xephthaim: afterward by the Romans, and numbered for one of the ten Cities of the Decapolitan Region: When it had embraced the Christian faith, it was honoured with a Bishops seate, but in time it fell with the rest into the power of the Saracens and Turkes, and by them it was demolished.

From Cedes some foure Italian miles towards the South-west, standeth Sephet,¹⁰ otherwise Zephet, which was also one of the ten Decapolitan Cities: a place exceeding strong, and for many yeeres the inexpugnable Fortresse of the Christians, and afterward of the Saracens; for from hence they conquered all the neighbour Cities of those Regions, both In-land and Maritimate neere it. Touching Rama of Nephthaim, seated Northward neere Sephet: this is to be noted; that there are (1) diuers places of this name in Palestine, all situate on Hills: and therefore called Rama (Rama Hobrius excessum; Rama with the Hebrewes is high.) Also that for this Rama Ios. 19. 36. they read Arama, making the Article (which it hath in the Hebrew, as being a name of diuers Townes) to be a part of the word: whence taking away the aspiration, they²⁰ read Arama. From Sephet towards the West they place * Bethfemes, of which Ios. 19. 38. which defended it selfe against Nephthaim, Ind. 1. 33. but paid them tribute. On the other side of Sephet towards the East was Bethanath, who also kept their Citie from the Nephthaim.

Adioyning to which standeth Carban * or Kiriathaim a Citie of the Leuites, not farre from the Mountain out of which the Springs of Capharnaum arise, called Mons Christi: a place by our Saviour often frequented: as also then when calling his Disciples together, hee made choise of twelue, which he called and ordained to bee his Apostles or Messengers: of which place or the acts therein done, there is often mention in the³⁰ Evangelists.

Adioyning to these are Magedale, a place of strength; and Mafath, of which we read that it was forced by Bacchides in the time of the⁴ Maachabees: also (according to Adrichomius) one of the two Berethas of Nephthaim. For Adrichomius maketh two of this name in this Tribe, * one neere Chamath in the North border, of which Ezek. 47. 6. another (vpon a weak conjecture out of Ios. ant. 1. 5. c. 2.) he therefore placeth in this tract neere the waters of Merom; because the Kings that ioyned with Tabin against Iosua, which incamped at the waters of Merom, Ios. 11. 5. are by Iosephus said to have incamped at the Citie Beretha in Galilee, not farre from Cedes Superior, which is also in Galilee: all which may be true of that Beretha of which Ezek. seeing it is in that Galilee which is called the vpper Galilee or Galilee of the Gentiles. The same⁴⁰ Adrichomius placeth the Region of Berim neere Abela (of which Abela or Abel-beth Mahacab we haue spoken already) this doth vpon a conjecture touching the place 2. Sara. 20. 14. where some read Abel & Bethmahacab, & annua loca Berim: but the better reading is, & omnes Berim, that is, with all the Berai: for Shehab being of Berim (in which Tribe also there is a Citie called Beretha or Bereth) drew the men of that Citie after him.

To the North of Beretha of Nephthaim standeth Sebarim vnder Libanus, remembered by Ezek. 47. and Aroseth gentium, neere the waters of Merom or Sambathoni, the Citie of Sifara Lieutenant of the Armie of the second Tabin: from whence not farre off towards the Sea of Galilee, is Edrai, or Eureli, a strong Citie: besides many⁵⁰ others whereof I finde no particular storie of importance: as Ser in Iosua c. 19. v. 35. called Triddim-Tzer; and named for the first of their fenced Cities: whence they make two Cities, Affedim and Ser. Then Adama which they call Edama: also Hon which they call Ahon of which in the Bookes of Kings. Then the strong Citie of Cimmereth Cimmereth after called Gennareth, whence we read of the Land and Lake of Gennareth, the same Lake which is also called the Sea of Tiberias. In the body of the Land they place Galgala to the South border: of which * Mat. 1. 9. 2. also diuers others named, Ios. 19. 35. Tenua or Chukkok: Horom & Azenoth-tabor (which they place towards the East parts) and out of the same place of Iosua: 1. 20. 1. Lakkum Iepnell, Heteb, & * Receath, which two last they place neere Casaria Philippi: To these they add out of Iosua, Nekab, and Adami: for which two Iunius readeth Possa Adami, making it no Towne but a Ditch cast by some of Adamath, as it seemes, or at least the custodie of which March or Limit belonging to the Towne. To these out of Iosua. 34. 10. they add Sephana which 1. Sam. 30. 21. seemes to be called Sepmoth. As for Tichan and Atelon, whereof the former they fetch out of Ezek. 47. 16. and the latter out of Iosua 19. 33. it may appeare by Iunius his Translation, that neither are to be taken for Cities: for the former he readeth Mediani, and for the latter Querietum. The Citie of Xephthaim which they make the native place of Tobie, and Naasfen neere vnto it, they fetch out of the Vulgar Translation, Tob. 7. 7. but in the Greece Text there is no signe, neither of the one nor of the other.

which Carban we haue noted already, that it is also called Kiriathaim. b In the place, 1. Reg. 4. 13. which also they bring to prove that there was a Citie called Nephthaim, as it is euident by the following Verles: the Tribe of Nephthaim is meant, and not any Citie of that name.

S. V.

THE TRIBE OF ZABVLON.

Zabulon or Zebulon, another of the sonnes of Iacob by Lea, there were muliered at Mount Sinai 57400. able men besides women, children, and aged vnable persons: all which dying in the Desarts, then entered the Holy Land of their issues 65000. fit to beate armes: who inhabited that part of Canaan, from Asher to the Ruer Chifon: Southward, and from the Sea of Galilee to the Mediterran, East and West.

The Cities within this Tribe which border Asher, are Sicanim on the Sea shore, of which Ioseph. Ant. 13. c. 19. Debbiset of * which Ios. 19. 11. Ieknam or Ioknekum (whose King was * slain by Iosua, and the Citie was given to the Leuites) and Gaba after called the Citie of Horsemen, of a Regiment there garrisoned by Herode. Then the Citie which beareth the name of Zabulon, or the Citie of men, exceeding ancient and magnificent, burnt to the ground by Cestius, Lieutenant of the Roman Armie. Adrichomius makes it the birth Citie of * Elan Iudge of Israel, because hee is called Zabulonita: not marking that in the same place he is said to be buried at Aidon.¹⁰ To the East of this Citie of Zabulon is Catheth, of which Ios. 19. 15. on the border of Asher: and beyond it the lesser⁴ Cana of Galilee, where Christ conuered Water into Wine: the native Citie of Nathaniel, and as it is thought of Simon Zebedee. Beyond it begin the Mountaines of Zabulon: and then the Citie of Cethron (in Zeigler, Chitron) which defended it selfe against Zabulon. Then Berjabe which standeth in the partition of the vpper and nether Galilee, fortified by Iosephus against the Romans. Not farre from hence standeth Shimon of Merom whose King was slain by Iosua.

Then Danna or Dimma, a Citie of the Leuites: then Noa or rather Neha, of which Ios. 19. 13. Then Dathan or Dathaim, where Ioseph found his brethren feeding their flocks: the same wherein Elisau besieged by the Syrians, strooke them all blinde.

Beyond it towards the East they imagine * Amthar or Ansthar: then Remmon of the Leuites. The last of the Cities on the North border of Zabulon is Reithaida, one of the ten Cities of Decapolis, situate on the Galilean Sea, and watered by the springs of Capharnaum, the native Citie of the Apostles, Peter, Andrew, and Philip. Herein Christ did many miracles, but these people being no lesse incredulous than the Capharnaum,

This place of the Atacab warrants no Galgala or Gibgal in Nephthaim, but may well be understood of Gidgal in Beniamin or in Manassah.

1 The Receath or Receath, Iunius thinketh it is the same with Carban (one of these being made of the other by Transposition of letters)

10. 1. 1. Nathaniel is said to be of Cana in Galilee. Of Simon it may be doubted: for Angelus Cannius reads Mat. 10. 4. Simon Cananites, which word Luc. 6. 15. hee thinketh to be expounded by Zebulon.

pharmans, and others, received the same curse of threatned miseries, as wee bee vnto thee Bethsaida, &c.

Alongst the West border of Galilee, towards the South from Bethsaida, was the strong Castle of Magdalum, the habitation of Marie Magdalen, not long since standing.

And beyond it the strong and high seated Citie of Totapata: fortified by Iosephus in the Roman Warre: but in the end after a long siege surpris'd by Vespasian: who slaughtered many thousands of the Citizens: and held 1200. prisoners, whereof Iosephus the Historian was one.

The last and greatest of the Cities on that Sea and the Lake of Genesareth within 10 Zabulon was that of Tiberias, from whence afterward the Galilean Sea also changed name, and was called the Sea of the Citie Tiberias, so named in honour of Tiberius Caesar, it was one of the ten Cities, and the Metropolis of the Region Decapollitan, and the greatest and last of the lower Galilee. From hence our Saviour called Matthew, from the toll or custom-house, to be an Apostle, and neere vnto it raised the daughter of Tairus from death: it was built (as Iosephus reports) by Herod the Tetrarch, the brother of Philip, in the beginning of the reigne of Tiberius Caesar: in the most fruitful part of Galilee; but in a ground full of Sepulchres: Quam iuxta nostras leges (saith hee) ad septem dies impurus habeatur, qui in talibus locis habitet; whereas by our law hee should bee seven dayes held as vnclane, who inhabited in such a place: by which wordes, and by the whole place of Iosephus it appears, that this Tiberias is not (as some haue thought) the same as the old Emmeris, which was seated, not in Zabulon, but in Nephthali.

Neere vnto this Tiberias, at Emaus, there were hot baths, where Vespasian the Emperour encamped against Tiberias: More into the Land toward the South-West is Bethulia, seated on a very high Hill, and of great strength, famous by the story of Helophernes and Iudeth, such as it is. Neere which handeth Bethleem of Zabulon: and adioyning vnto it, Capharath fortified by Iosephus against the Romans: and Iapha an exceeding strong place afterward forced by Titus: who in the entrance, and afterward in furie flew 15000. of the Citizens; and caried away about two thousand prisoners.

On the South side are the Cities of Cartha of the Leuites, and Gabara, of which Iosephus in his owne life, then Iaspe according to Adrichomius (of which Iof. 19. 12.) for he thinks that it is not that Sapha of which we spake but now out of Iosephus. Idela of which Iof. 19. 15. Hierome calls it Iadela: vnder it Westward, Legio, (afterward a Bishops seate) and the Citie Belma, in ancient times exceeding strong, remembered Iudeth 7. 3. otherwise Chelma. Between Legio and Nazereth is the Citie Saffa or Saffa, the birth-Citie of Zebedee, Alphaus, James and John; Then Sephoris, or Sephora, according to Iosephus: Sephorum according to Brocard: which afterward, saith Hegesippus and Hierome, was called Diocæsaria; the Citie of Joachim and Anna, the Parents of the Virgin Mary, it was walled by Herod the Tetrarch: and by him, as Iosephus speaks, made the head and defence of Galilee; in another place he saith Vrbium Galilæarum maxime Sephoris & Tiberias. This Sephoris greatly vexed Vespasian ere hee wanne it. Herod Antipas when he made it the Regall seate of the nether Galilee, and so rounded it with a strong wall, called it Autocratorida, which is as much to say as Imperiall, saith Iosephus; and it is now but a Castle called Zaphet.

To the South-West of this Sephoris or Diocæsaria was that blessed place of Nazereth, the Citie of Marie the Mother of Christ; in which hee himselfe was conceived, it standeth betwene Mount Tabor, and the Mediterran Sea. In this Citie hee abode chiefly foure and twenty yeeres, and was therefore called a Nazarene, as the Christians afterward were for many yeeres. It was erected into an Archbishopricke in the following age. Neere vnto it are the Cities Buria (afterward well defended against the Turkes) and Nahabul of which Iof. 19. 15. and Jud. 1. 30. where it is called Nahabul: and Iof. 21. 35. where it is a Citie of the Leuites, neere the Sea; adioyning to the Riuer of Chifon is Sarid, noted in Iofua for the vttermoſt of Zabulon.

In

In this Territorie of Zabulon there are diuers small Mountaines: but Tabor is the most renowned, by the Apparition of Moses and Elias: and by the Transfiguration of Christ in the presence of Peter, James, and John: vnto whom Moses and Elias appeared; in memorie whereof on the top of the Mountaine, the Emperesse Helen built a sumptuous Chappell.

The chiefe Riuer of Zabulon is Chifon, which rising out of Tabor, runneth with one streame Eastward to the Sea of Galilee, and with an other streame Westward into the great Sea. This Riuer of Chifon where it riseth, and to farre as it runneth Southward, is called Chedumim or Cadumim: and for mine owne opinion, I take it to bee the same which Ptolomee calleth Chorfeus: though others dillinguish them: and set Chorfeus by Cæsaria Palestina. There is a second Torrent or Brooke that riseth in the Hills of Bethulia, and falleth into the Sea of Galilee by Magdalum: and the third is a branch of a Riuer rising out of the Fountaines of Capharnaum, which falleth also into the same Sea, and neere Magdalum: which Torrent they call Detham, from the name of the Citie, from which it passeth Eastward to Bethsaida, and so ioyning with Jordanis parvus, which runneth from the Valley of Iephthael which Iofua reckoneth in the bounds of Zabulon, it endeth in the Sea of Galilee.

THE TRIBE OF ISACHAR.

He next adioyning Territorie to Zabulon, to the South and South-west, was Isachar, who inhabited a part of the nether Galilee, within Jordan: of whom there were increas'd in Egypt, as appeared by their multitudes at Mount Sinai 54400. able and warlike men, who leauing their bodies with the rest in the Deserts, there entered the Holy Land, 64300.

The first Citie of this Tribe neere the Sea of Galilee, was Tarichea, distant from Tiberias eight English mile, or somewhat more, a Citie wherein the Jewes (by the practice of a certaine mutinous vpstart, Iohn the sonne of Leui) tooke armes against Iosephus the Historian, then Governour of both Galilees. This Citie was first taken by Cassius, and 3000. Jewes carried thence captiue; and afterward with great difficulty by Vespasian: who entred it by the Sea side, hauing first beaten the Jewes in a sea-fight vpon the Lake or Sea of Galilee: he put to the sword all sorts of people, and of all ages: sauing that his furie being quenched with the Riuer of blood running through euery street, hee reserued the remainder for slaues and bond-men.

Next to Tarichea is placed Ceslion, or Cyflion, of the Leuites, and then Isachar, membered in the first of Kings, 6. 4. 7. 17. then Abes or Ebeis, Iof. 19. 20. and Remeth of which Iof. 19. 21. otherwise Ramoth. 1. Chron. 6. 73. or Iarmoth, Iof. 21. 29. this also was a Citie of the Leuites, from whose Territorie the Mountaine of Gilboa take beginning: and range themselves to the Mediterran Sea, and towards the West as farre as the Citie of Iezrael, betwene which and Ramoth, are the Cities of Bethphages, or Bethpasse, according to Ziegler, and Enadai, or Hem-chidda: neere which Saul flew himselfe: vnder those Aphec or Apheca, which Adrichomius placeth in Isachar: betwene which and Sama, he saith, that the Philistines incamped against Israel, and afterward against Saul: a Land thirke of blood, for herein also, saith hee, the Syrians with two and thirke Regulis assisting Bethsaida, encountered Acab: and were overthrowne and slaughtered: to whom the King of Israel made a most memorable answer, when Bethsaida vaunted before the victorie: which was, Tell, BETHA DAD, Let not him that giueth his harness boast himselfe, as he that putteth it off: meaning that glorie followed after victorie, but ought not to precede it. Vnder Aspee towards the Sea they set the Citie of Esdrelon, in the plaines of Galilee, called also the great field of Esdrelon, and Mageddo: in the border whereof are the ruines of Aspee to be seene, saith Brochard, and Breidenbach: After these are the Citie of Cesaloth, of which, 1. Maccab. 9. 2. Anem or Ben-Gannim of the Leuites, and Secimor or Shabatima, the West border of Isachar, of which Iof. 19. 22. From hence ranging the Seacoast, there is found the Cattle of Pilgrimes: a strong Cattle inuironed with the Sea, sometime the store-houise and Magaline of the Christians, and built by the Earle of S^t. Giles or Teluse.

From the Cattle of Pilgrimes the Sea maketh a great Bay towards the North, and the farthermost shore beginneth Mount Carmel, not farre from the River Chifon: where Elijah assembled all the Prophets, and Priests of Basal, and prayed King Achab and the people aslumbered, to make triall whether the God of Israel, or the Idoll of Basal, were to be worshipped, by laying a sacrifice without fire on the Altar: which done, the Priests of Basal prayed, and cut their owne flesh after their manner, but the fire kindled not, while Elijah in derision told them that their God was either in pursuit of his enemies not at leisure, or perchance asleepe, &c. but at the prayer of Elijah his fire kindled, notwithstanding that he had caused the people to cast many Vessels of water thereon: by which miracle the people incensed, slew all those Idolaters on the bankes of Chifon adjoining.

At the foote of this Mountaine to the North standeth Caiphas, built, as they say, by Caiphas the high Priest. It is also knowne by the name of Perfina and Porphyria, sometime a Suffragane Bishops seate. Returning againe from the Seacoast towards Tiberias by the bankes of Chifon, there are found the Citie of Hapharaim or Aphram, and the Castles of Mesra, and Saba: of which Brochard and Breidenbach: and then Naim on the River Chifon: a beautifull Citie while it stood, in the Gates whereof Christ raised from death the widowes only sonne.

Next to Daberath is Abels situate, neere the Caues of those two Theeues which so greatly molested Galilee in Herodes time. It ioyneth on one side to the Mountaine of Isachar or Hermion, and on the other to the Valley of Israhel: which valley continueth it selfe from Bethsan or Scythopolis, the East border of Isachar, euen to the Mediterran Sea: two parts whereof are inclosed by the Mountaines of Gilboe on the South, and by Hermion, and the River Chifon on the North. In these * plaines Geidon ouerthrew the Madianites, and herein, they thinke, Saul fought against the Philistims: Achab against the Syrians, and the Tartars against the Saracens.

THE HALFE OF THE TRIBE OF MANASSE.

†. I.

Of the boundes of this halfe Tribe: and of Scythopolis, Salem, Thersa, and others.

He next Tribe which ioyneth it selfe to Isachar towards the South, is the halfe of Manasse, on the West side of Jordan. Manasses was the first begotten of Ioseph, the eleventh sonne of Jacob. His mother was an Egyptian, the daughter of Puiphar, Priest and Prince of Helipolis: which Manasses with his brother Ephraim, the grand-children of Jacob, were by adoption numbred amongst the sonnes of Jacob, and made vp the number of the twelve Patriarches. Of Manasse there were increased in Egypt, as they were numbred at Mount Sinai, 32100. able men: all which being consumed in the Desarts, there entred of their issues, 52700. bearing armes. The Territory which fell on this one halfe of Manasse, was bounded by Jordan on the East, and Dora vpon the Mediterran Sea on the West, Israhel on the North, and Machata is the South border.

The first and principall Citie which stood in this Territorie was Bethsan, sometime Nysa, saith Plinie, built by Liber Pater, in honour of his Nurse there buried, of the same name; which Solinus confirms. Afterward when the Scythians invaded Asubeth lesse, and pierst into the South, to the vttermoost of Calesyria, they built this Citie anew, and very magnificent: and it had thereupon the name of Scythopolis, or the Citie of Scythians given it by the Greekes.

These barbarous Northren people constrained the Jewes to fight against their owne Nation and kindred, by whose handes when they had obtained victorie, they themselves set on the Jewes which serued them, and slew them all. Stephanus makes it the vtmost towards the South of Calesyria: and Strabo ioynes it to Gililee. It is feared betwene Jordan and the Hills of Gilboe, in aloue ad montes acerbis, saith Ziegler. But I finde it in the East part of the Valley of Israhel neere Jordan: after that, Jordan streighteneth it selfe againe into a Riuer: leauing the Sea or Lake Genesareth. Notwithstanding, Moriamus describes it farre to the West, and towards the Mediterran Sea, neere Endor, contrarie to Stella, Laifan, Adrichom, and all other the best Authors. This Citie was the greatest of all those of Decapolis: but the children of Manasse could not expell the Inhabitants thereof: and therefore called it Sane an enemy, or Beth-san, the house of an enemy.

Ouer the walls of this Bethsan the Philistims hung the bodie of Saul, and his sonnes, slaine at Gilboe. It had, while the Christian Religion flourished in those parts, an Archbishop, who had nine other Bishops of his Diocese, numbred by Tyrus, in his 14. Booke and 12. Chapter: but the same was afterward translated to Nazareth. The later traualiers in those parts affirme, that there is daily taken out among the rubble and the ruines of that Citie, goodly pillars and other pieces of excellent marble, which witnesseth the stately buildings, and magnificence which it had in elder times, but it is now a poore and desolate Village.

From Bethsan keeping the way by Jordan, they finde an ancient Citie called Salem, which Citie the ancient Rabbines, saith Hierome, doe not finde to be the same with Heteran: there being in the time of Hierome and since, a towne of that name, neere Scythopolis before remembered, which if the place of Scripture Gen. 13.18. doe not confirme, where the Wulgar readeth transiit, in Salem urbem Sichemorum (for which others reade, venit in columiam ad Civitatem Sichemum, making the word Salem not to be a proper name, but an adiective) yet the place John 3.13. where it is said, that Iohn was baptizing in Enon neere Salem, may somewhat strengthen this opinion, and yet it is not unlikely that this Salem of which S. Iohn speaketh, is but contradicted of Shubalim, of which in the Tribe of Beniamin, 1. Sam. 9.4. This word Iunius maketh to be the plural of Shubal: of which we reade, 1. Sam. 13.17. for as for that which is added out of Cant. 6.12. of Shulamitis, as if it had been as much as a Woman of this Salem, neere Enon, it hath no probability.

Not farre from thence where they place Salem, they finde Bezeck the Citie of Adombezat, Iosephus calls it Bala, here it was that Saul assembled the strength of Israel, and Indi, to the number of 330000. when hee meant to relieue Iabel Gilead, against Nasab the Ammonite: who would giue them no other conditions of peace, than to suffer their right eyes to be thrust out. Neere Bezeck is the Citie of Bethbara or rather Beth-bara, of which Iudg. 7. 24. in the storie of Gideon: and then Ephra or Hophra, wherein Gideon inhabited: in the border whereof Rood an Altar consecrated to Baal: which he pulled downe and defaced: and neere it that stone, on which Abimelech the Bastard slew his 70. brothers: a Heathenish cruelty, practised by the Turke to this day; and not farre hence, betweene the Village of Ajophon and Jordan, Ptole 20 maxus Lathurus ouerthrew Alexander King of the Iewes: and slaughtered as Iosephus numbeth them 3000. but according to Timagenes 50000. after which victory, as Ptolomee saith by the Villages of the Iewes; he slew all their women: and caused the yong children to be sod in great caldrons, that therest of the Iewes might thereby thinke that the Egyptians were growne to be men-eaters, and strike them with the greater terrour.

Towards the West and on the border of Isachar, they place the Cities of * Aner of the Leuites; and Abel-Mehola, which Iunius, Iudg. 7. 22. placeth in Ephraim, it was the habitation of Helisaius the Prophet, numbred among those places, 1. Reg. 4. 12. which were giuen in charge to Baana by Salomon, to whose charge also Tahmae be-³⁰ longed, a place of great strength, which at the first resisted Iosua, though their King was afterward hanged, and their Citie giuen to the Leuites.

In the bodie of this Territory of Manasse, but somewhat neerer Jordan, than to the Mediterran Sea, were three great Cities, to wit, Thersa, whose King was one of those that Iosua slew: which the Kings of Israel vsed for their Regall seat: till such time as Samaria was built. From hence the wife of Ieroboam went to Achia to enquire of her sonnes health: who knowing her, though she were disguised, told her of her sonnes death.

The second was Thebes neere Samaria, of which name there are both in Agypt, and Greece, of great fame: in the assault of the Tower of this Towne, wherinto the 40 Citizens retired, the Bastard Abimelech was wounded by a waigthy stone, throwne by a Woman ouer the Wall, who despairing of his recovery, commanded his Page to slay him out-right, because it should not be said that he perished by the stroke of a Woman. But others set this Citie in Ephraim neere Sichem or Neapolis.

The third is Acrabata, of which the Territory adioyning is called Acrabatena, (one of the ten Toparchie or Government in Iudaea) for which Hierome, 1. Mac. 5. reads Arabathena; in the Greeke it is Acrabatine: Isidore calls it Agrabat. This Citie had one of the largest Territories of all Palestine belonging to the Gouernour thereof. Iosephus remembereth it often, as in his second Booke of the Iewes Warres, c. 11. 25. 28. and elsewhere.

The difference betweene a Tetrarchie and a Toparchie, was, that the first was taken for a Province, and the other for a Citie with some lesser Territory adioyning, and a Tetrarch is the same with Preses in Latine, and President in English, being commonly the fourth part of a Kingdome: and thereof so called: Plinie nameth Ieu-

teene

teene Tetrarchies in Syria: the Holy Land had foure, and so hath the Kingdome of Ireland to this day, Leinster, Ulster, Connath, and Mounster.

Euseb. in chron.

To the South-west of Acrabata they place the Cities of Balaam or Bilham, and Geothremom of the Leuites: but Iunius out of Ios. 21. 25. and 1. Chron. 6. 70. gathers that these two are but one; and that Ishleham Ios. 16. 11. is another name of the same Citie.

Then is Iezrael a Regall Citie, set at the foot of the Mountaines of Gilboa, towards the South-west: herein Iezabel by a false accusation caused Naboth to be stoned, to the end shee might possesse his Vineyard adioyning to the Citie, which Naboth refused to sell, because it was his inheritance from his Father.

Ierom also was cast vnburied into the same field: for which his Mother Iezabel King. 2. cap. 2. murdered Naboth.

Toward the Sea from Iezrael is the Citie which they call Gaber: in whose ascent as Abesiah King of Iuda fled from Iehu, when hee had slaine Ioram, hee was wounded with the thor of an arrow, of which wound hee died at Mageddo adioyning. The Scripture calls this Citie of Gaber, Gur.

Then Adadremmon, neere vnto which the good King Iosias was slaine by Necho, King of Egypt, in a Warre vndoubtedly undertaken. For Necho marched towards Affria against the King thereof; by the commaundement of God: whom Iosias sought to resist in his passage. It was afterward called Maximianopolis.

A neighbour Citie to Adadremmon was Mageddo, often remembered in the Scrip-^{Ind. 1. c. 5.} tures, whose King was slaine among the rest by Iosua: yet they defended their Citie for a long time against Manasse. The River which passeth by the Towne, may perhaps be the same which Ptolomee calleth Chorfeus: and not that of which wee haue spoken in Zabulon. For because this name is not found in the Scriptures, many of those that haue described the Holy Land delineate no such River. Moore only sets it downe in his Geographie of the twelue Tribes: but the River which passeth by Mageddo hee vnderstandeth to be but a branch, falling therinto. Lateflan and Schori make a great confluence of waters in this place: agreeable to this Scripture in³⁰ the fifth of Judges: Then fought the Kings of Canaan in Tanac by the waters of Mageddo. But these Authors, and with them Stella, giue it no other name then the Tor-⁴⁰ rent so called.

But seeing that ancient Cosmographers stretch out the bounds of Phenicia, euen to Syaste or Samaria; and Strabo farre beyond it on the Sea coast: And Iosephus calls Syrah, 1. c. 6. Casaria Palestina a Citie of Phenicia, yea Laurentius Corinius extendeth Phenicia as Ios. 1. 15. c. 13. farre as Gaza: seeing also Ptolomee lets downe Chorfeus for the partition of Phenicia and Iudea: this River running East and West parallel with Samaria: it is very probable that this Torrent called Mageddo, after the name of the Citie, which it watereth, is the same which Ptolomee in his fourth Table of Asia calleth Chorfeus. The⁴⁰ later traualers of the holy Land call Mageddo Subimbre at this day.

¶ II.

Of Casaria Palestina, and some other Townes.

From Mageddo toward the West, and neere the Mediterran Sea, was that glorious Citie of Casaria Palestina: first, the Tower of Sidon: the same which Plinie calls Apollonia: though Ptolomee lets Apollonia elsewhere, and toward Egypt, betweene this Citie and Ioppe, to which Vespasian gaue the name of Flavia Colonia. It was by Hierodre rebuilt, who therein laboured to exceede all the workes in that part of the world. For besides the edifices, which hee reared within the Walls, of cut and polished marbles, the Theatre and Amphitheatre, from whence he might looke ouer the Seas farre away, with the high and stately Towers and Gates: hee forced a Harborow of great capacitie, being in former times but an open Bay: and the winde blowing Ilands) to wit, Aradus, Orthesia, Tripolis, Botrys, Byblus, Berytus, Sidon, Tyre, Ptolomais (or Acon) Dora, and Casaria Palestina: and by reason of the many Ports and goodly Sea-townes, it anciently commanded the Trades of the Eafterne world: and they were absolute Kings of the Mediterran Sea.

The ancient Regall Seate of those Princes was Zidon, built by Zidon the first sonne of Canaan: and the people then subiect to that people were called Zidenians: the same state continuing euen vnto Iesus time. For till then it is probable that there was but one King of all that Region; afterward called Phœnicia: which Procopius also confirmeth in his second Booke of Pandall Warres. But in proceffe of time the Citie of Tyre adioyning became the more magnificent: yet according to the Prophet, it was but a Daughter of Zidon, and by them first built and peopled.

But after the death of Moses, and while Iesus yet governed Israel, Agenor an Egyptian of Thebes, or a Phœnician bred in Egypt, camethence with his sonnes Cadmus, Phœnix, Cyrus, and Cilix, (say Cedrenus and Curtius) and built and possesse the Cities of Tyre and Zidon: to wit, the new Tyrrus, and brought into Phœnicia (so called after the name of his second Sonne) the vse of letters: which also Cadmus in his purluite after his sister Europa taught the Grecians. For Taurus King of Crete, when he surprised Tyre, had stolen her thence: of which the Poets deuiled the fable of Iapetus transformation into a Bull, by whom that stealth was also supposed to be made. Pomponius Mabinus makes Belus the first King of Phœnicia: and findes Cadmus his successeur: to whom he calleth his grand-child: and it seemeth that Belus was the Father of Agenor, and not Neptune: because the successors of Dido held that name alwayes inreuerence, making it a part of their owne, as Asdrubal, Hannibal: which memorie Virgil also toucheth in these Verses:

Hic Regis agnauem geminis auroq; poposcit
Impleuitq; more patriam: quam BELVS & omnes
A BELVS soliti.

The Queene anon commands the waighy bowle (Waighie with precious stones and masse gold)
To flow with wine. This Belus vs'd of old,
And all of Belus Line.

Whether this Belus were Father or Grand-father to Agenor, the matter is not great. But it seemeth to me by comparing of times, that Belus was Ancestor to these Phœnicians, and preceded Agenor. For were Belus, or Iupiter Belus, the sonne of Neptune by Libya, the Daughter of Epaphus, or were he the Sonne of Telegonus, according to Eusebius; yet it is agreed that Ceopros then ruled in Attica: and in the end of Ceopros time, saith S. Augustine, Moses left Egypt: *Agenor*s successeur liuing at once with Iesus. Now that Agenor returned about the same time into the Territory of Zidon, I cannot doubt: neither doe I denie, but that he gaue that Region the name of Phœnicia, in honour of his Sonne. But in stead of the building of Tyre, and Zidon, it is probable that he repaired and fortified both: and therefore was called a Founder, as Semiramis and Nabuchodonosor were of Babylon.

For bee it true that Agenor was of the same Nation, and brought vp in Egypt: where he learnt the vse of letters (Egypt flourishing in all kind of learning in Moses time) or were he by Nation an Egyptian: yet is it very likely that either he came to saue his owne Territory: or otherwise to defend the coast of Canaan, from the Israelites: who were by Moses led out of Egypt, to the great losse and dishonour of that Nation: and by Iesus conducted ouer Jordan, to conquer and possesse the Canaanites Land. For though the Egyptians, by reason of the losse which they received by the hand of God, in the Red Sea, and by the ten plagues cast on them before that, and by the slaughter of so many of the Male children at the same time, could not hinder the Hebrewes from inuading Canaan by Land: which also they knew had so many powerfull Nations to defend it: the Deserts inter-jacent, and the strong Egyptians, Moabites, Emorites, and Ammonites their borderers: yet Egypt hauing such Vessells, or Ships, or Gallies, as were then in vse: did not in all probability neglect to Garrison the Sea coast, or assist Agenor with such forces, as they had to spare; and which they might performe with the greater facilitie, in that the Philistines which held the shores of Canaan, next adioyning vnto them, were their Friends and Confederates.

Now as it appeareth by the course of the storie, those Cities of Phœnicia, which Agenor was said to haue built (that is, to haue fortified and defended against Iesus, and against the Tribes after him, as Zidon, Sor, or Tyre, by Iesus called the strong Citie, Acho afterward Ptolomais, Aezib and Dor) were all that Phœnicia had in those days.

That the Kings of Phœnicia were mightie, especially by Sea, it appeareth, first by their defence against Israel: secondly by this, that David and Salomon could not master them: but were glad of their alliance: thirdly, that one of their Cities, though they were then but Reguli, defended it selfe 13. yeeres against a King of Kings, Nabuchodonosor: and that Alexander the great (who being made victorious by the providence of God, seemed vnresistible) spent more time in the recourie of Tyre; than in the conquest of all the Cities in Asia.

Other opinions there are, as that of Berosus out of Iosephus, who conceiues that Tyre was founded by Tyrus the sonne of Iaphet. And for the Region it selfe, though Calisthenes deriue it ab arbores dactylorum; and the Greekes from the word Phonos, of slaughter, because the Phœnicians slew all that came on their coasts, yet for my selfe I take it that Phœnix the sonne of Agenor gaue it that name. But that either Agenor in Phœnicia, or Cadmus his sonne in Greece, were the Inuentors of Letters, it is ridiculous: and therefore the dispute vnecessary.

The Ethiopians affirme that Atlas, Orion, Orpheus, Linus, Hercules, Prometheus, Cadmus, and others, had from them the first light of all those Arts, Sciences, and ciuill Policies, which they afterward profest, and taught others: and that Pythagoras himselfe was instructed by the Libyans: to wit, from the South and Superior Egyptians: from whom those which inhabited neerer the out-let of Nilus, as they say, borrowed their Diuinitie and Philosophie: and from them the Greekes, then barbarous, received Ciuilitie. Again, the Phœnicians challenge this inuention of Letters and of Learning: acknowledging nothing from the Egyptians at all; neither doe they allow that Agenor and his sonnes were Africans; whence Lucan.

Phœnicians first (if same may credit haue)

And that Cadmus was the sonne of Agenor, and was a Phœnician, and not an Egyptian, it appeareth by that answer made by Zeno; when hee in a kinde of reproch was called a stranger and a Phœnician:

Si patria est Phœnix, quid tum? nam CADMVS & ipse

Out of doubt the Phœnicians were very ancient: and from the Records and Chronicles of Tyre, Iosephus the Historian confirms a great part of his Antiquities. The Tyrians againe subscribe to none of these reports: but affirme constantly, that the great Zimolxis flourished among them: when Atlas liued in Mauritania; Nilus and Vulcan in Egypt; and Ochus in Phœnicia. Yea, some of the French doe not blush to maintaine, that the ancient Gauls taught the Greekes the vse of Letters, and other Sciences. And doe not we know that our Bardes and Druids are as ancient as those Gauls, and that they sent their sonnes hither to bee by them instructed in all kinde of learning?

Lastly, whereas others bestow this inuention on Moses, the same hath no probability at all, for hee liued at such time as learning and arts flourished most, both in Egypt, and Affrya, and he himselfe was brought vp in all the learning of the Egyptians, from his infancy.

But true it is that letters were inuented by those excellent Spirits of the first age, and before the generall flood: either by Seth, or Enos, or by whom else God knowes; from whom all wisdom and understanding hath proceeded. And as the same infinite God is present with all his Creatures, so hath hee giuen the same inuention to diuers Nations: whereof the one hath not had commerce with the other; as well in this as in many other knowledges: for euen in Mexico, when it was first discovered, there was found written Bookes after the manner of those Hieroglyphicks, anciently vsed by the Egyptians, and other Nations: and so had those Americans a kinde of Heraldrick; and their Princes differing in Armes and Scutcherions, like vnto those vsed by the Kings and Nobilitie of other Nations. In a naturalia communia, & generalia, &c. Naturali Laues are common and generall.

§. II.

Of the Kings of Tyre.

Whatsoever remaineth of the storie and Kings of Phœnicia (the books of Zeno, Sicboniatho, Atanaseus, and others of that Nation, being no where found) the same is to be gathered out of the Scriptures, Iosephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus.

Agenor liued at once with Iofus, to whom succeeded Phœnix, of whom that part of Canaan, and so farre towards the North as Aradus, tooke the name of Phœnicia: what King succeeded Phœnix it doth not appeare: but at such time as the Grecians belieged Troy, Phaïs gouerned Phœnicia.

chap. 27. v. 3.

In Hieremies time and while Iehoiakim ruled in Iuda, the Tyrians had a King apart: for Hieremies speaketh of the Kings of Zidon, of Tyre, of Edom, &c. as of seuerall Kings.

In Xerxes time, and when he prepared that incredible Armie wherewith hee invaded Greece, Tetramnestus ruled that part of Phœnicia, about Tyre, and Zidon: who commanded, as some Writers affirme, Xerxes flecte, or rather, as I suppose, those 300 Gallies, which himselfe brought to his aide: for at this time it seemeth, that the Phœnicians were Tributaries to the Persian: for being broken into Reguli, and petty Kings in Hieremies time, they were subiects by Nabuchodonosor; of whose conquests in the Chapter before remembred, Hieremies prophecied.

Tennes, though not immediately, succeeded Tetramnestus: remembred by D. Siculus in his 14. Booke.

Strato, his successor, and King of Zidon, Alexander Macedon threw out, because of his dependance vpon Darius, and that his Predecessors had serued the East Empire against the Grecians. But diuers Kings, of whom there is no memorie, came betwene Tennes and Strato. For there were consumed 130. yeeres and somewhat more betwene Xerxes and Alexander Macedon. And this man was by Alexander esteemed esteemed the more vnworthie of restitution, because (saith Curtius) hee rather submitted himselfe by the intiligation of his Subiects (who foresaw their viter ruine by resistance) than that hee had any disposition thereunto, or bare any good affection towards the Macedonians.

Of this Strato, Athenæus out of Theopompus reporteth, that hee was a man of ill liuing: and most voluptuous; also that hee appointed certaine games and prizes for Women dancers, and singers: whom he to this end chiefly inuited, and assembled: that hauing belied the most beautifull and liuely among them, hee might recover them for his owne vse and delights. Of this strange accident about the death of one Strato King of these coasts, S. Hierome and others make mention: who hauing heard that the Persians were nere him with an Armie too waightie for his strength, and finding that hee was to hope for little grace, because of his falling away from that Empire, and his adhering to the Egyptians: hee determining to kill himselfe, but fainting in the execution, his wife being present wrested the sword out of his hand and slew him: which done shee also therewith pierced her owne bodie, and died.

After Alexander was posselt of Zidon, and the other Strato driuen thence, Hee gaue the Kingdome to Hephestion, to dispose of: who hauing receiued great entertainment of one of the Citizens, in whose house he lodged, offered to recompence him therewith; and willingly offered to establish him therein: but this Citizen no lesse vertuous than rich, desired Hephestion that this Honour might be inferred on some one of the blood and race of their ancient Kings: and presented vnto him Balonymus, whom Curtius calls Abdolonimus, Iustinus Abdolonius, and Plutarchus Alynomus: who at the very houre that hee was called to this regall Estate, was with his owne handes working in his Garden, setting herbes, and rootes, for his reliefe and sustenance: though otherwise a wife man and exceeding iust.

These were the ancient Kings of Zidon: whose estate being afterward changed into Popular or Aristocratticall: and by times and turnes subiects to the Emperours of the East: there remaineth no farther memorie of them, than that which is formerly deliuered in the Tribe of Isser.

The Kings of Tyre, who they were before Samuels time, it doth not appeare: Iosephus the Historian, as is saide, had many things wherewith hee garnished his Antiquities from the Tyrian Chronicles: and out of Iosephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus, there may be gathered a descent of some twentie Kings of the Tyrians, but these Authors, though they both pretend to write out of Menander Ephesus, doe in no sort agree in the times of their reignes; nor in other particulars.

Abibulus is the first King of the Tyrians, that Iosephus and Theophilus remember: whom Theophilus calls Abemalus: the same perchance that the sonne of Sirach mentioneth in his fourtie and sixth Chapter, speaking of the Princes of the Tyrians.

To this Abibulus, Suron succeeded, if hee be not one and the same with Abibulus. David (saith Eusebius out of Eusebius) constrained this Suron to pay him Tribute, of whom also David complaineth Psal. 83.

Hiram succeeded Suron, whom Iosephus calls Iram, and Theophilus sometime Hieremmus, sometime Hieramus, but Tatian and Zonaras Chiram. He entred into a league with Dauid, and sent him Cedars with Masons, and Carpenters, to performe his buildings in Ierusalem: after he had beaten thence the Isabittes. The same was hee that so greatly assisted Salomon: whom he not only furnished with Cedars, and other Materials towards the raising of the Temple, and with great summes of money, but also he ioyned with him in his enterprize of the East India, and of Ophir: and furnished Salomon with Mariners and Pilots: the Tyrians being of all Nations the most excellent Navigators: and lent him 120. talents of gold. Of this Hiram there is not only mention in diuers places of Scripture, but in Iosephus in his Antiquities the 7. and 8. chap. 2. & 3. in Theophilus his 34. booke, in Tatianus his Oration against the Greekes: and in Zonaras Tome the first. This Prince seemed to be very mighty and magnificent: he despised the 20. towne which Salomon offered him: he defended himselfe against that victorious King David and gaue his Daughter in marriage to Salomon, called the Zidonian: for whose sake he was contented to worship Astarte, the Idoll of the Phenicians. Hiram liued 53. yeeres.

Baleasartus whom Theoph. Antiochenus, calleth Bazorus, succeeded Hiram, King of Tyre and Zidon, and reigned 7. yeeres according to Iosephus.

Abdasartus the eldest sonne of Baleasartus, gouerned 9. yeeres, and liued but 20. yeeres according to Iosephus: but after Theophilus he reigned 12. yeere, and liued 54. who being slaine by the foure sonnes of his owne Nurce, the eldest of them held the Kingdome 12. yeeres.

Astartus brother to Abdasartus, recovered the Kingdome from this Vsurper, and 10. reigned 12. yeeres.

Astartus, or Atharimus, after Theophilus, a third brother followed Astartus, and ruled 9. yeeres, and liued in all 54.

Phelles the fourth sonne of Baleasartus, and brother to the three former Kings, flew Astartus, and reigned 8. Moneths; liued 55. yeeres.

Ithobalus (or Ithobalus, in Theophilus) son to the third brother Astartus, who was the chiefe Priest of the Goddesse Astarte, which was a dignitie next vnto the King, reuenged the death of his father, and slaughtered his Vncle Phelles: and reigned 32. yeeres, the same which in the first of Kings chap. 16. is called Ethbaal, whose Daughter Iezabel, Achab married.

Badezor or Bazor the sonne of Ithobalus or Ethbaal, brother to Iezabel, succeeded his Father, and reigned 6. yeeres, and liued in all 45.

Metimus succeeded Badezor, and reigned but 9. yeeres, (saith Iosephus) he had two sonnes Pygmalion and Barca, and two Daughters Elysa and Anna.

Pygmalion reigned after Metimus his Father 40. yeeres, and liued 56: In the 7. yeere of whose reigne, Elysa sailed into Africa, and buile Carthago, 143. yeeres and 8. Moneths, after the Temple of Salomon: which by our account was 289. yeeres after Troy taken, and 143. before Rome: and therefore that fiction by Virgil of Aeneas and Dido must be farre out of square. For Pygmalion couetous of Sicheus his riches, who had married his sister Elysa, slew him traiterously as he accompanied him in hunting: or if wee beleue Iustine and Virgil, at the Altar: whereupon Elysa fearing to be depouled of her husbands treasure, fled by Sea into Africa as aforesaid: whom when Pygmalion prepared to pursue, he was by his Mothers teares, and by threats from the Oracle arrested. Barca accompanied his sister, and assisted her, in the erection of Carthage: and from him sprang that noble Familie of the Barce in Africa, of which race descended many famous Captaines, and the great Hannibal. Servius interprets this name of Dido by Virago, because of her man-like acts, others from Iedidias, a surname of Salomon.

Eulenes succeeded Pygmalion: and reigned 36. yeeres: the same that ouerthrew the fleet of Salmanaasar, in the Port of Tyre: not withstanding which hee continued his 40. siege before it on the Land side five yeeres, but in vaine.

After Eulenes, Ethobales gouerned the Tyrians, who wanted himselfe to bee as wise as Daniel: and that he knew all secrets (saith Ezekiel) of whom the Prophet writeth at large in his 28. Chapter: out of whom it is gathered, that this Prince died, or was slaine in that long siege of Nabuchodenesor: who serrounded and attempted Tyre 13. yeeres together, ere he preuailed.

Baal followed Ethobales, and reigned 10. yeeres a tributarie, perchanse, to Nabuchodenesor: for after his death it was gouerned by diuers Judges, succeeding each other: First, by Ecnibalus, then by Chelbis, Abarus the Priest, Mitonus, and Gerasius, who held it among them some 7. yeeres, and odde Moneths: after whom Balatorus commanded 50. therein as a King for one yeere: after him Merbalus sent from Babylon 4. yeeres: after him Irom sent thence also, 20. yeeres. In the 17. of whose reigne Cyrus beganne to gouerne Persia.

§. III.

§. III.

Of Bozivs his conceit that the Edumaeans inhabiting along the Red Sea, were the Progenitors of the Tyrians, and that the Tyrians from them received and brought into Phenicia the knowledge of the true God.

F the great mutations of this Kingdome and State of the Tyrians, mixed with a discourse of diuers other Nations, there is one Bozivs that hath written a Treatise at large, intituled deruinis Gentium. And although the great, and many alterations found in this and other Cities, yea in all things vnder Heauen; haue proceeded from his ordinance who onely is vnchangeable, and the same for euer; yet whereas the said Bozivs, inforcing heerehence, that the prosperitie and ruine of the Tyrians were fruits of their embracing or forsaking the true Religion, to proue this his assertion, supposeth the Tyrians to haue bene Edumaeans, descended from Esaue, Jacobs brother: first, it can hardly be beleued that Tyre, when it flourished most in her ancient glorie, was in any sort truly deuout and religious. But to this end (besides the prooff which the Scriptures giue of Hiram good affection when Salomon built the Temple) he brings many coniectural arguments: whereof the strongest is their petegree and descent: it being likely in his opinion, that the posteritie of Esaue receiued from him by Tradition the Religion of Abraham and Isaac. That the Tyrians were Edumaeans, he endeouours to shew, partly by weak reasons, painfully strained from some affinity of names, which are arguments of more delight than waight; partly by authoritie. For Strabo, Herodotus, Plinius, and others witness, that the Tyrians came from the Red Sea, in which there were three Ilands, called Tyrus, Aradus, and Sidon: which very names (as he thinketh) were afterwards giuen to the Cities of Phenicia. Considering therefore that all the coast of the Red Sea, was (in his opinion) vnder the Edumaeans: as Elab and Elongaber; or vnder the Amalekites, who descended of Amalek the Nephew of Esaue, whose chiefe Citie was Madian, so called of Madian the sonne of Abraham by Cethura, whose posteritie did people it: the consequence appeares good (as he takes it) that the Tyrians originally were Edomites: differing little or nothing in Religion from the children of Israel. Hereunto hee addes that Cadmus and his Companions brought not into Greece the worship of Astarte, the Idoll of the Sidonians. That the Parents of Thales and Pherecydes being Phenicians, themselves differed much in their Philosophie from the Idolatrous customes of the Greekes. That in Teman, a Towne of the Edumaeans, was an Arinerstie, wherein as may appeare by Eliphas the Temanite, who disputed with Iob, Religion was sincerely taught.

Such is the discourse of Bozivs, who labouring to proue one Paradoxe by another, deserves in both very little credit. For neither doth it follow, that if the Tyrians were Edumaeans, they were then of the true Religion, or well affected to God and his People: neither is it true that they were Edumaeans at all. In what Religion Esaue brought vp his children it is no where found written, but that his life was a prophane man, and disauowed by God, the Scriptures in plaine termes expresse. That his posteritie were Idolaters, is directly proued in the five and twentieth Chapter of the second booke of Chronicles. That the Edomites were perpetual enemies to the House of Israel, saue only when Dauid and some of his race, Kings of Juda, held them in subiection, who knows not? or who is ignorant of Dauids vnfriendly behaviour amongst them, when first they were subdued? Surely it was not any argument of Kindred or Alliance, betwene Tyrus and Mount Seir, that Hiram held such good correspondence with Dauid: euen then when Joab slew all the Males of Edom: neither was it for their deuotion to God, and good affection to Israel, that the Edomites were so ill intreated. It seemeth that the pietie and ancient wisdom of Eliphas the Temanite,

Themanite was then forgotten, and the Edumians punished, for being such as David in his owne dayes found them. Although indeed the Citie of Teman whence Eliphas came to reason with Job, is not that in Edumia, but another of the same name, lying East from the Sea of Galilee, and adioyning to Hir, the Countrie of Job: and to Sueb the Citie of Bildad the Subite, as both such Chorographers who best knew those parts, doe plainly shew, and the holy Text makes manifest. For Job is said to have exceeded in riches; and Salomon in wisdom, all the people of the East; not the inhabitants of Mount Seir; which lay due South from Palestina. True it is that Eliphas, the sonne of Elasu had a sonne called Teman: but that Fathers were wont in those dayes to take name of their sonnes, I no where finde. And Ismael also had a sonne called Thema: of whom it is not vnlike that Theman in the East had the name: for as much as in the seuenth Chapter of the booke of Judges, the Midianites, Amalekites, and all they of the East are called Ismaelites. And he that well considers how great and strong a Nation Amalec was, which durst giue battaile to the Host of Israel, wherein were 60000. able men, will hardly beleue that such a people were descended from one of Elasu his grand-children. For how powerfull and numberlesse must the forces of all Edom haue bene: if one Tribe of them, yea one Familie of a Tribe had bene so great? surely Mount Seir and all the Regions adioyning could not haue held them. But wee no where finde that Edom had to doe with Amalec: or afflied the Amalekites: when Saul went to roote them out. For Amalec is no where in Scripture named as a Tribe of Edom: but a Nation of it selfe, it distinct from the Ismaelites. The like may be said of Midian, that the Founder thereof being sonne to Abraham by Cethura, doublelle was no Edomite. And thus much in general for all the Seigniorie of the Red Sea-coast, which Bozsius imagines the Edumians to haue held: if the Edomites in after-times held some places as Elan and Esiogaber on the Red Sea shore, yet in Moses time, which was long after the building of Tyre, they held them not. For Moses himselfe saith, that Israel did compass all the borders of Edom: within which limits had Midian stood, Moses must needs haue knowne it: because he had sojourned long in that Countrie: and there had left his Wife and Children, when he went into Egypt.

But coniecturall Arguments, how probable soeuer, are needlesse in so manifest a case. For in the 83. Psal. Edom, Amalec, and Tyre, are named as distinct Nations: yea the Tyrians and Sidonians being one people, as all good Authors shew, and Bozsius himselfe confesseth, were Canaanites, as appeares, Gen. c. 10. v. 15. & 19 appointed by God to haue bene destroyed, and their Lands given to the children of Israel: 29. because they were euer Idolaters, and of the cursed seede of Canaan, nor Cousins to Israel, nor professors of the same Religion. For though Hiram said, Blessed be God that hath sent King David a wise sonne, wee cannot inferre that hee was of David's Religion. The Turke hath said as much of Christian Princes, his confederates. Certaine it is that the Sidonians then worshipped Ashtaroth; and drew Salomon also to the same Idolatrie.

Whereas Hiram aided Salomon in building the Temple, hee did it for his owne ends, receiuing therefore of Salomon great prouision of Corne, and Oile, and the offer of twentie Townes or Villages in Galilee. And if wee rightly consider things, it will appeare that Hiram, in all points, dealt Merchant-like with Salomon, He allowed him Timber, with which Libanus was, and yet is ouer-persuaded: being otherwise apt to yeeld silkes: as the Andarine silkes which come from thence, and other good commodities. For Corne and Oile, which hee wanted, hee gave that which hee could well spare to Salomon. Also gold for Land: wherein Salomon was the wiser: who hauing got the gold first, gaue to Hiram the worst Villages that hee had: with which the Tyrian was ill pleased. But it was a necessarie police which enforced Tyru to hold league with Israel. For David had subdued Moab, Ammon, Edom, the Aramites, and a great part of Arabia, euen to Euphrates: through which Countries the Tyrians were wont to carrie and recarrie their Wares on Cammels, to their flectes on the Red Sea; and backe againe to Tyru: so that Salomon being Lord of all the Countries through which they were to passe, could haue cut off their Trade.

But the Israelites were no Sea-men, and therefore glad to share with the Tyrians in their adventures. Yet Salomon as Lord of the Sea-townes, which his Father had taken from the Philistims, might haue greatly distressed the Tyrians, and perhaps haue brought them euen into subiection. Which Hiram knowing, was glad (and no meruaile) that Salomon rather meant as a man of peace to employ his Fathers treasure, in magnificent workes, than in pursuing the conquest of all Syria. Therefore hee willingly aided him, and sent him cunning workmen, to increase his delight in goodly buildings, imageries, and instruments of pleasure.

As these passages betwene Salomon and Hiram, are no strong Arguments of pietie in the Tyrians: so those other proofes which Bozsius frames negatively vpon particular examples, are very weak. For what the Religion of Cadmus was, I thinke, no man knowes. It seemes to me, that hauing more cunning than the Greekes, and being very ambitious, hee would faine haue purchased diuine honours: which his Daughters, Nephewes, and others of his house obtained, but his owne many misfortunes beguiled him of such hopes, if hee had any. Thales and Pherecydes are but single examples. Euerie saluage Nation hath some whose wisdom excelleth the Vulgar, euen of ciuill people. Neither did the morall wisdom of these men expresse any true knowledge of the true God. Only they made no good mention of the Gods of Greece: whose being newly come thither, they knew not. It is no good argument to say, that Cadmus and Thales being Tyrians, are not knowne to haue taught Idolatrie, therefore the Tyrians were not Idolaters. But this is off force, That Carthage, Pica, Leptis, Cadiz, and all Colonies of the Tyrians (of which, I thinke, the Islands before mentioned in the Red Sea to haue been, for they traded in all Seas) were Idolaters, euen from their first beginnings: therefore, the Tyrians who planted them, and to whom they had reference, were so likewise.

This their Idolatry from Salomon's time on-wards is acknowledged by Bozsius, who would haue vs thinke them to haue been formerly a strange kinde of deuout Edomites. In which tancie he is so peremptory, that hee filtheth men of contrary opinion, impious politicos, as if it were impiety to thinke that God (who euen among the Heathen, which haue not knowne his name, doth fauour Vertue and hate Vice) hath often rewarded morall honestie, with temporal happinesse. Doubtlesse this doctrine of Bozsius would better haue agreed with Julian the Apollonia, than with Cyril. For if the Assyrians, Greekes, Romanes, and all those Nations of the Gentiles, did then prosper most, when they drew neereft vnto the true Religion: what may bee said of the foule Idolatry which grew in Rome, as fast as Rome it selfe grew: and was enlarged with some new Superlution, almost vpon euerie new victory? How few great battailes did the Romanes winne, in which they vowed not either a Temple to some new God, or some new Honour to one of their old Gods? yea, what one Nation, saue onely that of the Jewes, was subdued by them, whose Gods they did not afterward entertaine in their Citie? Onely the true God, which was the God of the Jewes, they reiected, ybraiding the Jewes with him, as if hee were unworthy of the Romane Maieitie: shall we hereupon enforce the lewd and foolish conclusion, which Heathen writers vsed against the Christians in the Primitive Church: That such Idolatrie had caused the Citie of Rome to flourish, and that the decay of those abominations did also bring with it the decay of the Empire? It might well be thought so, if prosperitie were a signe or effect of true Religion. Such is the blind zeale of Bozsius, who writing against those whom hee falsely termes impious, giues strength to such as are impious indeed. But such indiscretion is usually found among men of his humour; who hauing once either foolishly embraced the dremes of others, or vaine-ly fashioned in their owne braines any strange Chimera's of Diuinitie, condemne all such in the pride of their zeale, as Atheists and Infidels, that are not transported with the the like intemperate ignorance. Great pittie it is that such madde Dogges are oftentimes encouraged by those, who hauing the command of many tongues, when they themselves cannot touch a man in open and generous opposition, will wound him secretly by the malicious vertue of an Hypocrite.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Tribe of EPHRAIM, and of the Kings of the tenne Tribes, whose head was EPHRAIM.

§. I.

Of the memorable places in the Tribe of EPHRAIM.

¶ 1659. 9. 78. 108
Par. 5.

A VING now past ouer Phenicia, we come to the next Territory adioyning: which is that of Ephraim: long time taken per excellentiam for the whole Kingdome of the tenne Tribes. Ephraim was the second sonne of Ioseph, whose issues when they left Egypt were in number 45000. all which dying in the Deserts (Iofua excepted) there entred the Holy Land of their children growne to bee able men 32500. who came downe on the West side of Iordan, betwene Manassas, and Beniamin: who bounded Ephraim by the North and South; as Iordan, and the Mediterranean Sea, did by the East and West.

The first and chiefe Citie which Ephraim had, was Samaria, the Metropolis of the Kingdome of Israel, built by Amris or Homri King thereof, and seated on the top of the Mountaine Somren, which ouer-looketh all the bottome, and as farre as the Sea-coast. It was afterward called Sebasti, or Augusta, in honour of Augustus Caesar. This Citie is often remembered in the Scriptures: and magnificent it was in the first building; for as Brachard obserueth, the ruines which yet remaine, and which Brachard found greater then those of Hierusalem, tell those that behold them, what it was when it stood vpright: for to this day there are found great store of goodly marble pillars, with other hewne and carued stone in great abundance, among the rubble.

It was beaten to the ground by the Sonnes of Hircanus the high Priest: restored and built by the first Herod the sonne of Antipater: who to flatter Cesar called it Sebasti. Herein were the Prophets Isaiah, and Abdias buried: and so was Iohn Baptist. It now hath nothing but a few Cottages filled with Grecian Monkes.

Nere Samaria toward the South, is the Hill of Bethel, and a towne of that name: on the top of which Mountaine Ieroboam erected one of his golden Calues, to be worshipped: with which he seduced the Israelites.

In sight of this Mountaine of Bethel, was that ancient Citie of Sichem; after the restoration called Neapolis, now Pelusa, and Neapolis: It was destroyed by Simon and Lewi, in reuenge of the rauishment of their filter Dina: and after that by Abimelech cued cued with the soyle. Ieroboam raised it vp againe: and the Damascens a third time calit downe.

Vnder Sichem toward the Sea standeth Pharston or Pirbathon on the Mountaine Iudg. 12. 15. Amelet, the Citie of Abdon Iudge of Israel. And vnder it Bethoron of the Leuites, 2. Reg. 13. built as it is said by Sara, the Daughter of Ephraim. Nere to this Citie Iudas Machabeus ouerthrew Sevon and Lyfius, Lieutenants to Antiochus. This Citie had Salomon formerly repaired and fortified.

Betweene Bethoron and the Sea, standeth Samir, of which Iof. 10. And Saron whose King was slaine by Iofas: it is also mentioned Act. 9. 35. and of this Saron the Iof. 12. 18. Valley taketh name, which beginning at Casarea Palastina, extendeth it selfe alongst the coast as farre as Ioppe, saith Adrichome. Though indeed the name Saron is not particularly giuen to this Valley, but to euery fruitful plaine Region; for not onely this Valley is so called, to wit, betwene Casarea and Ioppe, but that also betwene the Mountaine Tabor and the Sea of Galilee: for so S. Hierome vpon the five and thirtieth Chapter of Esay interprets the word Saron: and so doth the same Father in his Commentaries vpon Abdias, reade Saron for Affaron: vnderstanding thereby a Plaine nere Lidda: which Lidda in his time was called Diofpolis, or the Citie of Iupiter, one of the Toparchies of Iudaea, the fift in dignitie (or the third after Plinie) where Saint PETER (non fuisse Christi vultate) cured Aeneas. Niger calls all that Region from Antilibanus to Ioppe Saron. This Ioppe was burnt to the ground by the Romanes, Niger comm. 4. those Rauens and spoylers of all Estates, disturbers of Common-weales, vsurpers of other Princes Kingdomes; who with no other respect led than to amplify their owne glory, troubled the whole world: and themselves, after murdering one another, became a prey to the most salvage and barbarous Nations.

In Diofpolis (saith Will. of Tyre) was S. George beheaded, and buried: in whose honour and memorie Iustinian the Emperour caused a faire Church to bee built ouer his Tombe, these be Tyrius his wordes: *Relicta dextris locis maritimis Antipatride, & Ioppe, per late patentem plantitiem Eleutheriam pertranseunt, Liddam que est Diofpolis, ubi & egregij Martyris GEORGII, que hodie Sepulchrum ostenditur, perueniunt, eius & Eleutheriam quum ad honorem eiusdem Martyris pius & orthodoxus Princeps Romanorum, AUGUSTVS IUSTINIANVS multo studio & deuotione promptis edificari preceperat, &c. They hauing left (saith he) on the right hand, the Sea Townes Antipatris, and Ioppe, passing ouer the great open plaine of Eleutheria, came to Lidda, which is Diofpolis: where the sumptuous Tombe of the famous Martyr S. GEORGE is at this day shewed; whose Church, when the Godly and Orthodox Prince of the Romanes, High and Mightie IUSTINIAN had commanded to bee built, with great earnestnesse and present deuotion, &c. Thus saith Tyrius, by whose testimonie we may coniecture that this S. George was not that Arrian Bilhop of Alexandria; but rather some better Christian: for this of Alexandria was slaine there in an vprore of the people, and his ashes cast into the Sea: as Ammianus Marcellinus reports. And yet also it may bee, that this George was a better Christian, than hee is commonly thought: for his wordes of the Temple of GENIUS, How long shall this Sepulchre stand? occasioned the vprore of the people against him: as fearing lest hee would giue attempt to ouerthrow that beautifull Temple. This also Marcellinus reports; who though hee say that this George was also deadly hated of the Christians, who else might haue rescued him: yet hee addeth that his ashes, with the ashes of two others, were therefore cast into the Sea, lest if their Reliques had been gathered vp, Churches should bee built for them, as for others. But for my part, I rather thinke that it was not this Georgius, whose name liues in the right honourable Order of our Knights of the Garter, but rather another, whom Tyrius, aboue cited, witnesseth to haue been buried at Lidda or Diofpolis. The same also is confirmed by Vitrua. S. Hierome affirms that it was sometime called Tigrida, and while the Christians inhabited the Holy Land, it had a Bilhop Suffragan.*

Nere to Lidda or Diofpolis standeth Ramatha of the Leuites, or Aramathia: afterward ward Rama, and Ramula, the native Citie of Ioseph, which buried the body of Chryl. There are many places which beare this name of Rama; one they set in the Tribe of Juda neere Thecina in the way of Hebron; another in Nephthaim, not farre from Seper; a third in Zabulon, which they say, adioyneth to Seper oria; a fourth, which they make the same with Silo, and a fifth, which is this Rama, in the Hills of Ephraim, called Rama-Sophim, where Samuel lived; and wherein he is buried.

From hence to the North along the coast are Heli, or Aialon of the Levites, of which 1. Chron 6. Apollonia, of which Iosephus in his Antiquities, and in the Warre of the Jewes. Also Bajalis (for which Iunius, 2. Reg 4. 42. reads planities Shalifa) they place hereabout in this Tribe of Ephraim; but Iunius vpon 1. Sam 6. where we read 10 of the Land of Shalifis, findeth it in Beniamin.

On the other side of the Mountaines of Ephraim standeth Gofna, one of the Toparchies or Cities of government, the second in dignitie, of which the Country about it taketh name.

Then Thunnath-Jara, or according to the Hebrew, Thimnath-Serach; one also of the ten Toparchies or Presidencies of Juda, which they call Thamnitica; a goodly Citie and strong, seated on one of the high Hills of Ephraim; on the North of the Hill called Gana; which Citie and Territory Israell gave vnto their Leader Iofua; who also amplified it with buildings, neere which he was buried. His Sepulchre remained in 5. Hierons time, and ouer it the Sunne ingrauen, in memory of that greatst of wonders, 20 which God wrought in Iofua's time.

In the places adioyning standeth Adarfa, or Adafa; where Judas Maccabeus with 3000. Jewes ouerthrew the Armie of Nicanor, Lieutenant of Syria; neere to Gazer or Gezer which Iofua tooke, and hung their King; a Citie of the Levites. It was afterward taken by Pharao of Egypt; the people all slaine, and the Citie razed; Salomon rebuilt it.

To the East of this place is the Frontier Citie of Iefleti, of which Iof 16. 3. otherwise Peletih, whence David had part of his Pratorian Souldiers, vnder the charge of Benai. Then that high and famous Mountaine and Citie of Silo, whereon the Ark of God v kept for many yeeres, till the Philistims got it.

To this they ioyn the Citie of Machmas or Blachmas: in which Ionathas 30 Machabeus inhabited, a place often remembered in the Scriptures. It standeth in the common way from Samaria towards Hierusalem: and is now called Byra.

Then the Village of Naiath where Saul prophesied; and neere it Ephron, one of those Cities which Abijah recovered from Ieroboam; after the great ouerthrow giuen him. Then Kibzaim of the Levites, of which Iofua 21. 22. which Iunius thinks to be the same with Iokmechum, of which 1. Chro 6. 28. As for Abjaloms Balsasor, which they finde hereabout, Iunius reads it the Plaine of Chetzor; and finds it in the Tribe of Juda; as Iof 15. we read of two Chetzors in that Tribe; one neere Kedell v. 23. 40 and the other the same as Chetzon v. 25.

In this Tribe also they finde the Citie of Mello; whose Citizens, they say, ioyned with the Sichemites in making the Ballard Abimelec King: adding that for the building thereof with other Cities, Salomon raised a Tribute vpon the people. But it seemes that Mello or Millo is a common name of a strong Fort or Cittadell: and Iofua 10. 11. reads incolae munitionis, and for Salomo edificabit Mello, he reads edificabit munitionem, and so the Septuagint reads incolae in that place. And without doubt the Millo which Salomon built, cannot be that of Sichem, but another in Hierusalem.

The other Cities of marke in Ephraim, are Taphuseb, whose King was slaine by Jo-50 fas; and anath or Ienath spoiled by Teglapalsar; Pekab then gouerning Israell with diuers others, but of no great fame.

The Mountaines of Ephraim sometime signifie the greatst part of the Land of the Sonnes of Ioseph, on the West of Jordan: Ieuerrall parts whereof are the Hill of

Samron

Samron or Samaria, 1. Reg 16. 24. * the Hill of Gabas, Judg 2. 9. the Hill of Tsalmon or Salmon, Judg 9. 48. the Hills of the Region of Tupph or Tjophim, Judg 9. 5. where Rama-Tjophim stood, which was the Citie of Samuel.

The great plentie of fruitfull Vines vpon the sides of the Mountaines, was the occasion that Jacob in the Spirit of Prophecie, Genes 49. 22. compared Ioseph two branches, Ephraim and Manasse, to the branches of a fruitfull Vine planted by the Well side, and spreading her Daughter-branches along the Wall: which Allegory also Ezekiel c. 22. in his Lamentation for Ephraim (that is, for the tenne Tribes, whose head was Ephraim) prosequites: as also in his Lamentation for Juda, hee followeth the other Allegorie of Jacob, Gen 49. 9. comparing Juda to a Lyon. Vpon the top of one of the highest of these Hills of Ephraim, which ouer-looketh all the plaines on both sides of Jordan, they finde the Cattle called Dok: which they make to bee the same with Dagon, of which Ioseph 1. Bel. Iudg c. 2. in which Cattle as it is 1. Maccab 16. Ptolome most traiterously, at a banquet, slewe Simon Maccabeus his Father-in-Law.

Among the Rivers of this Tribe of Ephraim, they name Gana, remembered in the second of Samuel c. 23. v. 30. where though Iunius reads Hiddai ex rana vallium Gabasi: yet the Vulgar and Patabus read Hiddai of the River of Gana. Also in this Tribe they place the River of Garith, by which the Prophet Elias abode during the great drought: where he was b fed with the Ravens: and after that the River was dried 10 vp, he trauailed (by the Spirit of God guided) towards Sidon: where he was relieved by the poore Widow of Zarepta, whose dead sonne he reuiued, and increased her pittance of Meale and Oyle: whereby she sustained her life.

§. II.

Of the Kings of the ten Tribes from IEROBOAM to ACHAB.

F the first Kings of Israel, I omit in this place to speake: and referre it to the Catalogue of the Kings of Juda: of whom hereafter.

Touching the acts of the Kings of the ten Tribes, but briefly, beginning after the diuision from Juda and Beniamin, now it followeth to speake. The first of these Kings was Ieroboam, the sonne of Nebat, an Ephraimite of Zereda, who being a man of strength and courage, was by Salomon made ouer-seeer of the buildings of the Millo or Munition in Hierusalem, for as much as belonged to the charge of the Tribes of Ephraim and Manasse: and so many of them as wrought in those works. During which time as he went from Hierusalem, hee encountered the Prophet Abijah: who made him know that he was by God delisted to be King of Israel: and to command ten of the twelue Tribes. After this fearing that those things might come to Salomons knowledge, hee fled into Egypt to Shishak, whom Eusebius calleth Oschorer, whose Daughter hee married: the Predecessor of which Shishak (if not the same) did likewise entertaine Adad the Idumean, when he was carried yong into Egypt from the furie of Dauid, and his Captaine Ioth; which Adad, the King of Egypt married to his Wives sister Taphnes; vning both him and Ieroboam as instruments to shake the Kingdome of Juda; that himselfe might the easier spoile it, as hee did: for in the fifth yeere of Ieroboams, Shishak sackt the Citie of Hierusalem, and carried thence all the treasure of Dauid and Salomon, and all the spoiles which Dauid tooke from Adadexer of Soba, with the presents of Tobu, King of 10 Hamath, which were of an inestimable value.

This Ieroboam after the death of Salomon became Lord of the ten Tribes: and though he were permitted by God to gouerne the Israellites, and from a meane man exalted to that state: yet preferring the policies of the world before the seruice and honour of God (as fearing that if the Tribes vnder his rule should repaire to Hierusa- lem to doe their vsuall Sacrifices, they might bee drawne from him by degrees) he erected two golden Calues, one in Dan, and another in Belhel, for the people to worship (an imitation of the Egyptian Apis, saith S. Ambrose, or rather of Aurons Calf in Horeb) further he made election of his Priests out of the basest and vnlearned people. This King made his chiefe seat and Palace at Sichem: He despised the warning of the Iudaean Prophet, whome Iosephus calleth Adon, and Glycias too: His hand there-after withered, and was againe restored: but continuing in his Idolatry, and hardened vpon occasion that the Prophet returning was slaine by a Lyon, Ahijah makes him know, that God purposed to roote out his posteritie.

He was afterward ouerthrowne by Abia King of Iuda, and died after he had 40-uerued two and twenty yeeres; whom Nadab his sonne succeeded: who in the second yeere of his reigne, together with all the race of Ieroboam was slaine, and rooted out by Bascha, who reigned in his stead: so Nadab liued King but two yeeres.

1. King. xv. 26

Bascha the sonne of Ahijah, the third King after the partition, made warre with Asa King of Iuda: hee feared him/ selfe in Thersa: and fortified Rama against Iuda, to restraîne their excursions. Hereupon Asa entertained Benhadad of Damascus against him, who inuaded Nephthalim, and destroyed many places therein: the meane while Asa carried away the Materials, with which Bascha intended to fortifie Rama; but being an Idolater, he was threatened by Iehu the Prophet, that it should befall his race, as it did to Ieroboam: which afterward came to passe: He ruled foure and twentie yeeres and died.

To Bascha succeeded Ela his sonne, who at a feast at his Palace of Thersa, was in his cups slaine by Zambri after he had reigned two yeeres: and in him the prophetic of Iehu was fulfilled.

1. King. 16.

2. King. 16.

Ambri or Homri succeeded Ela, and transferred the Regall seat from Thersa to Samaria: which he bought of Shemer, built, and fortified it. This Ambri was also, an Idolater, no lesse impious than the rest: and therefore subiect to Tabremmon, King of Syria; the Father of Benadad according to Eusebius, Nicethorus, and Zonaras: but how this should stand, I doe not well conceiue, seeing Benadad the Sonne of Tabremmon was inuited by Asa King of Iuda, to assaile Bascha King of Israel, the Father of Ela who forewent Ambri. This Ambri reigned twelue yeeres, sixe in Thersa, and sixe in Samaria, and left two children, Achab and Athalia.

2. King. 25.

2. III.

Of ACHAB and his Successors, with the captiuitie of the ten Tribes.

CHAB of Ahab succeeded Omri, who not only vp-held the Idolatrie of Ieroboam, borrowed of the Egyptians: but hee married Iezabel the Zidonian: and as Ieroboam followed the Religion of his Egyptian Wife: so did Achab of his Zidonian; and erected an Altar and a Grove to Baal in Samaria. He suffered Iezabel to kill the Prophets of the most high God. God sent famine on the Land of Israel. Achab met Elias: Elias prevailed in the trial of the Sacrifice, and killeth the false prophets: and afterward sitteth for feare of Iezabel.

Benadad, not long after, besieged Samaria: and taken by Achab, was by him set at libertie: for which the Prophet (whom Glycias calleth Nichaeas) reproveth him: afterward hee caused Naboth by a false accusation to bee stoned. Then ioyning with Iosephat

Iosephat in the warre for the recouerie of Ramoth, hee was slaine as Micheas had foretold him.

Hee had three sonnes named in the Scripture, Ochozias, Ioram, and Ioa: besides seueritie other sonnes by sundry wiues and Concubines.

Ochozias succeeded his father Achab. The Assabites fell from his obedience: hee bruiſed himselfe by a fall: and sent for counsaile to Beelzebub the God of Acharam, Elisha the Prophet meeteth the messenger on the way: and misliking that Ochozias sought helpe from that dead Idoll, asked the messenger, If there were not a God in Israel? Ochozias sendeth two Captaines, and with each fiftie souldiers to bring Elisha vnto him, both which with their Attendances were consumed with fire. The third Captaine be sought mercie at Elishas hands, and hee spared him, and went with him to the king; auowing it to the king that he must then die, which came to passe in the second yeere of his raigne.

Ioram the brother of Ochozias by Iezabel, succeeded: He allured Iosephat king of Iuda, and the king of Edom to assit him against the Moabites, who refused to pay him the tribute of 20000. sheepe. The three kings wanted water, for themselves and their horses, in the Deserts. The Prophet Elisha causeth the ditches to flow. The Assabites are ouerthrowne: their king flieth to Kirharaseth, and being besieged, according to some Expositors, burnt his sonne on the walles as a Sacrifice, whereat the three kings moued with compassion returned and left Moab, wasting and spoyling that Region. Others, as it seemes with better reason, vnderstand the Text to speake of the sonne of the king of Edom, whom they suppose in this irruption to haue beene taken prisoner, by the Moabites, and that the king of Moab shewed him ore the walles, threatening, vnlesse the siege were dissolved, that he would offer him in sacrifice to his Gods. Whereupon the king of Edom besought those of Iuda and Israel to breake off the siege for the safetie of his sonne: which when the other kings refused to yeeld vnto, and that Moab according to his former threatening had burnt the king of Edom vpon the rampire, that all the assailants might discern it, the king of Edom being by this sad spectacle enraged, forsooke the partie of the other kings; for want of whole assistance the siege was broken vp.

After this the king of Aram sent to Ioram, to heale Naaman the Captaine of his Armie of the leproisie. The answer of Ioram was, Am I God to kill, and to giue life, that hee doth send to heale a man from his leproisie? adding, that the Aramite sought but matter of quarrell against him. Elisha hearing thereof, wilked the king to send Naaman to him; promising that hee should know that there was a Prophet in Israel, and so Naaman was healed by washing himselfe seuen times in Iordan. Elisha refused the gifts of Naaman. But his seruant Gehazi accepted a part thereof: from whence the sellers of spirituall gifts are called Gehazites, as the buyers are Simonians of Simon Magus.

Afterward Benhadad king of Aram or Damascus, having heard that this Prophet did discouer to the king of Israel whatsoever the Aramite consulted in his secrettest counsell, sent a troupe of horse to take Elisha: all whom Elisha strooke blinde, and brought them captiues into Samaria: Ioram then asking leaue of the Prophet to slay them, Elisha forbade him to harme them: but caused them to be fed and sent backe to their owne Prince in safetie.

The king of Aram notwithstanding these benefits, did againe attempt Samaria, and brought the Citizens to extreme famine. Ioram imputeth the cause thereof to the Prophet Elisha. Elisha by prayer caused a noise of Chariots and armor to sound in the ayre, whereby the Aramites affrighted, fled away, and left the siege: an act of great admiration as the same is written in the second of Kings. After this, when Azad obtained the kingdom of Syria by the death of his Master, Ioram entring vpon his frontire tooke Ramoth Gilead: in which warre hee received diuers wounds, and returned to Israel to be cured. But whilest hee lay there, Iehu (who commanding the armie of Ioram in Gilead, was annoyed king by one of the children of the Prophets sent by Elisba surprized and slew both him and all that belonged vnto him, routing out the whole posteritie of Ahab.

Iehu who raigned after Iehoram, destroyed not onely the race of his foregoers, but also their Religion; for which hee receiued a promise from God, That his seede should occupie the Throne vnto the fourth generation. Yet hee vpheld the idolatrie of Ieroboam, for which hee was plagued with grieuous warre, wherein he was beaten by Hazeel the Aramite, who spoiled all the Countreies to the East of Iordan; in which warre he was slaine, saith Cederuus: whereof the Scriptures are silent. Iehu raigned 28. yeeres.

Pag. 86.

2. King. 13.

Ioachaz or Iehoahaz the sonne of Iehu succeeded his father, whome Azael and his 10 sonne Benhadad often inuaded, and in the end subiected, leauing him onely 50. horse, 20. chariots, and 10000. foot; and as it is written in the Scriptures, he made them like dust beaten into powder. Ioachaz raigned 17. yeeres.

After Ioachaz Ioa his sonne gouerned Israel, who when hee repaired to Elisba the Prophet as he lay in his death-bed, the Prophet promised him three victories ouer the Aramites: and first commaunded him to lay his hand on his bowe, and Elisba couered the kings hands with his, and bad him open the window westward (which was toward Damascus) and then shoot an arrow thence out. He againe willed him to beare the ground with his arrowes, who smote it thrice, and ceased: The Prophet then told him, that hee should haue smitten five or sixe times, and then hee should 20 haue had so many victories ouer the Aramites as hee gaue strokes. And so it succeeded with Ioa, who ouerthrew the Aramites in three battells, and recouered the Cities and Territorie from Benhadad the sonne of Azael, which his father Ioachaz had lost. He also ouerthrew Amazias king of Juda, who prouoked him to make the war, whereupon hee entred Hierusalem, and sacked it with the Temple. This Ioa raigned sixteene yeeres and died; in whole time also the Prophet Elisba exchanged this life for a better.

2. King. 14.

Ieroboam the third from Iehu, followed Ioa his father, an Idolater as his predecessors; but hee recouered all the rest of the lands belonging to Israel, from Hamath which is neere Libanus, to the dead Sea, and raigned one and fortie yeeres.

Zacharias the fift and last of the house of Iehu, slaine by Shallum his vassall, who raigned in his stead, gouerned six moneths. Shallum held the kingdome but one moneth, being slaughtered by Menabem of the Gadites.

Menabem who tooke reuenge of Shallum, vsed great crueltie to those that did not acknowledge him: ripping the bellies of those that were with child. This Menabem being inuaded by Phul, bought his peace with ten thousand talents of siluer, which he exacted by a Tribute of fittie shekels from euery man of wealth in Israel. Menabem gouerned twentie yeeres.

2. King. 16. 19.

Pekabiah or Phaceia, or after Zanarus Phaceia, succeeded, and after hee had ruled two yeeres, hee was slaine by Phace or Pekab the Commander of his armie, who 40 raigned in his place. In this Pekab time Phulassar or Tiglat-Phlassar inuaded the kingdome of Israel, and wan Lion, Abel-Bethmaaca, Ianoach, Kedesb, Hajor, and Gilead, with all the Cities of Galilee, carrying them captiues into Assyria: he was drawn in by Achas king of Iudaea against Pekab and Rezin, the last of the Adades. For Achas being waikd by Pekab of Israel and by Rezin of Damascus, did a third time borrow the Church riches, and therewith ingaged the Assyrian, who first suppressed the Monarchie of Syria and Damascus, and then of Israel: and this inuading of the great Assyrian, was the vtter ruine of both States, of Israel and of Iudaea. Pekab raigned twentie yeeres.

2. King. 27. 29.

Then hoshea or Osea, who slew Pekab, became the vassall of Salmanassar; but ho- 50 ping to shake off the Assyrian yoke, he fought aide from So, or Sua, or Sebus king of Egypt: which being knowne to the Assyrian, he call him into prison, besieged Samaria, and maistred it: carried the ten Idolatrous Tribes into Ninuite in Assyria, and into Rages in Media, and into other Easterne Regions, and there disperfed them: and and re-planted Samaria with diuers Nations, and chiefly with the Cuthae (inhabiting about Cutha a Riuer in Persia, or rather in Arabia Deserta) and with the people Canaan bounding vpon Syria, and with those of Seppharaim (a people of Sepphar in Mesopotamia vpon Euphrates, of whose conquest Senecherib vaunteth) also with those of Philistines in Ara: which were of the ancient Aims who inhabited the Land of the Philistines in *Abraham*s time, dwelling neere vnto Gaza, whom the Caphorims rooted out: and at this time they were of Arabia the Desart, called Hauai, willing to returne to their ancient seates. To these he added those of Chamath or Iturae, the ancient enemies of the Israelites, and sometime the Vassalls of the Adads of Damascus, which so often afflicted them. And thus did this Assyrian aduise himselfe better than the Romanes did. For after Titus and Vespasian had waikd the Cities of Iudea, and Hierusalem, they carried the people away captiue: but left no others in their places, but a very few simple labourers, besides their owne thin Garrisons, which soone decayed: and thereby they gaue that dangerous entrance to the Arabians and Saracens, who neuer could be driven thence againe to this day.

And this transmigration, plantation, and displantation, hapned in the yeare of the world 3292. the sixth yeare of Ezekias King of Iuda: and the ninth of Hoshea the last King of Israel.

CHAP. X.

Of the memorable places of DAN, SIMEON, IUD, RUBEN, GAD, and the other halfe of MANASSE.

§ I.

Of DAN, where of Ioppe, Gath, Accaron, Azotus, and other Townes.

V. 46.

Now following the coast of the Mediterran Sea, that portion of Land assigned to the Tribe of Dan, ioyneth to Ephraim, whereof I spake last: of which familie there were numbered at Mount Sinai 62700. fighting men, all which leauing their bodies with the rest in the Deserts, there entred the Holy Land of their sonnes 66400. bearing armes. The first famous Citie in this Tribe on the Sea coast was Ioppe, or Iapho, as in the 19. of Iosua: one of the most ancientest of the World, and the most famous of others on that coast, because it was the Port of Hierusalem. From hence Ionas imbarked himselfe when he fled from the seruice of God, towards Tarsus in Cilicia. In the time of the Macchabees this Citie receiued many changes: and while Iudas Macchabeus governed the Iewes, the Syrians that were Garrifond in Ioppe, hauing their fleet in the Port, inuited 200. principall Citizens aboard them, and cast them all into the Sea: which Iudas reuenged by 30 firing their fleet, and putting the companies which sought to escape to the sword.

It was twicetaken by the Romanes, and by Cestius the Lieutenant vtterly burnt and ruined. But in the yeare of Christ 1250. Lodouick the French King gaue it new Walls and Towers: It is now the Turkes, and called Iaffa. There are certaine Rocks in that Port, whereunto it is reported that Andromeda was fastned with chaines: and from thence deliuered from the Sea-Monster by Perseus. This fable (for so I take it) is confirmed by Iosephus, Solinus, and Plinie. Marcus Scarus during his office of Edileship, shewed the bones of this Monster to the people of Rome. S. Hierome vpon Ionas speaks oft indifferently.

The next vnto Ioppe was Iamnia, where Iudas Macchabeus burnt the rest of the Syrian fleet: the fire and flame whereof was scene at Hierusalem 240. furlongs off. It had sometime a Bishops seate, faith Will. of Tyre; But there is no signe of it at this time that such a place there was.

After Iamnia is the Citie of Geth or Gath, sometime Anithedon, faith Volaterran. And so Montanus seemes to vnderstand it. For he sets it next to Egypt, of all the Philistim Cities, and in the place of Anithedon. But Volaterran giues neither reason nor authority for his opinion; for Plotomie sets Anithedon farr to the South of Ioppe: And Geth was the first and not the last (beginning from the North) of all the great Cities of the Philistims: and about fixtene miles from Ioppe; where S. Hierome in his time found a great Village of the same name. It was sometime the Habitation and Seminarie of the Anakims: strong and Giant-like-men, whom Iosua could not expell, nor the Danites after him: not any of the Israelites, till Dauids time: who slew Goliath, as his Captaines did diuers others not much inferior in strength and stature vnto Goliath.

Hieron. in Michem.

Reboam the Sonne of Salomon rebuilt Geth: Ozias the sonne of Amazias destroyed it againe. It was also laid waste by Azel King of Syria. Falke the fourth King of Hierusalem, built a Castle in the same place out of the old ruins. Whether this Geth was the same that Will. of Tyre in the holy Warre calls Ibghin, I much doubt: the error growing by taking Geth for Anithedon.

Nor farr from Geth or Gath standeth Bethsemes or the house of the Sanne. In the fields adioyning to this Citie (as is thought) was the Arke of God brought by a yoke of two Kine, turned loose by the Philistims: and the Bethsemites presuming to looke therein, there were slaine of the Elders 70. and of the people 50000 by the ordinance of God. After which slaughter and the great lamentation of the people: it was called the great Abel, faith S. Hierome. Benedictus Theologus finds three other Cities of this name; one in a Nephthim: another in Iuda: and another in Iachar. Hierome finds a fifth in Beniamin.

Keeping the Sea-coast, the strong Citie of Accaron offereth it selfe, sometime one of the five Satrapies, or Governments of the Philistims. S. Hierome makes it the same with Casaria Palaestina. Plinie confounds it with Apollonia: It was one of those that defended it selfe against the Danites and Iudeans. It worshipped Beel-zebub the God of Hornets or Flies. To which Idoll it was that Absaziah King of Israel sent to enquire of his health: whose Messengers Elrab meeting by the way caused them to returne, with a sorrowfull answer to their Master. This Citie is remembered in many places of Scripture.

Christianus Schrot placeth Azotus next to Geth, and then Accaron or Ekron. This Azotus or Asdod was also an habitation of the Anakims, whose Iosua failed to destroy, though he once possessed their Citie. Herein stood a sumptuous Temple dedicated to the Idoll Dagon: the same Idoll which fell twice to the ground of it selfe, after the Arke of God was by the Philistims carried into their Temple; and in the second fall it was vtterly broken and defaced. Neere it was that famous Iudas Macchabeus slaine by Bacchides and Alcimius, the Lieutenants of Demetrius. Afterward it was taken by Ionathas: and the rest of the Citizens being put to the sword, all that fled into the Temple of Dagon, were with their Idoll therein consumed with fire: neere which also he ouerthrew Apollonius.

Gabinus the Romane rebuilt it. It had a Bishops seate while Christianitie flourished in those parts. But in S. Hieromes time it was yet a faire Village. And this was the last of the Sea-Townes within the Tribe of Dan.

The Cities which are within the Land Eastward from Azotus, and beyond the Fountaine of Ethiopia, wherein Philip the Apostle baptized the Eunuch, are Tjorah, or Sarara, and Eshbaol, and betwene them Casra Dania neere Hebron: though this place where Samson was borne, may seeme by the words Iud. 18. 12. to bee in the Tribe of Iudab, as the other also were bordering Townes betwene Dan and Iuda.

After these within the bounds of Iuda, but belonging to the Danites, they finde Gador, or as it is 1. Mac. 15. Cedron, which Cenachab the Lieutenant of Antiochus fortified against the Iewes, and neere which himselfe was by the Macchabees ouerthrowne.

Then Modin the Native Citie of the Macchabees: and wherein they were buried, on whose Sepulcher the seven Marble Pillars, which were erected of that height as they serued for a marke to the Sea-men, remained many hundreds of yeares after their first setting vp, as Brochar and Breidenbach witness.

There are besides these the Citie of Cariathiarim, that is, the Citie of the woods: seated in the border of Iuda, Beniamin, and Dan, wherein the Arke of God remained twentie yeeres in the house of Amiadab: till such time as Dauid carried it thence to Hierusalem: Of this place (as they say) was Zacharias the sonne of Eurachias, or Iehoids, who was slaine betwene the Temple and the Altar: also Prius whom Iechim King of Hierusalem slaughtered as we finde in Jeremie. Many other places which Next Dabir sometime Cariath-Sepher, the Citie of Letters, the Vniuersitie, as they say, or Academie of old Palestine. In S^t. Hieromes time it seemes it had the name of Dama: Iofua 15. 49. it is called Vrbs Sanna: from the name, as it seemes, of some of the Anakims, as Hebron was called Vrbs Arbabi. For euen hence also were these Giants expelled. It was taken chiefly by Othaniel, incouraged by Caleb promise of his Daughter in marriage: but that Iofua and the Host of Israhel were at the siege, it appears Iof. 10. 39. This Citie Iof. 21. 15. is named among those which out of Simoon and Juda were given to the Leuites. And hence it seemes they attribute it to this Tribe.

Besides these, there are many others in the Tribe of Simoon, but of lesse fame, as Hajir, of which Iof. 19. 7. which also Iof. 21. 16. is reckoned for one of the Cities of the Leuites, giuen out of the portion of Juda and Simoon (for which Iunius thinks Hisham is named 1. Chron. 6. 59. though * in the place of Iofua these two are distinguished) also Tholad so named 1. Chron. 4. 29. for which Iofua 19. 4. wee haue Eltholad. Chatear-Susa so named Iofua 19. 5. for which Iofua 15. wee haue Chatear-Gadda, both names agreeing in signification: for Gadda is Turme, and Susa Eziquitatur.

In the same places of Iofua and of the Chronicles Chorma is named, which they thinke to be the same with that of which Numb. 14. 45. to which the Amalekites and Canaanites pursued the Israelites. But that Chorma cannot bee in Simoon, nor within the Mountaines of Edumaea. For Israhel fled not that way: but backe againe to the Campe, which lay to the South of Edumaea, in the Desert.

The same places also name Beerseba in this Tribe: so called of the Oath betwene Abraham and Abimeles: neere vnto which Hagar wandered with her Sonne Ismael. It was also called the Citie of Isac, because hee dwelt long there. While the Christians held the Holy Land, they laboured much to strengthen this place, standing on the border of the Arabian Desert, and in the South bound of Canaan. It hath now the name of Gibelin. The other Cities of Simoon which are named in the places of Iofua, and of the Chronicles, aboue noted, because they helpe vs nothing in storie, I omit them. In the time of Ezekia King of Juda, certaine of this Tribe being strightened in their owne Territories, passed to * Gedor, as it is 1. Chron. 4. 39. (the same place which Iof. 15. 36. is called Gedera and Gederothaima) which at that time was inhabited by the issue of Cham: where they seated themselves: as also five hundred others of this Tribe, destroyed the Reliques of Amalec in the Mountaines of Edom, and dwelt in their places.

* As it seemes in the Land of Juda. See in the first Paragraph of this Chapter in the Cities of Dan. Iud. 1. 63.

The Mountaines within this Tribe are few, and that of Sampson the chieft: vnto which he carried the Gate-post of Gaza. The Riuiers are Befor, and the Torrent of Aegypti called Shichar, as is noted in Affer.

50

THE TRIBE OF JUDA.

F Juda the fourth Sonne of Iacob by Lea, there were multiplied in Aegypt 74600. all which (Caleb excepted) perished in the Desarts. And of their sonnes there entred the Land of Canaan 76500. bearing armes: Agreeable to the greatnesse of this number was the greatest Territorie giuen, called afterward Judea: within the bounds whereof were the portions allotted to Dan and Simoon included. And many Cities named in these Tribes, did first, as they say, belong vnto the children of Juda: who had a kind of Soueraigntie ouer them: as Succoth, Cariathiarim, Labis, Bethemes, Tijleg, Beerseba, and others. The multitude of people within this small Prouince (if it be meant by that ground giuen to this Tribe onely) was incredible, if the witness of the Scriptures had not warranted the report. For when Dauid numbered the people, they were found five hundred thousand fighting men.

The Cities of Juda were many. But I will remember the chieft of them: beginning with Arad, or Horma, which standeth in the entrance of Judea from Idumaea: whose King first surpris'd the Israelites as they passed by the border of Canaan towards Moab, and tooke from them some spoiles, and many prisoners: who being afterward ouerthrowne by the Israelites, the sonnes of Keniz, the Kinsmen of Moses, obtained a possession in that Territorie: who before the coming of the Israelites, dwelt betwene Madian and Amalek.

Following this Frontier towards Idumaea and the South, Asensu Scorpionis, or Arabbim is placed, the next to Arad: so called because of Scorpions, which are said to be in that place: from which name of Arabbim, Hierome thinks that the name of the Teparchie called Arabatena was denominated: of which we haue spoken in Massifer. On the South side also of Judea they place the Cities of Iagur, Dimona, Adada, Cedes, Asna, Iethnam, and Asor or Chasfor, most of them Frontier Townes.

And then Zipp: of which there are two places so called: one besides this in the body of Juda, of which the Desart and Forreit adioyning tooke name: where Dauid hid himselfe from Saul. After these are the Cities of Efron, Adar, Karkab and Asmona, or Hafmon, of no great fame.

Turning now from Idumaea towards the North, we finde the Cities of Danna, Shebah, Amam, the other Asor, or Chasfor, Behaloith, and the two Seches: of all which see Iof. 15. also Cariath by Iofua 15. v. 25. called Kerioth: whence Judas the Traitor was called Iscariath, as it were a man of Cariath. Then Hetham the abode of Sampson which Reboboam reedified. Beyond these towards the North border, and towards Eleutheropolis, is the Citie of Iethar, or Iathir, belonging to the Leuites. In Saint Hieromes time it was called Iethira: and inhabited altogether with Christians: neere vnto this Citie was that remarkable battaile fought betwene Afa King of Juda, and Zara King of the Arabians, who brought into the field a Million of fighting men: and was notwithstanding beaten and put to flight: Afa following the victorie as farre as Gerar, which at the same time he recovered.

Not farre from Iethar, Randeth Iarmuth, whose King was slaine by Iofua, and the Citie returned. Next vnto it is Marefa the native Citie of the Prophet Micha: betwene it and Odolla, Judas Machabeus ouerthrew Gorgias: and sent thence ten thousand Dryagmas of silver to be offered for Sacrifice.

Odolla or Hadullam it selfe was an ancient and magnificent Citie, taken by Iofua, and the King thereof slaine. Jonathas Machabeus beautified it greatly. Then Cela or Zeila afterward Echela, where Dauid sometime hid himselfe: and which afterward afterward he deliuered from the assaults of the Philistims: neere which the Prophet Abacuc was buried: whose monument remained and was scene by St. Hierome.

Neere it is Hebron sometime called the Citie of Arbab, for which the Vulgar hath Caristharbe: the reason of this name they giue as if it signified the Citie of foure: because the foure Patriarchs, Adam, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, were therein buried, but of Adam it is but supposed: and it is plaine by the places Iofua 14. 14. and 15. 13. and 20. 11. that Arbab here doth not signifie foure, but that it was the name of the Father of the Giant called Anakim, whose sonne as it seemes Anak was: and Achim, Shelbui, and Talmai (whom Caleb expelled Iof. 15.) were the sonnes of this Anak, Nam. 13. 23. The name of Anak signifieth Torquem, a chaine worne for ornament: and it seemes that this Anak enriched by the Spoiles which him selfe and his Father got, wore a chaine of gold, and fogot this name: and leauing the custome to his posteritie, left also the name: so that in Latine the name of Anakim may not amisse be expounded by Torquati.

The Citie Hebron was one of the ancientest Cities of Canaan, built seven yeeres before TJoan or Tanis in Egypt: and it was the head and chiefe Citie of the Anakim, whom Caleb expelled: to whom it was in part giuen, to wit, the Villages adioyning, and thereto the Leuites. It had a Bishop in the Christian times, and a magnificent Temple built by Helen the Mother of Constantine.

Not farre hence they finde Eleutheropolis or the free Citie, remembered often by St. Hierome. Then Eglon whole King Dahir associated with the other foure Kings of the Amorites, to wit, of Hierusalem, Hebron, Iarmuth, and Lachis, besieging the Gubenites, were by Iofua utterly ouerthrowne. From hence the next Citie of fame was Emsus, afterward Neopolis, one of the Cities of Government or Presidencies of Iudas. In sight of this Citie Iudas Machabaeus (after he had formerly beaten both Apollonius and Seron) gaue a third ouerthrow to Gorgias Lieutenant to Antiochus.

In the yeare 1301. it was ouer-turned by an earth-quake, saith Eusebius. In the Christian times it had a Bishops seate of the Diocesse of Casaria of Palestine.

From Emsus toward the West Sea there are the Cities of Nabatae, Bethdegan, and Gader or Gedera, or Gederothaima, of which and of Gederoth * Iof. 15. v. 36. & 41. 30. Then Azecha, to which Iofua followed the slaughter of the five Kings before named, a Citie of great strength in the Valley of * Terebith or Turpintine, as the Vulgar readeth 1. Sam. 17. 2. whence (as it seemes) they feat it neere vnto Soco, and vnto Laba of the Leuites. It reuolted from the subiection of the Iewes while Toram the sonne of Iofaphat ruled in Hierusalem: And next vnto this standeth Maceda, which Iofua utterly dispeopled.

On the other side of Emsus towards the East standeth Bethsur, otherwife Bethfura, and Bethsur: one of the strongest and most sought for places in all Iuda. It is seated on a high Hill; and therefore called Bethsur (the house on the Rocke, or of strength.) It was fortified by Reboam, and afterward by Iudas Machabaeus. Lyfias fortit it, and Antiochus 40. Eupator by famine: Ionathas regained it: and it was by Simon exceedingly fortified against the Syrian Kings.

Bethleem is the next vnto it within fixe miles of Hierusalem, otherwife Lechem: sometime Ephrata; which name, they say, it had of Caleb wife, when as it is so called by Moses before Caleb was famous in those parts Gen. 38. 16. Of this Citie was Abesjan or Ibzam, Judge of Israel, after Iephthab, famous for the thirtie Sonnes and thirtie Daughters, begotten by him. Elimelis was also a Bethleemite, who with his wife Naomi sojourned in Moab during the famine of Iuda in the time of the Judges, with whom Ruth the daughter in law of Naomi returned to Bethleem: and married Boaz, of whom Obed, of whom Isai, of whom Dauid. It had also the honour to be the native Citie 50 of our Sauour Iesus Christ: and therefore shall the memorie thereof neuer end.

In Zabulon of Gallilee there was also a Citie of the same name: and therefore was this of our Sauour called Bethleem Iuda.

From Bethleem some foure or five mile standeth Thecna, the Citie of Amos the Prophet:

Prophet: and to this place adioyning is the Citie of Bethzaccaria, in the way between Bethfura and Hierusalem: on whose Hills adioyning the glorious gilt Chieles of Antiochus shined like lamps of fire in the cies of the Iewes. The Citie of * Bezek was also neere vnto Bethleem, which Adoni-bezek commanded; who had during his raigne tortured 70. Kings, by cutting off the ioynts of their Fingers and Toes: and made them gather bread vnder his Table: but at length the same end befell him selfe by the sonnes of Iuda, after they had taken him prisoner.

The rest of the Cities in this part (most of them of no great estimation) wee may passe by until we come to the magnificent Castile of Herodinum, which Herod erected on a Hill, mounting therunto with 200. Marble steps, exceeding beautifull and strong. And towards the Dead Sea, and adioyning to the Desert of Ieruel, between it and Tekoa, is that clitus floridus, where in the time of Iohaphat, the Iewes flood and lookt on the Moabites, Ammonites, and Edomites, massacring one another, when they had purposed to ioyne against Iuda: neere which place is the Valley of blessing, where the Iewes the fourth day after, solemnely came and blessed God for so strange deliuerance.

Now the Cities of Iuda which border the Dead Sea, are these: Achora beautified by Reboam: and Teshar which the Vulgar calleth * Segor: so called because Lorin his praiser for it vrge that it was but a little one: whence it was called Teshar, which signifieth a little one: when as the old name was Belah, as it is Gen. 14. 2. In the Romans times it had a Garrison, and was called (as they say) Pannier: in Hieromes time Bale-20. zma. Then Engaddi or Hen-gaddi, first Asaphonbamar: neere vnto which are the Gardens of Balsimum, the best that the world had called Opobalsimum: the most part of all which Trees Cleopatra Queene of Egypt sent for out of Iuda, and Herod who either feared or loued Antonie her husband, caused them to be rooted vp and presented vnto her: which shee replanted neere Helipolis in Egypt. This Citie was first taken by Chedorlaomer, and the Amorites thence expelled. It was one of the most remarkable Cities of Iudas: and one of the Presidencies thereof.

The rest of the Cities are many in the In-land, and among them Iezrael; nor that 30 which was the Citie of Naboth, of which already: but another of the same name, the Citie of Achinoam, the wife of Dauid, the mother of that Amnon, whom Asaph slew: also as some thinke the Citie of Amasa, Abshalom Lieutenant, and the commander of his Armie. But this seemeth to be an error grounded vpon the neecessite of the words, Israel and Iezrael: and because the 2. Sam. 17. 25. Amasas father is called a Israhelie, who first of the Chron. 2. 17. is called an Israhelie: indecde the Hebrew Orthographie sheweth that Amasas Father is not said to be of the Citie Iezrael, but an Israhelie in Religion, though otherwife an Israhelie.

In this Tribe there were many high Hills or Mountains, as those of Engaddi vpon the Dead Sea: and the Mountains of Iuda, which begin to rise by Emsus, and 40 end neere Taphna, and these part Iuda from Dan and Simon. Of others which stand single there is that of Hebron: at the foote whereof was that Oake of Mambre, where the three Angels appeared to Abraham, which St. Hierome calleth a Fir-tree; and saith, that it stood till the time of Constantine the younger. There is also that Mountain called Collis Achille, on the South side of Zippor: on the top whereof the great Herod, inclosing the old Cattle, erected by Ionathas Machabaeus, and called Masfada, garnished it with seven and twentie high and strong Towers: and therein left Armour and furniture for an hundred thousand men; being as it seemeth a place vncaccessible, and of incomparable strength.

In the Valley afterward called the Dead Sea, or the Lake Asphaltitis, this Countrey 50 had foure Cities, Adama, Sedom, Seboim, and Gomorra, destroyed with fire from Heaven for their vnnaturall finnes.

S. IIII.

THE TRIBE OF REUBEN
and his Borderers.

†. I.

The seats and bounds of Midian, Moab, and Ammon, part whereof the Reubenites wanne from SEHON
King of Hebron.

ON the other side of the Dead Sea, Reuben the eldest of Jacobs sonnes inhabited : of whose children there were numbered at Mount Sinai 46000. who dying with the rest in the Desarts, there remained to possess the Land promised 43700. bearing armes. But before wee speake of these or the rest that inhabited the East side of Jordan, something of their borderers : to wit, Midian, Moab, and Ammon, whose land in our writers are confusedly described, and not easily distinguished. And first we care to remember that out of Abrahams kindred came many mightie Families : as by Isaac and Jacob the Nation called Israel, and afterward Jewes : by Esau or Edom the Idumaeans : by Ismael the eldest sonne of Abraham, the Ismaelites : and by Rebekah his last wife the Midianites. And againe by Lot, Abrahams brothers sonne, those two valiant Nations of the Moabites, and Ammonites : all which being but strangers in the Land of Canaan (formerly posselt by the Canaanites, and by the Families of them descended) these issues and alliances of Abraham, all but Jacob, whose children were bred in Egypt, inhabited the frontier places adjoining.

Esaue and his sonnes held Idumaea, which bounded Canaan on the South. Ismael tooke from the South-east part of the Dead Sea ; stretching his possession over all Arabia Petraea, and a part of Arabia the Desart, as farre as the Riuer of Tigris, from Sur to Huileh.

Moab tooke the rest of the coast of the Dead Sea, leauing a part to Midian, and passing ouer Arnon, inhabited the plaines betwene Jordan and the Hills of Abarim or Arnon, as far North as Essebon, or Cheybon.

Ammon late downe on the North-east side of Arnon, and posselt the Tract from Rabbah afterward Philadelphia, both within the Mountaines of Gilhead, and without them as far forth as Arroer, though in Moses time he had nothing left him in all that Valley : for the Amorites had thrust him ouer the Riuer of Iaboe, as they had done Moab ouer Arnon. As these Nations compassed sundrie parts of Canaan, so the border betwene the Riuer of Iaboe and Damascus was held by the Amorites themselves, with other mixt Nations : all which Territorie on the East side of Jordan, and on the East side of the Dead Sea, was granted by Moses to the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and halfe Manasse ; whereof that part which Moab had, was first posselt by the Emims : a Nation of Giants weakned and broken by Chedorlahomer, after expelled by the Moabites, as before remembred. That which the Ammonites held, was the Territorie and ancient possession of the Zamzummims or Zurais, who were also beaten at the same time by Chedorlahomer, Amraphel, and the rest : and by them an easie way of conquest was prepared for the Ammonites.

Now where it is written that Arnon was the border of Moab, the same is to be understood according to the time when Moses wrote. For then had Sehon or his Ancestor beaten the Moabites out of the plain Countries, betwene Abarim and Jordan, and driven them thence from Hebron ouer Arnon, and this happened not long before before Moses arrivall vpon that border, when Vabeb gouerned the Moabites. For he that ruled Moab when Moses past Arnon, was not the sonne of Vabeb, but his name was Balac the sonne of Zipper. And it may be that those Kings were elective, as the Edumaeans anciently were.

Now all that part of Moab betwene Arnon and Jordan, as farre North as Essebon was inhabited by Reuben. And when Israel arrivied there out of Egypt, it was in the possession of Sehon, of the race of Canaan by Amoreus : and therefore did Israhel the Judge of Israel iustly defend the regaining of those Countries against the claime of the Ammonites : because (as hee alleaged) Moses found them in the possession of the Amorites, and not in the hands of Moab or Ammon : who (saith Ioshua 11.) Israhel had three hundred yeeres time to recover them, and did not : whence he inferreth that they ought not to claime them now.

And lest any should maruaile why the Ammonites in Israhels time should make claime to these Countries : whereas Moses in the place Numb. 21. verse 26. rather accounts them to haue bene the ancient possession of the Moabites then of the Ammonites : it is to be noted that Deut. 3. 11. when it is said that the yron bed of Og was to be seene at Rabbath, the chiefe Citie of the Ammonites, it is also signified, that much of the Land of Og, which the Israelites possessed, was by him or his Ancestors got from the Ammonites, as much of Sehons was from the Moabites.

And as the Canaanite Nations were scated so confusedly together that it was hard to distinguish them : so also were the sonnes of Moab and Ammon, Midian, Amalek, and Ismael. Yet the reason seemeth plaine enough why Ammon commanded in chiefe, in Israhels time ; for sometime the one Nation, sometime the other of all those borderers acquired the Soueraigntie : and againe that one part of the Land which Gad held, namely within the Mountaines of Gilhead, or Gilhead, and as farre South as Arroer belonged to the Ammonites. And therefore taking advantage of the time, they then sought to recover it againe. Yet at such times Moses overthrew Sehon at Iabaz, the Ammonites had lost to the Amorites, all that part of their possession which lay about Arroer, and betwene it and Iaboe : Sehon and Og two Kings of the Amorites hauing displanted both Moab and Ammon of all within the Mountaines. For it is written in the one and twentieth of Numb. v. 24. that Israel conquered the Land of Sehon from Arnon vnto Iaboe, euen vnto the children of Ammon, so as at this time the Riuer of Iaboe was the South bound of Ammon, within the Mountaines, when as anciently they had also possessions ouer Iaboe which atlength the Gadites posselt, as in the thirteenth chapter of Isaia verse 25. it appears.

†. II.

Of the memorable places of the Reubenites.

THE chiefe Cities belonging to Reuben were these, Kedemoth, for which the Vulgar, without any shew of warrant, readeth Iethion. The Vulgar or Hierome followed the Septuagint those two verses 36. and 37. and 21. Isa. being wanting in the old Hebrew Copies, and the Septuagint read Kedson for Kedmoth, which Kedson by writing slip into Iethion.

This Citie which they gaue to the Leuites, imparts her name to the Desart adjoining : from whence Moses sent his Embassage to Sehon. In the same place of Isaia where this Kedemoth is mentioned, the Vulgar for Besser & villa ciuis, reads Bozor in Solitudin Adisor, without any ground from the Hebrew : whence Adrichemius makes a Towne called Adisor, in the border betwene Reuben and Gad. Farther from Kedemoth nere the Dead Sea (for the Countrie betwene being Mountainous hath fewe Cities) they place two Townes of note, Lafa or Lefab of which Genes. 10. verse 19. the Greekes call it Callirhoe : nere which

Isa. 13. vers. 25. Iosua notes that the one halfe of the Land of Hammon which in this place of Isaia is said to haue bene giuen to the Gadites, was taken from the Ammonites by Sehar : but the place Deut. 31. ysaith that Israhel had gotten Lands out of the hands of the Ammonites.

Isa. 21. vs.

Deut. 3. 6. It was a marginal note out of the 3. Deut. where the 70. kept the word Adisor, signifying a plaine which after crept into the Text.

The Soldans of Egypt, for the exceeding strength thereof, kept therein all their treasures of Egypt and Arabia: of which it is the first and strongest Citie: the same perhaps which Plinie and Strabo call Nabathæa, whence also the Province adjoining tooke name: which name seemes to haue been taken at first from Naboth the sonne of Abraham by Kezura. For Nabathæa is no where vnderstood for all Arabia Petrea, (at least where it is not misvnderstood) but it is that Province which neighboureth Iudea. For Pharan inhabited by Ismael, whose people Ptolomie calleth Pharanites, in stead of Ismaelites, and all those Territories of the Cusites, Madianites, Amalekites, Ismaelites, Edomites, or Idumeans; the Lands of Moab, Ammon, Hus, Sim, and of Og King of Basan, were parts of Arabia Petrea: though it be also true, that some part of Arabia the 10
Desert belonged to the Amalekites, and Ismaelites: all which Nations the Scriptures in the first of Chronicles the fifth calleth Hagarims of Hagar.

This Citie Petra, Scavrus besieged with the Roman Armie, and finding the place in shew impregnable, he was content by the perualion of Antipater, to take a composition of monie, and to quit it, Yet Amasis king of Iuda (after he had slaughtered 10000. of the Arabians in the valley called Salinarum) wanne also this Citie. S. Hierome finds Ruth the Moabit to be naturall of this Citie. In the time when the Christians held the Kingdome of Iherusalem, it had a Latine Bishop, hauing before beene vnder the Greeke Church. It is seated not far from Hor where Aaron died, and on the other side towards the North is the riuer of Zared or Zered, by which Moses incamped in the 38. Station. 20
Adrichome describeth the waters of Memrim, or rather Nemrim, in his Map of Reuen, not far hence, and betweene Zared and Arnon: and so be doth the Valley of Sane: but the waters of Nimra or Beth-Nimra (for which it seemes Adrichomius writ Nemrim) refresh the plaines of Moab: and the confluence of those waters of Nimra are in the Tribe of Gad. Sane also cannot be found in this place, that is, to the South of Arnon, and vnder Midian. For after Abraham returned from the pursuit of the Affryan and Persian Princes, the King of Sodom met him in the Valley of Sane, or Shaneh, which is the Kings Dale, where Abraham set vp his Monument, as it seems, not farre from Iherusalem. And at the same time Melchizedek King of Salem also incountered him. But Abraham coming from the North, and Melchizedek inhabiting, either neere Bethan 30 otherwise Soythopolis in the halfe Tribe of Manasse, or in Iherusalem (both places lying to the West of Jordan) could not incounter each other in Arabia: and therefore Sane which was also called the Kings Dale, could not be in these parts.

T. IIII.

Of the Dead Sea.

NOW because the Sea of Sodom or the Dead Sea, called also the Lake of Aphlatitis, and the salt Sea (in distinction from the Sea of Tiberias which was fresh 40 water) also the Sea of the Wildernesse, or rather the Sea * of the plaines, is oftentimes mentioned in the Scriptures, and in this storie also, therefore I thinke it not impertinent, to speake somewhat thereof. For it is like vnto the Calpian Sea, which hath no out-let or disburthening. The length of this Lake Iosephus makes 180. furlongs (which make two and twentie miles and a halfe of ours) and about 150. in breadth which make eighteene of our miles and somewhat more. Plinie makes it a great deale lesse. But those that haue of late yeres scene this Sea, did account it (with a Weyssenburg) eight Dutch miles (which is two and thirtie of ours) in length: and two and a halfe of theirs (which is ten of ours) in breadth. Of this Lake or Sea Tacitus maketh this report: Lacus est immensis ambitu, specie maris, sapore corruptior, granitate odoris accolis pestifer: neque vento impellitur, neque pisces aut fauces aquis volucrium patitur, incertum vnde superest, ut solida ferantur peritis imperitijs, mandis perinde ac-

* So Lacius reads for the Hebrew Hara-both euery-where, and so also the edition of Vatablus, Deuter 3. 17. though Deuter 4. 44. hath more salutudinis in alio 1. Regum 25. the reason of this name seemes to be, because it loynes to the plaines of Moab which are called Harbath Moab Deut 34. 1. as also wee haue Cephath in Harbath, that is in the plaines, to wit, of Zabulon, 1. Mach 9. 2. whence Adrichomius imagines a City in Zabulon called Araba, a Desert, terr. Sandia.

tolluntur,

tolluntur, &c. That it is very great, and (as it were) a Sea of a corrupt taste: of smell infectious, and pestilent to the borderers. It is neither moved nor raised by the winde: nor induceth fish to live in it, or fowles to swimme in it. Those things that are cast into it, and the vnkitchfull of swimming, as well as the skiffull, are borne up by this water. At one time of the yere it calleth vp Bitumen: the Art of gathering which, Experience (the finder of other things) hath also taught. It is vsed in the trimming of ships, and the like buildings.

And then of the Land, hee speaketh in this sort: The fields not farre from this 10
Lake, which were sometime fruitful and adorned with great Cities were burnt 10 with lightning: of which the ruines remaine, the ground looking with a sad face as 10 hauing lost her fruitfulness: for whatsoever doth either grow or is set thereon, be it 10 fruits or flowers, when they come to ripenesse, haue nothing within them, but 10 moulder into ashes: Thus saith Tacitus. And it is found by experience, that those 10 Pomegranates and other Apples or Oranges, which doe still grow on the bankses of 10 this cursed Lake, do looke faire and are of good colour on the out-side, but being cut 10 haue nothing but dust within. Of the Bitumen which this Lake casteth vp, it was 10 by the Greekes called asphaltitis. Vespassian desirous to be satisfied of these reports, 10 went of purpose to see this Lake, and caused certaine Captiues to be cast into it, who 10 were not onely vnkillfull in swimming, but had their handes also bound behind 10 them, and notwithstanding they were carried on the face of the waters, and could 10 not sink.

T. V.

Of the Kings of Moab, much of whose Countrie within Arnon Reuben possesse.

OF the Kings of Moab, whose Countrie (within Arnon) Reuben possesse (though 30 not taken from Moab but from Sehon the Amorite) few are knowne. Ianinus in the 21. of Numbers verse 14. nameth Yabeb, which seemeth to bee the Ancestor or 30 Predecessor of Balaam, the sonne of Zippor: which Balaam sent for Balaam to curse Israel. For fearing to contend with Moses by armes by the examples of Sehon and Og, hee hoped by the helpe of Balaams curlings or incantments, to take from them all 30 strength and courage, and to cast on them some pestilent diseases. And though Balaam at the first moved by the Spirit of God, blest Israel contrarie to the hope and desire of Moab: yet being desirous in some sort to laesifie him, and to doe him seruice, he aduised Moab to send Maadianish Women among the Israelites: hoping by them, 30 as by instruments of mischief, to draw them to the Idolatrie of the Heathen: but in the end hee receiued the reward of his falling from God, and of his euil counsaile, and was slaine among the rest of the Princes of Midian.

After these times the Kings of the Moabites are not named: sauing that wee finde in the first of Chron the fourth, that Iokim, and the men of Chozabab, and Iasub, and Sareph, all being of the issue of Iuda, sometime had the Dominion in Moab: but as it is written in the same Verse, These also are ancient things: to wit, as some expound it, the particulars of these mens Governments are no where extant or remaining: or as others, hacprius fure, these Families of Iuda were once thus famous: but now their posteritie chuse rather to abide in Babylon, and bee Clay-workers to the King there.

Then wee finde Eglon King of Moab, who with the helpe of Ammon, and Amalec, 10 mastered Israel and commanded them eightene yeres: which Eglon, Ehud slew in his owne house, and afterward 10000. of his Nation. What name the King of Moab had vnto whom Dauid fled fearing Saul, it doth not appeare: or whether it 10 were the same against whom Saul made Warre, it is not manifest, for neither are na- 10 med.

Iunius refers the name of the Citie Rephan, 1. Maacab. 37. of this question it were hard to resolve. But touching Iulius (according to Iosephus sometimes Bataramphla) the same Iosephus placeth in the Region of Perea, beyond Jordan, which Regio Perea, as the Greeke word significeth, is no more then Regio vltior, the Countie beyond the River; and therefore they which labour to set downe the bounds of this Perea, take more paines than needes. Fourteene Villages this Iulias had belonging vnto it, according to Iosephus. He makes it to haue been built by Herod Antipas, and named Iulias, in honour of the adoption of Livia, Augustus his Wife, into the Iulian familie: by which adoption she was called Iulia. Another Iulias, hee saith, was built by Philip the brother of Herod, in the lower Galanitis, which, hee saith, is the same as 10 Bethaida.

Vpon the Sea of Galilee neere to Iulias in Perea, (that is, in the Region ouer Jordan) they finde Petesobra, as it is called in Iosephus, for Beth-esob, which is as much as domus hisopii. Of a noble woman of this Citie, which for safegard in the time of Warre with the Romans, came with many others into Hierusalem, and was there besieged, Iosephus in the place noted, reports a lamentable History; how for hunger they ate her owne child, with other Tragical accidents hereupon ensuing.

Of Succoth (which we said Ios. 13. is placed with Beth-baran, in the Valley of the Kingdome of Sehon) it is plaine by the Story of Gedeon that it is neere vnto Jordan: where it is said, that as hee was past Jordan with his three hundred, weariest in the pursuit of Zebib and Salmunsh, hee requelled reliefe of the men of Succoth: who denying him, and that with contempt, in Gedeons returne were by him tortured, as it seemes vnder a thesling. Carre of Tribulum, betwene which and their flesh he put Thornes to teare their flesh as they were prest and trod vnder the Tribulum, and after which fort also Dauid vied some of the Ammonites, though not with Thornes, but with yron teeth of the Tribulum. As for the name of Succoth, which significeth such Tabernacles as were made in halte, either for Men or Cattel, Moses, Gen. 33. 17. witnesseth that the originall of the name was from such harbours, which Iacob in his returne from Mesopotamia built in that place: as also the place beyond the Red Sea, where the children of Israel, as they came from Rameses in Egypt, had their first Station, was vpon like reason called Succoth: because there they set vp their first Tabernacles or Tents: which they vsed after for fortie yeeres in the Wilderness. In remembrance where of, the Feast of Succoth, or Tabernacles was instituted.

Other foure Cities of Gad are named, Ios. 21. 38. Ramoth in Gilead, Machanaim, Cheshbon, and Iabzer, all of them by the Gadites giuen to the Leuites, of which Iabzer, as Cheshbon or Heshbon was a chiefe Citie of Sehon, whence Num. 32. 1. his Countie is called the Land of Iabzer. It was taken by Moses, hauing first sent spies to view it. In the first of the Chronicles it is made part of Gilead. In later times (as it may be gathered by the prophetic of Esaie, touching Isaiah) it was possessed by the Moabites: to which place of Esaie also Jeremie in a like prophetic alludes. It was at length re-gained (but as it is from the Ammonites) by Isaiah Maachabaeus: as it is, 1. Maac. 8. where Iunius out of Iosephus reads Iabzer, though the Greeke hath Gazer. For Gazer or Gezer (as hee gathereth out of Iosua 16. 3. & 8. and Ind. 1. 29.) was farre from these Counties of Sehon, seated in the West border of Ephraim, not possessed by the Israelites, vntill Salomons time, for whom the King of Egypt wan it from the Canaanites, and gaue it him as a Dowrie with his Daughter.

Of Cheshbon it may be marvelled that in the place of Iosua, and 1. Chron. 6. 81. it should be said to haue been giuen to the Leuites by the Gadites, seeing Iosua 13. v. 17. it is reckoned for a principall Citie of the Reubenites: Adrichomius and such as little trouble themselves with such scruples, finding Caishon, 1. Maac. 5. 36. among the Cities of Gilead, taken by Isaiah Maachabaeus, makes two Cities of one: as if this Caishon had been the Cheshbon of Gad: and that of Reuben distinct from it: but the better reconciliation is, that it being a bordering Citie, betwene Gad and Reuben, was common to both, and that the Gadites gaue their part to the Leuites: for so also it seemeth that that in like reason Dibon is said in one place built by the Gadites, and in another giuen to Reuben, as before is noted. Of Machanaim, which word significeth a double Armie, we read Gen. 32. 2. that it was therefore so called, because the Angels of God in that place met Isaac in manner of another Hoste or company, to ioyne with his for his defence: as also Luke 2. 13. we read of a multitude of the Hoste of Heaven, which appeared to the sheep-herds, at the time of our Saviours birth: and so vnto the Godly King Ofwald of Northumberland, when hee was soone after to ioyne battaile with the Pagan Penda of middle-England, Beda reports, that the like comfort appeared: whence the field where the battaile was fought in the North-parts of 10 England, is called Heuuen-field. In this Citie of Machanaim Dauid abode during the rebellion of Abshalom: and the same for the strength thereof Abner chose for the seat of Abshalom, during the warre betwene Dauid and the house of Saul.

Of the fourth Towne which was Ramoth in Gilead, we read often in the Scripture, for the recovering of which King Achab lost his life. Iunius thinks that Ramoth-Mitpha, of which Iosua 13. 26. was this Ramoth in Gilead. Concerning the place where Laban and Jacob (ware one to the other, as it was called Gilead, which is as much as a witnessing heape, because of the heape of stones which Laban and his sonnes left for a monument; so also that it was called Mitphab, which significeth ouer-looking (because there they called God to ouer-see and be witness to their covenant) it is plaine by the place, Gen. 31. 49. that in these parts there was not only a Towne, but likewise a Region called Mitpha, it appears, Ios. 11. 3. where we read of the Chinuties vnder Herman, in the Countie of Mitpha, * the Towne of Mitpha, as it seems both by this place, and in the eighth verse following, being not in the Hill Countie, but in the valley. But seeing that Iephtha the Iudge of Israel, who after hee came home from Tob, (whither his brethren had driven him) dwelt in this Towne of Mitpha, who doubtlesse was of the Tribe of Manasse, and thence at first expelled by his brethren, it may seeme that they doe not well which place this Towne of Mitpha rather in Gad, than in Manasse. By Isaiah Maachabaeus this Towne of Mitpha (whether in Gad or in Manasse) was vtterly spoiled and burnt, and all the males of it 30 slaine: for it was then possesed of the Ammonites.

Betweene Succoth (of which we haue spoken) and the River Iaboc was that Peniel or Penuel, which name significeth Locum faciei Dei; A place where the face of God was seene: so called for memorie of the Angels appearing to Jacob, and wrestling with him there: the churillthnesse of which Citie, in refusing to relieue Gideon, was the cause that in his returne hee ouerthrew their Tower, and slew the chiefe Aldermen thereof. To these places of the Gadites, they adde Regelim, the Citie of that great and faithfull subiect Barsilai, as it seemes, not farre from Mahanaims, where he sustained King Dauid, during Abshaloms rebellion. To these they adde the Townes of Gadai, Arnon, and Alimus, of which Gadai, being in Hebrew no more then Gaddita, is 40 ignorantly made a name of a place. Arnon also no where appears to bee the name of a Towne, but fill of a River. Alimus Adrichomius frames of Isaiah, 1. Maac. 5. 26. so that the name should rather be Alema, but Iunius out of Iosephus reads Malle, for this in Alimus: and vnderstanding Malle to bee part for Millo, and to be as much as Munilio, (as we haue shewed touching the Millo of the Sichemites) hee takes this Malle, to be Mitpha Moabitum, of which 1. Sam. 22. 3. As for that Mogel which Adrichomius findes in this Tribe of Gad, it is that Mahacath, which Moses noteth to be as farre as the furthest of Manasse, out of the bounds of this Tribe. So also Dathema, of which 1. Maac. 5. 10. (which Iunius takes to bee a Rithma, of which Num. 33. 18. a place of strength in the Territory of the Ammonites) and in like maner Minnith, and 50 Abel zinnaim, though by some they be attributed to the Gadites, or to their borders, yet they are found farther off. For of the two last we read in Iephtha s pursuit of the Ammonites: seated as it seemes by that place of the booke of Iudges, the former of them in the South border, and the other in the East border, both farre removed from the Gadites. But the chiefe Citie of the Ammonites was neerer, and not farre from from the borders of Gad. It is called in the Scriptures sometime Rabbath, as Deut. 3. 11. but more often Rabba. It is supposed to be that * Philadelphia which Ptolemy findes in Celestria, Hierome and Calistus in Arabia. It was conquered by Og from the Ammonites: but as it seemes neuer possit by the Israelites, after the ouerthrow of Og, but left to the Ammonites: whereupon at length it became the Regall seate of the Ammonites, but of old it was the possession of the Zamzammims: which is as much to say, as men for all manner of craft and wickednesse intamous. The same were also called Raphaim, of whom was Og, which recovered much of that which the Ammonites had got from his Ancestors: who hauing been first beaten by the Affrysians, and their affilants (as the Emims in Moab, and the Horims in Seir had 10 becene) were afterward the easier conquered by the Ammonites, as the Emims were by Moab, and the Horims by the Idumeans. Yet did the races of Emoreu, of whom these Giants were descended, contend with the Conquerours for their ancient inheritance: and as Sehon of Heshon had dispossest Moab, so had Og of Basan the Ammonites, and betweene them recovered the best part of all the Valley, betweene the Mountaines and Jordan. For this Og was also master of Rabba or Philadelphia: And in the possession of the one or the other of these two, Moses and Israel found all those Cities and Countreys which were given to Reuben, Gad, and the halfe Tribe of Manasse. So that though it were 450. yeeres since that these Zamzammims or Raphaim were expelled, yet they did not forget their ancient inheritance: but hauing these two Kings of one kindred, and both valiant and vnder-taking men, to wit, Og and Sehon, both Amorites, they recovered againe much of their lost possessions, and thrust the sonnes of Lot over the mountaines, and into the Desarts. And as the Kings or Captaines of Peris and Affrysia, (remembered in the 14. of Genesis) made way for Ammon, Moab, and Edom, so by that great conquest which Moses had ouer those two Amorites, Og and Sehon, did the Moabites and Ammonites take opportunity to looke backe againe into those plaines, and when the Reubenites, Gadites, and Manassites forlooke the worship of the liuing God, and became slothfull and licentious, they taking the aduantage invaded them, and callt them out of their possessions: and were sometime their masters, sometime their tributaries, as they pleased 30 or displeased God: and according to the wisdom and vertue of their Commanders.

In this Citie of Rabba, was the yron bed of Og found, nine cubites of length, and foure of breadth. The Citie was taken in *Dauid*s time, and the inhabitants slaine with great cruerty, and by diuers torments. At the first assault thereof Fris was shot to death, hauing been by direction from Dauid appointed to be employed in the leading of an assault, where he could not escape: wherein also many of the best of the Armie perished: and wherein Dauid so displeased God, as his affaires had ill successe afterward, euen to his dying day. From hence had Dauid the waigritic and rich crowne of gold, which the Kings of Ammon ware: or which as some expound it, was vled to be set on the head of their Idoll, waighing a talent, which is 60. pound waight after the common talent. In the time of Christians it had a Metropolitan Bishop, and vnder him twelue others.

The Mountaines which are described within this Tribe, and that of Manasse, with a part of Reuben, are those which Ptolemy calleth the hills of Hippus, a Citie of Celestria: and Strabo * Trachones: the same which continue from nere Damascus vnto the Desarts of Moab: and receiue diuers names, as commonly mountaines do, which neighbour and bound diuers Countries: For from the South part, as farre Northwards as Aleroth, the chiefe Citie of Og, they are called Galaad or Gilead, from thence Northward they are knowne by the name of Hermom, for so Moses calleth them: 50 The Sidonians name them Shirion, but the Amorites Shenir, others Seir: of which name all those Hills also were called, which part Iudea and Idumea: and lastly, they are called Libanus, for so the Prophet Hieremie makes them all one, calling the high mountaines of Galaad, the head of Libanus. These mountaines are vere fruitful, and full full of good pastures, and haue many trees which yeeld Balsamm, and many other medicinable drugs. The Riuer of this Tribe are the waters of Nimrah, and Dibon, and the Riner Taboc: Others doe also fancie another Riuer, which rising out of the Rockes of Armon, falleth into Jordan.

Hier. 8. & in

§. VI.

Of the Ammonites, part of whose Territories the Gadites swanne from Og the King of Basan.

10 His Tribe of Gad posselt halfe the Countrie of the Ammonites, who together with the Moabites, held that part of Arabia Petraea called Nabat, as well within as without the mountaines of Gilead: though at this time when the Gadites waite, it was in the possession of Sehon and Og, Amorites: and therefore Moses did not expell the Ammonites, but the Amorites, who had thrust the illues of Leu over the mountaines Trachones or Gilead, as before. After the death of Othaniel the first Iudge of Israel, the Ammonites ioyned with the Moabites against the Hebrewes, and so continued long. Iephtha Iudge of Israel had a great conquest ouer one of the Kings of Ammon, but his name is omitted. In the time of Sammel they were at peace with them againe.

10 Afterward we find that cruell King of the Ammonites, called Nabhus: who besieging Iabes Gilead, gaue them no other conditions but the pulling out of their right eyes. The reason why he tendred so hard a composition, was (besides this desire to bring shame vpon Israel) because those Gileadites vsing to carrie a Target on their left armes, which could not but shadow their left eyes, should by losing their right, be verterly disabled to defend themselves: but Saul came to their rescue, and deliuered them from that danger. This Nabhus, as it may seeme, became the confederate of Dauid, hauing friended him in *Saul*s time, though Iesephus thinks that this Nabhus was slaine in the battaile, when Saul raised the siege of Iabes, who affirmeth that 30 there were three Kings of the Moabites of that name.

Hanan succeeded Nabhus: to whom when Dauid sent to congratulate his establishment, and to confirme the former friendship which he had with his Father, he most contemptuously and proudly cut off the Ambassadors garments to the knees, and shaued the halfe of their beards. But afterward notwithstanding the aydes receiued from the Aramites subiect to Adadexer, and from the Reguli of Rehob, and Maacah, and from Isab, yet all those Arabians, together with the Ammonites, were ouerturned: their chiefe Citie of Rabba, after Philadelphia, was taken, the Crowne which weighed a talent of gold was set on *Dauid*s head, all such as were prisoners, Dauid executed with strange seueritie; for with Sawes and Harrowes hee care them in pieces, 40 and cast the rest into Lime-kills.

Iosaphat governing Iuda, they assisted the Moabites their neighbours against him, and perished together. Osias made them Tributaries, and they were againe by Iotham inforced to continue that Tribute, and to increase it, to wit, a hundredth talents of silver, ten thousand measures of wheat, and ten thousand of barley: which the Ammonites continued two yeeres.

The silt King of the Ammonites, of whose name we read was Baalis, the confederate of Zedechie: after whose taking by Nabuchodonosor, Balis sent Ismael of the bloud of the Kings of Iuda, to slay Gedaliah, who serued Nabuchodonosor.

Vpon the East side of the same Lake of Tiberius liands Corezaim, or Corazim, of which Christ in Matthæw 23. we be unto thee Corazim.

But the principall Cite of all these in ancient time was Asteroth: sometime peopled with the Giantes & Raphaim: and therefore the Countrie adioyning called the Land of Giantes, of whose race was Org, King of Basam. In Genesis this Cite is called Asteroth of Carnaim, whence 1. Maac, 5. 26 it is called simply Carnaim, as Ios 13. 21. it is called to Asteroth without the addition of Carnaim. The word Carnaim signifieth a paire of Hornes, which agree well with the name of their Idoll Asteroth, which was the I- mage of a sheepe, as it is elsewhere noted, that Asteroth in Deut. signifieth sheepe. O- thers from the ambiguity of the Hebrew take Carnaim, to haue bene the name of the people which inhabited this Cite: and expound it heroes * radiantes. For of old the Raphais which inhabited this Cite (Gen. 14. 5.) were Giant-like men, as appears by comparing the words Deut. 3. 11. Og rex refiduo gigantum, with the words Ios 13. 12. Og rex reliquus Raphasorum: but if the Carnaim (or Karnaim) were these Raphai, the word would not haue bene in the duall number: neither would Moses in the place of Genesis haue said the Raphai in Asteroth of the Carnaim, but either the Raphai 20 in Asteroth of the Raphai, or some other way fittest for perspicuie: for this naming of both thus in the same clause, distinguisheth one from the other.

Not farre from Asteroth Adrichomus out of Brochard and Breidenbachius placeth Cedar, in the way out of Syria into Galilee, foure miles from Corazim. This Cite (saith hee) is remembered in the Canticles, and in the booke of Iudith, and there are that of this Cite vnderstand Dauid in his 120. Psalme: and heere the Sepulchre of Iob is yet to be seene, saith Breidenbach.

Now concerning the Texts which hee citeth, it is so that the Greeke hath Galaad in stead of the word Cedar, which the Vulgar doth vse in that place of Iudith, and ioyn- neeth Carmel and Galilee. The Canticles and the 120. Psalme doe rather proue that Cedar was not heereabout, than any way helpe Adrichomius. For that they speake of Semite Cedar, it is apparent, and asseident by the place in the Canticles that they were decolores, much more than any vnder the Climates of the land of Canaan: whence Iunius out of Lampridius and Plinie placeth them in Arabia Petrea, farre from these parts. Touching the Sepulchre of Iob, it is certain that the Arabians and Saraceni (holding those places) saue many things to abuse the Christians, and to get mo- ney. Further, it may well be affirmed that many (if not all) the historical circum- stances of Iob are so obscure, that we should rather by finding his Countrie seek to get some knowledge of him, than by any presumptions founded vpon him, inferre what his Countrie was, and build vnto him a Cite by coniecture.

Of Iob himselfe whether he were the same Iobab remembered in the 36. of Gene- sis, descended from Esaú, and King also of Idumæa, though Rupertus, Lyranius, Olester, and Bellarmino are of another opinion, yet S. Ambrósio, Augustine, Chrysostome, and Gregorie, with Athanasius, Hypollitus, Iraneus, Eusebius Emisenus, Apollinaris, Euse- bius & other, cited by S. Etherom in his 126. Epist. to Eugarius, take him for the same.

The Land of Hus or Hus wherein Iob dwelt is from the Greeke Os, which the Septuagint vse for the word Hus, translated by the Vulgar sometime Hus, as Iob 1. v. 1. sometime Ausitis, as Etherom 5. 20. This Land is placed by Iunius between Palastina and Calefrya, besides Chamatha (or Hamath) vnder Palmyrene in the Countrie cal- led by Ptolomie Trachonitis or Bathansa, the bounds of which Countries are confound- ed with Basam in this halfe Tribe of Manasses. And that this Land of Hus was thus so- leated, it may in part be gathered out of the place of Ieremie the 25. 20. where he reckons the Hittites among the promiscuous borderers of the Israelites, whom hee therefore calleth promiscuous or miscellaneous turbam, because their bounds were not not onely ioyned but confounded, and their Seignories mingled one with the other, but of this place the wordes of Ieremie, Lamentations 4. 21. Speaking of the same prophete, of which hee speaketh in the five and twentieth Chapter, must needs be expounded: as Iunius reads them, distinguishing the Land of Hus from Edom: O filia Edom, i. quæ habitas in terra Hutz; O Daughter of Edom, O thou which dwellest in the Land of Hus. Now because the Vulgar doth not so distinguish, but readeth Filia Edom quæ habitas in terra Hus; Daughter of Edom which dwellest in the Land of Hus: Hence, as it seemes, some of the learned haue thought that Iob was an Edomite, as we haue said, and King of Edom, which if they vnderstand by it Idumæa or Edom, so called in Mo- ses time, they are greatly millaken, making this Land of Hus to be in Edumæa. For it is very probable that Esaú when hee first parted from Isaac, did not leaue himselfe in Edom, or Seir, which lieth on the South border of Iudæa, but inhabited Seir farre to the East of Jordan, and held a part of those Mountaines otherwise called Galaad, and Hermom, which by corruption the Sidamians call Skirion, and the Amorites Shemir for Seir, and from this his habitation did Esaú encounter Isaac when he returned out of Mesopotamia, who passed by the very border of Esaú his abiding. It is true that at such time as Moses wandered in the Deserts, that the posteritie of Esaú inhabited Seir to the South of Iudæa: for it is like that the Amorites who had beaten both Ammon and Moab, did also driue the Edomites out of those parts, who thence forward leaied themselves to the South of Iudæa, bordering the Desart Paran, and stretched their habitations ouer the Desarts as farre as Hor where Aram died.

Now for this Hus which gaue the name to a part of the Land of Trachonitis, whe- ther it were Hus the sonne of Aram, as Iunius thinks in his note vpon Gen. 10. 23. or rather Hus the sonne of Nachor, Abraham's brother, the question is doubtfull. For my part I rather incline to thinke, that it was Hus the sonne of Nachor: partly be- cause these Families of Aram seeme long before to haue bene lost: and partly be- cause in Iob 4. 2. 2. Elihu the fourth of Iob's friends, which seemes to be of Iob's owne Countrie, is called a Buzite, of Buz, the brother of Hus, the sonne of Nachor: as also Ieremie 2. 5. in the same continuation (though some other Nations named between) 30 where Hus is spoken of, there Buz is also named: Neither doth it hinder our conie- cture, that in the place of Iob 32. Elihu the Buzite is said to bee of the Familie of Ram: (which Iunius expounds to bee as much as of the Familie of Aram) for that by this Aram we are not to vnderstand Aram the sonne of Sem, Iunius himselfe maketh it plaine, both in his annotation vpon the beginning of his booke, where he saith that one of Iob's friends (which must needs be this Elihu) was of the posteritie of Nachor (as also in this place he confesseth so much expressely) and in as much as hee readeth note familiâ Aram, or Ram, but 2 familiâ Syra; like as elsewhere Laban who sprung of Nachor is called a Syrian.

As for the other three of Iob's friends (of whom by this note of Elihu his being of the Syrian Familie, or of the Familie of Nachor) it is implied that they were of other kindreds; as also by the Septuagint's addition, that this Elihu was of the Land of Hus, or Ausitis, it is implied that they thought onely Elihu to haue bene of Iob's owne Countrie.

Franciscus Brochard the Monke, in his description of the holy Land in the journey from Acon Eastward, findeth Suetha, and Theman on the East of the Sea of Galilee: both very neere to the Land of Hus: whereof the one may seeme to haue denomi- nated Bildad the Shuchit; the other Eliphaz the Themanite: two of the three friends of Iob, of the which Iob 2. 11. But Iunius thinks that the Shuchits were inhabitants of Arabia the Desart, descended of Shuach the sonne of Abraham and Keeturah of whom 50 Gen. 52. 2. perhaps, saith he, the same whom Plinie calls Saccar. So also he thinketh the Themanites of whom Eliphaz was, to haue bene of Arabia the Desart: and Eliphaz himselfe to haue bene of the posteritie of Theman the sonne of Eliphaz, which was the sonne of Esaú. And so also Nabamah whence Tophar the third of Iob's friends (which in this place of Iob c. 2. v. 11. are mentioned) is by the same learned expolitor thought either to be named of Thimnath by transposition of letters (which Thimnath Gen. 36. 40. is named among the sonnes of Esaui that gaue denomination to the places where they were seated) or elscto bee the same Nahamah, which Ios. 15. 41. is reckoned for a Citie of Juda in the border, as he thinkes, of Edom. And yet I denie not but that neere to the Land of Hus, in Basán, as it seemes, in the Tribe of Manasses, there is a Region which at least in latter times was called Suitis, or of some like name. For this is euident by the Historie of Willicimus Tyrius, which reports of a Fort in this Region of Suita or Suites (as hee calls it diuersly) of exceeding great strength and vñe for the retaininge of the whole Countrie: which, in the time of Baldwin the second King of Hierusalem, was with great digging through rocks recovered by the Christians: hauing not long before been lost to the great disadvantage of the Countrie, while it was in the hands of the Saracens. The situation of this Fort is by Tyrius described to be sixteene miles from the Citie Tiberias, on the East of Jordan: by Adrichomius foure miles Northward from the place where Jordan enters the Lake Tiberias at Corazin.

Other Cities of this part of Manasses named in the Scripture are these: Golan, Beheshtera, Mitpa of Gilead, and Kenath, which after the comming of the Israelites was called Nabach. Of Nabach or Kenath, and Mitpa of Gilead, we haue spoken by occasion among the Cities of Gad: The two other were giuen to the Leuites, and Golan made one of the Cities of refuge: from which Golan wee haue both Gaulanitis superior and inferior, oft in Iosephus. Beheshtera is accounted the chiefe Citie of Basán by some, but the writers corrupting the name into Bozra, it is confounded with Betser or Bozra of Reuben, and with Bozra of Edom. Argob is oft named for a Region in this Tract, and hence Hierameath Arga, a name of a Citie placed by some about the waters of Merom (as they are called by Iosua) which make the Lake Samachonitis, as Iosephus calls it. This Lake being as it were in the midst betwene Cesaria Philippi and Tiberias, through which as through the Lake of Tiberias, Jordan runneth, boundeth part of this halfe Tribe on the West. When the snow of Libanus melteth, it is very large, saith Brocard: otherwise more contract, leauing the marish ground on both sides, for Lyons and other wild beasts, which harbour in the shrubs that plentifully grow there.

Adioyning to this Lake in this Countrie of Manasses, Iosephus names two places of strength fortified by himselfe in the beginning of the Iewes rebellion: Selenia the one, and Sogana the other. In the North side of this halfe Tribe of Manasse, and in the North-east, the Scripture nameth diuers bordering places toward Damascus, as Tsedad, Chauran, and Chatsar-Henan, lying in a line drawne from the West; of which three Cities we reade Ezek. 47. 15. with which also agrees the place Namb. 34. 8. where for Chauran, betwene Tsedad, and Chatsar-Henan, Ziphran is named. From this Chauran is the name of Auranitis regio, in Iosephus and Tyrius, whose bounds (as also the bounds of Gessur and Mabaath or Macati, which were likewise borderers to Manasses toward the North-east) are vnknowne: only that Gessur was of might, it appears in that Dauid married Mabaca the Daughter of Tholmay King of Gessur: by whom he had the most beautiful, but wicked, and vnfortunate Abisalon.

CHAP. XI.

The Historie of the Syrians the chiefe borderers of the Israelites that dwell on the East of Jordan.

§. I.

Of the Citie of Damascus and the diuers fortunes thereof.

DAMASCUS of all other in this border, and of that part of the world, was the most famous, excelling in beauty, antiquitie, and riches, and was therefore called the Citie of ioy or gladnes, and the House of pleasure; and is not onely remembered in many places of Scripture, but by the best Historians and Cosmographers. The Hebrewes, saith Iosephus, thinke it to haue been built by the sonne of Adam: of which opinion S. Hierome vpon Esa seemeth to be: though in his Hebrew questions hee affirmeth that it was founded by Damascus, the sonne of Eliezer Abrahams Steward, a thing very vnlikelie, seeing the citie was formerly knowne by that name, as appeares by Abrahams calling this his Steward Eliezer of Damascus. Dauid was the first that subiected it to the Kingdome of Juda, after the ouerthrow of Adad their King, but in Solomons time, Rezon recovered it againe, though he had no title at all or right to that principallie: but Dauid hauing ouerthrowne Hadad their king of Sephena, (otherwise Siba or Zobab) Rezon or Rezon with the remainder of that broken armie, invaded Damascena, and posselt Damascus it selfe, and became an enemy to Solomon all his life.

The next King of Damascus was Adad the Edomite, who flying into Egypt from Dauid, and Isab, when they slew all the males in Edom, was there entertained, and married Taphnes the King of *Egypt*s wiues sister: of whom Taphnes in Egypt was so called. This Adad returning againe, became an enemy to Solomon all his life, and (as some writers affirme) invaded Damascus, and thrust Rezon thence out. In the life of Adad that Kingdome continued nine descents (as hereafter may be shewed in the catalogue of those Kings of Syria) to whom the Assyrians & then the Grecians succeeded. This citie was exceeding strong, compassed with waters from the riuers of Abanath, and Parpar: whereof one of them prophane writers call Chrysorrhoas the golden riuer. Iunius takes it for Adonis. The countrey adioyning is very fruitful of excellent wines and wheats, and all manner of excellent fruits. It had in it a very strong Castle, built as it seemes by the Florentines, after it became Christian: the lillies being found cut in many marbles in that Citadell. Against this Citie the Prophets Amos, Esa, Hieremy and Zacharias, prophesied that it should be taken, burnt, demolished, and made a heape of stones. In the time of the last Rezon and tenth King of the Damascens, Toglatphalassar inuited by Achaz King of Juda, carried away the naturals of Damascus into the East: leauing of his owne nation to inhabit it. After that it was utterly ruined by the Babylonians, saith Hieremy vpon Esa: which thing was performed by Salmanassar, according to Iunius in his note vpon that place, siue yeeres after the prophecie. In time it was restored by the Macedonians, and the Ptolomies; but long after when Syria fell into the bandes of the Romans, it was taken by Metellus and Lollius. In the time of the Christians it had an Archbishop: S. Elic some liuing, as hee affirmeth vpon the Alles, it was the Metropolis of the Saracens:

being taken by Hammar their King from the Remanes, in the yeere of our redemption 636. And in the yeere 1147. Conrad the third, Emperour of Rome, Lewes King of France, Baldvine the third King of Hierusalem, Henry Duke of Aufres, brother to Conrad, Frédéric Barbarossa afterward Emperour, Theodorick Earle of Flanders, and other Princes assembled at Prionois Acon, on the sea coast, determined to recover Damascus: but being betrayed by the Syrians, they failed of the enterprize.

In the yeere 1262. Halon the Tartar incompass it, and having formerly taken the King, brought him vnder the walls, and threatened extreme torture vnto him, except the Citizens rendred the place: but they refusing it, the King was torne asunder before them, and in fine the Citie taken, Agab the sonne of Halon was by his father made King thereof.

In the yeere 1400. Tamberlaine Emperour of the Parthians, invaded that region, and besieged the citie with an armie of 1200000. (if the number be not mistaken) He entred it and put all to the sword, filling the ditch with his prisoners, those that retired into the Castle which seemed a place impregnable, hee ouertopped with another Castle adioyning: he forbore the demolishing of the citie in respect of the beautie of the Church, garnished with 40. gates or sumptuous porches. It had within it 9000. lanternes of gold & silver: but while hee invaded Egypt, they againe surprized Damascus. Lastly in his returne after three moneths siege hee forsook it: the Mahometans prostrating themselves with their priests, desired mercie: But Tamberlaine commanding them to enter the Church, he burnt them, and it, to the number of 30000. and did so demolish it, as those that came afterwards to see their houses, knew them not by the foundations. And as a Trophey of his victorie he raised three towers with great Arte, builded with the heads of those whom hee had slaughtered. After this it was restored and repossessed by the Seldane of Egypt, with a garison of Mamaluques: And in the yeere 1517. Selimus Emperour of the Turkes wreke it out of the hands of the Egyptians: in whose possession it now remaineth inhabited with Mahometans, and Christians, of all neighbouring nations.

§. II.

Of the first Kings of Damascus, and of the growing up of their power:

Now be it that Damascus were founded by Hus the sonne of Aram, or by Damascus the sonne of Eliezer Abrabams steward, we finde no relation of their Kings, or Common wealth till Dauid's time. For it stood without the boundes of Canaan: and therefore neglected by Moses, Iosua, and the Judges, as impertinent to that Storie: But were it so that it had some reguli, or pettie Kings ouer it, as all the Cities of those parts had, yet none of them became famous for ought that is left to writing, till such time as Dauid ouerthrew Adadazer prince of Sophena or Syria Zoba: the same Nation which Plinie calleth Nubai, inhabiting betwene Batanea and Euphrates. Now the better to vnderstand the historie of those Syrian Princes, whom soone after the Kings of Damascus made their vassals, the reader may informe himselfe, That on the North-east parts of the holy land there were three chiefe principalities whereof the Kings or Commanders greatly vexed or disturbed the State or Common wealth of Israel, namely Damascus or Aram, Sophena or Syria Zoba, and Chamath, or Chamath-Zoba, of which these were the Princes in Dauid's and Salomons times: Rezon or Rezon of Damascus, Adadazer of Syria Zoba, and Tobu of Chamath. But it seemeth that Damascus was one of the cities subiect to Adadazer when Dauid invaded him, though when Saul made warre against Zoba, Damascus was not named. And as Iosephus affirmeth, So the leader of those luccours, which were leuiued and sent to Hadad-Elzer from Damascus, had the name of Adad: who was in that battaile slaine with 22000. Aramites of Damascus: whereof, as of the ouerthrow of Adadazer, Rezon, the Comander of his his armie, taking aduantage, made himselfe King of Damascus: Adadazer and Adad of Damascus being both slaine. About the same time Tobu King of Chamath or Isuraa, hearing that his neighbour and enemy Adadazer was utterly ouertrowne, sendeth for peace to Dauid, and presenteth him with rich gifts, but in dole saith S. Hierome, it was craftily done of him. Now to the North of the Holy Land, and to the West of Damascus, the Tyrians and Zidonians inhabited: but they for the most part were in league and peace with the Indeans and Israelites. But to returne to the Kings of Syria, I mean of Syria, as it is taken in the Scriptures, containing Damascus, Soba or Zoba, and Chamath or Isuraa, to which I may adde Geshur, because it is so accounted in the 2. of Sam. 5. as ioyning in the Territorie to Damascus (for Syria at large is farre greater, of which Palestina it selfe is but a Prouince, as I have said in the beginning of this Tract.) It is not agreed among the Historians of former times, nor of our later writers, who was the first of those Adads of Syria Zoba, and Damascus.

Some account Rezon, other Adad of Idumea: of whome it is written in the first of Kings, that Dauid hauing invaded that Region, and leitt Isab therein to destroy all the male childreen thereof: Adad of the Kings feed, fled into Egypt; and was there married to Taphnes the Queenes sister, as before, who hearing of Dauid's death, and of the death of his Captaine Isab (whom indeed all the bordering Nations feared) he returned againe, and as Bunting thinketh, this Adad did expell Rezon out of Damascus; and was the first of the Syrian Kings. To mee it seemeth otherwise. For I take it, Adadazer the sonne of Reboby, whom Saul invaded, was the founder of that Principallitie: and the first of Adads, who forsaking his Fathers name, as hee grew powerfull, tooke vpon him the stile of Adad, the great God of the Assyrians, saith Marobius, which signified onenesse or Frinitie. I also finde a Citie called Adad in the same part of Syria: of which, whether these Princes tooke the name, or gaue it, I am ignorant. For Adad-azer, Ben-adad, Eli-adad were the same in name, with the difference of Ezer, Ben, and Eli, adioyned. And that Adadazer was of greatest power, it appeareth first, because it is against him, that Dauid vnderooke the warre: secondly, because he leuiued 22000. Aramites out of the Territorie of Damascus: as out of his proper Dominions: for had the Damasceni had a King apart, it is probable that the Scriptures would haue given vs his name: thirdly, because Syria Zoba, of the most of which Adadazer was King, was an exceeding large Territorie, and contained of Arabia the Desert as farre as to Euphrates, according to Plinie: and the greatest part of Arabia Petrea according to Niger. Whosoever was the first, whether Adadazer, or Adad of Idumea, Rezon was the second: who was an enemy to Israel all the dayes of Salomon. Besides the euill that Adad did, the euill that Hadad did, seemeth to be referred to Hadad of Idumea, lately returned out of Egypt: to wit, 23. yeeres after he was carried thither.

The third king of Damascus, and of Zobab both, was Hezion, to Hezion succeeded Tabriimon, or Tabriemon, to him Benhadad, as is proued in the first of Kings. For Afa King of Iuda the sonne of Abiam, the sonne of Roboam, the sonne of Salomon, being vexed and invaded by Basia, the succellor of Nadab, the sonne of Ieroboam, sent to Benhadad the sonne of Tabriimon the sonne of Hezion, King of Aram, that dwelt at Damascus, to invade Israel (while Basia fought to fortifie Rama against Afa): thereby to blocke him vp, that he should not enter into any of the Territories of Israel: who according to the desire of Afa, hauing receiued his presents, willingly invaded the Countrie of Nepthalim, and tooke diuers Cities, and spoiles thence: Afa in the meane while carrying away all the Materials, which Basia had brought to fortifie Rama withall, and conuerted them to his owne vfe.

This Benhadad Father Tabriemon was in league with Afa: and so was his Father So Hezion; for Afa requireth the continuance of that friendship from Benhadad, his sonne: though it seemeth that the gold and silver sent him out of the Temple, was the most forcible argument. And that this Tabriemon invaded Israel, before the enterprize of his sonne Benhadad, it is coniectured. For Benhadad when he was prisoner with Achab, spake as followeth. The Cities which my Father tooke from thy Father, I will restore:

I will

reflore: and thou shalt make freetes or keepers of the borders, for thee in Damascus: as my father did in Samaria. And herein there ariseth a great doubt (if the argument it selfe were of much importance) because Tabremmon was Father indeede to Benhadad which invaded Basba, at the request of Asa; But this Benhadad that twice entred vpon Achab, and was the second time taken prisoner, was rather the sonne of Benhadad, the first of that name, the confederate of Asa and Abiam, as before, than the sonne of Tabremmon. For betwene the inuasion of Benhadad the first, in Basba time, and the siege of Samaria, and the ouerthrow of Benhadad by Achab, there past 49. yeeres, as may be gathered out of the raignes of the Kings of Israel. So that if we allow 30. yeeres of age to Benhadad, when hee invaded Basba, and after that 49. 10 yeeres, ere he was taken by Achab, which make eighty lacking one; it is vnlikely that Benhadad at such an age would make warre. Besides all this, the first Benhadad came with no such pompe; but the second Benhadad vaueth, that hee was followed with 32. Kings: and therefore I resolue, that Benhadad the sonne of Tabremmon invaded Basba and Omri; and Benhadad the second invaded Achab, at whose hands this Benhadad receiued two notorious ouerthrowes: the first at Samaria, by a fall of 700. If radites: the second at Aphec, where, with the like number in effect the Israelites slaughtered 100000. of the Aramites; besides 27000. which were crushed by the fall of the wall of Aphec. And this Benhadad, Achab againe setteth at liberty: to whom hee rendreth those townes, that his father had taken from the Predecessour of Achab, 20 but being returned, he refuseth to render Ramoth Gilead, a frontier towne, and of great importance. Now three yeeres after (for so long the league lasted) Ramoth not being deliuered, Achab inuadeth Gilead, and assaileth the Citie, being assisted by Iosephat. The Aramites came to succour and fight: in which Achab is wounded, and dyeth that night. After this, Benhadad sendeth the commander of his forces called Ngaman, to Ioram the sonne of Achab to be healed of the leprosie, and though Elizeu had healed him, yet hee picketh quarrell against Ioram: and when Ioram by Elizeu his intelligence, had escaped his plot, he sent men, and Chariots to take the Prophet, as is before said. After Benhadad besiegeth Samaria againe, and being terrified thence from heaven, he departerh home, and sickneth, and sendeth Azazel with great gifts 30 to Elizeu, to know his estate, if he might line. Azazel returning, smoootherh him. Zonarus and Cedemius call this Benhadad Adar, and the sonne of Adar: Amos and Hieremie mention the towres of Benhadad. Iosephus writeth that Benhadad and his successeur Azazel were worshipped for Gods by the Syrians to his time, for the sumptuous Temples which they built in Damascus. The Syrians also boasted much of their antiquity, ignorant, faith hee, that scarce yet 1100. yeeres are complete since their warres with the Israelites.

Hazael or Asael, the first King of the race of the Adads of Damascus, was anointed by Elifha, or Elizeu, when he was sent by Benhadad to the Prophet, to know whether Benhadad should recouer his present sicknesse: Hee waged warre with Ioram; who receiued diuers wounds at the encounter at Ramoth in Gilead: from whence returning to be cured at Isephat, he and the King of Iuda, Ahaziah, or Ochozias, are slaine by Iehu, as before is said. After the death of Ioram, Azazel continued the warre against Iehu, and waiked Gilead, and all those portions of Gad, Reuben, and Manasse, ouer Iordan. Hee then inuaded Iuda, and tooke Geth, but by gifts from Iosab hee was auerted from attempting Ierusalem: for hee presented him all the hallowed things which Iehosaphat, Iehoram, and Ahaziah his fathers, Kings of Iuda had dedicated; and which hee himselfe had dedicated: and all the gold which was found in the treasures of the Lord, and in the Kings house. This was the second time that the Temple was spoyled to please the Adads of Damascus. For Asa did present Benhadad 50 with those treasures, when hee inuited him to warre vpon Basba King of Israel. And notwithstanding this composition betwene Iosab and Azazel, yet a part of his Armie spoyled the other Prouinces of Iudaea, and slaughtered many principall persons. Lastly, Azazel vexed Iosab the sonne of Iehu, and brought him to that extremitee, as he left him but fifty horsemen, tenne Chariots, and tenne thousand footemen of all his people.

§. III.

Of the later Kings, and decay and ouerthrow of their power.

FTER Hazael, Benhadad the second, or rather the third of that name, the sonne of Hazael, reigned in Damascus: who fought against Israel, with ill successe: for Iosab King of Israel, the sonne of the vnhappy Iosab, as he was foretold by Elifha the Prophet, beat Benhadad in three seuerall battels: and he lost all those Cities to Israel, which his Father Hazael had taken violently from Iosab.

After this Benhadad the sonne of Hazael, there succeeded three others of the same name, of whom the Stories are lost, only Nicholauus Damascus cited by Iosephus, makes mention of them: and in one of these Kings times it was that Ieroboam the second, the sonne of Iosab recovered Damascus it selfe, to Iudab saith the Genea, but better in IYNNVS, vñg. recuperabat Damascus, & Chamisham Ichuda pro Israele; that is, And how he recovered for Israel, Damascus and Chamath of Iudaea; for these Cities sometimes conquered by David, did of right belong to the Tribe of Iuda.

And it is likely that this conquest vpon the Adads was performed: the first of these three Adads then liuing, of whom there is no Story. For when as Iehosab the King of the ten Tribes had thrice ouercome the Syrians in the time of Benhadad the sonne of Hazael, and had recovered the Cities which Hazael had wonne from Israel, and so left his Kingdome to his sonne Ieroboam the second, it seemeth that this Ieroboam without delay, and having nothing else left for him to enterprize, instantly followed his fathers good fortune, and inuaded Damascus.

Razin, or Rezin, after Iosephus Reser, after Zonarus Raafon, the 10. Adad, maketh league with Pekah, or Phacis King of Israel, against Achaz King of Iuda; both carrie 30 away a great number of prisoners. After this they both besiege Achaz in Ierusalem: but in vaine. Then Adad alone inuadeth Elath, and beating out the Iewes, maketh it a Colonie of Syrians. Wherefore Achaz brought Tetzlapbalsar against Razin, who tooke him, and beheaded him, and wonne Damascus: with whom ended the line of the Adads and the Kingdome of Damascus: the Assyrians becoming masters both of that and Israel. These Adads as they reigned in order are thus reckoned.

1. Adadazer the sonne of Rehob.
2. Rezin the sonne of Eliadad, or Razin.
3. Hezion.
4. Tabremmon.

405. Benhadad, who inuaded Basba.

6. Benhadad the second, taken prisoner by Achab.

7. Hazael, whom Elifha foretold, with teares, of his aduancement; the same who ouerthrow Ioram King of Israel, at Ramoth Gilead. And that there was a second Hazael which preceded Benhadad the third, it is not improbable, because that Hazael which tooke Geth, and compounded the warre with Iosab, made the Expedition thirty yeeres, and perchance more, after the first Hazael which stifled his master Benhadad, and had slaine Ioram the sonne of Achab King of Israel. For Iosab began to reigne in the 7. yeere of Iehu King of Israel; and after hee had reigned 23. yeeres, the Temple was not yet repaired, after which (and how long wee know not) it is said that Hazael 50 tooke Geth, and turned his face towards Ierusalem. It is also some proofe that Hazael which tooke Geth, was not the same with Hazael that murdered Benhadad, because he could not at that time but be of good yeeres, being as it seemeth the second person in the kingdome, and Commander of Benhadads men of warre. To this Hazael, be he the first or second, succeeded

8. Ben-

8 Benhadad the third, whom Iosif King of Israel thrise ouerthrew.
9 Rezin or Rezin the last, who ioynd with Pekab King of Israel, against Iuda, at which time Achaz King of Iuda waged for his defence Teglatphalassar.

Now betwene Benhadad the third, and Rezin the last, Nicholaus Damascenus findes three other Kings of the Adadi, which make twelue in all.

For the rest of the Princes of Syria, which were but reguli, as those of Emath, and Gessur, we finde that Tolu was King of Emath or Chamath in Dauid's time, to whom he sent his sonne Ioram with presents, after Dauid's victory against Adadazer. Alfo Sennacherib speaketh of a King of Emath, but names him not.

§. IIII.

Of other lesser Kingdome: of the Syrians, which being brought under the Assyrians, neuer recovered themselves againe.

OF Gessur wee finde two Kings named; to wit, Talmai, and his Father Amminur. To Talmai, whose daughter Dauid married, it was that Abalen fled, who was his maternall grandfather. Of the Kings of Sophena or Syria, Soba or Calosyria, there are two named, Rehob or Rechoh, the Father of Adadazer, and Adadazer himselfe, and it is plaine that after his death the seat of the Kings of Soba was transferred to Damascus, a Citie better fitting their greatnesse. After Rezin became Lord of both Principalities. And the race of these Kings of Syria, (which became so potent, and ioynd Soba, Damascus, Emath, and the Desart of Arabia with other Prouinces into one, vnder Rezin the second of the Adadi) as it began with Dauid, so it ended at once with the Kingdome of Israel. For Achaz King of Iuda waged the Assyrian Teglatphalassar against Pekab King of Israel, and against Rezin the last King of Damascus: which Teglat first invaded Damascus, and the region of Soba, and tooke Damascus it selfe, and did put to death Rezin the last, carrying the inhabitants captiue. This was the second time that the Assyrians attempted Israel. For first, Phul Belochus entred the borders thereof (Menabem gouerning Israel) who stopt the enterprize of Phul with a thousand talents of siluer: for this Phul Belochus, whose pedigree wee will examine hereafter, being scarce warme as yet in his seat at Babylon, which hee, with the helpe of his companion Arbaces, had wrested from Sardanapalus: hauing besides this King of Syria in his way, who seemed to be a great and strong Prince, was content to take the composition of a thousand talents of the King of Israel for that present time. But his sonne Teglat following the purpose of his Father Belochus, and finding so excellent an occasion, as the warre begun betwene Israel and Iuda, Pekab commanding in the one, and Achaz in the other, his neighbour Rezin being also wrapt in that warre, and waited in strength thereby, did willingly accept the offer of Achaz King of Iuda, his imprest and entertainment. So first attempting Damascus, which lay in his path towards Israel, hee carried it (as is before remembred) and then with great ease posselt himselfe of the Cities of Nephthalim; leading with him a great part of the people captiue. And his sonne Salmanassar, whom Ptolemie calleth Nabonassar, after the reuolt of Hofea, forced Samaria: and rent that Kingdome asunder. So as the line and race of Ninus in Sardanapalus, whom Belochus supplanted; the race and Monarchie of the Syrian Adadi in Rezin: whom Teglat slaughtered; the Kingdome of Israel in Hofea, whom Salmanassar ouerturned; happened neere about a time: that of Ninus in the dayes of Belochus, and the other two in the dayes of Teglatphalassar, and Salmanassar his sonne. For Sardanapalus perished, Osia ruling Iuda; and the other two Kingdomes were dissolved, Achaz yet liuing.

Lastly, the Kingdome of Iuda it selfe, being attempted by Sennacherib, the sonne of Salmanassar in vaine, and preferred for the time by God miraculouly, was length length vterly ouerturned. Hierusalem and the Temple burnt 132. yeeres after the captiuitie of Israel, and Samaria: the destruction of Israel being in the ninth yeere of Hofea: that of Iuda in the eleuenth of Zedechia. Now the Emperours of Assyria and Babylon held also the Kingdome of Syria, from the eight yeere of Salmanassar, to the last of Balsassar, whom Herodotus calleth Labyntus: in all about 200. yeeres. After these the Persians from Cyrus to Darius their last King, held Syria about 200. yeeres.

Then Alexander Macedon tooke this among other Prouinces of the Persian Empire, and his successours the Seleucide reigned therein, till it became subiect vnto the power of the Romanes, from whom it was wrested long after by the Saracens, and remaineth now in possession of the Turke, as shall bee shewed in due place. Thus much of the nations bordering vpon the Israelites, with whom they had mozt to doe both in warre and peace, being the only people, whose History in those ancient times carried an assured face of truth.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Tribe of BENIAMIN, and of Hierusalem.

§. I.

Of diuers memorable places in the Tribe of Beniamin, whereof Hiericho, Gilgal, Mistpa, Bethel, Rama, Gobah and Gilba.

OF the Tribe of Beniamin, the twelfth and yongest sonne of Iacob, whom hee had by Rachel, there were mustred at Mount Sinai 35000. able bodies: all which perishing in the Desarts, there entred the holy Land of their Issues 45600. fit to beare Armes: and these had their Territory on this side Jordan, betwene Iuda and Ephraim: The Cities within this Tribe neerest Jordan, are Lod, Hadid, and Omo: of which Lod and Omo were built by Shemida Beniamite: they were all three reinhabited with Beniamites, after the returne out of Captiuitie, as is mentioned, Nehem.

11. 35. and Esd. 2. 35. where Adrichomius reading Lod, Hadid, Omo, makes besides Hadid in Nehemia, a Citie called Lodhadid: This Hadid or Chadid was rebuilt by Simon Macc. 12. 38. Machabees.

Samarim or Tsemarim, named of Tsemari, one of the sonnes of Canaan, was another of their Cities; and further into the Land standeth Tericho, one of the Toparchies, and the last of Iudas seated in a most fruitfull valley, adorned with many palme trees: and therefore elsewhere called the citie of Palmes. From the time of Iosv h. who vterly destroyed it, it lay waste vntill the time of Achab: in whose dayes Chiel of Bethel laid the new foundation of it, in the losse of Abiram his eldest sonne, and built the gates of it in the losse of his youngest sonne Segub: according to the curse of Iosv a. in which and other respects, Hof. 12. 14. calleth Iosv a. a Prophet. In after-times it was destroyed by Vespasian, and rebuilt by Adrian.

To the Southeast of Tericho stood Halmon of the Leuites, of which Iof. 21. 18. To the South Betharaba, of which Iof. 15. and c. 18. Then that Gilgal of which there is so so much mention in the Scripture, where Iofua first ate of the fruits of the land, circumcised all those borne in the Desarts, and celebrated the Passeover.

The reason of the name, or rather a memorable application of the Etymology of this name (for it seems by the place; Deut. 11. 30. that the name was known before the coming of the Israelites into Canaan) is noted Iof. 5. 9. Ob duo intonem prohi Egyptiaci, because their fore-skins (the people being there circumcised) were tumbled downe the Hill: which from thence was called Collis preputiorum. This Gilgal was also called Geliloth, as appears by comparing the places, Iof. 15. 7. and 18. 17. for it was in the borders of Jordan, of which Iof. 22. 13. and Geliloth signifieth borders. * It stood (though in some distance) directly Eastward, over against the two Hills Garizim and Hebal: vpon one of which the blessings, and on the other the curfings were to be read to the people, both being the mountaines of Ephraim. Further, for the situation of this Gilgal, it is to be noted, that both it, and Mitpa of Beniamin (of which also we read oft in the Scripture) were seated about the midle of the length of the land of Canaan: for which reason * Samuel chose these two places, to either of which hee came yearly to giue iudgement to the Israelites; of which two, Gilgal (as is said) was neerer Jordan on the East side of this Tribe; and Mitpa neerer the West Sea, towards the land of the Philistims.

The third place, which is named with these two, whither also Samuel vsed yearly to come, is * Bethel: which also was seated in this Tribe of Beniamin. But to returne to Gilgal: which was the first place, where the Arke resided, and whither Jordan (from whence it was carried to Silo, and thence to Kiriath-bearim, &c. at length to Hierusalem) here in Gilgal it was that Iofua pitched vp the twelve stones, which were taken out of the channell of Jordan, when it was drie, that the Israelites might passe over it: by which Story, as it is set downe Iof. 4. it appears, that the same day that they passed ouer Jordan, they lodged at Gilgal. At the same Gilgal, to omit many other memorable things, it was that Samuel hewed Agag the King of the Amalekites in pieces. And as for Mitpa, whither also Samuel came yearly to giue iudgement, there also were often the greatest meetings held: as that for the reuenge of the Leuites wife against Gibba, and the Beniamites, Iud. 20. 1. and another against the Philistims, 1. Sam. 7. 12. Thither also Iudas Maccabaeus gathered the Lewes, (when Hierusalem was possit by the Heathen) as it is 1. Macc. 3. 47. in which place this reason of their meeting is added; Quia locus Orationis fuerat Mitpa antea Israelit. Touching this Mitpa, to auoid confusion, it is to be remembered, that the Scriptures mentioned four places of this name: Mitpa of Iuda, of which Iof. 15. 38. * Mitpa of Gilead, of which we haue spoken already in the Tribe of Gad: Mitpa of the Moabites, where Dauid for a while held himselfe, commending his parents to the King of Moab, 1. Sam. 22. 3. and lastly, this chiefe Mitpa of the Beniamites. And as in this place the chiefe meetings were held both before Hierusalem was recovered from the Iebusites, and also in the time of the Maachabees (as we haue said) when Hierusalem was held by the wicked vnder Antiochus, so also in the time of Hieremie, after the destruction of the Temple by the Chaldees, Gedaliah whom Nabuchodonosor left in Ierury, as Governor ouer those that were left in the land, held his abiding in this place: vntill (to the great hurt of the Lewes) he was slaine by the treason of Ismael, one of the royall blood of Iuda, as it is Hierem. 41.

Neere vnto this Mitpa, the * Scripture mentioneth Beth-car, after called Aber-Hazer, that is, the Storie of hope: where Samuel pitched vp the pillar or Stone, for a Trophy against the Philistims.

Touching Bethel which (as it seems) was the third place where Samuel held his chiefe meetings for the ministring of Iustice, that it was anciently called Luz, and how it was taken by the issue of Ioseph (though it belonged to the portion of Beniamin, as it is 1. Chron. 11. 31. and Iof. 18. 22.) and how another Citie called Luz * neere adioyning to it, was built by the man of the Citie which shewed the entrance to the Spies, as it is Iud. 1. and of the occasion of the name from Jacobs vision: and how

Ierobom

Ierobom, by erecting one of his calves heere, of Bethel (which signifieth the house of God) made it * Beth-amen, that is, the house of Vanitie, Hos. 4. 15. and 10. 5. as also other memorable things of this place, they are so well known, out of the Histories of the Scripture, that we may well passe them ouer.

The territory of Bethel, which at the first belonged to the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes, from the time of the great victorie of Abia against Ierobom (of which 2. Chr. 13.) was taken from them, and adioyned to the Kingdome of Iuda: and so continued, as appears by the Storie of Iofhua: which performed the Prophecies against the altar of Bethel, 2. Reg. 23. whence those coales 1. Macc. 11. 34. are called Aphel rema, which Greeke word signifieth as much as, As thing taken away, to wit, from the tenne Tribes. It was one of the three Seignories or Prefectures which Demetrius in his Epistle mentioneth, as added by him to the Dition of the Lewes, out of the Samaritan Country. A part of it, as appears 2. Chron. 13. 19. was Ephraim, which Iof. 18. 23. is called Ephraim, belonging to this Tribe of Beniamin.

Not farre from this Bethel, in this Tribe, we finde three other Cities often mentioned in the Scriptures, Rama, Gibba, and Gelah. Of the name Rama, * it is noted already, in the description of Ephraim, that there were many townes so called, because of their high situation. But whereas they finde out Rama in the Tribe of Iuda (as it seems because Mat. 2. it appears that it bordered Bethlelem) and also out of Brochard and Brudenbach make Silo to haue bene called Rama, and finde yet another Rama in Zabulon; these three haue no warrant in the Scripture. Of Rama in the Tribe of Asser, as it seems, we haue testimony Iof. 19. 29. and of another in Nephthalim, Iof. 19. 36. of a third Rama, where Samuel dwelt in Mount Ephraim 1. Sam. 25. 11. which more often is called * Ramatha, and 1. Sam. 1. 1. Ramathaim Tophim: for which the Septuagint haue Aramathaim-tophim, taking the Article affixed in the beginning, for a part of the word, whence they thinke Ioseph of Aramathaim Mat. 2. 27. was denominated.

Of a fourth Rama we read 2. Reg. 8. 29. which is Ramath in Gilead. The first, which is most often mentioned, is Rama of Beniamin, seated as we said, neere Bethel the uttermost South-border of the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes: for which cause Basbas in the time of Afa King of Iuda, fortified it, to hinder those that did flic from him to Afa. Of this Rama or Ramatha I should rather thinke Ioseph was, that buried Cherif: because it was neerer to Hierusalem, and after the captiuitie belonged to Iudas, as it appears Esd. 2. 26. where in that it is ioyned with Gelah, it is plaine that he speakech of that Rama with whole stones (after Basbas had ceased to build it) Afa (as it is 1. Reg. 25. 22.) built Gelah adioyning to it: both being in Beniamin. And as Rama was the South-border of the tenne Tribes, so was Gelah the North-border of the Kingdome of Iuda: whence 2. Reg. 23. 8. we read that Iofab through all his Kingdome, euen from Gelah, which was the North-border, to Beer-sheba which was the South-border, destroyed the places of Idolatry.

The third Citie Gibba which was the Citie of Saul (the wickednesse of which Citie in the time of the Iudges had almost vtterly rooted out this Tribe) Adrichimius confounds with Gelah, making one of two (as they are evidently distinguishing 1. Chr. 10. 27. of which word * Gibba, in another forme Gibbath, he imagineth Gabaath another Citie in this Tribe, making two of one. The vicinitie of this citie also to Rama of Beniamin, appears Iud. 19. 13. where the Leuite with his wife notable to reach to Rama, tooke vp his lodging at Gibba. By that place of 1. Sa. 22. 6. it seems that there was in this Gibba some towne or Citie called Rama, where Iamius redress in exceles, for in Rama: but it may be that the name of the Kings place in this citie, was Rama: as it is some that in Rama of Samuel, the name of the chiefe place where Samuel with the Colledge of Prophets abode, was Naiath. The great Citie of Hai ouerthrowne by Iofab, which Iof. 7. 2. is placed neere Beth-amen vpon the East of Bethel, was in this Tribe, as is proued Nehe. 7. 10. 30. though it be not named by Iofab. 18. for it was burned by him and laid desolate, as it is Iof. 8. 28. In solitudine in tumultum perperamus; Another

* 1. Sam. 7. 12.
* Iamius in this place, for Bethel reads Dum Dei fortis, and interprets it Kiriath-bearim where the Arke abode. For (faith he) by the Law, Exod. 23. 17. the greatest meetings in their annual feasts were to be, where the Arke was, but this place doth not speake of (festi- uall, but of iudicial meetings) and be- sides the Priests did vsue to bring the Arke to their great meetings: whereto- ever they were, as appears 1. Sam. 12. 11. 16. 1. 14. 2. 8. nei- ther is it easie to expound Bethel otherwise then for the Citie Bethel: though Iamius also saie it for the place where the Arke was, 1. Sam. 10. 3.
* It is no o- ther than this Mitpa of Gilead, of which Iof. 21. 8. as ap- pears by that which is added Profusurion, for Iofua notes the three quar- ters North, West, and East, to which hee followed the Canaanites, though Adrichimius & others out of this place imagine a Mitpa or Mitpa (as they write it) in the Tribe of Asser.
* 1. Sam. 7. 12. Iof. 18. 21.

* Borrowing the name of a neighbour towne in the confines of the Kingdome of Iuda and Issachar betweene Hai and Bethel, Iof. 7. 2. and 18. 2. 1. Macc. 11. 34.
* Of this Rama I haue plac- ed the place 1. Macc. 11. 34. where it is na- med for one of the three Prefectures which Demetrius yeelds to the Lewes out of the Country of Samaria, this lying toward the East to Te- tidis: and Iud. 19. toward the West: and Aphrama of which euen now we speake) lying in the midle between the two other. A first Rama it seems there was in the Tribe of Simeon toward the South, which Iof. 19. 8. is cal- led Rama of the South, and otherwise Bathath-deer. * Gibba in con- struction, that is, Governering a gentile citie is Gibbath. Whence the Septuagint out of the Septuagint made Iof. 24. 33 Gibbath Ph- 10. which Iamius hath cal- led Phincafi (for this word is oftentimes an Ap- pellative signi- fying a Hill) but Adrichimius taking notice of this, builds his Citie Gabaath vpon this Text & placeth it in Beniamin, when as the words adioyn- ed, note that this Hill was in the Mount- ains of Ephraim.

* The word Nethinim or Nethinies, is as much as dut (as were a Dut dut) for as Inim expounds it dut, it is vied, 1. Chr. 9. 2. and in Esdra and Nehemiah often.

Citie of chiefe note reckoned Iof. 18. 25. in this Tribe was Gibhon, the chiefe Citie of the Heuites: whose cunning to bind the Israelites by oath to saue their liues, is set downe Iof. 9. whence they were reckoned among the * Nethinai or Profetites: and were bound to certaine publique seruices in the house of God: which oath of faining the Gibeonites broken in part after by Saul, was by God punished by a famine 2. Sam. 21. 1. This Gibon or Gibhon with Almon and Iebah (of both which we haue spoken) and with Hanoth the natall place of Hieremie the Prophet, were said Iof. 21. 18. to be given to the Leuites by the Beniamites. Neere to this Hanoth was Nob, as appears 1. Reg. 2. 26. where Eliab the Priest, which was of Nob before it was destroyed by Saul, is sent to his grounds at Hanoth: It is reckoned in the Tribe of the Beniamin, Nehem. 9. 31. and though in the time of Saul the residing place of the Arke was at Kirish-barim: yet by the lamentable tragedie of bloudshed, which Saul raised in this place (as it is set downe 1. Sam. 21. and 22.) in the iudgement of Iehoue, it is proued that the Tabernacle was there for a time.

Almon is also in this Tribe Nehem. 9. 31. was a place of fame, of which Esa. 10. 28. where also he nameth Galim, and Magrim in this Tribe. In Almon Saul had his Campe 1. Sam. 13. 2. (when he left Gibha to Ionathan) and there also was Ionathas Macchabeus his abode 1. Mac. 9. 73. Of Gisala in Galilee Iosephus makes often mention, but of any here in Beniamin, which they make the natall place of S. Paul, whence (they say) when it was taken by the Romans, hee failed with his parents to 12 Ioharfa, of this I finde no good warrant. Other places of lesse importance I omit, and come to the Citie of Hierusalem, and the Princes and Gouvernours of this Citie: A great part whereof was in the Tribe of Beniamin, whence Iof. 18. 28. it is named among the Cities of Beniamin.

§. II.

Of diuers memorable things concerning Hierusalem.

* See in the higher halfe of Almon.

At what time Hierusalem was built (which after ward became the Princesse of all Cities) it doth not appeare. Some there are who imagine that Melchisedec was the founder thereof in Abrahams time. But* according to others, that Citie out of which Melchisedec encountered Abraham (in his returne from the overthrow of the Affirian and Persean Kings or Captaines, when Lot was made prisoner) standeth by the riuer of Iordan, in the halfe Tribe of Manasse bordering Zabulon, which was also called Salem, and by the Greekes Solima.

2. Sam. 5. v. 6.

Hierusalem (whensoever or by whomsoever built) was a principall Citie in Iesus his time: yet not so renowned as Hazor or the Metropolis (in those dayes and before) of all the Canaanites. Adonisedeck (whom Iesus slew) was then King of Hierusalem. That it was belonging to the Iebusites it is manifest: for how long soever they held it before Moses time, they were Masters and Lords thereof almost 400. yeeres after him: euen till Dauid wanne it: and therefore in all likelihood, it was by the Iebusites him: euen till Dauid wanne it: and therefore in all likelihood, it was by the Iebusites him: (the children of Iebus was the sonne of Canaan) built; after whom it was called Iebus. And so much did that Nation relye on the strength of the place, as when Dauid attempted it, they bragged that their lame, and blinde, and impotent people should defend it.

9. aut. App. 12. Strab. geog. 16.

Dauid, after he had by Gods assistance possesed it, and turned out the Iebusites, gave it an exceeding great increase of circuit: strengthened it with a Citadell or Callee: and beautified it with many Palaces, and other buildings: changing the name from Iebusalem, the Citie of the Iebusites, to Hierusalem, which the Greekes call Hierosolima. After Dauid time Salomon amplified, beautified and strengthened it exceedingly. For besides the worke of the Temple, which was no lesse admirable than renowned among all Nations, the Palaces, gates, and walles, could not any where in the world see

bee exemplad: and besides that it had 150000. inhabitants, the women and children not accounted. The ditch had 60. fote of depth, cut out of the very rocke: and 250. fote of breadth: whereof the like hath seldom beene heard of, either since or before.

After the death of Salomon, and that the Kingdome of the Iewes was cut asunder, Shishac King of Egypt, and his predecessour, hauing bred vp for that purpose, Adad the Iamman, and Ieroboam, Salomons seruants; and both married to Egyptians: the State by the one disturbed, by the other broken: Sishac first invaded the Territorie of Iuda, entred Hierusalem, and lackt it, and became Master not onely of the riches of Salomon, but of all those spoiles which Dauid had gotten from Adadazer, Tobit, the Ammonites, and other Nations. It was againe lackt and a part of the wall throwne downe by Ioas King of Israell; while Amasias the twelfth King thereof gouerned Iuda.

Not long after Achaz the fiftenth King of Iuda impouerished the Temple, and presented Teglaphtassar with the treasures thereof. And Manasse the sonne of Ezekiah, the sonne of Achaz, by the vaunts made by Ezekiah, to the Embassadors of Achaz, lost the remaine, and the very bottom of their treasures. It was againe spoiled by the Babylonians, Iakim then reigning. But this vngratefull, Idolatrous, and rebellious Nation, taking no warning by these Gods gentle corrections and afflictions, but persisting in all kinde of impietie, filling the Citie euen to the mouth with innocent blood, God raised vp that great Babylonian King Nabuchodonosor, as his scourge and reuenger, who making this glorious Citie and Temple with all the Palaces therein, and the walles and towers which embraced them, euen and leuell with the dust, carried away the spoiles with the Princes and people, and crused them with the heauie yoke of bondage and seruitude full 70. yeeres, inasmuch as Sion was not onely become as a torne and plowed vp field, Hierusalem a heape of stone, and rubble, the mountaine of the Temple as a groue, or wood of thornes and briars, but (as Hierome speaketh) Euen the birds of the ayre scorned to flie ouer it, or the beasts to tread on that defiled soile.

Then 70. yeeres being expired, according to the Prophecie of Daniel, and the Iewes by the grace of Cyrus returned: the Temple was againe built, though with interruption and difficultie enough: and the Citie meanelie inhabited, without walls or other defences, for some 60. and odde yeeres, till Nehemiah by the fauour of Artaxerxes rebuilt them. Then againe was the Temple and Citie spoiled by Bagozes, or Vagozes, the Lieutenant of Artaxerxes: after by * Ptolomaeus the first; then by Antiochus Epiphanes: and againe by Apollonius his Lieutenant. By Pompey it was taken long after, but not destroyed, nor robbed, though Craffus in his Parthian expedition tooke as much as hee could of that which Pompey spare.

But the damages which it sustained by the violence of sacrilegious Tyrants, were commonly recompened by the industrie or bounty of good Princes, the voluntary contribution of the people, and the liberalitie of strangers. Before the captiuitie, the people of the land through the exhortation of godly Kings, made many and large offerings to repaire the Temple of Salomon. The wrong done by Ptolomaeus Lagt to the second Temple, was requited by the bounty of his sonne Ptolomaeus Philadelphus. The mischiefe wrought by Antiochus Epiphanes and his followers, was amended partly by the great Offerings which were sent to Hierusalem out of other Nations. Finally all the losses, which either the Citie or Temple had endured, might well seeme forgotten in the reigne of Herod that vsurping and wicked, but magnificent King, who amplified the Citie, new built the Temple, and with many sumptuous workes did so adorne them, that hee left them farre more stately and glorious than they had beene in the dayes of Salomon.

p. III.

Of the destruction of Ierusalem by the Romans.

IN this flourishing estate, it was at the coming of our Saviour Christ Iesus: and after his death and ascension, it so continued about 40. yeeres. But then did Titus the Roman, being stirred vp, by God, to be the reuenger of Christ his death; and to punish the Iewes sinfull ingratitude, incompasse it with the Roman armie, and became Lord thereof. Hee began the siege at such time as the Iewes, from all parts, were come vp to the celebration of the Passouer: so as the Citie was then filled with many hundreds of thousands of all sorts; and no manner of prouision or store for any such multitudes. An extreme famine, with the ciuill dissension, opprest them within the walles; a forcible enemie assailed them without. The Idumeans also, who lay in wait for the destruction of the Iewes Kingdome, thrust themselves into the Citie, of purpose to betray it: who also burnt the Temple, when Nabuchodonosor took it. And to be short, there perished of all sorts, from the first besieging to the consummation of the victorie, eleuen hundred thousand soules: and the Citie was so beaten downe, and demolished, as those which came afterward to see the desolation thereof, could hardly beleue that there had beene any such place or habitation. Onely the three Herodian towres (workes most magnificent, and ouertopping the rest) were spared: as well for lodgings for the Roman garrisons, as that thereby their victorie might be the more notorious and famous: for by those buildings of strength and State remaining, after ages might iudge what the rest were; and their honour be the greater and more shining that thereouer became victorious.

After this, such Iewes as were scattered here and there in Iudea, and other Prouinces, beganne againe to inhabit some part of the Citie; and by degrees to rebuild it, and strengthen it as they could, being then at peace, and tributaries to the Roman State: but after 65. yeeres, when they againe offered to revolt, and rebell, Adrianus the Emperour slaughtered many thousands of them, and ouerturned those three Herodian Towres, with all the rest, making it good which Christ himselfe had foretold; That there should not stand one stone vpon another, of that vngratefull Citie. Afterward, when his furie was appeased, and the Prophecie accomplished, he tooke one part without the wall, wherein stood Mount Caluarie, and the Sepulchre of Christ, and excluding of the rest the greatest portion, hee againe made it a Citie of great capacitie, and called it after his owne name, Alia Capitolia. In the gate toward Bethel, he caused a Sowe to be cut in marble, and set in the front thereof, which he did in despite of the Iewes Nation: making an Edict, that they should not from thenceforth euer enter into the Citie, neither should they dare so much as to behold it from any other high place ouertopping it.

But the Christian Religion flourishing in Palestina, it was inhabited at length, by all 40 Nations, and especially by Christians; and so it continued 500. yeeres.

It was afterward in the 636. yeere after Christ, taken by the Egyptian Saracens, who held it 400. and odd yeeres.

In the yeere 1099. it was regained by Godfrey of Bullion, by assault, with exceeding slaughter of the Saracens, which Godfrey, when hee was elected King thereof, refused to be crowned with a Crowne of gold, because Christ, for whom hee fought, was therein crowned with thornes. After this recovery, it remained vnder the successours of Godfrey 88. yeeres: till in the yeere 1197. it was regained by Saladin of Egypt: and lastly, in the yeere 1517. in the time of Selim, the Turke cast out the Egyptians, who now hold it, and call it Cuzumbarce, or the Holy Citie. Neither was it Ierusalem alone that hath so oftentimes beene beaten downe and made desolate, but all the great Cities of the world haue with their inhabitants, in severall times and ages, suffered the same shipwracke. And it hath bene Gods iust will, to the end others might take warning, if they would, not onely to punish the

impie of men, by famine, by the sword, by fire, and by slaughter; but hee hath reuenged himselfe of the very places they possesse: of the walls and buildings, yea of the loyle and the beasts that fedde thereon.

For, euen that land, sometime called holy, hath in effect, lost all her fertilitie, and fruitlesse; witnesse the many hundreds of thousands which it fedde in the dayes of the Kings of Iuda and Israel; it being at this time all ouer, in effect, exceeding stony and barraine. It also pleased God, not onely to consume with fire from heauen the Cities of the Sodomites; but the very soile it selfe hath felt, and doth feele the hand of God to this day. God would not spare the beast that belonged to Amalek, no not any small number of them to be sacrificed to himselfe, neither was it enough that Achan himselfe was stoned, but that his moueables were also consumed and brought to ashes.

p. IIII.

Of the vaine and malicious reports of Heathen writers, touching the ancient Iewes.

IF the original of the Iewes, prophane writers haue conceived diuersly and inuiously. Quintilian speaks intamously of them; and of their leader; who (saith he) gathered together a pernicious Nation. Diodore and Strabo make them Egyptians. Others affirme that while Moses gouerned Egypt, the people were so increased, as Ierosolymus, and Iudaea ledde thence a great multitude of that Nation, with whom they planted the neighbour Regions; which might be meant by Moses and Aaron: for the name of Moses was accidentall, because hee was taken vp and saued out of the waters. But Iulius, of all other most malicious, doth deriue the Iewes from the Syrian Kings; of whom, Damasus, saith hee, was the first: and to him succceeded Abraham, Moses, and Israel. He againe supposeth (somewhat contrary to himselfe) that Israel had tenne sonnes, among whom hee diuided the land of Iuda; so called of Iudas his eldest, who had the greatest portion. The yongest of the sonnes of Israel hee calleth Ioseph: who being brought vp in Egypt, became learned in magical Arts, and in the interpretations of Dreames, and signes prodigious, and this Ioseph (saith hee) was father to Moses: who with the rest, by reason of their foule diseases, and lest they should infect others, were banished Egypt. Further, hee telleth how these men thus banished, when in the Deserts they suffered extreme thirst and famine, and therein found reliefe the seuenth day, for this cause euer after obserued the seuenth day, and kept it Holy; making it a Law among themselves, which afterward became a branch of their Religion. Hee addeth also that they might not marrie out of their owne Tribes, lest discouering their vnchastitie, they might also be expelled by other Nations, as they were by the Egyptians. These and like fables hath Iulius.

Cornelius Tacitus doth as grossly belie them, in affirming, That in the inmost Oratorie of their Temple, they had the golden head of an Asse, which they adored. But herein Tacitus forgetteth himselfe, hauing in the first booke of his owne Historie truly confessed of the Iewes, that they worshipped one onely God: and thought it most prophane to represent the Deitie by any materiall figure, by the shape of a man, or any other creature; and they had therefore in their Temples, no Image or representation, no not so much as in any Citie by them inhabited. Somewhat like 30 to this hath Alexander Polyhistor, in Stephanus; who also makes Iudas with Idumaea, the first parents of the Iewes.

Claudius Iolius drawes them from Iudaea, whose parents were Spartan and Thebis; whence it came that the Spartans or Lacedaemonians challenged kindred of the Iephonians in Iudaea: but they did it as descended of Abraham, saith Iosephus. Some of these reports

ports seeme to haue been gathered out of diuine letters; though wrestled and peruerted, according to the custome of the Heathen. For so haue they obscured and altered the Storie of the Creation, of Paradise, of the Flood; and giuen new names to the children of Adam in the first age: to Noah and his sonnes, in the second: and so to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, Moses, and the rest of the fathers, and leaders of the He- brewes: all which fainings, as touching the Jewes and their originals, Iosephus against Appion, and Tertulian haue sufficiently answered. For that the Hebrewes were the Children of Arphaxad and Heber, no man doubteth: and so Chaldeans originally, taking name either of Heber, the sonne of Sale, or else (saith Montanus) of wandering, as is before remembred. And therefore doth Stephanus, the Greeke Grammarian, to deriue the Hebrewes or Jewes, from Abraham; hauing mistaken the name of Abra- ham, who was the sonne of Heber, in the sixth descent. Their ancient names were first changed by the two grand-children of Abram: for after Jacob, otherwise Isra- el, the chiefe part were called Israel, another part after Esau or Edom, Edomites; at length the remnant of Jacob, being most of the Tribe of Juda, honoured the name of Judas, the sonne of Jacob, and became Judeans or Jewes: as also for a time in the name of Ephraim the sonne of Ioseph, the chiefe of the Patriarches of the ten Tribes; the rest of the tenne Tribes were comprehended: but were first rooted out when the Kingdome of Israel fell. The Judeans continued their names, though they suffered the same seruitude not long after, vnder Nabuchodonosor.

The gouernement which this Nation vnder-went, was first paternall: which continued till they serued the Egyptians. They were secondly ruled by their Captaines and leaders, Moses and Iosua, by a policie Diuine. Thirdly, they subiected themselves to Iudges. Fourthly, they desired a King, and had Saul for the first: Of whom and his successours, before wee intreate, wee are first to speake of their Gouernment vnder Iudges, after the death of Iosua:
 with somewhat of the things of Fame in other Nations about these times.

Of the memorable things that happened in the world, from the death of IOSVA to the Warre of Troy:
which was about the time of

I E P H I A.

§. I.

Of the inter-regnum after IOSVA's death: and of OTHONIEL.

HEN Iosua was now dead, who with the advice of the 70. Elders, and the high Priest, held authoritie ouer the people, and ordered that Common-weale: It pleased God to direct the Tribe of Iuda (in whom the Kingdome was afterward established) to undertake the Warre against the Canaanites, ouer whom (with Gods fauour, and the assistance of Simeon) they became victorious.

In the first attempt which they made, they not only slew ten thousand, but made Adoni-bezek prisoner: the greatest and cruellest Commander, both of the Canaanites and Perizzites.

This tyrants crueltie as else where hath been signified, they returned in the same kinde vpon his owne head: and so by the torments which hee now felt in his owne person (before no otherwise knowne vnto him but by his malicious imagination) made him confesse and acknowledge Gods iust iudgement against himselfe.

The tribes of Iuda and Simeon did also master and possesse during this interregnum (or as some thinke, before the death of Iosua) the Cities of Azotus, Ashdod, Ekron and Hierusalem, which they burnt, and the Jebusites afterward reedified.
They tooke also the Cities of Hebron, Debir, or Kiriatsepher, and Zephath, afterwards Horma. And although it bee not set downe in expresse words that any one person commanded in chiefe ouer the people, as Moses and Iosua did: yet it seemeth that Caleb was of greatest authoritie among them: and that hee with the aduice of Phinees directed and ordered their warres. For if any thinke that they proceeded without a chiefe, the good successe which followed their undertakings witnesseth the contrarie. And it was Caleb euen while Iosua gouerned, as appeares Ios. 10. 39. that propounded the attempt of Debir, to the rest of the Captaines: for the performance of which enterprise, he promised his Daughter Achisb: which hee performed to Othoniel his younger brother after the conquest: whose behaviour in that service was such, as (next vnto the ordinance of God) it gaue him the greatest reputation among them, and may be esteemed the second cause of his preferment and election for their first Iudge soone after. But while those of Iuda made warre with their borders, from whom they onely recovered the mountainous Countries (for they could not driue out the inhabitants of the Vallies, because they had Chariots of Iron)
The rest of the Tribes sought also to enlarge and establish their owne Territories:
in which warre they laboured with variable successe: for as the house of Joseph recovered Bethel, or Luz, from the Hittites, so did the Amorites recover from Dan all the plaine Countries, and forkt them to saue themselves in the Mountaines. And now the Israelites vnmindfull of Gods benefits, and how often he had miraculously a-fore-time defended them, and made them victorious ouer their enemies (the El ders being also consumed, who better aduiled them in the Inter-regnum) did not on-ly ioyne themselves in marriage with the Heathen Nations: but (that which was more detestable) they serued the Idols of Baal, and Astereth, with other the dead gods of the Canaanites and Amorites. And therefore did the Lord God whom they had prouoked with their Idolatrie, deliuer them into the handes of the Aramites of Mesopotamia: whom Chusban Rishathaim at that time commanded. But after they had felt the smart of Gods displeasure against them eight yeeres, it pleased him to haue compassion on his people, and to raise vp Othniel to bee their Iudge and Leader: who by Gods assited, deliuered his brethren from oppression: and infort the Aramites to returne into their owne Deserts, and into Mesopotamia adioyning, after which the Israelites had peace fourtie yeeres, during all the time of Othniels go-vernment. This Othniel is thought by Talsatus to haue been the younger brother of Caleb, for as much as in the booke of Judges he is twice called Othniel the Sonne of Cenaz, Calebs younger brother. Others doe rather interpret those wordes (Caleb younger brother) as if they signified the meane of his kined. Indeed it is not like-ly, that Calebs Daughter should marrie with her owne Vncle; yet it followes not therefore that Othniel should haue bene the meane of the kined. Wherefore we may better thinke that he was the Nephew of Caleb, (as some learned men ex- pound it) and as the very wordes of Scripture seeme to enforce. For Caleb was the sonne of Iephunneh, and Othniel the sonne of Cenaz, Calebs younger brother; that is, he was not brother to Caleb, but his younger brothers sonne; to whom it was not on-ly lawfull, but commendable to marrie with his Cousin German Calebs daughter.
now

How long it was from the death of Ioshua to the government of Othniel, it is not to be found: but it seemes to haue been no short time. For many Warres were made in that space against the people of the Land. Isaiah was then taken (as is thought) by the Danites; and the best writers are of opinion, that betwene the times of Ioshua and Othniel that ciuill warre brake out betwene the Beniamites and the rest of Israel, for the forcing to death of the Leuites wife. For it is written that in those dayes there was no King in Israel, but every man did that which was good in his owne eyes. And as Iuda led the people against the Canaanites during the Inter-regnum, so was hee commanded to doe against Beniamin, euen by the Lord God, whose direction they craued, as wanting a Iudge to appoint what should bee done, which sheweth it to haue been when Ioshua was dead, and before the government of Othniel, especially considering, that all other times wherein they wanted Gover-nours, were spent vnder such oppression of strangers, as would haue giuen them no leaue to haue attended such a ciuill Warre, if their power had been as great, as it was in the menaging of this action, wherein they so weakened the body of their state, by effusion of blood, that in many ages they could not bring into the field such numbers as formerly they had mustered against their bordering enemies.

§. II.

Of the memorable things of this Age in other Nations: and of the difficultie in the computation of times.

Here liued in this Age of Othniel, Pandion or Pandareus; according to Homer, the first King of Athens: who beganne to rule in the twentieth yeere of Othniel, and governed fortie yeeres. Hee was Father to Erichon theus: his Daughters were Progne and Philomela, so greatly men-tioned in fables.

Cadmus also about this time obtained Thebes: of whose Daughter Semele was borne Dionysius, or Liber Pater: vnder whome Linus the Musician liued. In his time time also the Cities of Meius, Paphus, and Thorus, were built.

Ida and Dactylus flourished in this age, who are said to haue found out the vse of iron: but Genesis hath taught vs the contrary, and that Tubalcain long before wrought cunningly both in iron and brasie. Not long after this time, Amphion and Zeubus governed Thebes: whom diuers Chronologers finde in Ebnus time. But S. Augu- stine making a repetition of those fables, which were deuised among the Gracians of whole Nations, during the government of the Iudges, begins with Triptolemus, of whose parentage there is a little agreement. Vnes vpon the thirteenth Chapter of S. Augu- stine de Cinitate Dei, and the eighteenth booke, hath gathered all the opi- nions of this mans progenie, where he that desires his pedigree may finde it. La- stantius and Euclerus make him native of Attica: and the sonne of Elenus King of Eleusina: which Elenus by carefull industrie had fed the people of that Citie in the time of a great famine. This, when vpon the like occasion Triptolemus could not performe, fearing the furie of the people, he fled thence by Sea in a kinde of Galley or long Boat, which carried in her Prowe a grauen or carued Serpent; who because he made exceeding great speed to returne and to relieue his people with Corn, from some neighbour Nation: it was tained by the Poets, that his Coach was carried by Serpents through the ayre.

Whether the times of these Kings which liued together with Othniel, and after him with the rest of the Iudges and Kings of Israel and Juda, be precisely set downe, I cannot auow; for the Chronologers, both of the former and latter times, differ in many particulars, to examine all which would require the whole time of a long life: and therefore I desire to be excused, if in these comparisons I erre with others of bet- ter iudgement. For whether Euclerus and all that follow him, or his opposites (who make themselves so conuerfant with these ancient Kings, and with the very yeere when they beganne to rule) haue hit the marke of time of all other the farthest off and most defaced, I cannot but greatly doubt. First, because the Authors them- selves, from whom the ancientest Chronologers haue borrowed light, had nothing for the warrant of their owne workes, but coniecture. Secondly, because their owne disagreement and contention in those elder dayes, with that of our owne age among the labourers in times, is such, as no man among them hath yet so edified any mans vnderstanding, saue his owne, but that he is greatly distracted, after what patterne to erect his buildings.

This disagreement is found not only in the reignes of Heathen Kings and Prin- ces; but euen in computation of those times which the indisputable authoritie of holy Scripture hath summed vp, as in that of Abrahams birth; and after in the times of the Iudges and the oppressions of Israel, in the times from the egression to the building of Solomons Temple, in the Persian Empire, the fuentie Weekes, and in what? Wherefoeuer the account of times may suffer examination, the arguments are opposite, and contentions are such, as for ought that I see, men haue fought by so many wayes to vncouer the Sunne, that the dayes thereby are made more darke, and the clouds more condense than before: I can therefore giue no other warrant, than other men haue done in these computations: and therefore that such and such Kings and Kingdomes tooke beginning in this or that yeere, I auow it no otherwise than as a borrowed knowledge, or at least as a private opinion: which I submit to better iudgements. Nam in pricis rebus veritas non ad vnguem quærenda; In ancient things we are not to require an exact narration of the truth, sayes Diodore.

ϕ. III.

Of EHYVS time, and of PROSERPINA, ORITHYA, TEREVS, TANTALVS, TITYVS, ADMETVS, and others that liued about thofe times.

After the death of Othniel, when Israel fell backe to their former Idolatry, God incouraged Moab to invade and supresse them: to performe which he ioyned the forces of Ammon, and Amalec vnto his owne, and so (as all kinde of miserie readily findeth out those whom God hath abandoned, or for a time with-drawne his helpe from, thereby to make them feele the difference betweene his grace and his displeasure) these Heathen neighbouring Nations had an easie conquest ouer Israel: whom God himselfe exposed to those perils: within which they were so speedily folded vp. In this miserable estate they continued full eightenee yeeres vnder Eglon King of the Moabites, and his confederates. Yet as the mercies of God are infinite, he turned not his hatred from their crying repentance: but raised vp Ehud the sonne of Gera to deliuer them: by which weak man, though maimed in his right hand, yet confident in the iustice of his quarrell, and fearing that the Israelites were too few in numbers to contend with the Head of those valiant Nations, heeresolued to attempt vpon the person of Eglon, whom if he could but extinguish, he assured himselfe of the following victorie: especially giuing his Nation no time to reestablish their government, or to chooseth a King to command, and direct them in the Warres. According to which resolution, Ehud went on as an Embaſſadour to Eglon, loaden with presents from the Israelites, as to appease him, and obtaining priuate access vpon the pretence of some secret to be reuealed, he pierst his body with a Poniard, made of purpose with a double edge: and shutting the doores of his closet vpon him, escaped,

It may seem that being confident of his good success, hee had prepared the strength of Israel in readinesse. For suddenly after his returne, he did repaile Jordan, and invading the Territorie of Moad, overthrew their Armie consisting of 10000³⁰ able and strong men: whereof not any one escaped. After which victory, and that Sangar his Successour had miraculously slaine 600. Philistims with an Oxe goade: the Land and People of Israel lived in peace vnto the end of fourecore yeeres from the death of Orhanli, which terme expired in the Worlds yeere 2601.

In the dayes of Ehud, Naomi with Elimelech her husband, and with her two sonnes, trauiailed into Mobab, and so the storie of Ruth is to be referred to this time. About the beginning of the fourscore yeeres which are giuen to Ehud, it was that Orcau King of the Melosiasts: otherwile Pluto, false Proserpina, as shee walked to gather flowers in the fields of Hyppionius in Stellia: or (according to Pausanias) by the Riuer Cephissus, which elswhere he calleth Chemer; if he meant not two distinct Riuers. T his health being made knownte Pyrrhus, with whom Hercules and Theseus ioynd themselves, they agreed together to recouer her: but Pluto or Orcau (whom others call Adonius) had (as they say) a very huge Dogge, which fastened on Pyrrhus, and tare him in pieces, and had also worried Theseus, but that Hercules speedily rescued him: and by strength tooke and mastered the Dogge Cerberus: whereof grew the fable of Hercules his deliuering of Theseus out of Hell. But Zeus, as I take it, hath written this storie somewhat more according to the truth. For Theseus and Pyrrhus, saith he, attempted to steale Proserpina Daughter to Adonius, King of the Melosiasts, who had Ceres to Wife, the mother of Proserpina. Proserpina being a generall name also for all faire women. This purpose of theirs being knownte to Adonius, Theseus and Pyrrhus were both taken; and because Pyrrhus was the principall in this conspiracie, and Theseus drawne on by a kinde of affection or enforcement, the one was giuen for foode to Adonius his great Dog Cerberus, the other held prisoner, till Hercules by the insligation of Euristheus deliuered him by strong hand. The Melosiasts which which Stephanus writes with a single (S) were a people of Epirus inhabiting neere the Mountaines of Pindus: of which Mountaines Oeta is one of the most famous, where Hermes burnt himselfe. The River of Acheron (which the Poets describe to be in Hell) riseth out of the same Hills. There is another Nation of the Molops in Thessali: but these are neighbours to the Caſſopaei, saith Plutarch in his Greeke questions.

 The rape of Oribys the Daughter of Erichon, King of Athens, taken away by Boreas of Thrace, is referred to the time of Eubolus. The Poets ascribe this rape to the North winde, because Thrace is situate North from Athens. In his time also Tereus
 10 to ransomed Philomela, of which the fable was devised of her conversion into a Nightingale.
 For Tereus having married her sister Progne, conducting Philomela from Athens to see her sister, forth her in the passage, and withall cut out her tongue, that shee might not complaine; perfwading Progne his Wife, that Philomela died in the mid-way: all which her brother in law's mercilesse behaviour towards her, Philomela exprest by her neede upon cloth, and sent it Progne. In reuenge whereof Progne caused her onely sonne Irys to be cut in pieces, and yet before Tereus her husband, so dreft as it appeared to be some other ordinary foode: of which when he had eaten his fill, shee caused his head, hands, and feete, to be presented vnto him: and then fled away with speede towards Athens where her Father Pandion yet liued, and 20 the Poets faigned, that shee was turned into a Swallow. The place where it was performed, Strabo findes to be Daulis in Phocis: and the Tomb of Tereus, Pausanias L. 9.

 way of digression in his Peloponnesian Warre, That this Tereus was not King in that which is now called Thracia, or in Odryse, (as the Poets call him Odryseus) but that 30 Phocis a Countie in Greece not farre from Asticia a Citie whereof is called Daulis, was in Pandions time inhabited by Thracians: of which this Tereus was King: whence Pandion to haue amitie with his neighbours, made him his sonne in law: as it is good to beleue, faith Thucydides, that Pandion King of Athens made that alliance with a neighbour King, from whom hee might haue succour, rather than with any Tereus, that should haue held the Kingdome of Odryse, which was greatly distant from thence. The occasion that the Poets chose a Swallow for Progne to be turned into, may seeme to haue beene partly because, as Pausanias sayes; Daulide nec mirificanti, nec hospitum in tota circum regione Hircundines; As if a Swallow, remembering the wrong that was there done to her, and to her sister, did for euer eate that place.

Nere this time Melampus (who is said to have vnderstood the voyces of Birds and Beasts) flourished, being also esteemed for an excellent Physician. Hee reformed their former health the Daughters of Pereus King of the Argives, who (as the 40 Poets please) were made mad by Iuno: and thinking themselves to be Kine, fled into the Woods, fearing to be constrained to the Plough: for in those Countries, where the ground was light, they did vs. often to plough with Kine.

In the 47. yeere of Ebud, Tros began to raigne in Dardania, and gaue it his owne name; about which time Pheomone the chiefe Priest of Apollo in Delfos, deuiled the

Of the fame date was Tantalus, King of Lydia: whom Euſebius makes King of Pergis; and alſo of that part of which the people were anciently Meſones. Of Tantalus was deuifed the fable that ſome Poets haue applied to the paſſion of loue: and ſome to the couetouſ that dare not inioy his riches. Euſebius calls this Tantalus the ſonne of Iupiter, by the Nymph Pleſta: Diogenes and Didymus in Zetes, giue him another Mother. He was ſaid to be the ſonne of Iupiter: as ſome will haue it; becauſe he had that Planet in his aſcendent, betokening wiſedome and riches. It is ſaid that when he made a feaſt to the Gods, hauing nothing more precious: he cauſed his own Sonne to be ſlaine and dreſt for the banquet: of whom Ceres ate part of one of the ſhoulders;

shoulders: whereby was signified that those men which seeke after Diuine knowledge, preferre nothing on earth before it: no nor the care of their owne children, of all else the most deare. And where it was deuised, that hee had alwayes Water and Fruit offered to his lips, and yet suffered the torment of hunger and thirst, it was meant thereby, that though he abounded (by reason of his riches) in all delicacie of the world, yet his minde being otherwife and to higher desires transported, he enioyed no pleasure at all by the rest. Of whom Ouid:

Quarit aquas in aquis, & poma fugacia captat
TANTALVS, hoc illi garrula lingua dedit.

Here TANTALVS in water seekes for water, and doth misse
The fleeting fruit hee catcheth at: His long tongue brought him this.

This punishment, they say, was inflicted vpon him, for that hee discouered the secrets of the Gods: that is, because he taught wisdom and vertue to mortall men: which storie Cornelius Gallus hath elegantly exprest in Verse. Others expound this fable otherwife and say, That Tantalus, though he excelled in riches, yet being thirstie of more abundance, was neuer satisfied. Of whom Horace against couetousnesse:

TANTALVS à labijs sitiens fugientia captat Flumina quid rides? mutato nomine de te Fabula narratur.

The thirsting TANTALVS doth catch at streames that from him flee.
Why laughest thou? the name but chang'd, the tale is told of thee.

Others conceiue where it is fained of Tantalus, that he gaue the Nectar and Ambrosia of the Gods to vaine and vnworthy men, that he was therefore by them in that sort punished. Of which Natalis out of Pindarus:

Immortalitatem quid furatus,
Coëtanjs conuinit
Nectar Ambrosiamq; dedit.

Because that stealing immortalitye,
He did both Nectar and Ambrosia giue
To guests of his owne age to make them liue.

Whereby it was meant, that the secrets of Diuinitie ought not to be imparted to the vnpure Vulgar. For as the cleaneſt meates in a foule stomake, are therein corrupted, so the most high and reſerued myſteries are often peruerſed by an vncleane and deſiled minde.

Mark. 4. 11. Totum itis quoniam (saith Christ in MARKE) to know the myſterie of the Kingdome of God, but vnto them that are without, all things bee done in parables. So is it ſaid of him, that he expounded all things to his Diſciples apart. And therefore doth Gregory Nazianzen inferre vpon a place of S. PAVL: Quod si PAVLO licuisset effari ea, quorum ipsi agnitionem celum tertium & usque ad illud progressio suppeditauit, fortasse de Deo, nobis aliquid amplius constaret. If PAVL might haue vttered the things, the knowledge whereof the third heauene, and his going thither did bring vnto him, peradventure we might know somewhat more of God.

Pythagoras, saith Reuclin, thought it not the part of a wife man, Admo lyram experire, aut myſteria, quae ita reciperet, ut Sui tubam, & ſidem graculis, & vnguenta Scarpae:

hem: quare silentium indixit discipulis, ne vulgo diuinorum arcana pateſcerent, quae mendaculo facilius, quam loquendo apprehenduntur; To ſet an Aſſe to a harpe, or to learne myſteries: which he would handle as a Swine doth a trumpet, or a Iay a viall, or Scarabies and vncleane flies ſoueraigne oiniment. Wherefore he commanded ſilence to his diſciples, that they ſhould not diſcloſe diuine myſteries to the common ſort, which are eaſie learnt by meditation than by babbling. And therefore did the Egyptians communicate their myſteries among their Priests in certaine hieroglyphick letters, to the end that their ſecrets might bee hidden from the Vulgar: and that they might beſtow the more time in the contemplation of their couered meanings.

But to proceede with the contemporaries of Ao, or Ehnd, with him it is alſo ſaid, that Tityus liued whom Apollo ſlew, becauſe he fought to force his Mother Ladona. Euphorion hath it thus, that Tityus was the Sonne of Elara, the Daughter of Orchomenus; which Elara being beloued of Iupiter, to auoid hans reuenge, he hid Elara in the earth, where ſhee was deliuered of Tityus: whole Mother dying, and himſelfe therein nourished, he was therefore called the ſonne of the earth. Pausanias ſpeaking of the graue of this Gyan, affirms that his body occupied the third part of a furlong. But Tribullus hath a louder lie of his ſtature out of Homers.

Porcelluſq; nouem TITYVS per iugera terra, Aſſiduis atro viſcere paſcit aues.

Hom. Od. 11.

Nine furlongs ſtretcht lies TITYVS, who for his wicked deeds,
The hungrie birds with his renewing liuer daily feeds.

This Strabo doth thus expound; that Apollo killing this cruell and wicked Tyrant of Panopea, a Citie in Phocis, it was fained by the Poets to the terrour of others, that he was ſtill eaten in Hell by birds, and yet ſtill liued; and had his fleſh renewed.

Admetus King of Theſſalie liued alſo in this Age, whom it is ſaid that Apollo firſt ſerued as a Herd-man, and afterward for his excellent wit was by him advanced; but hauing ſlaine Hyacinthus, he croſt the Helleſpont, and ſled into Phrygia: where together with Neptune, hee was entertained by Laomedon, and got his bread by working in bricke, for building of the walls of Troy, not by making the bricks leape into their places by playing on his Harpe: according to him in Ouid, which ſaith:

Iliou ſpicias, firmataq; turribus altis
Mantia, APOLLINEAE ſtructa canore lyra.

Strong Iliou thou ſhalt ſee with walls and towers high Built with the harpe of wife APOLLO's Harmonie.

Thus the Poets: but others, that hee laboured with his hands, as hired in this worke. And that he alſo laboured at the building of the Labyrinth in Greece, all the Megarians witneſſe, ſaith Pausanias.

In theſe daies alſo of Ehnd, or (as ſome finde it) in the daies of Deborah, liued Perſus, the ſonne of Iupiter and Danae, by whole Souldiers (as they failed out of Peloponneſus, to ſeek their aduenture on Africa ſide) Meduſa, the Daughter and Succellor of Phorcus, being weakly accompanied as ſhee hunted, neare the Lake Triton, was ſurpriſed and ſlaine: whole beautie, when Perſus beheld, he cauſed her head to be embalmed, and carried into Greece: the beautie whereof was ſuch and ſo much admired, and the beholders ſo aſtoniſhed which beheld it, as thereof grew the fiction, that all that looked on Meduſa's head, were turned into ſtones.

Cecrops, the second of that name and 7. King of Athen, and Acrisius the 13. or 14. King of the Argives, began also their reigns, as it is said, in the time of this Iudge: of which the first ruled 40. yeares, and the second 31 yeares. Also Bellerophon lived in this age, being the sonne of Glaucus, the sonne of Sisyphus: who inticed by Antea or Stenobolia, the wife of Pratus of the Argives, to accompany her, but refusing it, shee accused him to her husband that he offered to force her: whereupon Pratus sent Bellerophon into Lycia, about some affaires of weight, between him and his Sonne in law Iobates: giuing secret order to Iobates to dispatch him: but Iobates thinking it dishonorable to lay violent hands on him, imployed him against Chimæra, a Monster, vomiting or breathing fire. Now the Gods (as the report is) pitying his innocencie, sent him the winged Horse Pegasus, spring vp of the blood of Medusa, formerly slaine by the Souldiers of Persus in Asitia: to transport him, a horse that none other could master or bridle but Minerva: vpon which beaſt Bellerophon ouer-came Chimæra: and performed the other seruices giuen him in charge: which done, as he returned toward Lycia, the Lycians lay in ambush to haue slaine him: but being victorious also ouer all those, he arrived to Iobates in safetie: whom Iobates for his eminent vertues honoured, first with one of his Daughters: and afterward with his Kingdom: after which he grew so insolent, as he attempted to flie vp to heauen vpon his Pegasus: whose pride Iupiter disdainig, caused one of his flaming flies so to vex Pegasus, as he cast off Bellerophon from his back, into the Valley of Cilicia, where he died blinde: of which burthen Pegasus being discharged (as the fable goeth) flew back to heauen: and being fed in Iupiters owne stable, Aurora begd him of Iupiter to ride on before the Sunne. This tale is diuersly expounded, as if by some, That it pleaseth God to relieue men in their innocent and vnderstanded aduersitie, and to cast downe those which are too high minded: according to that which is said of Bellerophon: that when he was expoled to extreme hazard, or rather certaine death, he found both deliuerance and honor: but waxing ouer-proud and presumptuous in his glorious fortunes, he was againe throwne downe into the extremitie of sorrow, and euer-during miserie. Secondly by others, That vnder the name of Chimæra, was meant a cruell Pyrate of the Lycians, whose ship had in her prow, a Lyon, a Goate in the mid-ship, and a Dragon in the stearne, of which three beasts this Monster Chimæra was said to be compounded, whom Bellerophon pursued with a kinde of Galley of such swiftnesse, that it was called the flying Horse: to whom the inuention of sailes (the wings of a ship) are also attributed. Many other expolitions are made of this tale by other Authors: but it is not vnlikely, that Chimæra was the name of a ship, for so Virgil calleth one of the greatest ships of Athenas.

Ion also, from whom the Athenians (being ignorant of the antiquitie of their parent Iauan) deriue their name of Iones, is said to haue bene about Ehuds time: Homer calls them Iaones, which hath a neere resemblance to the word Iauan. Perhaps it might be so that Ion himselfe tooke name from Iauan: it being a custome obseruable in the Histories of all times, to reuiue the ancient name of a fore-father, in some the principall of his issue.

The inuasion of India by Liber Pater, is by some reported as done in this age: but S. Augustine makes him farre more ancient: placing him betwene the coming out of Egypt, and the death of Iosua.

About the end of the 80. yeares, ascribed to Ehud, and Samgar, Pelopon flourished: who gaue name to Peloponnesus in Greece, now called Morcia.

§. IIII.

§. IIII.

Of DEBORA and her Contemporaries.

After Israel had liued in peace and plentie to the end of these 80. yeares, they againe began to forget the giuer of all goodnesse, and many of those being worne out, which were witnesses of the former miserie, and of Gods deliuerance by Ehud, and after him by Samgar, the rest began to returne to their former neglect of Gods commandments.

For as Plentie and Peace are the parents of idle securitie; so is securitie as fruitfull in begetting and bringing forth both danger and subuersiō: of which all estates in the world haue tasted by interchange of times. Therefore when their sinnes were againe ripe for punishment, Iabin King of Hazor, after the death of Ehud, inuaded the Territorie of Israel, and hauing in his seruice 900. yron Chariots, besides the rest of his forces, he held them in subiection twentie yeares, till it pleased God to raise vp Deborah, the Prophetesse, who encouraged Barac to leuie a force out of Nephthalim, and Zabulon, to incounter the Canaanites. That the men of Nephthalim were more forward than the rest in this action, it may seeme to haue proceeded partly from the authoritie that Barac had among them, being of the same Tribe; and partly from their feeling of the common grievance, which in them was more sensible, than in others, because Hazor and Haroseth the chiefe holds of Iabin, were in Nephthalim. So in the daies of Iephtha the Gileadites tooke the greatest care, because the Ammonites with whom the Warre was, pressed most vpon them, as being their borderers. Now as it pleased God by the left hand of Ehud to deliuer Israel from the Moabites: and by the counsaile and courage of a woman, to free them from the yoke of Canaan, and to kill the valiant Sisera by Iael the Kenites wife: so was it his will at other times, to worke the like great things by the weakest means. For the mighty Affiryan Nabuchodonosor, who was a King of Kings, and resistlesse, he ouerthrew by his owne imaginations, the causes of his brutish melancholy: and changed his matchlesse pride into the base humilitie of a Beast. And to approue that he is the Lord of all power, he sometime punisheth by inuisible strength, as when he laughred the Armie of Senacherib by his Angell: or as he did the Egyptians in Moses time: sometime by dead bodies, as when he drowned Pharao by the waues of the Sea: and the Canaanites by haile-stones in the time of Iosua: sometimes by the ministerie of men, as when he ouerthrew the foure Kings of the East, Chedorlaomer, and his companions, by the household seruants of Abraham. He caused the Moabites and Ammonites to set vpon their owne confederate the Armie of the Edomites; and hauing slaine them to kill one another in the sight of Iebelaphat: and of the like to these a volume of examples may be gathered. And to this effect did Deborah the Prophetesse speake vnto Barac in these words: But this journey that thou takest, shall not be for thine honour, for the Lord shall sell Sisera into the hands of a Woman. In which victorie all the strength of the Canaanite Iabin fell to the ground, euen to the last man: in the end of which Warre it seemeth that Iabin himselfe also perished, as appeareth by the last Verse of the fourth of Iudges.

Chron. 2. 20.

Jud. 4.

After all which Deborah giueth thanks to God, and after the acknowledgment of all his powerfullnesse and great mercies, shee sheweth the weak estate whereinto Israel was brought for their Idolatrie by the Canaanites, and other bordering Nations, in these words: Was there a shield or speare scene among fortie thousand of Israel? Iudas. 5. 17. she also sheweth how the Israelites were leuened and amaled, some of them confined ouer Jordan, and durst not ioyne themselves to the rest; as those of Reuben in Gilead: 17. 17. that the Assiries kept the Sea-coast, and forooke their habitations towards the Land, and the children of Dan who neighboured the Sea, crept into their ships for safetie, shewing thereby that all were disperfed, and all in effect lost. Shee then curseth the inhabitants of Asteroz, who dwelling neare the place of the battaile (be-like fearing the successe) came not out to assist Israel, and then bleisseth Iael the

the wife of Heber the Kenite, who nailed Sisera in her Tent: shewing the ancient affection of that race to the Israelites. For though the Familie of Heber were informed in that miserable time of subjection, to hold correspondence with Jabin the Canaanite, yet when occasion offered them means, they witnessed their love and faith to their ancient friends. Lastly, these derideth the Mother of Sisera who promised her sonne the victorie in her owne hopes: and fancied to her selfe, and described the spoiles both of Garments and Maidens by him gotten. For conclusion, these directeth her praises and thanks to God only victorious.

From the beginning of Jabins oppression to the end of that peace, which Deborah and Barac purchased vnto Israel, there passed 40. yeares. In which time the Kingdom of Argos which had continued 544. yeares was translated to Mycene: The translation of this Kingdome Vies out of Pausanias writeth to this effect: After Danaus, Lyncus succeeded in Argos, after whom the children of Abas the sonne of Lyncus diuide the Kingdome: of which Acrisius being eldest held Argos it selfe: Prattus his brother posselt Epbyra or Corinthe, and Tyrinthos, and other Cities with all the Territorie towards the Sea, there being many monuments in Tyrinthos, which witness Prattus possession, saith Pausanias.

Now Acrisius was foretold by an Oracle, that hee should be slaine by the sonne of his Daughter Danae: whereupon he caused her to be inclosed in a Tower, to the end that no man might accompanie her. But the Ladie being exceeding faire, it is said that Iupiter turned himselfe into a golden shower: which falling into her lap, begat her with child: the meaning whereof was, that some Kings sonne, or other Worthie man, corrupted her keepers with gold: and enioyed her, of whom Perseus was borne; who when he grew to mans estate, either by chance (saith Ctesias) or in shewing his grand-father the inuention of the discus, or leaden ball, slew him unwillingly. After this Perseus, to auoide the infamie of Patricide in Argos, changed Kingdomes with his Vncle Prattus: and built Mycene. This imprisonment of Danae, Sophocles reporteth otherwise: and that shee was inclosed in a brasse vault, vnder the Kings Hall with her Nurse and Keepers. Vpon this close custodie Horace hath this witty obseruation.

Inclusam DANAEN, turris ahenae, Robustaeq; fores, & vigilum Canum Tristes excubiae, munerant satis

*Nocturnus ab adulteris:
Si non ACRISIUM Virginis abdita

The brasse Tower with doores close bar'd,
And watchfull bandogs frightfull guard,
Kept safe the Maidenhead
Of DANAe from secret loue:
Till smiling VENUS, and wife IOVE
Beguild her Fathers dread.
For chang'd into a golden shower,
The God into her lap did powre
Himselfe, and tooke his pleasure
Through gardes, and stonie walls to breake,
The thunder-bolt is farre more weake,
Then is a golden treasure.

that liued in this Age.

DE DEBORAH and Barac being dead: the Midianites assisted by the Amalekites infested Israel. For when vnder a Judge who had held them in the feare of the Lord, they had enioyed any quiet or prosperitie: the Judge was no sooner dead, than they turned to their former impious Idolatrie. Therefore now the neighbouring Nations did so master them in a short time (the hand of God being withheld from their defence) as to saue themselves, they crept into caues of the mountaines, and other the like places of hardest access: their enemies possessing all the plaines and fruitfull vallies: and in hauest time by themselves, and the multitude of their cattle, destroying all that grew vpon: weering the fields as thick as grasse-hoppers: which seruitude lasted seven yeares.

Ind 6. 6. & 7.

Then the Lord by his Angell stirred up Gideon the sonne of Josab, afterward called terabass: whose feare and vntwillingnesse, and how it pleased God to hearken him in his enterprise, it is both largely and precisely set down in the holy Scriptures; as also now it pleased God by a few select persons, namely 300. out of 32000. men, to make them know that he only was the Lord of Hosts; Each of these 300. by Gideons appointment carried a trumpet, and light in a pitcher, instruments of more terror than force, with which he gaue the great Armie of their enemies an alarm; who hearing so loud a noise, and seeing (at the crack of so many pitchers broken) so many lights about them, esteemed the Armie of Israel to be infinite, and strucken with a sodaine feare, they all fled without a stroke stricken: and were slaughtered in 10 great numbers: two of their Princes being made prisoners and slaine. In his returne the Ephramites began to quarrell with Gideon, because he made warre without their assistance, being then greedie of glorie, the victorie being gotten: who (if Gideon had failed and fallen in the enterprise) would no doubt haue held themselves happy by being neglected. But Gideon appeasing them with a mild answer, followed after the enemy, in which pursuit being tired with trauaile, and wearie euen with the slaughtering of his enemies, he desired reliefe from the inhabitants of Succoth, to the end, that (his men being refreshed) he might ouer-take the other two Kings of the Midianites: which had saved themselves by flight. For they were four Princes of the Nations, which had invaded and wasted Israel: to wit, Oreb and Seeb, which 20 were taken already, and Zebah and Salmunna which fled.

Gideon being denied by them of Succoth, fought the like reliefe from the inhabitants of Penuel, who in like sort refused to succour him. To both of these places he threatened therefore the reuenge, which in his returne from the prosecution of the other two Princes, he performed: to wit, that hee would teare the flesh of those of Succoth with Tornes and Briars, and destroy the Inhabitants and Citie of Penuel: Now why the people of these two Cities should refuse reliefe to their bretheren the Israelites, especially after so great a victorie: if I may presume to make coniecture, it seemes likely, first that those Cities set ouer Jordan, and in the way of all invasions, to be made by the Mozabites, and Ammonites, and Midianites, into Israel, had either 30 made their owne peace with those Nations, and were not spoiled by them: or else they knowing that Zebah and Salmunna were escaped with a great part of their armie, might feare their reuenge in the future. Secondly, it may be laide to the condition and dispositions of these men: as it is not rare to finde of the like humour in all ages. For there are multitudes of men, especially of those which follow the warre, that both enuie and maligne others, if they performe any praise-worthy actions, for the honour and safetie of their owne Countrey, though themselves may be assured to beare a part of the smart of contrarie successe. And such malicious hearts can rather be contented that their Prince and Countrey should suffer hazzard, and want, than that such men as they mislike, should be the authors or actors of any glorie or good 40 to either.

Ind 6. 10.

Now Gideon, how or wherefoerer it were that hee refreshed himselfe and his wearie and hungrie Souldiers, yet he followed the opportunitie, and pursued his former victorie to the vttermost: and finding Zebah and Salmunna in Karkor (suspecting no farther attempt vpon them) he againe surprised them, & slaughtered those 15000. remaining: hauing put to the sword in the former attempt 120000. and withall he tooke Zebah and Salmunna prisoners: whom because themselves had executed Gideons bretheren before at Tabor, he caused them both to be slaine: or (as it is written) at their owne request flew them with his owne hands: his Son whom he first commanded to doe it, refusing it, and in his returne from the consummation of this meruallous victorie, he tooke reuenge of the Elders of Succoth, and of the Citizens of Penuel: forgiuing no offence committed against him: either by strangers or by his bretheren the Israelites. But such mercy as he shewed to others, his owne children found soon after his death, according to that which hath been said before. The 40 debs debts of crueltye and mercie are neuer left vnatisfied: for as he slew the 70. Elders of Succoth, with great and vnusuall torments, so were his owne 70. sonnes al, but one, murdered by his owne bastard Abimelec. The like Analogie is observed by the Rablines, in the greatest of the plagues which God brought vpon the Egyptians, who hauing caused the male children of the Hebrewes to be slaine, others of them to be cast into the riuer and drowned: God rewarded them euen with the like measure, destroying their owne first borne by his Angell, and drowning Pharaoh and his armie in the red sea. And hereof a world of examples might bee giuen, both out of the Scriptures and other Histories.

10 In the end so much did the people reuerence Gideon in the present for this victorie, and their owne deliuerance, as they offered him the Soueraignetie ouer them, and to establish him in the Government; which hee refused, answering; I will not reigne ouer you, neither shall my childre reigne ouer you, but the Lord shall, &c. But he desired the people that they would bestow on him the golden eare-rings, which every man had gotten. For the Israelites, neighbours, and mixt with the Midianites, yfed to wear them: the waight of all which was a thousand and seven hundred Shekels of gold, which makes of ours 2380. l. if we follow the account of the Shekle vulgar. 20 And because he conuerted that gold into an Ephod, a garment of gold, blue filke, purple, scarlet, and fine linnen, belonging to the High Priest only, and set vp the same in his owne Citie of Ophra or Ephra, which drew Israel to Idolatrie, the same was the destruction of Gideon and his house.

There was another kinde of Ephod besides this of the High Priests, which the Leuites yfed, and so did David when he danced before the Arke: and Samuel, while he was yet young, which was made of linnen only.

Now if any man demaund how it was possible for Gideon with 300. men to destroy 120000. of their enemies, and afterward 15000. which remained, wee may remember that although Gideon with 300. gaue the first alarme, and put the Midianites in rout and disorder: yet all the rest of the armie came into the slaughter, and pursuite, for it is written; That the men of Israel being gathered together out 30 of Nephtalie, and out of Alber, and out of Manasse, pursued after the Midianites: for this armie Gideon left in tents behinde him, when hee went downe to view the armie of his enemies, who with the noyse of his 300. trumpets came after him to the execution.

There liued with Gideon, Egeus, the sonne of Pandion, who reigned in Athenes: Euristhenes King of Mycena: Atrous and Thyestes the sonnes of Pelops, who bare dominion ouer a great part of Peloponnesus, and after the death of Euristhenes, the Kingdome of Mycena fell into the hand of Atrous. This is that Atrous, who holding his brother in ialousie, as an attempter, both of his wife and crowne, slew the children of Thyestes, and causing their flesh to be drest, did therewith feast their father. But this crueltye was not vireuenged. For both Atrous and his sonne Agamemmen were slaine by a base sonne of Thyestes, yea the grand-children, and all the 40 kinage of Atrous died by the same sword.

In Gideons time also those things were supposed to haue beene done, which are written of Dadalus and Icarus. Dadalus, they say, hauing slaine his Nephew Attalus, fled to Mimos, King of Crete, for succour, where for his excellent workmanship he was greatly esteemed, hauing made for Mimos a Labyrinth, like vnto that of Egypt. Afterward he was laide to haue framed an artificiall Cowe for Pasiphae the Queen, that she, being in loue with a faire Bull, might by putting her selfe into the Cow, satisfie her lust, a thing no lesse vnaturall than incredible, had not that shamelesse Emperour Domitian exhibited the like beastly spectacle, openly before the people of Rome, in his Amphitheater; of purpose, as may seeme, to verifie the old fable. For so it appeares by those verses of Martial, wherein the flattering Poet magnifieth the abominable shew, as a goodly Pageant, in those vicious times.

Fidimus, accepit fabula prisca fidem.
Nec se miratur Cæsar longæa uersitas Quicquid famiscanti, donat menâ tibi.*

But concerning that which is reported of Paspheas, Serius makes a lesse vnhoëst construction of it, thinking that Dadalus was of her counsell, and her Pandar for the enticing of a Servant of Ainos called Taurus, which signifieth a Bull, who begat her with child, and that the being deliuered of two sonnes, the one resembling Taurus, the other her husband Ainos, it was fained that he was deliuered of the Minotaur, halfe a Minn and halfe a Bull. But this practise being discovered, and Dadalus appointed to be laine, he fled out of Crete to Coelus King of Sicily: in which passage he made such expedition, as it was fained that he fashioned wings for himselfe and his loane to transport them. For whereas Ainos pursued him with boats which had gares onely, Dadalus framed sailes both for his owne boate, and for his sonnes, by which he ouertwente those that had him in chase. Vpon which new inuention, Iarus bearing himselfe ouerbolt, was ouerborne and drowned.

It is also written of Dadalus, that he made Images that could moue themselves, and goe, because he caried them with legs, armes and hands, whereas those that preceded him, could onely present the bodie and head of those men, whom they cared to counterfeit, and yet the workmanship was esteemed very rare. But Plutarch, who had seene some of those that were called the Images of Dadalus, found them exceeding rude.

With Gideon also flourished Linus the Theban, the sonne of Apollo, and Terpsichore, who instructed Thamiris, Orpheus, and Hercules. Hee wrote of the Creation, of the Summe, and Adornes countries, and of the generation of liuing Creatures, but in the end he was slaine by Hercules his scholler with his owne harpe.

Againe, in this age those things spoken of Sphinx and Oedipus, are thought to haue bene performed: This Sphinx being a great robber by sea and land, was by the Corinthian Antis, led by Oedipus, overcome. But that which was written of her propounding of riddles, to those whom shee mastered, was meant by the rocke and vnaccessible mountaine neere Thibes, which she defended, and by Oedipus dissoluing her probleme his victorie ouer her. She was painted with wings, because exceeding swift, and with the bodie of a Lyon for her cruelrie. But that which Palaphatus reports of Sphinx, were more probable, did not the time disproue it, for he calls her an Amazonicke, and the wife of Cadmus: who when by her help he had cast Draco out of Thebes (neglecting her) he married the sister of Draco, which Sphinx taking in despitefull part, with her owne troope shee held the mountaine by Thebes, from whence she continued a sharpe warre vpon the Thebani, till by Oedipus ouerthrowne. About this time did Minos thrust his brother out of Crete, and held sharpe warre with the Megarians, and Athenians, because his sonne Androgeus was slaine by them. He posselt himselfe of Megara, by the treason of Seylla, daughter of Nisus the King. He was long Master of the sea, and brought the Athenians to the tribute of deliuering him euery yeere seuen of their sonnes: which tribute Thebes released, as shall bee shewed; when I come to the time of the next Iudge Thala. In the end hee was slaine at Camirinus or Caminus in Sicily, by Coelus the King, while he pursued Dadalus: and was esteemed by some to be the first law-giuer to those Ilands.

To this time are referred many deeds of Hercules, as the killing of Anteus the gyant, who was said to haue 40. and odder cubites of length, which though Plutarch doth confirme, reporting that there was such a bodie found by Sertorius the Roman, in Lybia, where Hercules slew Anteus; yet for my selfe, I thinke it but a lowd lie. That Anteus was of great strength, and a cunning wrestler, Ensebius affirmeth: and because hee cast so many men to the ground, hee was fained to bee the sonne of the Earth. Plinie saith, that he inhabited neere the gardens Hesperides in Mauritania. Augustine affirms that this Hercules was not of Greece, but of Lybia: and the Hydra also which he ouercame, Plato expoundeth to be a subtle Sophister.

§. VI.

Of the expedition of the Argonauts.

Bout the eleventh yeere of Gideon, was that famous expedition of the Argonauts: of which many fabulous discourses haue bene written, the summe of which is this.

Pelias the sonne of Neptune, brother by the mothers side to Aeson, who was Iasons father, reigning in Iolcus a towne of Thessalie, was warned by the Oracle of Apollo to take heede of him that ware but one shoe. This Belis afterward sacrificing to Neptune, inuited Iason to him, who comming hastily, lost one shoe in passing ouer a brooke: whereupon Pelias demanded of him what course he would take (supposing he were able) against one of whom an Oracle should aduise him to take heede: to which question when Iason had briefly answered, that he would send him to Colchos, to fetch the golden fleece, Pelias immediately commaunded him to vndertake that seruice. Therefore Iason prepared for the voyage, hauing a shippe built by Argus, the sonne of Phryxus, by the Counsell of Pallas: wherein hee procured all the bruiet men of Greece to saile with him: as Typhus the Master of the shippe, Orpheus the famous Poet, Castor and Pollux the sonnes of Tyndarus, Telaamon and Peleus, sonnes of Aacus, and fathers of Atax and Achilles, Hercules, Thestus, Zetes and Calais the two winged sonnes of Boreas, Amphiarus the great Southlayer, Aleager of Calidon that slew the great wilde boare: Arcalaphus and Ialmenus or Almenus the sonnes of Mars, who were afterwards at the last warre of Troy, Laertes the father of Ulysses, Atalanta a warlike virgine, Idas and Lyncæus the sonnes of Aphareus, who afterwards in fight with Castor and Pollux slew Castor, and wounded Pollux, but were slaine themselves: Lyncæus by Pellux, Idas by Iupiter with lightning.

These and many other went with Iason in the ship Argo: in whose prow was a table of the beech of Dodona, which could speake. They arriued first at Lemnos, the women of which Iland, hauing slaine all the males, purposing to lead an Amazonian life, were neuertheless contented to take their pleasure of the Argonauts. Hence they came to the Country about Cyzicus: where dwelt a people called Doliones: ouer whom then reigned one Cyzicus: who entertained them friendly: but it so fell out, that loosing thence by night they were driuen by contrary winds back into his port, neither knowing that it was the same Hauē, nor being knowne by the Doliones, to be the same men: but rather taken for some of their bordering enemies: by which meanes they fell to blowes, inso much that the Argonauts slew the molt part of the Doliones together with their King Cyzicus: which when by day light they perceiued, with many teares they solemnized his funeral. Then departed they againe and arriued shortly in Mysia, where they left Hercules and Polypheumus the sonne of Elateus, who went to seeke Hylas the darling of Hercules, that was rauished by the Nymphes.

Palipheumus built a towne in Mysia, called Cios, wherein he reigned. Hercules returned to Argos. From Mysia the Argonauts failed into Bythinia, which then was peopled by the Bebryes, the ancient inhabitants of the Country, ouer whom Aeneas the sonne of Neptune was then King. Hee being a strong man, compelled all strangers to fight with him, at whole battes, in which kinde of fight hee had slaine many, and was now himselfe slaine by Pollux. The Bebryes in reuenge of his death slew all vpon Pollux, but his companions rescued him, with great laughter of the people. They failed from hence to Samydesus, a towne in Thrace (somewhat out of their way) wherein Phineus a Soothsayer dwelt, who was blinde and vexed with the the Harpyes. The Harpyes were said to be a kinde of birds, which had the faces of women and foue long claws, very filthy creatures, which when the table was furnished for Phineus, came flying in, and deuouring or carrying away the greater part of the victuals, did so defile the rest, that they could not be endured. When therefore the Argonautes craued his aduise, and direction for their voyage: you shall doe well (quoth he) first of all to deliuer me from the Harpyes, and then afterwards to aske my Counsaile. Whereupon they caused the table to be couered, and meat set on; which was no sooner set downe, then that presently in came the Harpyes, and played their accustomed pranks: when Zetes and Calais the winged young men saw this, they drew their fowls, and pursued them through the ayre; some say so that both the Harpyes and the young men died of wearinesse in the flight, and pursuit. But Apollonius saith that the Harpyes did conenant with the youthes, to doe no moe harme to Phineus, and were thereupon dismissed. For this good turne Phineus gaue them informations of the way, and aduertised them withal of the dangerous rocks, called Symplegades, which by force of windes running together, did shut vp the passage: wherefore he willed them to put a pigeon before them into the passage: and if that passed safe, then to aduenteure after her: if not, then by no means to hazard themselves in vaine. They did so, and perceiuing that the pigeon had only lost a piece of her taile, they obserued the next opening of the rocks, and then rowing with all their might, passed through safe, onely the end of the poepe was bruised.

From thence forward, (as the tale goeth) the Symplegades haue stood still: for the Gods, say they, had decreed that after the passage of a shippe, they should be fixed. Thence the Argonautes came to the Mariandyni, a people inhabiting about the mouth of the riuer Parthenius, where Lycus the King entertained them courteously. Here Limon a Soothsayer of their company was slaine by a wild boare; also heere Typhus died: and Aeneas undertooke to steere the ship. So they passed by the riuer Thermodon, and mount Caucasus, and came to the riuer Phagis, which runnes through the land of Colchos. When they were entred theauen, Iason went to Aetes the King of Colchos, and told him the Commaundement of Pelias, and cause of his coming, desiring him to deliuer the golden Fleece, which Aetes, as the Fable goeth, promised to doe, if he alone would yoaake together two brazen hooft bulls, and plowing the ground with them, sowe dragons teeth, which Minerva had giuen to him, being part of those which Cadmus did sowe at Thebes. These bulls were great and fierce, and breathed out fire: Vulcan had giuen them to Aetes.

Whilest Iason was in a great perplexitie about this taske, Medea the daughter of Aetes, fell into a most vehement loue of him, so farre forth, that being excellent in Magique, she came priuily to him, promising her helpe, if he would assure her of his marriage. To this Iason agreed, and confirmed his promise by oath. Then gaue she to him a medicine wherewith she bad him to anoint both his bodie and his armour, which would preserue him from their violence: further she told him, that armed men would arise out from the ground, from the teeth which hee should sowe, and set vpon him. To remedie which inconuenience, shee bad him throw stones amongst them as soone as they came vp thicke, whereupon they would fall together to blowes, in such wise that he might easily slay them. Iason followed her counsaile; whereto when the euent had answered, hee againe demanded the Fleece. But Aetes was so farre from approving such his desire, that hee deuised how to destroy the Argonautes, and burne their ship, which Medea perceiuing, went to Iason, and brought him by night to the Fleece, which hung vpon an Oke in the groue of Mars, where they say it was kept by a Dragon, that neuer slept. This Dragon was by the Magique of Medea cast into a sleepe: so taking away the golden Fleece, she went with Iason into the ship Argo, hauing with her, her brother Abysrtus.

Aetes vnderstanding the praefises of Medea, provided to pursue the ship, whom when when Medea perceiued to be at hand, she slew her brother, & cutting him in pieces, she scattered his limbs in diuers places, of which Aetes finding some, was faine to seeke out the rest, and suffer his daughter to passe: the parts of his sonne hee buried in a place, which thereupon he called Tomis; the Greeke word signifieth banishment. Afterwards he sent many of his subiects to seeke the ship Argo, threatening that if they brought not backe Medea, they should suffer in her stead. In the meane while the Argonautes were driuen about the Seas, and were come to the Riuer Eridanus, which is Po in Italie.

Iupiter, offended with the slaughter of Abysrtus, vexed them with a great tempest, and carried them they knew not whither; when they came to the Ilands Abysrtides, there the ship Argo (that there might want no incredible thing in this Fable) spake to them, and said, that the anger of Iupiter should not cease, till they came to Ausonia, and were clesed by Circe, from the murder of Abysrtus. Now, they thereupon sayling betwene the coasts of Lybia and Cacia, and passing through the sea of Sardinia and along the coast of Hetruria, came to the Ile of Eoa, wherem Circe dwelt, who clesed them. Thence they sayled by the coast of the Syrens, who sang to allure them into danger: but Orpheus on the other side sang so well that he stayed them. Only Butes swamme out vnto them, whom Phineus rauished, and carried to Lycibetum in Sicilie to dwell.

Hauing past the Syrens, they came betwene Scylla and Charybdis, and the stragling rocks which seemed to cast out great store of flames and smoke. But Thetis and the Aetrides, conueyed them safe through at the appointment of Iuno. So they coasted Sicilie where the beemes of the Sunne were, and touched at Coreyra, the Iland of the Phaeaces, where King Alecinous reigned. Meane while, the men of Colchos, that had bene sent by Aetes in quest of the ship Argo, hearing no newes of it, and fearing his anger, if they fulfilled not his will, betooke themselves to new habitations: some of them dwelt in the mountaines of Coreyra, others in the Ilands Abysrtides, and some coming to the Phaeaces, there found the ship Argo, and demanded Medea of Alecinous: whereto Alecinous made answer, that if they were not Iasons wife, they should haue her; but if they were already married, he would not take her from her husband. Arete, the wife of Alecinous, hearing this, married them: wherefore they of Colchos not daring to returne home, stayed with the Phaeaces; so the Argonautes departed thence, and after a while came to Crete. In this Iland, Aminas reigned, who had a man of brasse giuen to him (as some of the Fable say) by Vulcan. This man had one veine in his bodie reaching from the necke to the heele, the end whereof was closed vp with a brazen naile, his name was Talus: his custome was to runne thrice a day about the Iland for the defence of it. When hee saw the ship Argo passe by, hee threw stones at it, but Medea with her Magique destroyed him. Some say that shee slew him by potions, which made him mad; others, that promising to make him immortall, shee drew out the naile that stopp his veine, by which meanes all his blood ranne out, and he died; others there are that say he was slaine by Pagan, who wounded him with an arrow in the heele. From hence the Argonautes sayled to Egina, where they were faine to fight for fresh water. And lastly, from Egina they sayled by Eubaea and Leontes home to Iolus, where they arrived, hauing spent foure whole months in the expedition.

Some there are that by this iourney of Iason vnderstand the mysterie of the Philosophers stone, called the golden Fleece, to which also, other super-fine Chymists draw the twelue labours of Hercules. Suidas thinks that by the golden Fleece, was meant a booke of Parchment, which is of sheepe-skin, and therefore called golden, because it was taught therein how other metalls might be transmuted. Others would signifie by Iason, wisdom, and moderation, which ouer-commeth all perils: but that which is most probable is the opinion of Dervilius, that the stone of such a passage was true, and that Iason with the rest went indeed to rob Colchos, to which they might arriue by boate. For not farre from Caucasus there are certaine steepe falling falling torrents which wash downe many graines of gold, as in many other parts of the world, and the people there inhabiting vs to see many flocks of wooll in those descents of waters, in which the graines of gold remaine; and the water passeth through, which Strabo witnesseth to be true. The many rocks, straits, sands, and Currents, in the passage betweene Greece and the bottom of Pontus, are Poetically conuerted into those fierie bulls, the armed men rising out of the ground; the Dragon cast allepe, and the like. The man of brasse, the Syrens, Scylla and Charybdis, were other hazards and adventures which they fell into in the Mediterran sea, disguised, as the rest, by Orpheus, vnder poeticall morall's: all which Homer afterward vsed (the man of brasse excepted) in the description of Polysses his traualles, on the 10 same Inland-seas.

OF ABIMELECH, THOLAH, and LAIR, and of the Lapytha, and of THESEVS, HYPOLYTUS, &c.

After the death of Gideon, Abimelech his base sonne begotten on a Concubine of the Sechemites, remembering what offers had been made to his father by the people, who desired to make him and his their perpetuall Princes; and as it seemeth, supposing (notwithstanding his fathers religious modestie) that some of his brethren might take on them the Soueraigntie, practised with the inhabitants of Sechem (of which his mother was native) to make election of himselfe, who being easily moued with the glorie, to haue a King of their owne, readily condescended: and the better to enable Abimelech, they borrowed 70. pieces of silver of their Idoll Baalberith, with which treasure he hyred a company of loose and desperate vagabonds, to assist his first detestable enterprize, to wit, the slaughter of his 70. brethren, the sonnes of Gideon, begotten on his wiues, of which he had many, of all which none escaped but Iotham the youngest, who hid himselfe from his present furie: all which hee executed on one stone, a crueltie exceeding all that hath beene written of in any age. Such is humane ambition, a monster that neither feareth God (though all-powerfull, and whose reuenges are without date and for euermore) neither hath it respect to nature, which laboureth the preferuacion of euery being: but it rageth also against her, though garnished with beautie which neuer dieth, and with loue that hath no end. All other passions and affections, by which the soules of men are tormented, are by their contraries oftentimes resisted or qualified. But ambition, which begetteth euery vice, and is it selfe the childe and darling of Satan, looketh only towards the ends by it selfe set downe, forgetting nothing (how fearefull and inhumane soeuer) which may serue it: remembering nothing, what soeuer iustice, pietie, right or religion can offer and alleadge on the contrary. It scribeth the lamentable effects of like attempts, to the error or weaknesse of the vnder takers, and rather praileth the adventure than feareth the like successe. It was the first sinne that the world had, and began in Angels: for which they were cast into hell, without hope of redemption. It was more ancient than man, and therefore no part of his naturall corruption. The punishment also preceeded his creation, yet hath the Deuill which felt the smart thereof, taught him to forget the one as out of date, and to practise the other, as bestitting euery age, and mans condition.

Iotham, the youngest of Gideon sonnes, hauing escaped the present perill, fought by his best persuasions to alienate the Sechemites, from the assisting of this mercilesse tyrant, letting them know, that those which were vertuous, and whom reason and religion had taught the safe and happie estate of moderate subiection, had refused to receiue as vnlawfull, what others had not power to giue, without direction from the King of Kings: who from the beginning (as to his owne peculiar people) had had appointed them by whom and how to bee governed. This hee taught them by the Oliue, which contented it selfe with it's fatnesse, the Figge tree with sweetnesse, and the Vine with the good iuyce it had: the Bramble onely, who was moit base, cut downe all the rest, and accepted the Soueraigntie. He also foretold them by a Propheticall spirit, what should befall them in the end, and how a fire should come out of the Bramble, and consume the Cedars of Libanon.

Now (as it is an ealie matter to call those men backe whom rage without right led on) Gai the sonne of Ebed withdrew the Citizens of Sechem, from the seruice of Abimelech: who therefore after some assaults entred the place, and mastered it; and an conclusion fired the towne, wherein their Idoll Baalberith was worshipped, and put all the people of all sorts to the slaughter. Lastly, in the assault of the Caille or Tower of Teber, himselfe was wounded in the head with a stone throwne ouer the wall by a woman, and finding himselfe mortally brused, hee commaunded his owne page to pierce his bodie, thereby to auoid the dishonour of being slaine by so feeble a hand.

While Abimelech vsurped the Government, the Lapytha and Centaures made warre against the Thebanes. These Nations were descended of Apollo, and were the first in these parts that deuiled to mannage horses, to bridle and to fit them: in so much as when they first came downe from the mountaines of Pindus, into the plaines, those which had neuer seene horsemen before, thought them creatures compounded of men and horses; so did the Mexicans when Ferdinando Cortes the Spaniard first inuaded that Empire.

After the death of Abimelech, Thola of Isachar gouerned Israel 23. yeeres, and after him Iair the Gileadite 22. yeeres, who seemeth to bee descended of Iair the sonne of Manasse, who in Moses time conquered a great part of Gilead, and called the same after his owne name, Haboth Iair. For to this Iair there remained thirtie of those Cities, which his ancelter had recovered from the Amonites. Of these Iudges, because there is nothing else written, it is an argument that during all their times, Israel liued without disturbance and in peace.

When Iair iudged Israel, Priamus beganne to reigne in Troy, who at such time as Hercules lacked Ilium, was carried away captiue with his sister Hesione into Greece, and being afterward redeemed for ranfome, hee rebuilt and greatly strengthned, and adorned Troy; and so farre enlarged his Dominions, as hee became the supreme Lord in effect of all Asia the lesse. He married Heceba the daughter of Cisseus King of Thrace, and had in all (saith Cicero) fiftie sonnes, whereof Euentene by Heceba, of whom Paris was one; who attempting to recouer his aunt Hesione, tooke Helena the wife of Menelaus the cause of the warre which followed.

The tenth King of Athens began likewise to reigne in the beginning of Iair: some writers call him the sonne of Nephteme and Aethra; but Plutark in the storie of his life findes him begotten by Aegeus, of whom the Grecian sea betwene it and Asia the lesse tooke name. For when Athens had mastered the Athenians, so farre as hee forst them to pay him seuen of their sonnes euery yeere for tribute, whom hee inclosed within a Labyrinth, to bee deuoured by the monster Minotaur: because belike the sonnes of Taurus, which hee begat on Passiphae the Quene, had the charge of them: Among these seuen Theus thrust himselfe, not doubting by his valour to deliuer the rest, and to free his Countie of that flauerie occasioned for the death of Androgeus, Minos his sonne.

And hauing posselt himselfe of Ariadnes affection, who was Minos daughter, hee receiued from her a bosome of thred, by which hee conducted himselfe through all the crooked and inextricable turnings of the Labyrinth, made in all like that of the Citie of Crocodiles in Egypt; by meane whereof hauing slaine Minotaur, hee found a readie way to returne. But whereas his father Aegeus had giuen order, that if hee came backe with victorie and in safetie, hee should vie a white saile in signe thereof, and not that mournfull blacke saile, vnder which they left the port of Athens. This instruction beeing either forgotten or neglected, Aegew desfering the shippe of Thesew with a blacke saile, cast himselfe ouer the rockes into the Sea, afterward called of his name Aegewum.

One of the first famous actes of Thesew, was the killing of Scyron, who kept a passage betwene Megara and the Peloponnesian Isthmos, and threw all whom hee mastered into the Sea, from the high rockes. Afterward hee did like to Cercyon, by wrestling, who vled by that Arte to kill others. Hee also ridde the Country of Procrustes, who vled to bend downe the strong limbes of two trees, and fastened by cordes such as hee tooke, part of them to one and part to the other bough, and by their springing backe tare them asunder. So did hee roote out Periphetes and other mischievous theeves and murderers. Hee ouerthrew the armie of the Amazons, who after many victories and vastations, entred the Territorie of Athens. Thesew hauing taken their Queene Hippolyta prisoner, begat on her Hippolytus; with whom afterward his mother in law Phadra, falling in loue, and hee refusing to abuse his fathers bed, Phadra perswaded Thesew that his sonne offered to force her: after which it is fained, that Thesew besought Neptune to reuenge this wrong of his sonnes, by some violent death. Neptune taking a time of aduantage, sent out his Sea-Caluces, as Hippolytus passed by the sea shore, and so affrighted his horses, as casting the Coach ouer, hee was (by being intangled therein) torne in pieces. Which miserable and vnderfered destinee, when Phadra had heard of, shee strangled herselfe. After which it is fained, that Diana entreated Aesculapius to set Hippolytus his pieces together, and to restore him to life: which done, because hee was chaste, shee led him with her into Italie, to accompanie her in her hunting, and field sports.

It is probable that Hippolytus, when his father fought his life, thinking to escape by Sea, was affronted thereat, and receiued many wounds in forcing his passage and escape; which wounds Aesculapius, to wit, some skilfull Physician, or Chirurgeon healed againe, after which hee past into Italy, where he liued with Diana, that is, the life of a hunter, in which hee most delighted. But of these ancient prophane Stories, Platarch saith well, that as Cosmographers in their descriptions of the world, where they finde many vast places whereof they know nothing, fill the same with strange beastes, birdes, and fishes, and with Mathematicall lines, so doe the Græcian Historians and Poets imbroder and intermixe the tales of ancient times, with a world of fictions and fabulous discourses. True it is, that Thesew did many great things in imitation of Hercules, whom hee made his patterne, and was the first that gathered the Athenians, from being disperst in thinnie and ragged villages: in recompence whereof, and for deuiling them lawes to liue vnder, and in order, hee was by the beggerly, mutable, and vngratefull multitude, in the end banished. Some say per Ostracismum, by the Lawe of Lottes, or names written on shelles, which was a deuice of his owne.

Hee stole Helens (as they say) when she was 50. yeeres olde, from Aphidia, which Citie Caster and Pollux ouerturned; when they followed after Thesew to recouer their sister. Erasistratus and Pausanias write that Thesew begat her with child at Argos, where shee erected a Temple to Lucina: but her age makes that tale vnlikely to bee true, and so doth Ouid, Nō tam ex factō fructum tulit ille petunt, &c. The rape Eusebius findes in the first of Iair, who gouerned Israel 22. yeeres, to whom succeeded Iephtha or Iephth fixe yeeres, to whom Ibzan who ruled Iscen yeeres, and then Habibon eight yeere: in wholtime was the fall of Troy. So as, if Thesew had a childe by her in the first of Iair, (at which time we must count her no lesse than fifteene yeere olde; for the women did not commonly beginne so young as they doe now) shee was then at least two and fiftie yeere olde at the destruction of Troy: and when shee was stolen by Paris eight and thirtie: but here in the Chronologers doe not agree. Yet Eusebius and Bunting with Halicarnassus doe doe in effect consent, that the Citie was entred, and burnt in the first yeere of Demophon King of Athens, the succellour of Minestheus, the succellour of Thesew, seuentene dayes before the Summer Tropique, and that about the eleuenth of September following, the Troians crost the Hellspont into Thrace, & wintred there, and in the next spring that they navigated into Sicilia, where wintred the second yeere, the next summer they arriued at Lawentum, and builded Launium. But S. Augustine bath otherwise, that when Poliphides gouerned Scyron, Minestheus Athens, Tautanes Affrya, Habdon Israel, then Eneas arriued in Italie, transporting with him in twentie shippes the remainder of the Troians: but the difference is not great: and hereof more at large in the storie of Troy at hand.

In Sicyonia Phæstus the two and twentieth King, reigned eight yeeres, beginning by the common account in the time of Thola. His succellours, Adraistus, who reigned foure yeeres, and Poliphides who reigned thirteene, are accounted to the time of Iair, so is also Minestheus King of Athens, and Atræus, who held a great part of Peloponnesus. In Affrya, during the gouernment of these two peaceable Iudges, Mitrius and after him Tautanes reigned. In Egypt Amenophis, the sonne of Ramfes, and afterwards Annenemes.

§. VII.

Of the warre of Thebes which was in this age.

N this age was the warre of Thebes, the most ancient that euer Greeke Poet or Historian wrote of: Wherefore the Roman Poet Lucretius, affirming (as the Epicures in this point held truly against the Peripateticks) that the world had a beginning, vrgeth them with this obiection.

Si nulla fuit genitalis origo
Rerum, & mundi, semperque aeterna suere,
Cur supra bellum Thebanum, & funera Troie,
Nō alius alij quoque res cecinerit poeta?

If all this world had no original,
But things haue euer beene as now they are:
Before the siege of Thebes or Troyes last fall,
Why did no Poet sing some elder warre?

It is true that in these times Greece was very saluage, the inhabitants being often chased from place to place, by the captaines of greater Tribes: and no man thinking the ground whereon hee dwelt his owne longer than hee could hold it by strong hand. Wherefore merchandize and other intercourse they vled little, neither did they plant many trees, or sow more corne than was necessarie for their sustentance. Money they had little or none, for it is thought that the name of money was not heard in Greece, when Homer did write, who measures the valew of gold and brasse by the worth in cattell; saying that the golden armour of Glaucus, was worth 100. beeces, and the copper armour of Diomedes worth nine.

Robberies by land and sea were common and without shame, and to steale horses or kine was the vusual exercise of their great men. Their townes were not so many, whereof those that were walled were very few, and not great. For Myæne the principall Citie in Peloponnesus was a very little thing, and it may well be thought that these were proportionable: briefly, Greece was then in her infancie, and though in some small townes of that halfe Ile of Peloponnesus, the inhabitants might haue enioyed quietnesse within their narrow bounds; as likewise did the Atbenians because their Country was so barren, that none did care to take it from them: yet that the land in general was very rude, it will easily appeare to such as consider, what Thucydides the greatest of their Historians hath written to this effect, in the praeface to his Historie. Wherefore, as in the latter times, idle Chroniclers vñ when they want good matter, to fill whole bookes with reports of great frosts, or dry summers, and other such things which no man cares to read, so did they who spake of Greece in her beginnings, remember onely the great floods which were in the times of Ogyges, and Deucalion: or else rehearse fables of men changed into birds, of strange monsters, of adulterie committed by their Gods, and the mightie men which they begat, without writing ought that sauueth red of humanitie before the time of the warre of Thebes: the brieue whereof is this.

HOM. Odyss. 11.

Oedipus the sonne of Laius King of Thebes, hauing bene cast forth when hee was an infant, because an Oracle foretolde what euill should come to passe by him, did afterwards in a narrow passage contending for the way, slay his owne father, not knowing either then or long after, who hee was. Afterward hee became King of Thebes, by marriage of the Queene Iocasta, called by Homer Epiclese: on whom, not knowing her to bee his mother, hee begat two sonnes, Eteocles and Polynices. But when in proceesse of time, finding out by good circumstances, who were his parents, hee vnderstood the grieuous murder and incest hee had committed, he tore out his owne eyes for griefe, and lete the Citie. His wife and mother did hang her selfe. Some say, that Oedipus hauing his eyes pulled out, was expelled Thebes, bitterly cursing his sonnes, because they suffered their father to bee cast out of the Towne, and ayded him not. Howsoeuer it were, his two Sonnes made this agreement, that the one of them should reigne one yeere, and the other another yeere; and so by course rule interchangeably. But this appointment was ill obserued. For when Polynices had after a yeeres Government reigned, the Kingdome to his brother: or (according to others) when Eteocles had reigned the first yeere, hee refused to giue ouer the rule to Polynices. Hereupon Polynices fled vnto Argos, where Adrastus the sonne of Talaus then reigned, vnto whose palace comming by night, hee was driuen to seek lodging in an out-houise, on the backside.

There hee met with Tydeus the sonne of Oeneus, who was fled from Calidon: with whom struing about their lodging, hee fell to blowes. Adrastus hearing the noyse, came forth and tooke vp the quarrell. At which time perceiving in the shield of Tydeus a Bore, in that of Polynices a Lyon, hee remembered an olde Oracle, by which hee was aduised to giue his two daughters in marriage, to a Lyon and a Bore: and accordingly hee did bestow his daughter Argia vpon Tydeus, and Dipyle vpon Polynices, promising to reitore them both to their Countries. To this purpose leuying an armie, and assembling as many valiant Captaines as hee could draw to follow him, hee was desirous among others to carrie Amphiarus the sonne of Oideus a great Soothsayer, and a valiant man, along with him. But Amphiarus, who is said to haue foreseene all things, knowing well that none of the Captaines should escape, save onely Adrastus, did both vterly refuse to bee one in that expedition, and perswaded others to stay at home. Polynices therefore dealt with Eriphyle the wife of Amphiarus, offering vnto her a very faire bracelet, vpon condition that shee should cause her husband to assit him. The Soothsayer knowing what should worke his destinie, forbidd his wife to take any gift of Polynices. But the bracelet was in her eye so precious a iewel, that she could not refuse it. Therefore whereas a great controuersie, betwene Amphiarus and Adrastus, was by way of compromise put vnto the decision of Eriphyle, either of them being bound by solemne oath to stand to her appointment: shee ordered the matter so, as a woman should, that loued a bracelet better than her husband. Hee now finding that it was more easie to foresee than auoide destinie, sought such count fort as reuenge might afford, giuing in charge to his sonnes, that when they came to fullage, they should kill their mother and make strong warre vpon the Thebans.

Now had Adrastus assembled all his forces, of which, the seuen chiefe leaders were, himselfe, Amphiarus, Capaneus, and Hippomedon (in steade of whom some name Metisfeus) all Argiues, with Polynices the Theban, Tydeus the Ætolian, and Parthenopeus the Arcadian sonne of Meleager and Atalanta. When the armie came to the Nemean wood, they met a woman whom they desired to helpe them to some water, she hauing a child in her armes, laid it downe, and led the Argiues to a spring: but ere three returned, a Serpent had slaine the childe. This woman was Hippolyte the daughter of Thoas the Lemnian, whom shee would haue saved when the women of the Ile slew all the males by conspiracie, intending to lead an Amazonian life. For such her pietie, the Lemnian wiues did sell her to Pyrrates, and the Pyrrates to Lycurgus Lord of the Country about Nemea, whose yong sonnes Opheltes or Archemorus, the did nurse, and lost as is shewed before. When vpon the childs death shee hid herselfe for feare of her maister, Amphiarus told her sonnes where they should finde her: and the Argiues did both kill the Serpent which had slaine the childe, and in memorie of the chaunce, did institute solemne funerall games called Nemean, wherein Adrastus wanne the prize with his swift horse Arion, Tydeus with whorlcbats, Amphiarus at running and quoying, Polynices at wrestling, Parthenopeus at shooting, and one Laococus in darting. This was the first institution of the Nemean games, which continued after famous in Greece for very many ages. There are, who thinke that they were ordained in honour of one Opheltus, a Lacedemonian. Some say by Hercules, when hee had slaine the Nemean Lyon: but the common opinion agrees with that which is here set downe.

From Nemea the Argiues marching onwards, arrived at Cithæron, whence Tydeus was by them sent Embassadour to Thebes, to require of Eteocles the performance of Coucnants betwene him and Polynices. This message was nothing agreeable to Eteocles, who was thoroughly resolued to holde what hee had, as long as hee could: so which Tydeus perceiving and intending partly to get honour, partly to trie what mettle was in the Thebans, hee made many challenges, and obtained victorie in all of them, not without much enuie and malice of the people, who laide fittie men in ambush to intercept him at his returne to the armie, of which fittie hee slew all but one, whom hee sent backe to the Citie as a reporter and witness of his valour. When the Argiues vnderstood how resolute Eteocles was, they presented themselves before the Citie, and incamped round about it. Thebes is said to haue had at that time seuen gates, which belike flood not farre asunder, seeing that the Argiues (who afterward when they were very farre stronger, could scarce muster vp more thousands then Thebes had gates) did compass the towne. Adrastus quartered before the gate Homoloides, Capaneus before the Oegyan, Tydeus before Crenis, Amphiarus at Proctis, Hippomedon at Anchisis, Parthenopeus at Electra, and Polynices at Hypsistia. In the meane season, Eteocles hauing armed his men, and appointed Commanders vnto them, tooke aduice of Trochus the Soothsayer, who promised victorie to the Thebans, if Athenacus the sonne of Creon a principall man of the Citie, would vowe himselfe to bee slaine in honour of Mars the God of warre. So full of malice and pride is the Diuell, and so enuious at his Creators glorie, that hee not onely challengeth honours due to God alone, as oblation: and sacrifice with all Diuine worship, but commandeth vs to offer our selues, and our children vnto him, when hee hath sufficiently clouded mens vnderstanding, and bewitched their wits with ignorance and blinde deuotion. And such abominable sacrifice of men, maidens, and children hath hee exacted of the Syrians, Carthaginians, Galles, Germanes, Cyprians, Aegyptians, and of many other, if not of all Nations, when through ignorance or feare they were most filled with superstition. But as they grew more wise, so did hee waxe lesse impudent in cunning, though not lesse malicious in desiring the continuance of such barbarous inhumanitie. For King Diphilus in Cyprus without aduice of any Oracle, made the Idoll of that Country reit contented with an Ox in head of a man. Tiberius forbade humane sacrifices in Africa, and crucified the Priests in the groves where they had practised them. Heraclus taught the Italians to drowne men of hay in stead of the liuing: yet among the saluages in the West Indies these cruell offerings haue been practised of late ages: which as it is a sufficient argument that Satans malice is onely couered and hidden by this subtiltie among ciuill people: so may it serue as a probable Coniecture of the barbarismes then reigning in Greece. For Menacius, as soone as he vnderstood that his death might purchase victorie to his people, belowed himselfe (as he thought) vpon Mars,¹⁰ killing himselfe before the gates of the Citie. Then was a battaile fought, wherein the Argiues prevailed so farre at the first, that Capaneus aduancing ladders to the wall, got vp vpon the rampart: whence, when he fell or was cast downe, or (as writers haue it) was stricken downe by Iupiter with a thunder-bolt, the Argiues fled. Many on each part were slaine in this battell, which caused both sides to desire that Eteocles and Polynices might trie out the quarrell in single fight: whereto the two brethren according, flew each other.

Another battell was fought after their death, wherein the sonnes of Asphus behaued themselves very valiantly: Ismaeus one of the sonnes slew Hippomedon which was one of the seven Princes: Parthenopaus being another of the seven (who was faide to haue bene so faire that none would hurt him when his face was bare) was slaine by Amphidicus, or as some say, by Perichymenus the sonne of Neptune: and the valiant Tydeus by Menealus: yet ere Tydeus died, the head of Menealus was brought vnto him by Amphiarauus, which hee cruely tore open and swallowed vp the braines. Vpon which fact, it is said, that Pallas, who had brought from Iupiter such remedie for his wound, as should haue made him immortal, refused to bestow it vpon him: whereby perhaps was meant that his honour which might haue continued immortal, did perish through the beauly rage that hee shewed at his death.

The host of the Argiues being wholly discomfited, Adrastus and *Amphiarauus*³⁰ fledde: of whom Amphiarauus is said to haue been swallowed quicke into the earth, nere to the riuer Ismenus, together with his Chariot, and so lost out of mens sight, being peraduenture ouerwhelmed with dead carriages or drowned in the riuer: and his bodie neuer found nor greatly sought for. Adrastus escaped on his good horse Arian, and came to Albens; where sitting at an Altar called the Altar of Mercie, hee made supplication for their aide to recover their bodies. For Creon hauing obtained the Government of Thebes, after the death of Eteocles, would not suffer the bodies of the Argiues to be buried: but caused Antigone, the only daughter then liuing of Oedipus, to be buried quicke, because shee had fought out and buried the bodie of her brother Polynices, contrary to Creons Edict. The Athenians also condescending to the request of Adrastus, did send forth an armie vnder the Conduct of Thebes, which tooke Thebes, and restored the bodies of the Argiues to Sepulture: at which time Eucadne the wife of Capaneus, threw herselfe into the funerall fire, and was burnt willingly with her husband. But it little contented the sonnes of those Captaines which were slaine at Thebes, that any lesse reuenge should be taken of their fathers death, than the ruine of the Citie: wherefore tenne yeeres after hauing leuiued forces, Egealeus the sonne of Adrastus, Diomedes of Tydeus, Promachus of Parthenopaus, Sthenelus of Capaneus, Thersander of Polynices, and Euripylus of Metislaus, marched thither vnder the conduct of Alcmaon the sonne of Amphiarauus: with whom also went his brother Amphiloctus. Apollo promised victorie if Alcmaon were their Captaine, whom afterward by another Oracle he commaunded to kill his owne mother.

When they came to the citie, they were incountred by Laodamas the son of Eteocles then King of the Thebans, (for Creon was only Tutor to Laodamas) who though hee did did valiantly in the battaile, and slue Egealeus, yet was he put to the worst, and driuen to fle, or (according to Apollodorus) slain by Alcmaon. After this disaster the citizens began to desire composition; but in the meane time they conuayed themselues with their wiues and children away from thence by night, and so began to wander vp and downe, till at length they built the Towne called Eschias. The Argiues, when they perceived that their enemies had quitted the Towne, entering into it, sacked it, threw downe the walls, and layd it waste; howbeit it is reported by some that the Towne was saued by Thersander, the sonne of Polynices, who causing the Citizens to returne, did there raigne ouer them. That hee saued the Citie from vtter destruction, it is very likely, for hee reigned there, and led the Thebans to the Warre of Troy, which very shortly after ensued.

¶ VIII.

Of Iephthas and how the three hundred yeeres which hee speake of, Iud. 11. v. 28. are to be reconciled with the places, Act. 13. 20. 1. Reg. 6. 1. together with some other things touching Chronologie about these times.

After the death of Sair (nere about whose times these things happened in Greece, and during whose government, and that of Tholus, Israel liued in peace and in order) they reuolted againe from the law, and service of God, and became more wicked and Idolatrous than euer. For whereas in the former times they worshipped Baal and Asteroth, they now became followers of all the Heathen Nations adioyning, and embraced the Idolls of the Aramites, of the Zidonians, Mobabites and Ammonites: with those of the Philistines. And as before it pleased God to correct them by the Aramites, by the Amalekites and Midianites: so now he scourged them by the Ammonites, and afterward by the Philistines.

Now among the Israelites, those of Gilead being most oppressed, because they bordered vpon the Ammonites, they were infort to seeke Iephthas, whom they had formerly despised and cast from them, because he was base borne; but hee (notwithstanding those former iniuries) participating more of godly compassion, than of deuillish hatred and reuenge, was content to leade the Gileadites to the Warre, vpon condition that they should establish him their Gouvernour after victorie. And when he had disputed with Ammon for the Land, disproued Ammons right, and fortified the title of Israel by many arguments, the same preuailing nothing, hee beganne the warre; and being strengthened by God, ouerthrew them: and did not onely beate them out of the plaines, but forst them ouer the mountaines of Arabia, euen to Minimith, and Abel of the vineyards, Cities exprest heretofore in the description of the holy Land. After which victory it is said, that he performed the vaine vow, which hee made, to sacrifice the first liuing creature hee incountred, comming out of his house to meete him; which happened to be his owne daughter, and only child, who with all patience submitted herselfe, and onely desired two Moneths time to bewaile her Virginitie on the mountaines of Gilead; because in her the issues of her Father ended: but the other opinion that shee was not offered, is more probable, which Berthaus and others proue sufficiently.

After these things the children of Israel, of the Tribe of Ephraim, either enuious of Iephthas victorie, or other wise making way to their future calamitie, and to the most grieuous slavery that euer Israel suffered, quarrelled with Iephthas, that they were not called to the Warre, as before time they had consented with Gideon. Iephthas hereupon enforst to defend himselfe against their fury, in the incounter slew of them two and fortie thousand, which so weakened the bodie of the Land, as the Philistines had had an easie conquest of them all not long after: Iephtha, after he had iudged Israel six yeeres, died: to whom succeeded Iezan, who ruled seven yeeres: after him Eloa was their Iudge ten yeeres: in all which time Israel had peace. Eusebius finds not Eloa, whom he calleth Adon, for in the Septuagint, approved in his time, this Iudge was omitted.

Now before I goe on with the rest, it shall bee necessary vpon the occasion of Iephtha's account of the times Iud. 11. 28. (where he sayes that Israel had then posselt the East side of Jordan 300. yeeres) to speake somewhat of the times of the Iudges, and of the differing opinions among the Diuines and Chronologers: there being found three places of Scriptures touching this point seeming repugnant, or disagreeing: the first is in this dispute between Iephtha and Ammon, for the right and possession of Gilead: the second is that of S. Paul, Act. 13. the third that which is in the first of Kings. Iephtha here challengeth the possession of Gilead for 300. yeeres: Saint Paul giueth to the Iudges, as it seemes, from the end of Iofua, to the last of Heli, 450. yeeres. In the first of Kings it is taught, that from the departing of Israel out of Egypt, to the foundation of Salomons Temple, there were consumed 480. yeeres. To the first Beroaldus findeth Iephtha's 300. yeeres to bee but 266. yeeres, to wit, 18. of Iofua, 40. of Othniel, 80. of Aod and Samgar, 40. of Debora, 40. of Gideon, 3. of Abimelech, 23. of Thola, and 22. of Iair: But Iephtha (saith Beroaldus) putteth or propoeth a certaine number, for an vncertaine: Sicvt dicit animum agi prope trecentisimum, ex quo nullus item ea de re mouerit Israeli; 50 hie speakeeth (saith hee) as meaning, that ita ita was about or wel-nigh the three hundred yeeres, since Israel possessed those Countries, no man making question of their right. Codoman on the contrary findes more yeeres than Iephtha named by 65. to wit, 365. whereof 71. were spent in Israel's captiuitie, at severall times, of which (as Codoman thinketh) Iephtha forbore to reapeate the whole summe or any great part, lest the Ammonites should haue iustly objected, that 71. of those yeeres, the Israelites were in captiuitie and vassals to their neighbour Princes, and therefore knowing that to name 300. yeeres it was enough for prescription, hee omitted the rest.

To iustifie this account of 365. yeeres, besides the 71. yeeres of captiuitie or affliction, to be added to Beroaldus's 266. he addeth also 28. yeeres more, and so maketh vp the summe of 365. These 28. yeeres hee findeth out thus: 20. yeeres hee giues to the Seniors between Iofua and Othniel: and where Beroaldus alloweth but 18. yeeres to Iofua's his gouernment, Codoman accounts that his rule lasted 26. according to Iosephus; whereas S. Augustine and Eusebius giue him 27. Melancthon 32. The trueth is, that this addition of 28. yeeres is farre more doubtfull than the other of 71. But though we admit not of this addition, yet by accounting of some part of the yeeres of affliction (to wit, 34. yeeres of the 71.) it wee addeth them to the 266. yeeres of Beroaldus, which reckoneth none of these, we haue the iust number of 300. yeeres. Neither is it strange that Iephtha should leaue out more than half of these yeeres of affliction: seeing as it is already said, the Ammonites might except against these 71. yeeres, and say, that during these yeeres, or at least a good part of them, the Israelites had no quiet possession of the Countries in question. Martin Luther is the Author of a third opinion, making those 300. yeeres remembered by Iephtha, to be 306. which odde yeeres, saith hee, Iephtha omiteth. But because the yeeres of euery Iudge as they reigned, cannot make vp this number of 306. but doe onely compound 266. therefore doth Luther adde to this number, the whole time which Moses spent in the Deserts of Arabia Petrea; which fortie yeeres of Moses added to the number which Beroaldus findeth of 266. make indeede 306.

But I see nothing in the Text to warrant Luther's iudgement herein: for in the dispute between Iephtha and Ammon for the Land of Gilead, it is written in the person of Ammon in these words: Because Israel took my Land, when they came vp from Egypt from Arnon vnto Iaboc, &c. now therefore restore those Lands quietly or in peace. So by this place it is plaine that the time is not to bee accounted from Moses departure out out of Egypt: but from the time that the Land was posselt. For it is said, Quid ex ipse terram meam; Because Israel took my Land: and therefore the beginning of this account is to bee referred to the time of the taking: which Iephtha and we also confirmeth in these words: When Israel dwelt in Hesbion, and in her Townes, and in Aror and in her Townes, and in all the Cities that are by the coast of Arnon 300. yeeres: why did ye not then recover them in that space? So as this place speaketh directly, that Israel had inhabited and dwelt in the Cities of Gilead 300. yeeres: and therefore to account the times from the hopes or intents, that Israel had to possesse it, it seemeth somewhat strained to me; for we doe not vfe to reckon the time of our conquests in France, from our Princes intents or purposes, but from their victories and possessions.

Iunius neuertheless likes the opinion of Luther, and sayes, that this time of 300. yeeres hath reference, and is to take beginning from the first of Iephtha's narration: when he makes a briefe repetition of Moses whole iourney: to wit, at the sixteenth Verse of the eleventh Chapter of Iudges, in our translation in these words: But when Israel came vp from Egypt, &c. and therefore Moses his forty yeeres (as he thinkes) are to be accounted, which make the number of 305. yeeres: and not only the time in which Israel posselt Gilead, according to the Text and Iephtha's owne words: of which I leaue the iudgement to others; to whom also I leaue to iudge, whether we may not beginne the 480. yeeres, from the deliuerance out of Egypt to the Temple, euen from the first departure out of Egypt, and yet finde a more probable reconciliation of S. Paul's and Iephtha's account with this reckoning: than any of those that as yet haue been signified. For first, touching Iephtha's 300. yeeres of possession of the East side of Jordan, it is to be remembered, that for a good while before the Israelites possessed it, Sehon and Og had dispossessed Moab and Ammon thereof: so that when the Israelites had conquered Sehon and Og, the right of possession which they had, passed to Israel; and so Iephtha might say that they had possessed those Countries 300. yeeres, reckoning 266. yeeres of their owne possession, and the rest of the possession of the two Kings Sehon and Og, whose right the Israelites had by the law of conquest.

The second place disputed is this of S. Paul, Act. 13. that from the end of Iofua to the beginning of Samuel, there past 450. yeeres. And this place Luther vnderstandeth also besides the letter (as I finde his opinion cited by Functius Krentzenbinius, and Beza) for I haue not read his Commentaries. For he accounteth from the death of Moses, to the last yeere of Heli, but 357. yeeres: and this he doth the better to approve the times from the egression out of Egypt to the building of the Temple, which in the first King 6. is said to be 480. yeeres.

Now so far as much as S. Paul (as it seemes) findes 450. yeeres from the death of Iofua, to the last of Heli, and leaues but 30. yeeres for Saul and Samuel, who gouerned 40. for Dauid who ruled 40. and for Salomon who was the Crowne three whole yeeres ere the foundation of the Temple was laid; therefore Luther takes it, that there was error in the Scribe, who wrote out this piece of Scripture of S. Paul: to wit, Then afterward hee gaue vnto them Iudges about 450. yeeres, vnto the time of Samuel: the words than afterward, being cleerely referred to the death or after the death of Iofua, as shall be hereafter proued. But where S. Luke rehearsing the words of S. Paul, wrote 350. yeeres (saith Luther) the Scribe in the transcription being deceived by the affinity of those two Greeke wordes, whereof the one signifieth 300. and the other 400. wrote Tetracosidis, for Tricosisis; 400. yeeres, for 300. yeeres; and 450. for 350. This hee seeketh to strengthen by many arguments: to which opinion Beza in his great annotations adhereth. A contrary iudgement to this hath Codoman: where Luther and Beza beginne at Moses death, he takes his account from the death of Iofua, and from thence to the beginning of Samuel he makes 430. yeeres: to wit, of the Iudges (not reckoning Samsons yeeres) 319. and of yeeres of seruitude and affliction vnder strangers 111. The reason why he doth not reckon

Samsons

Iud. 13.
Iud. 15. 11.

Samsons 20. yeeres, is because hee thinks that they were part of the 40. yeeres, in which the Philistims are said to have oppressed Israel. For it is plaine that duringall Samsons time they were Lords ouer Israel. So then of the Judges, besides these 111. yeeres of seruitude, Codoman reckoneth (as I haue said) 319. yeeres, which two summes put together make 430. yeeres, and whereas S. Paul nameth 450. yeeres, he finds 20. yeeres to make vp S. Pauls number, to haue been spent after the death of Iofua by the Seniors, before the captiuitie of Cushan, or the election of Othoniel: which 20. yeeres added to 430. make 450. according to S. Paul. To approuethis time of the Elders, hee citeth two places of Scriptures, namely the 24. of Iofua, and the second of Judges, in each of which places it is written, that Israel serued the Lord all the dayes of Iosvā, and all the dayes of the Elders that ouer-lived Iosvā: so as to these times of the Elders, Codoman giueth 20. yeeres, which makes before 450. according to S. Paul. Neither would it breede any great difficulty in this opinion, if here also the 20. yeeres of the Seniors, betwene Iofua and Othoniel, should be denied. For they which denie these yeeres, and make Othoniels 40. to beginne presently vpon the death of Iofua, as in the beginning of this reckoning they haue 20. yeeres lesse than Codoman, so toward the end of it (when they reckon the yeeres of affliction apart from the yeeres of the Judges, in the number of Samsons yeeres, and of the 40. yeeres of the Philistims oppressing the Israelites, they haue 20. yeeres more than Codoman. For they reckon these 40. yeeres of oppression all of them a-part from Samsons 20. but Codoman, as is said, makes Samsons 20. to be the one halfe of the 40. of the Philistims oppressions; so that if the 20. yeeres of the Seniors, be not allowed to Codoman, then he may reckon (as the letter of the Text seemes to inforce) that the Philistims in an Inter-regnum, before Samson iudged Israel, vexed the Israelites 40. yeeres, besides the 20. while Samson was their Iudge, and so the reckoning will come to 450. yeeres betwene the end of Iofua, and the beginning of Samuel, though we admit not of any Inter-regnum of the Seniors, betwene Iofua and Othoniel: For if the times of their affliction be summed, they make 111. yeeres, to which if wee adde the yeeres of the Judges, which are 239. we haue the iust summe of 450. And this computation either one way or other, may seeme to be much more probable, than theirs that correct the Text, although we should admit of their correction thereof, and reade with them 350. for 450. For whereas they conceiue that this time of 350. yeeres, is to beginne immediately, or soone after the death of Moses: certainly the place of S. Paul doth evidently teach the contrarie, though it bee received for true that there was vitium scriptoris in the rest. For these be S. Pauls words: And about the time of 40. yeeres, God suffered their manners in the wilderness: And he destroyed seven Nations in the Land of Canaan, and diuided their Land to them by lot. Then afterward hee gaue vnto them Iudges about 450. yeeres, vnto the time of SAMUEL the Prophet. So as first in the eighteenth verse he speaketh of Moses and of his yeeres spent in the wilderness, then in the nineteenth verse hee cometh to the 40. of Iofua, which were that he destroyed seven Nations in the Land of Canaan, and diuided their Land to them by lot. In the twentieth verse it followeth: Then afterward hee gaue them Iudges about 450. yeeres, &c. and therefore to reckon from the death of Moses, is wide of S. Pauls meaning, so farre as my weake understanding can pierce it. The only in-conuenience of any waight in opinion of Codoman touching this place, in the Acts is that it seems irreconcilable with the account, 1. Reg. 6. 11. For if indeede there were spent 450. yeeres betwene the end of Iofua and the beginning of Samuel, certainly there must needs be much more than 480. yeeres betwene the beginning of the Israelites iourneying from Aegypt, and the foundation of the Temple by Salomon. To this difficultie Codoman answereth, that these 480. yeeres, 1. Reg. 6. 1. must beginne to be reckoned, not in the beginning, but in the ending of their iourneying from Aegypt, which hee makes to be 25. yeeres after the beginning of Othoniels government, from whence if wee call the yeeres of the Judges, with the yeeres of seruitude (which summes according to his account, of which we haue already spoken, make make 397. yeeres) and to these yeeres adde the 40. of Samuel, and Saul, and the 40. of Dauid, and the 3. of Salomon, wee shall haue the iust summe of 480. yeeres. Neither is it hard (saith he) that the annus egressus, 1. Reg. 6. 1. should be vnderstood egressus non incipientis sed finis, the yeere of their coming out of Aegypt (for so it is in the originall) or the yeere after they came out of Aegypt, may well be vnderstood for the yeere after they were come out thence, that is, after they had ended their wandering from thence. For so wee finde that things which were done 40. yeeres after they had set foote out of Aegypt, are said to haue been done in their going out of Aegypt, as Psal. 114. When Israel came out of Aegypt, Iordan was diuen backe, and Deut. 4. 45. These are the testimonies which Moses spake when they came out of Aegypt. And thus farre it seemes we may very well agree with Codoman, for the interpretation of the word ab exitu, to be as much as quum exiissent, or ab exitu finis: for it Iunius Deut. 4. 45. doe well reade quum exiissent, for in exitu, as it seemes that here in he doth well, why may not we also, to auoide contradiction in the Scripture, expound ab exitu to be, postquam exiissent?

The next point to be cleared, is how their iourneying should be said not to haue had end vntill the 25. yeere after the victory of Othoniel. To this Codoman answereth, that then it had no end till when all the Tribes had obtained their portions, which happened not vntill this time: at which time the Danites at length seated themselves, as it is declared Iud. 18. For doubtlesse to this time the expedition may most conueniently be referred. And thus without any great inconuenience to him appearing doth Codoman reconcile the account of Iephia, and S. Paul, with that in the first of Kings, 2. 6. Now whereas it is said that the expedition of the Danites was when there was no King in Israel: to this Codoman answereth, that it is not necessary that we should suppose that Othoniel liued all those 40. yeeres of rest, of which Iud. 3. 11. so that by the 25. yeere after his victory, either he might haue been dead, or at least, as Gideon did, he might haue refused all foweriegnitie, and so either way it might truly be said that at this time (to wit, the 25. yeere after Othoniels victorie) there was no King in Israel. This opinion of Codoman, if it were as consonant to other Chronologers grounding their opinions on the plaine Text, where it is indisputable, as it is in it selfe round enough and coherent, might perhaps bee received as good: especially considering, that the speeches of S. Paul haue not otherwise found any interpretation, maintaining them as absolutely true, in such manner as they found, and are set downe. But seeing that he wanteth all helpe of authority, we may iustly suspect the supposition whereupon his opinion is grounded; it being such as the consent of many Authors would hardly suffice to make very probable. For who hath told Codoman, that the conquest of Lais, by the Tribe of Dan, was performed in the five and twentieth yeere of Othoniel? Or what other probability hath he than his owne coniecture, to shew that Othoniel did so renounce the office of a Iudge after 40. five and twenty yeeres, that it might then be truly sayd there was no King in Israel, but every man did that which was good in his owne eyes?

Now concerning the rehearfall of the Law by Moses, and the stopping of Iordan, they might indeede be properly sayd to haue been, when Israel came out of Aegypt; like as we say that King Edward the first was crowned when he came out of the holy Land, for so all iournies with their accidents commonly take name from the place either whence or whither they read. But I thinke hee can finde no such phrase of speech in Scripture as limiteth a iourney by an accident, or faith by conuerting the proposition, when Iordan was turning back, Israel came out of Aegypt. Indeede most vnproper it were to giue date vnto actions commenced long after, from an expedition finished long before, namely to say, that King Edward at his arriuall out of Palestina, did winne Scotland, or died at Carlisle. How may wee then beleue that enterprize performed so many yeeres after the diuision of the Land (which followed the conquest at the iournys end) should be said to haue been at the time of the departure out of Aegypt? Or who will not thinke it most strange, that the most notable account of time, serving as the only guide for certaine ages in sacred Chronologie, should not take name and beginning from that illustrious delivrance out of Egypt, rehearsed often by God himselfe among the principall of his benefits to Israel, wherein the very day and moneth are recorded in Scripture (as like wise are the yeere and moneth wherein it expired) and the forme of the yeere vpon that occasion changed; but should haue reference to the surprizing of a Towne by 600. men, that robbed a Chappell by the way, and stole from thence Idols to be their guides, as not going to worke in Gods name? For this accident whereupon Cadoman buildeth, hath either no time given to it, or a time farre different from that which he supposeth, and is indeede rather by him placed in such a yeere, because it best stood with his interpretation so to haue it, than for any certainty or likelihood of the thing it selfe.

Wherefore we may best agree with such as affirme that the Apostle Saint Paul did not herein labour to set downe the course of time exactly (a thing no way concerning his purpose) but only to shew that God, who had chosen Israel to be his people, delivred them out of bondage, and ruled them by Judges, and Prophets, vnto the time of Saul, did raise vp our Lord Iesus Christ out of the seede of David the King, in whose succession the Crowne was established, and promise made of a Kingdome that should haue no end. Now in rehearsing briefly thus much which tended as a Preface to the declaration following (wherein he sheweth Christ to haue beene the true Messias) the Apostle was so farre from labouring to make an exact calculation of times (the Historie being so well knowne and beleued of the Iewes to whom he preached) that he spake as it were at large of the 40. yeeres consumed in the wilderness, whereof no man doubted, saying that God suffered their manners in the wilderness about 40. yeeres. In like manner he proceeded, saying, that from the diuision of the Land vnto the dayes of Samuel the Prophet, in whose time they required to haue a King, there passed about 450. yeeres. Neither did he stand to tell them, that an hundred and eluen yeeres of bondage mentioned in this middle while, were by exact computation to be included within the 339. yeeres of the Judges: for this had beene an impertinent digression from the argument which hee had in hand. Wherefore it is a worke not so needfull as laborious, to search out of this place that which the Apostle did not here intend to teach, when the summe of 480. yeeres is so exprelly and purposely set downe.

AR. 13.

Now that the words of S. Paul (if there be no fault in the Copie through error of some Scribe) are not so curiously to be examined in matter of Chronologie, but must be taken, as hauing reference to the memorie and apprehension of the vulgar, it is euident by his ascribing in the same place 40. yeeres to the reigne of Saul: whereas it is manifest that those yeeres were diuided betweene Saul and Samuel, yea, that farre the greater part of them were spent vnder the government of the Prophet, how soeuer they are here included in the reigne of the King. As for those that with so much cunning forsake the generall opinion, when it fauoureth not such exposition as they bring out of a good minde, to helpe where the neede is not ouer great; I had rather commend their diligence, than follow their example. The words of S. Paul were sufficiently iustified by Bernardus, as hauing reference to a common opinion among the Scribes in those dayes, that the 111. yeeres of seruitude were to be reckoned apart from the 339. yeeres ascribed to the Judges; which account the Apostle would not in this place stand to contradict, but rather chose to speake as the vulgar, qualifying it with a quasi, where he saith, quasi quadringentis & quinquaginta annis, As it were foure hundred and fifty yeeres. But Cadoman being not thus contented, would needes haue it to be so indeede, and therefore disioynes the members to make the account euen. In so doing he dasheth himselfe against a notable Text, whereupon all Antours haue builded (as well they might and ought) that purposely and precisely doth cast vp the yeeres from the departure out of Egypt, vnto the building of Solomons Temple, not omitting the very Moneth it selfe.

1. King. 6.

Now (as commonly the first apprehensions are strongest) hauing already giuen faith faith to his owne interpretation of S. Paul, he thinketh it more needfull to find some new exposition for that which is of it selfe most plaine, than to examine his owne coniecture vpon a place that is full of controuersie. Thus by expounding, after a strange methode, that which is manifest by that which is obscure, he loseth himselfe in those waies wherein before him neuer man walked. Surely if one should vrge him to giue reason of these new opinions, he must needs answer, That Othniel could not gouerne about 35. yeeres, because then was the taking of Laihi, at which time there was no King in Israel; That the Danites must needs haue taken Laihi at that time, because else wee could not reckon backwards from the foundation of the Temple to any action that might be termed the coming of Israel out of Egypt, without excluding the yeeres of seruitude; And that the yeeres of seruitude must needs be included, for that other wise he himselfe should haue spent his time vainly, in seeking to pleasure S. Paul with an exposition. Whether this ground be strong enough to vphold a Paradoxe, I leaue it to the decision of any iudicious Reader.

And now to proceede in our storie. To the time of Iephth are referred the death of Hercules, the rape of Helen by Paris, and the prouisions which her husband Mene-laüs, reigning then in Sparta, and his brother Agamemnon King of Mycene, made for her recouerie. Others referre this rape of Helen to the fourth yeere of Iban: from which time, if the Warre of Troy (as they suppose) did not begin till the third of which time, if the Greekes had sixe yeeres to prepare themselves: the rule holding not true in this Warre, longa preparatio belli celerem esset victoriam; That a long preparation begets a speedie victorie: for the Greekes consumed ten yeeres in the attempt: and Troy as it seemes was entred, sackt and burnt in the third yeere of Habdon.

Three yeeres after Troy taken, which was in the sixe yeere of Habdon, Aeneas arrived in Italy. Habdon in the eighth yeere of his rule died, after he had bene the Father of 40. sonnes and 30. grand-children. And whereas it is supposed, that the 40. yeeres of Israels oppression by the Philistims (of which Ind. 13. v. 1.)ooke beginning from the ninth yeere of Sair, and ended with the last of Habdon: I see no great reason for that opinion. For Ephraim had had little cause of quarrell against Iephth, for not calling them to Warre ouer Jordan, if the Philistims had held them in seruitude in their owne Territories: and if Ephraim could haue brought 42000. armed men into the field, it is not likely that they were then oppressd: and had it bene true that they were, who will doubt but that they would rather haue fought against the Philistims with so powerfull an Armie for their owne deliuerance, than against their owne brethren the Israelites? But Ammon being ouerthrowne, it seemed at that time, that they feared no other enemy. And therefore these 40. yeeres must either be supplied elsewhere, as in the time of Samson and afterward: or else they must be referred to the inter-regnum betweene the death of Habdon, and the deliuerance of Israel by Samson, such as it was.

Of the Warre of Troy.

Of the Genealogie of the Kings of Troy, with a note touching the ancient Poets how they have observed Historically truth.

THE Warre at Troy with other Stories hereupon depending (because the ruine of this Citie, by most Chronologers is found in the time of Habdon, Iudge of Israhel, whom in the last place I have mentioned) I rather choose here to intreat of in one intire narration, beginning with the linell descent of their Princes, than to breake the storie into pieces by rehearsing a-part in diuers yeeres the diuersitie of occurrences.

The Historie of the ancient Kings of Troy is vncertaine, in regard both of their originall, and of their continuance. It is commonly held that Teucer and Dardanus were the two founders of that Kingdome. This is the opinion of Virgil: which if he (as Reinecius thinkes) tooke from Berosus, it is the more probable: if Annius borrowed it from him, then it rests vpon the authoritie of Virgil, who saith thus:

AEnid. 3.

Creta Iovis magni medio iacet insula Ponto:
Mons Idæus ubi, & gentis cunabula nostra.
Centum Urbes habitant magnæ, uberrima regna:
Maximus und. Pater (si rite audita recorder)

In the maine Sea the Ile of Creete doth lie:
Where Iove was borne, thence is our progenie.
There is mount Ida: there in fruitfull Land
An hundred great and goodly Cities stand.
Thence (if I follow not mistaken fame)
TEUCER the eldest of our grand-fires came To the Rhetean shores: and reigned there Ere yet faire Ilion was built, and ere
The Towres of Troy: their dwelling place they sought In lowell vales. Hence CYBELLES rites were brought:
Hence Corybantian Cymbales did remoue:
And hence the name of our Idæan groue.

Thus

Thus it seemeth by Virgil, who followed surely good authoritie, that Teucer first gaue name to that Countrey, wherein he reigned ere Troy was built by Dardanus: of which Dardanus in the same booke he speaks thus:

Est locus Hesperiam Graji cognomine dicunt:
Terra antiqua, potens armis atque videre gleba.
OEnotry colere viri, nunc fama minores
Italiam distisse, ducta de nomine gentem.
Hæ nobis proprie sedes: hinc DARDANVS sortus:
Isiq; Pater, genus à quo Principe nostrum.

10

Hesperia the Grazians call the place:
An ancient fruitfull Land, a warlike race.
OEnotrians held it, now the later progenie Gives it their Captaines name, and calls it Italie;
This seate belongs to vs, hence DARDANVS,
Hence came the Author of our stocke, Iasus.

Hinc illam Coryti Tyræna ab sede profectum,

Some old Auruncians, I remember well,
(Though time have made the fame obscure) would tell
Of DARDANVS, how borne in Italie:
From hence he into Phrygia did flee.
And leauing Tascone (where he earst had place)
With Corytus did faile to Samothrace;
But now intronized he sits on high,
In golden Palace of the flutrie skie.

But contrarie to this, and to so many Authors, approving and confirming it, Reinecius thinkes that these names, Troes, Teucris, and Thracet, are deriued from Tiras 40 or Thiras the sonne of Iaphet: and that the Dardanians, Mysians, and Ascanians, mixt with the Troians, were Germane Nations, descended from Ashkenaz, the sonne of Gomer: of whom the Countrey, Lake, and Riuer of Ascanius in Asia tooke name. That Ashkenaz gaue name to those places and people, it is not unlikely: neither is it unlikely, that the Ascani, Dardani, and many others, did in after-times passe into 50 Europe: that the name of Teucer came of Tiras, the coniecture is somewhat hard. Concerning Teucer, whereas Halicarnassus makes him an Athenian, I finde none that follow him in the same opinion. Virgil (as is before shewed) reporteth him to bee of Crete, whose authoritie is the more to be regarded, because he had good meanes to finde the truth, which it is probable that he carefully sought, and in this did follow: so seeing it no way concerned Augustus (whom other-whiles hee did flatter) whether Teucer were of Crete or no. Reinecius doth rather embrace the opinion of Diodorus, and others, that thinke him a Phrygian, by which report he was the Sonne of Seamander and Ida, Lord of the Countrey, not founder of the Citie; and his Daughter or Neece Batia was the second wife of Dardanus, founder of Troy. Reinecius further thinks thinks that Atlas reigned in Samothracia, and gave his Daughter Electra to Corytus, or Coritus: and that these were Parents to Chryse, first wife to Dardanus. Virgil holds otherwise, and the common Tradition of Poets makes Dardanus the sonne of Electra by Jupiter, which Electra was the Daughter of Atlas, and wife to Coritus King of Hecetria, to whom she bare Iafus. Annus out of his Berosus finds the name of Cambolus, to whom he gives the addition of Coritus, as a Title of dignitie, making him Father of Dardanus and Iafus; and further telling vs very particularly of the faction betweene these Brethren, which grew to such heate, that finally Dardanus killed his Brother, and thereupon fled into Samothracia. The obscuritie of the historie gives leaue to Annus of saying what he list. I that loue not to vse such libertie, will forbear to determine any thing herein. But if Dardanus were the Sonne of Jupiter, it must haue beene of some elder Jupiter than the Father of those that liued about the Warre of Troy. So it is likewise probable that Atlas the Father of Electra was rather an Italian than an African, which also is the opinion of Boccace. For (as hath often beene said) there were many Jupiters, and many of almost euery name of the Gods; but it was the custome to ascribe to some one the acts of the rest, with all belonging to them. Therefore I will not greatly trouble my selfe with making any narrow search into these fabulous antiquities, but set downe the Pedegree according to the generall fame; allowing to Teucer such Parents as Diodorus gives, because others giue him none, and carrying the line of Dardanus in manner following.

Concerning the beginning and continuance of the Troian Kingdome, with the length of euery Kings raigne, I haue chosen good Authors to be my guides, that in a Historie, wherein depends the most ancient computation of times among the Greekes, I might not follow incertainties, ill cohering with the consent of Writers, and generall passage of things elsewhere done. And first for the destruction of Troy, which was of greater note than any accident befalling that Citie whilest it stood, it is reckoned by Diodorus to be 780. yeeres more ancient than the beginning of the 94th Olympiad. Whereas therefore 372. did passe betwene the beginning of the Olympiads, and the first yeere of the 94th it is manifest that the remainder of 780. yeeres, that is, 408. yeeres went betwene the destruction of Troy, and the first institution of those games by Iphitus, if the authoritie of Diodorus bee good proofe, who elsewhere tells vs, that the returne of the Heracidae, which was 80. yeeres after the fall of Troy, was 328. yeeres before the first Olympiad.

Herceunto agrees the authoritie of Dionysius Halicarnassensis, who placing the foundation of Rome in the first of the seventh Olympiad, that is, foure and twentie yeeres after the beginning of those games, accounts it 432. later then the fall of Troy. Solinus in expresse wordes, makes the institution of the Olympiads by Iphitus, whom he calleth Iphiclus, 480. yeeres later then the destruction of Troy. The summe is easily collected by necessarie inference out of diuers other places in the same booke. Herceunto doth Eusebius reckoning exclusively agree: and Eratosthenes, (as hee is cited by Clemens Alexandrinus) makes vp out of many particulars, the same totall summe, wanting but one yeere, as reckoning likewise exclusively.

The other collections of diuers Writers that are cited by Clemens in the same place, doe neither cohere any way, nor depend vpon any collaterall Historie, by which they may be verified.

The destruction of Troy being in the yeere before the Olympiads foure hundred and eight: wee must seeke the continuance of that from the beginning to the end, out of Eusebius, who leades vs from Dardanus on-wards through the raignes of foure Kings, by the space of two hundred and fise and twentie yeeres, and after of Priamus, with whom also at length it ended. As for the time which passed vnder Laomedon, wee are faine to doe, as others haue done before vs, and take it vpon trust from Annius his Authours; beleeuing Manetho so much therather, for that in his account of the former Kings raignes, and of Priamus, hee is found to agree with Eusebius, which may giue vs leaue to thinke that Annius hath not herein corrupted him. But in this point we need not to be very scrupulous: for seeing that no Historie or account of time depends vpon the raigne of the former Kings, but onely vpon the ruine of the Citie vnder Priamus, it may suffice that wee are careful to place that memorabell accident in the due yeere.

True it is, that some objections appearing waightie, may bee alleged in maintenance of different computations, which with the answers I purposely omit, as not willing to dispute of those yeeres, wherein the Greekes knew no good forme of a yeere; but rather to make narration of the actions which were memorabell, and acknowledged by all Writers, whereof this destruction of Troy was one of the most renowned.

The first enterprize that was vnder-taken by generall consent of all Greece, was the last warre of Troy, which hath bene famous euen to this day, for the numbers of Princes, and valiant Commanders there assembled: the great battailes fought with variable successe: the long indurance of the sieges the destruction of that great Citie; and the many Colones planted in sundry Countreies, as well by the remainder of the Troians, as by the victorious Greekes after their vnfortunate returne. All which things with innumerable circumstances of especiall note, haue bene deliuered vnto posteritie, by the excellent wits of many writers, especially by the Poets of that great Homer, whose verses haue giuen immortallitie to the action, which might else perhaps haue bene buried in obliuion, among other worthy deedes, done both before and since that time. For it is true which Horace saith;

*Vixere sortes ante AGAMEMNONA
Multi, sed omnes illecebrabiles
Vrgentur, ignotiq; longa
Nocte: carent quia vate sacro.*

Many by valour haue deferd renowned Ere AGAMEMNON: yet lye all opprest
Vnder long night, vnwept for, and vknowne:
For with no sacred Poet were they blest.

Yet so it is, that whilest these writers haue with strange fables, or (to speake the best of them) with Allegories farre strained, gone about to enlarge the commendations of those noble undertakers: they haue both drawne into suspicion that great vertue which they sought to adorne, and filled after-ages with almost as much ignorance of the Historie, as admiration of the persons. Wherefore it is expedient that wee seeke for the knowledge of such actions, in Histories; learning their qualities who did menage them, of Poets, in whose workes are both profit & delight: yet small profit to those which are delighted ouermuch, but such as can either interpret their fables, or separate them from the naked truth, shall finde matter in Poets, not vnworthy to be regarded of Historians. For those things excepted which are gathered out of Homer, there is very little, and not without much disagreement of Authours, written of this great warre. All writers consent with Homer; that the rape of Helen by Paris the sonne of Priamus, was the cause of taking armes: but how he was hereunto emboldened it is doubtfull.

§. II.

Of the Rape of HELEN: and strength of both sides for the warre.

Erodotus fetcheth the cause of this rape from very farre; saying, That whereas the Phenicians had rauished Io, and carried her into Aegypt, the Greekes to be reuenged on the Barbarians, did first rauish Europa, whom they brought out of Phenicia into Creta, and afterward Medea, whom they fetcht from Calchos, denying to restore her to her father, till such time as they might be satisfied for the rape of Io. By these deedes of the Greekes, Paris (as the same Herodotus affirmes) was emboldened to doe the like; not fearing such reuenge as ensued. But all this narration seemes frivolous. For what had the King of Calchos to doe with the iniurie of the Phenicians? Or how could the Greekes, as in reuenge of Io, pleade any quarrell against him, that neuer had heard the name of Phenicians? They dider a writer of vnquestionable sinceritie, maketh it plaine, that the name of Barbarians was not vsed at all in Homers time, which that they should haue sought reuenge vpon all Nations as barbarous, for the iniurie receiued by one: or that all people else should haue esteemed of the Greekes, as of a people opposed to all the world; and that euen then when as the Greekes had not yet one common name among themselves. Others with more probability say, that the rape of Helen was to procure the redeliuery of Hesione, King Priamus his daughter, taken formerly by Heracles, and giuen to Telamon. This may haue bene true.

For

for Telamon (as it seemes) was a cruell man, seeing his owne sonne Teucer durst not come in his sight, after the warre of Troy, but fled into Cyprus, onely because his brother Ajax (which Teucer could not remedie) had slaine himselfe. Yet, were it so, that Helen was ill intreated by Telamon, it was not therefore likely, that Priamus her brother would seeke to take her from her husband, with whom she had liued about thirtie yeeres, and to whom she had borne children which were to succcede in his Dominion. Whereupon I thinke that Paris had no regard, either to the rape of Europa, Medea, or Helen: but was merely incited by Venus, that is, by his lust, to doe that which in those dayes was very common. For not onely Greekes from Barbarians, and Barbarians from Greekes, as Heredotus discoureth, but all people were accustomed to steale women and cattell, if they could by strong hand or power get them; and hauing stollen them, either to sell them away in some farre Countrey, or keepe them to their owne vse. So did Thesus, and Pirithous attempt Proserpina; and so did Thesus (long before Paris) rauish Helen. And these practices, as it appeares in Thucydides, were so common, that none durst inhabit neere vnto the Sea, for feare of piracy, which was accounted a trade of life no lesse lawfull then merchandize; wherefore Tyndareus the father of Helen, considering the beautie of his daughter, and the rape which Thesus had made, caused all her wooers, who were most of the principall men in Greece, to binde themselves by solemne oath, that if these were taken from her husband, they should with all their might helpe to recouer her. This done, hee gaue free choyce of a husband to his daughter, who chose Menelaus, brother to Agamemnon. So the cause which drew the Greekes vnto Troy in reuenge of Helen's rape, was partly the oath which so many Princes had made vnto her father Tyndareus. Hereunto the great power of Agamemnon was not a little helping; for Agamemnon, besides his great Dominions in Peloponnesus, was Lord of many Ilands: hee was also rich in money, and therefore the Arcadians were well contented to follow his pay, whom hee imbarked for Troy in his owne ships, which were more then any other of the Greeke Princes brought to that expedition.

Thus did all Greece, either as bound by oath, or ledde by the reputation and power of the two brethren, Agamemnon and Menelaus; or desirous to partake of the profit and honour in that great enterprise; take armes against the Troians. The Greeke Fleet was (by Homer's account) 1200. sayle, or thereabouts: but the vessels were not great: for it was not then the manner to build shippes with deckes; onely they vsed (as Thucydides saith) small shippes, meete for robbing on the Sea; the least of which carried fiftie men, the greatest 120. euery man (except the Captaines) being both a Marriner and a Souldier. By this proportion it appeares that the Grecian armie consisted of 100000. men, or thereabout. This was the greatest armie that euer was raised out of Greece: and the greatness of this armie doth well declare the strength and power of Troy, which tenne whole yeeres did stand out against such forces: yet were the Troians which inhabited the Citie, not the tenth part of this number, as Agamemnon laid in the second of Homer's Iliades; but their followers and aydes were very many and strong. For all Phrygia, Lycia, Mysia, and the greatest part of Asia the lesse, tooke part with the Troians. The Amazones also brought them succour. And Rhesus out of Thrace, and Menan out of Assyria (though some thinke out of Ethiopia) came to their defence.

¶ III.

Of the Gracians iourney, and Embassage to Troy, and of Helen's being detained in Egypt; and of the Sacrificing of Iphigenia.

Herefore the Greekes vnwilling to come to tryall of armes, if things might bee compounded by treatie, sent Menelaus and Pylles Embassadors to Troy; who demanded Helen and the goods were taken with her out of Menelaus his house. What answer the Troians made hereunto it is vncertaine. Heredotus from the report of the Aegyptian Priests makes it very probable, that Helen was taken from Paris before his returne to Troy. The summe of his discourse is this.

Paris in his returne with Helen, being driuen by foule weather vnto the coast of Egypt, was accused for the Rape of Egypt, finding the accusation true by examination. Proteus then King of Egypt, till her husband should require on, detained Helen, and the goods taken with her, till her husband should require them: dismissing Paris without further punishment, because hee was a stranger. When therefore the Greekes demanding Helen had answered, that she was in Egypt, they thought themselves deluded, and thereupon made the warre, which ended with the ruine of Troy. But when after the Citie taken, they perceived indeed the had not bene there, they returned home, sending Menelaus to aske his wife of Proteus. Homer and the whole Nation of Poets (except Eurypides) vary from this History. *Hom*er, thinking it a matter more magnificent and more graceful to their Poems, for the retaining of a faire Ladie, than that they endured all by force, because it lay not in their power to redeliuer her. Yet in the fourth of his Odysses, *Hom*er speaks of Menelaus his being in Egypt, before he returned home to Sparta; which voyage it were not easily beleueed, that he made for pleasure: and if he were driuen thither by contrary windes, much more may we thinke that Paris was likely to haue bene driuen thither by foule weather. For Paris immediately vpon the rape committed, was enforced to fly, taking such windes as hee could get, and rather enduring any storme, than to commit himselfe to any Haven in the Greeke Seas; whereas Menelaus might haue put into any port in Greece, and there haue remained with good entertainment, vntill such time as the winde had come about, and serued for his Nauigation.

One great argument Heredotus brings to confirme the saying of the Aegyptian Priests, which is, that if Helen had bene at Troy, it had bene vtter madnesse for Priamus to see so many miseries befall him, during the warre, and so many of his sonnes slaine for the pleasure of one, who neither was heire to the Kingdome (for Helior was elder) nor equall in vertue to many of the rest. Besides, it may seeme that Lucian spake not more pleasantly than truly, when he said that Helen, at the warre of Troy, was almost as old as Queene Hecuba, considering that she had bene rauished by Thesus the companion of Hercules, who tooke Troy when Priamus was but young; and considering further, that she was sister to Casior and Pollux (he and Pollux being said by some to haue bene twinnes) who failed with the Argonautes, hauing Telamon the father of Ajax in their companie before the time that Helen was taken; on whom Telamon begat Ajax, that was a principall Commander in the Troian warre. But whether it were so, that the Troians could not, or would not restore Helen, so it was that the Embassadors returned ill contented, and not very well intreated; for there wanted not some that aduised to haue them slaine. The Greekes hereupon incensed, made all haste towards Troy: at which time Calchas (whom some say to haue bene a runnagate Troian, though no such thing be found in Homer) filled the Captaines and all the Hoste with many troublesome answers and diuinations. For hee would haue Agamemnon's daughter sacrificed to appease

Diana,

Diana, whose anger he said withstood their passage. Whether the young Lady were sacrificed, or whether (as some write) the Goddesse was contented with a Hinde, it is not needfull here to be disputed of. Sure it is, that the malice of the deuil, which awaits for all opportunities, is neuer more importunate, than where mens ignorance is most. Calchas also told the Greekes, that the taking of Troy was impossible, till some fatal impediments were remooued: and that till tenne yeeres were past, the towne should hold out against them. All which notwithstanding the Greekes proceeded in their enterprise, vnder the command of Agamemnon, who was accompanied with his brother Menelaus; Achilles the most valiant of all the Greekes, his friend Patroclus, and his Tutor Phemius; Aias and Teucer, the sonnes of Telamon; Idomeneus,¹⁰ and his companion Meriones; Nestor, and his sonnes Antilochus, and Thrasymedes; Vlysses; Menechmus the sonne of Petrus, Captaine of the Athenians; Diomedes the sonne of Tydeus, a man of singular courage; the wife and learned Palamedes, Acalaphus, and Ialmenus, the sonnes of Mars, who had sailed with the Argonauts; Philotes also the sonne of Peran, who had the arrowes of Hercules, without which Calchas said, that the Citie could not be taken; Aias the sonne of Oileus, Peuleus, Thous, Eumelus, Tysandrus, Euripilus, Athamas, Sthenelus, Tlepolemus the sonne of Hercules; Podalgius, and Machon, the sonnes of Æsculapius; Epeus, who is saide to haue made the wooden horse, by which the towne was taken, and Protesilaus, who first leapt on shore, neglecting the Oracle that threatened death to him that landed first.²⁰

§. IIII.

Of the Ailes of the Grecians at the siege.

THese, and many other of lesse note, arriuing at Troy, found such sharpe entertainment, as might easily perswade them to think that the warre would bee more than one yeeres worke. For in the first encounter, they lost Protesilaus, whom Hector slew, and many other, without any great harme done to the Troians: saue onely that by their numbers³⁰ of men, they wonne ground enough to incampe themselves in, as appeareth in Thucydides. The principall impediment which the Greekes found, was want of victuals, which grew vpon them by reason of their multitude, and the smallnesse of their vessels, wherein they could not carry necessaries for such an armie. Heereupon they were compelled to send some part of their men, to labour the ground in Chersonesse: others to robbe vpon the Sea for the reliefe of the Campe. Thus was the warre protracted nine whole yeeres, and either nothing done, or if any skirmishes were, yet could the towne receiue little losse by them, hauing equall numbers to maintain the field against such Greekes as continued the siege, and a more safe retreat if the enemy got the better.⁴⁰

Wherefore Ouid saith, that from the first yeere, till the tenth, there was no fighting at all: and Heraclides commends as very credible, the report of Herodotus; That the Greekes did not lye before Troy the first nine yeeres: but onely did beate vp and downe the seas, exercising their men, and enriching themselves, and so by wasting the enemies Country, did blocke vp the towne, vntill they returned not, vntill the fatal time drew nere when it should be subuerted.

This is confirmed by the enquire which Priamus made, when the Greeke Princes came into the field, the tenth yeere, for he knew none of them; and therefore sitting vpon an high tower (as Homer tells) he learned their names of Helen: which though it is like to be a fiction, yet could it not at all haue bene supposed that hee should bee ignorant of them, if they had shewed themselves before the towne so many yeeres together. Betwene these relations of Thucydides and Herodotus, the difference is not much, the one saying that a few of the Greekes remained in the Campe before Troy, whilst the rest made purveyance by land and sea: the other, that the whole whole armie did spend the time in waiting the sea-coastes. Neither doe the Poets greatly disagree from these authours: for they make report of many townes and lands wasted, and the people carried into Captiuitie; in which actions Achilles was employed, whom the armie could not well, nor would haue spared, if any seruice of importance had bene to be performed before the Citie. Howsoever it was, this is agreed by general consent, that in the beginning of that Summer, in which Troy was taken, great booties were brought into the Campe, and a great pestilence arole among the Greekes: which Homer saith that Apollo sent in reuenge of his Priests daughter, whom Agamemnon had refused to let goe, for any ransom: but Heraclides interpreting the place, saith that by Apollo was meant the Sunne: who raised pestilent foggies, by which the armie was infected, being lodged in a moorish piece of ground. And it might well bee that the campe was ouer-pelted with those, who had bene abroad, and now were lodged all close together: hauing also grounded their ships within the fortifications.

About the sametime arose much contention betwene Agamemnon and Achilles about the bootie, wherof Agamemnon, as General, hauing first chosen for his part a captiue woman, and Achilles in the second place chosen for himselfe another, then Aias, Vlysses, and so the rest of the Chieftaines in order: When the Soothsayer Calchas had willed that Agamemnon's woman should be restored to her father, Apollo's¹⁰ Priests, that so the Pestilence might cease, then did Agamemnon greatly rage and say, that hee alone would not lose his part of the spoile, but would either take that which had bene giuen to Achilles, or that which had fallen to Aias, or to Vlysses. Heereupon Achilles desired him, but was faine to suffer all patiently, as not able to hold his Concubine by strong hand, nor to reuenge her losse, otherwise than by refusing to fight, or to send forth his Companies. But the Greekes encouraged by their Captaines, presented themselves before the Citie without him and his troups.

The Troians were now relieved with great succours, all the neighbour Countries hauing sent them ayd: partly drawne to that warre by their Commanders,³⁰ who assisted Priamus for money, wherewith hee abounded when the warre began (as appeares by his words in Homer) or for loue of himselfe and his sonnes, or hope of marriage with some of his many and faire daughters; partly also (as we may well guess) incited by the wrongs receiued of the Greekes, when they wasted the Countreys adioyning vnto Troy. So that when Hector issued out of the towne, hee was little inferior to his enemies in numbers of men, or qualitie of their Leaders. The principall Captaines in the Troian armie, were Hector, Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus and the other sonnes of Priamus: Aeneas, Antenor, and his sonnes, Polydorus, Sarpedon, Glaucus, Asius, and the sonnes of Panthus, besides Iphus, who was slaine the first night of this attual, Menon, Queene Penthesilea, and others who came towards⁴⁰ the end of the warre. Betwene these and the Greekes were many battels fought: the greatest of which were, that at the tombe of King Iulus vpon the plaine; and another at the very trenches of the Campe, wherein Hector brake through the fortifications of the Greekes, and began to fire their ships; at which time Aias, the sonne of Telamon with his brother Teucer, were in a manner the onely men of note that remaining vnwounded, made head against Hector, when the state of the Greekes was almost desperate.

Another battell (for so antiquitie calls it) or rather the same renewed, was fought by Patroclus, who hauing obtained leaue, drew forth Achilles troups, relieuing the wearie Greekes with a fresh supply. Agamemnon, Diomedes, Vlysses, and the rest of⁵⁰ the Princes, though sore wounded, yet were driuen to put on armour, and with help of Patroclus, repelled the Troians very hardly. For in that fight Patroclus was lost, and his body, with much contention recovered by his friends, was brought backe into the Campe: the armour of Achilles which he had put on, being torne from him by Hector. It was the manner of those warres, hauing slaine a man, to strip him and and hale away his bodie, not restoring it without ranfome, if he were one of marke. Of the vulgar little reckoning was made: for they fought all on foote, lightly armed, and commonly followed the fucceffe of their Captaines; who rode not vpon horses, but in Chariots, drawne by two or three horses, which were guided by some trustie followers of theirs, which draue vp and downe the field, as they were directed by the Captaines, who by the swiftnesse of their horses presenting themselves where neede required, threw first their Iavelins, and then alighting fought on foote, with swords and battel-axes, retiring into the ranks of the footmen, or else returning to their Chariots when they found cause, and so began againe with a new dart as they could get it, if their old were lost, or broken. Their armes defensive were helmets, breast-plates, bootes of brasse or other metall, and shields commonly of leather, plated ouer. The offensive were swords and battel-axes at hand, and stones, arrows or darts when they fought at any distance. The vse of their Chariots (besides the swiftnesse) was to keepe them from wearineffe, whereto the leaders were much subiect, because of their armour, which the strongest and stoutest were heauiest: also that from them they might throw their Iavelins downewards, with the more violence. Of which weapon I finde not that any carried more than one or two into the field: wherefore they were often driuen to returne to their Tents for a new one, when the old was gone. Likewise of armours they had little change or none; euery man (speaking of the chiefe) carried his owne compleat, of which if 10 any piece were lost or broken, he was driuen to repaire it with the like if he had any fitting, taken from some Captaine whom hee had slaine, and shipped: or else to borrow of them that had by such meanes gotten some to spare. Whereas therefore Achilles had lost his armour which Hector (as is said before) had taken from the body of Patroclus, he was faine to await the making of new, ere he could enter the fight: whereof he became very desirous, that he might reuenge the death of Patroclus his deare friend.

At this time Agamemnon reconciled himselfe vnto Achilles, not onely restoring his concubine Briseis, but giuing him very great gifts, and excusing former matters as well as he might. In the next battell Achilles did so behaue himselfe, that he did 30 not onely put the Troians to the worst, but also slew the valiant Hector, whom (if Homer may herein be beleeued) hee chased three times about the wallles of Troy. But great question may bee made of Homers truth in this narration. For it is not likely that Hector would stay alone without the Citie (as Homer doth report of him) when all the Troians were fled into it: nor that he could leape ouer the riuers of Xanthus and Simois, as he must haue done in that sight: nor that the Troians perceiving Hector in such an extremitie, would haue forborne to open some of their gates and let him in. But this is reported onely to grace Achilles, who hauing (by what meanes soeuer) slaine the noble Hector, did not onely carry away his dead bodie, as the custome then was, but boring holes in his feet, and thrusing leatherne thongs into 40 them, tyed him to his Chariot, and dragged him shamefully about the field, selling the dead bodie to his father Priamus for a very great ranfome. But his crueltye and couetousnesse were not long vnreueged; for he was shortly after slaine with an arrow by Paris, as Homer sayes, in the Scæan gate, or as others in the Temple of Apollo, whither he came to haue married Polyxena the daughter of Priamus, with whom he was too farre in loue, hauing slaine so many of her brethren, and his body was ranfomed (as Lycophron saith) at the selfe-same rate that Hector was by him sold for. Not long after this, Penelopeia Queene of the Amazons arrived at Troy; who after some proofe giuen of her valour, was slaine by Pyrrhus the sonne of Achilles.

of the taking of Troy, the wooden Horse, the Booke of Dares and DICTIS, the Colonies of the reliques of Troy.

Finally after the death of many worthy persons, on each side, the Citie was taken by night, as all writers agree: but whether by the treason of Æneus and Antenor; or by a wooden Horse, as the Poets, and common fame (which followed the Poets) haue deliuered, it is vncertaine. Some write that vpon one of the gates of Troy called Scaea, was the image of a horse, and that the Greekes entring by that gate, gaue occasion to the report, that the Citie was taken by an artificiall horse. It may well bee that with some wooden engine, which they called an Horse, they either did batter the walls, as the Romans in after-times vsed to doe with the Ramme: or scaled the walls vpon the sudden, and so tooke the Citie. As for the hiding of men in the hollow bodie of a wooden horse, it had bene a desperate aduenture, and seruing to no purpose. For either the Troians might haue perceived the deceit, and slaine all those Princes of Greece, that were inclosed in it (which also by such as maintaine this report they are said to haue thought vpon) or they might haue left it a fewe dayes without the Citie (for it was vnlikely, that they should the very first day both conclude vpon the bringing it into the towne, and break downe their wallles vpon the suddaine to doe it) by which meanes they who were shut into it, must haue perished for hunger, if they had not by issuing forth vnseasonably discovered the inuention. Whereas further it is said, that this horse was built so high and great, that it could not bee brought into the towne through any of the gates, and that therefore the Troians were faine to pull downe a part of their wall to make way for it, through which breach the Greekes did afterwards enter: it is hereby manifest that the inclosing of so many principall men was altogether needlesse, considering that 30 without their helpe there was way sufficient for the armie, so that the surprising of any gate by them was now to no purpose.

John Baptista Gramay in his Historie of Asia, discoursing of this warre, saith that the Greekes did both batter the wall with a wooden engine, and were also let into the Citie by Antenor, at the Scæan gate: the townsmen sleeping and drinking without feare or care, because the fleet of the Grecians had hoisted saile, and was gone the day before to the Ile of Tenedos, thereby to bring the Troians into securitie. That the Citie was betrayed, the bookes of Dares and Dictys must proue, which whether we now haue the same that were by them written, it may bee suspected; for surely they who haue made mention of these writers in ancient times, would not, as they 40 did, haue followed the reports of Homer and others quite contradietorie in most points to these two authors, without once taking notice of the opposition, which they hauing serued in that warre made against the Common report: had it not been that either those bookes were euen in those times thought frivolous; or else contained no such repugnancie to the other authours as now is found in them.

Also concerning the number of men slaine in this warre, which Dares and Dictys say to haue bene about 600000, on the Trojan side, and more than 800000, of the Greekes, it is a report meerey fabulous; forasmuch as the whole fleet of the Greekes was reckoned by Homer, who extolled their armie and deedes as much as bee could, to bee somewhat lesse than 1200 saile, and the armie therein transported 50 ouer the Greekes seas, not much about 100000 men according to the rate formerly mentioned. But it is the common fashion of men to extoll the deeds of their Ancesters: for which cause both Homer magnified the Captaines of the Greekes, that serued in the warre, and Virgil with others were as diligent in commending & extolling the Troians and their Citie, from which the Romans descended. Yea the Athenians long after in the warre which Xerxes the Persian King made against all Greece, did not forbear to vaunt of the great cunning which Minesius the son of Petius had shewed, in marshalling the Gracian army before Troy; whereupon, as if it had bene a matter of much consequence, they were so proud, that they refused to yeeld vnto Gelen King of almost all Sicily, the Admirallie of their Seas, notwithstanding that he promised to bring 200. good fighting ships, and 30000. men for their defence.

The like vanitie possessed many other Cities of Greece, and many Nations in these parts of the world, which haue striven to bring their descent from some of the Princes, that warred at Troy: all difficulties or vnlikelihoods in such their Pedigree notwithstanding. But those Nations which indeed, or in most probability came of the Troians, were the Albanes in Italy; and from them the Romans, brought into that Countrey by Aeneas: the Venetians first seated in Padua, and the Countrey adioyning by Antenor: the Chaonians planted in Epirus by Helenus, the sonne of King Priamus. To which Hellenicus addeth that the posteritie of Hector did resemble such of the Troians as were left, and reigned ouer them about Troy.

§. VI.

Of the distresses and dispersions of the Greekes returning from Troy.

Concerning the Greekes, they tasted as much miserie as they had brought vpon the Troians. For Thucydides notes, that by reason of their long abode at the siege, they found many alterations when they returned: so that many were driven by their borderers from their ancient seats: many were expelled their Countreies by faction: some were slaine anon after their arrival: others were debarred from the Soueraigntie among their people, by such as had stayed at home. The cause of all which may seeme to haue bene the dispersion of the armie, which weakened much by the calamities of that long warre, was of little force to repell iniuries, being diuided into so many pieces vnder severall Commanders, not very well agreeing. For (besides other quarrels arising vpon the diuision of the bootie, and the like occasions) at the time when they should haue set saile, Agamemnon and his brother fell out, the one being desirous to depart immediately, the other to stay and performe some sacrifices to Minerva. Hereupon they fell to hot words, half the fleet remaining with Agamemnon, the rest of them sailing to the Ile of Tenedos; where when they arrived, they could not agree among themselves, but some returned backe to Agamemnon; others were disperfed, each holding his owne course. But the whole Fleet was fore vexed with tempests: for Pallus (as Homer saith) would not bee perswaded in haste.

They who returned safe were Nestor, and Pyrhus, whom Orestes afterward slew: also Idomeneus, and Philoctetes, who neuertheless, as Virgil tells, were drinen soone after to seek new seats: Idomeneus among the Salentines, and Philoctetes at Petilia in Italie. Agamemnon like wife returned home, but was forthwith slaine by his wife and by the adulterer Aegisthus, who for a while after vsurped his Kingdome. Athenaeus wandring long vpon the Seas, came into Egypt, either with Helen, or (as may rather seeme) to fetch her. Ulysses, after ten yeeres, hauing lost all his company, got home in poore estate, with much adoe recouering the mastership of his owne house. All the rest either perished by the way, or were drinen into exile, and faine to seek new habitations.

Alex the sonne Oileus was drowned; Teucer fled into Cyprus; Diomedes to King Danus, who was Lord of the Lappes in Apulia; some of the Locrians were drinen into Africke, others into Italie, all the East part whereof was called Magna Gracia, by reason of so many townes which the Greekes were drinen to erect vpon vpon that coast. Finally, it appears in Homer, that the Gracian Ladies, whose husbands had bene at the warre of Troy, were wont to call it; The place where the Greekes suffered miserie, and the vnluckie Citie not to be mentioned. And thus much for Troy and those that warred there: the ouerthrow of which Citie, as hath bene said, happened in the time of Habden Iudge of Israel, whom Samson alter a variance or Interregnum for certaine yeeres succeeded.

CHAP. XV.

Of SAMSON, ELI, and SAMUEL.

§. I.

Of SAMSON.

HE birth and actes of Samson are written at large in the 13. 14. 15. and 16. of Judges; and therefore I shall not need to make a repetition thereof. But these things I gather out of that Storie. First, that the Angell of God forbade the wife of Manoah the mother of Samson, to drinke wine or strong drinke, or to cate any vncleane meate, after she was conceived with childe, because those strong liquors hinder the strength, and as it were wither and shrinke the childe in the mothers wombe. Though this were euen the counsell of God himselfe, and deliuered by his Angell, yet it seemeth that many women of this age haue not read, or at least will not beleue this precept: the most part forbearing nor drincks, nor meats, how strong or vncleane soeuer, biling themselves with all sorts of wines, and with artificiall drincks farre more forcible: by reason whereof, so many wretched feeble bodies are borne into the world, and the races of the able and strong men in effect decayed.

Secondly, it is to be noted, that the Angell of God refused the sacrifice which Manoah would haue offered him, commanding him to present it vnto the Lord: and therefore those that profess diuinitie by the helpe of Angels, to whom also they sacrifice, may assuredly know that they are Deuils who accept thereof, and not good Angels, who receiue no worship that is proper to God.

Thirdly, this Samson was twice betrayed by his wiues, to wit, by their importunitie and deceitfull teares: by the first he lost but a part of his goods: by the second his life. Quem nulla vis superare potuit, voluptas euerit; Whom no force could overcome, Voluptuousnesse ouerturned.

Fourthly, we may note, that he did not in all deliuer Israel from the oppression of the Philistims; though in some sort hee reuenged, and defended them: for notwithstanding that he had slaine 30. of them in his first attempt, burnt their Come in harvest time, and giuen them a great ouerthrow instantly vpon it: yet so much did Israel feare the Philistims, as they assembled 3000. men out of Juda, to beseege Samson in the rocke or mountaine of Etam, vying these wordes: Knowest not thou that the Philistims are Rulers ouer vs? &c. After which they bound him, and deliuered him vnto the Philistims, for feare of their reuenge; though he was no sooner loosed, but hee gaue them another ouerthrow, and slew 1000. with the iawbone of an Ass.

Lastly, being made blinde, and a prisoner by the treason of his wife, hee was content to end his owne life, to be auenged of his enemies, when he pulled downe the pillars pillars of the house at the feast whereto they sent for Samson, to deride him, till which time he bare his affliction with patience: but it was truly said of Seneca; Patentia saepe laesa vertitur in furorem. Patience often wounded, is converted into furie: neither is it at any time so much wounded by paine and losse, as by derision and contumelie.

II.

Of Eli and of the Arke taken, and of Dagons fall, and the sending backe of the Arke.

He Storie of Eli the Priest, who succeeded Samson, is written in the beginning of Samuel; who foretolde him of the destruction of his house, for the wickednesse of his sonnes, which hee suppressed not, neither did hee punish them according to their deserts: whose sinnes were horrible, both in abusing the Sacrifice, and prophaning and polluting the holy places: though Leui Ben Gerson, to extenuate this filthie offence of forcing the women by the sonnes of Eli, hath a contrarie opinion. In this time therefore it pleased God to cast the Israelites vnder the swords of the Philistims; of whom there perished in the first encounter 4000. and in the second battell 30000. footmen; among whom the sonnes of Eli being slaine, their father (hearing the lamentable successe) by falling from his chaire, brake his necke. Hee was the first that obtained the High-Priesthood of the stocke of Ithamar the sonne of Aaron, before whose time it continued successively in the race of Elezar the eldest brother of Ithamar: for Aaron was the first, Elezar the second, Phinees the sonne of Elezar the third, Abiathar the sonne of Phinees the fourth, his sonne Bocai the fifth, Ozi the sonne of Bocai the sixth, and then Eli, as Iosephus and Zyranus out of diuers Hebrew authors haue conceiued. In the race of Ithamar the Priesthood continued after Eli to the time of Salomon who cast out Abiathar, and established Sadock and Achimaas and their successors. The Arke of God which Israel brought into the field, was in this battell taken by the Philistims. For as Dauid witnesseth, God greatly abhorred Israel, so that hee forsooke the habitation of Shilo: euen the Tabernacle where he dwelt among men, and deliuered his power into captiuitie, &c.

Now as it pleased God at this time, that the Arke whereby himselfe was represented, should fall into the hands of the Heathen, for the offences of the Priests and people: so did hee permit the Chaldeans to destroy the Temple built by Salomon; the Romans to overthrow the second Temple; and the Turkes to overthrow the Christian Churches in Asia and Europe. And had not the Israelites put more confidence in the sacrament, or representation which was the Arke, then in God himselfe, they would haue obserued his Lawes, and serued him onely: which whensoever they did, they were then victorious. For after the captiuitie they had no Arke at all, nor in the times of the Machabees: and yet for their pietie it pleased God to make that familie as victorious, as any that garded themselves by the signe in stead of the substance. And that the Arke was not made to the end to be carried into the field as an ensigne; Dauid witnesseth when he fled from Abshalon. For when the Priests would haue carried the Arke with him, hee forbade it, and caused it to be returned into the Citie, vying these words: If I shall finde fauour in the eyes of the Lord, he will bring me againe: if not, let him doe to me as seemeth good in his eyes.

The Troians beleued that while their Palladium or the image of Athena was kept in Troy, the Citie should neuer be ouerturned: so did the Christians in the last fatall battell against Saladin carrie into the field, as they were made beleue, the very Crosse wherupon Christ died, and yet they lost the battell, their bodies and the wood. But Christ some vpon Saint Matthew (if that bee his worke) giueth a good iudgement, speaking of those that were a part of Saint Iohns Gospel about their neckes, for an amulet or preseruatiue: Si tibi ea non profuerint, auribus, auribus quomodo proderunt in Callo? If those words doe not profit men in their eares, (to wit, the hearing of the Gospel preached) how should it profit them by hanging it about their neckes? For it was neither the wood of the Arke, nor the wood of the Crosse, but the reuerence of the Father that gaue the one for a memorie of his Countenant: and the Faith in his Sonne, which shed his blood on the other for redemption, that could or can profit them and vs, either in this life or after it.

The Philistims returning with the greatest victorie and glorie which euer they obtained, carried the Arke of God with them to Azotus, and let it vp in the house of Dagon their Idoll: but that night the Idoll fell out of his place, from aboute to the ground, and lay vnder the Arke. The morning following they tooke it vp, and set it vp, and set it againe in his place. And it fell the second time, and the head brake from the bodie, and the hands from the armes, shewing that it had nor power, nor vnderstanding in the presence of God; for the head fell off, which is the seat of reason, and knowledge, and the hands (by which wee execute strength) were sundred from the armes. For God and the Deuill inhabit not in one house, nor in one heart. And if this Idoll could not indure the representation of the true God, it is not to bee maruailed, that at such time as it pleased him to couer his onely begotten with flesh, and sent him into the world, that all the Oracles, wherein the Deuill derided and betrayed mortall men, lost power, speech, and operation at the instant. For when that true light which had neuer beginning of brightnesse, brake through the clouds of a virgins bodie, shining vpon the earth which had beene long obscured by Idolatrie, all those foule and stinking vapours vanished. Plutarch recheareth a memorable accident in that age concerning the death of the great god Pan, as hee slith him; where (as ignorant of the true cause) hee searcheth his braines for many reasons of so great an alteration: yet finds he none out but frivolous. For not onely this olde Deuill did then die as hee supposed, but all the rest, as Apollo, Iupiter, Diana, and the whole rabble became speechlesse.

Now while the Philistims triumphed after this victorie, God strooke them with the grievous disease of the Hemorrhoides of which they perished in great numbers. For it is written that the Lord destroyed them. It was therefore by general consent ordered, that the Arke should be removed from Azotus to Gath or Geth another of the five great Cities of the Philistims; to prouoe, as it seemeth, whether this disease was fallen on them by accident, or by the hand of God immediately: but when it was brought to Gath and received by them, the plague was yet more grievous and mortall. For the hand of the Lord was against this Citie with a very great destruction, and hee smote the men of the Citie both small and great, &c. And being not yet satisfied, they of Gath sent the Arke to Ekron or Acaron, a third Citie of the Philistims: but they also felt the same smart, and cryed out that themselves and their people should be slaine thereby; For there was a destruction and death throughout all the Citie. In the end, by the aduice of their Priests, the Prince of the Philistims did not onely resolute to returne the Arke, but to offer gifts vnto the God of Israel, remembering the plague which had fallen on the Aegyptians, when their hearts were hardened to hold the people of God from their inheritance, and from his seruice by strong hand. Wherefore confessing the power of the God of Israel to bee almightie, and that their owne Idols were subiect thereunto, they agreed to offer a sinne offering, vying these words, So ye shall giue glorie to the God of Israel, that hee may take his hand from you, and from your gods and from your land. And what can be a more excellent witnessing, than where an enemy doth approve our cause? according to Aristotle; Pulchrum est testimonium, quo hostis probantur ab hostibus. So did Pharao confesse the liuing God, when he was so plagued in Agypt: and Nabuchodonosor, and Darius, when they had seene his miracles by Daniel.

This counsell therefore of the Priests being embraced, and the golden Hemorrhoides, and the golden Mice prepared, they caused two mitch kine to bee choosen, such as had not bene yoked, and a new Cart or carriage to bee framed: but they durst not driue or direct it to any place certaine, thereby to make tryall whether it were indeed the hand of God that had stricken them. For if the Arke of God were carried towards Bethshemesh and into the territorie of Israel: then they should resolve that from God onely came their late destruction. For the Philistims knew that the milch Kine which drew the Arke, could not be forced from their Calues, but that they would have followed them wherefoeuer ; much lesse when they were left to themselves would they trauell a contrary way. For in the darkest night in the world if Calues be removed from their dammes, the kine will follow them through woods, and desarts by the foote, till they finde them. But the kine traualled directly towards Bethshemesh: and when they came into the fields thereof, to wit, of one Isaiah 10 of the same Citie; they stood still there; which when the Princes of the Philistims perceived, they returned to Ekron: After which, God spared not his owne people the Bethshemites, in that they presumed to looke into the Arke. And because they knew God and his commandements and had bene taught accordingly: hee brooke them more grieuouly than he did the Heathen, for there perished of them fifty thousand and seauente. From hence the Arke was carried to Kiriath-iearim and placed in the house of Abinadab; where it is written that it remained twentie yeere in the charge of Elezazar his sonne, vntill Dauid brought it to Hierusalem.

Now whereas it is said, that in the meane while the Arke was in Nob, Mispah, and Galgala, it was the Tabernacle, which was at this time seuered from the Arke: 20 or at least, it was for the present occasion brought to these places, and anon returned to Kiriath-earim.

8. III.
 Of SAMUEL, and of his Government.

T Hefe Tragedies ouerpast and ended, Samuel, to whom God appeared while hee was yet a child, became now Iudge and Gouernour of Israel. Hee was defended of the familie of ^b Chore or Korath. For Leui had three sonnes; Gerson, Cheath, and Merari: Cheath had Amram, and Isaar; of Amram came Moses and Aaron; of Isaar, Chore; and of the familie of Chore, Samuel. His father Eli was called an Ephraimite, not that the Leuites had any proper inheritance, but because hee was of Mount Ephraim, like as Iesse, Dauid's father was called an Ephraimite, because borne at Ephrata, or Bethlehem. Hannah his mother being long fruitlesse, obtained him of God by prayers and teares: it being an exceeding shame to the Jewish women, to be called barren in respect of the blessing of God both to Abraham that his seede should multiply, as the Starres of Heauen, and the sands of the Sea, as in the beginning to Adam, Increase and multiply, &c. and in Deuteronomie the seuenth; There shall bee neither male nor female barren among you.

Samuel was no longer borne, but that his mother, according to her former vow, dedicated him to God, and his service, to which she delivered him even from the dugg. For as the first borne of all that were called Nazarites, might be redeemed till they were five yeeres old for five shekles, and between five yeeres and twentie for twentie shekles: so was it not required by the Law that any of the race of the Levites should be called to serve about the Tabernacle, till they were five and twentie yeeres old.

Saint Peter reckons in the Altes the Prophets from Samuel, who was the first of the writers of holy Scriptures, to whom finally this name of a Prophet was given, and yet did Moses account himself less such one, as in the 18. of Deuteronomie. The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a Prophet like unto mee, &c. But he is distinguished from those that preceded him, who were called Seers; as, Beforetime in Israel, when a man went to seek an answer of God, thus he spake; Come and let us go to the Seer:

for hee that is now called a Prophet, was in old time called a Ser. And although it pleased God to appeare by his Angels to Moses, as before to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; yet in the time of Eli, there was no manifest vision; nor that God had altogether with-drawne his grace from Israel: but as the Chaldean Paraphrast hath it, those revelations before Samuel's time, were more clouded and obfure. The places where in Samuel judg'd were Majpha or Mispha, leated on a hill in Beniamin neere Sufa: also Gilgal, and Bethel, of which we have spoken elsewhere.

The Philistims taking knowledge of the assembly and preparation for Warre at Mispa in the beginning of Samuels government, gathered their Armie and marched towards the Citie : at whose approach the Israelites drucken with feare, and with the memorie of their former slaughters and servitude, befought Samuel to pray to God for them ; who was * then performing his sacrifice when the Philistims were in view. But God being moued with Samuels prayers (as he was by those of Moses, when Israel fought against the Amalekites at their first entrance into Arabia) It pleased him with thunder and tempest to disperse and beate downe the Armie of the Philistims, according to the prophcie of Hanna, Samuels Mother. The Lords aduantage shall be destroyed, and out of heauen shall be thunder vpon them. &c. Samuel affirms, that a part of the Philistims were swallowed with an earth-quake : and that Samuel himselfe led the Israelites in the prosecution of their victory. After which Samuel erected a Monument in memorie of this happie successe, obtained by the miraculous hand of God, which Iosephus called, Lapidem fortis : Samuel, Ebeneszer, or the stone of assistance : and then following the opportunitie and aduantage of the victory, the Israelites recovered diuers Cities of their owne formerly lost, and held long in possession of the Philistims, who for a long time after did not offer any inuasion or turgence. And the better to attend their purposes, and to withstand any of their attempts : the Israelites made peace with the Amorites, or Canaanites, which lay on their backes, and to the North of them, that they might not be assaulted from diuers parts at once ; hauing the Philistims towards the West and Sea-coast, the Canaanite toward the North and East, and the Idumie on the South. The estate being thus settled, Samuel for the ease of the people gaue audience and iudgement in diuers places by turnes, as hath beene elsewhere said.

when the Elders of Israel obserued, and saw that Samuel as a naturall man (though a Prophet) could not so well discern the errors of his owne, they prayed him to consent to their change of government, and to make them a King, by whom they might be iudged as other Nations were; who might also leade them to the Warre and defend them against their enemies. For after the ill and lamentable successe which followed the rule of Eli his sonnes, when those of Samuel by their first blifomes promised to yeld fruit no lesse bitter, they saw no way to put the gouernement from out his race, whome they so much reuerenced, but by the choice of a King.

In a cause of so great consequence and alteration, Samuel sought counsaile from God: which surely he did not for the establishing of his owne Sonnes; who being as they were, God would not haue approued his election. Now as it appears by the Text, this speech or motion displeasing him, hee vied his best arguments to dehort them: which when hee perceived to bee ouer-feeble, hee deliuered vnto them from Gods reuelation, the inconueniences and miseries which should befall them. And yet, all which hee fore-shewed was not intolerable, but such as hath beene borne, and is so still by free consent of the Subjects towards their Princes. For first he makes them know that the King will vse their sonnes in his owne seruice to make them his Horse-men, Chariotiers, and Foot-men; which is not only not grieuous, but by the Vassals of all Kings according to their birth and condition desired: it being very agreeable to subjects of the best qualitie to command for the King in his Warres, and to till the ground no lesse proper and appertaining to those that are thereto bred and brought vp: so are likewise the offices of women-seruants to dresse meate, to bake bread, and the like. But whereas immediately it is threatened, Hee will take up your Fields, and your Vineyards, and your best Olive trees, and give them to his seruants; with other oppressions; this hath giuen, and giues daily occasion to such as would be ruled by their owne discretion, to affirme that Samuel describeth here vnto them the power of a King, gouerned by his owne affections, and not a King that feareth God. But others vpon further examination construe this Text farre otherwise, as teaching vs what Subjects ought with patience to beare at their Soueraignes hand. The former opinion is grounded first vpon that place of Deuteronomie,³⁰ where God fore-sheweth this change of government from Iudges to Kings, and after he had forbidden many things vnto the Kings, as many wiues, couetousnesse, and the like: he commandeth that the Kings which were to reigne ouer Israel, should write the Law of Deuteronomie, or cause it to be written: and to shew how greatly the King should honour the Law, he addeth, It shall be with him, and he shall read therein all the dayes of his life: that hee may learne to feare the Lord his God, and to keepe all the words of this Law, and those ordinances for to doe them: that hee may prolong his daies in his Kingdome, he and his Sonnes. But to take away any other mans field, say they, is contrarie to the lawes of God: in the same booke written. For it is said, That which is iust and right shall thou follow, that thou mayest liue. Now if it bee not permitted to carrie away grapes more than thou canst eate out of another mans vineyard, but forbidden by God: it is much lesse lawfull to take the vineyard it selfe from the owner, and giue it to another. Neither are the wordes of the Text (say they) such as doe warrant the Kings of Israel, or make it proper vnto them, to take at will any thing from their vassalls. For it is not said that it shall be lawfull for the King, or the King may doe this or that: but it is written, that the King will take your Sonnes: and againe, This shall bee the manner of the King that shall reigne ouer you. God thereby fore-shewing what power seuered from pietie, (because it is accountable to God only) will doe in the future. And hereof we finde the first example in Achab,⁵⁰

Deut. 17.

Deut. 6.

Deut. 16.

who tooke from Naboth both his Vineyard and his life, contrary to the truit which God had put in him, of gouerning well his people. For God commanded, That his people should be iudged with righteous iudgement. Wherefore, though the King had offered vnto Naboth compollition, as a Vineyard of better value, or the worth in money money which he refused: yet because hee was falsly accused, and vniuently condemned (though by colour of law) how grievously Achab was punished by God, the Scriptures tell vs. Neither was it a plea sufficient for Achab against the all-righteous God, to say that it was done without his consent, and by the Elders of Israel. For God had not then left his people to the Elders, but to the King, who is called a liuing Law, even as David testifieth of himselfe: Posuisti me in caput gentium: For this of S. Augustine is very true: Simulata innocentia, non est innocentia: simulata equitas non est equitas: sed duplicatur peccatum in quo est iniquitas. Et simulatio 3. Fained innocence, and fained equitie, are neither the one nor the other: but the fault or offence is there doubled, in which there is both iniquitie and dissimulation. Such in effect is their disposition, who thinke this place to containe the description of a Tyrant. But the arguments on the contrary side, as they are many and forcible, so are they well knowne to all; being excellently handled in that Princely discourse of The true Law of free Monarchies, which Treatise I may not presume to abridge, much lesse here to insert. Only thus much I will say, that if practice doe shew the greatnesse of authoritie, even the best Kings of Isa and Israel were not so tied by any lawes, but that they did whatsoever they pleased in the greatest things; and commanded some of their owne Princes, and of their owne brethren to be slaine without any triall of law, being sometime by Prophets reprehended, sometime not. For though David confessed his offence for the death of Uriah, yet Salomon killing his elder brother and others, the same was not imputed vnto him as any offence.

That the state of Israel should receiue this change of gouernment, it was not only fore-told by Moses in Deuteronomie, but prophesied of by Isaiah in this Scripture: The Gen. 49. Septer shall not depart from Iuda, &c. It was also promised by God to Abraham for a blessing: For it was not only assured that his issues should in number equal the Starres in heauen, but that Kings should proceede of him: Which state seeing it is framed from the paterne of his sole rule, who is Lord of the Vniuersall; and the excellencie thereof in respect of all other gouernments, hath been by many iudicious men handled and proued, I shall not neede to ouer-paint that which is garnished with better colours already, that I can lay on.

In the time of the Iudges every man hath obserued what ciuill Warre Israel had: what outrageous slaughters they committed vpon each other: in what miserable seruitude they liued for many yeeres: and when it fared best with them, they did but defend their owne Territories, or recover some parts thereof formerly lost. The Canaanites dwelt in the best vallies of the Countrey. The Ammonites held much of Gilead ouer Jordan the Philistines the Sea-coasts; and the Iebusites Hierusalem it selfe, till Davids time: all which that King did not only conquer and establish, but hee mastered and subiected all the neighbour Nations, and Kings, and made them his tributaries and vassals. But whether it were for that the Israelites were moued by those reasons, which allure the most of all Nations to liue vnder a Monarch, or whether by this means they fought to bee cleared from the sonnes of Samuel, they became deafe to all the persuasions and threats which Samuel vsed, insisting vpon this point that they would haue a King, both to iudge them and defend them: whereunto when Samuel had warrant from God to consent, he sent euery man to his owne Citie and abiding.

§. II.

Of the election of Saul.

50 fter that Samuel had dismissed the assembly at Beth-lehem, hee forbore the election of a King, till such time as he was therein directed by God: who fore-told him the day before, that hee would present vnto him a man of the Land of Beniamin, whom hee commanded Samuel to anoint. So

Samuel

Samuel went unto Ramath Saphim, to make a feast for the entertainment of Saul (whom yet hee knew not, but knew the truth of Gods promises) and Saul also having wandered diuers dayes to seeke his Fathers Asses, at length by the aduice of his seruant traualled towards Ramath, to finde out a Seer or Prophet, hoping from him to be told what way to take, to finde his beasts. In which journey it pleased God (who doth many times order the greatest things by the simplest passages and persons) to elect Saul, who sought an ass, and not a Kingdome: like as formerly it had pleased him to call Moses, while he fed the sheepe of Isabro; and after to make choice of David the yongest of eight finnes, and the by the Scriptures called a little one, who was then keeping of beasts, and changed his sheep-hooke into a Scepter, making him of all other the most victorious King of Iuda and Israel. So Iohn and Jacob were taken from calling their nets, to become fishers of men, and honoured with the title of Apostles, a dignitie that died not in the graue, as all worldly Honours doe: but permanent and euerslasting in Gods endlesse Kingdome.

When Samuel was entered into Ramath, he prepar'd a banquet for the King, whom he expected and staied his arrival at the gate. Not long after came Saul, whom God shewed to Samuel, and made him know that it was the same whom hee had foretold him of, that he should rule the people of God. Saul finding Samuel in the gate, but knowing him not, though a Prophet and Iudge of Israel, much lesse knowing the Honour which attended him, asked Samuel in what part of the Citie the Seer dwelt. Samuel answered that himselfe was the man he sought, and prayed Saul to goe before him to the high place, where Samuel setting him according to his degree, aboue all that were invited, conferred with him afterwards of the affaires of the Kingdome, and of Gods graces to be bestowed on him, and the morning following anointed him King of Israel.

After this he told him all that should happen him in the way homeward; that two men should encounter him by Rabels Sepulchre, who should tell him that his Asses were found, and that his Fathers carcs were changed from the feare of losing his beasts, to doubt the losse of his Sonne: that he should then meete three other men in the plaine of Tabor; then a company of Prophets: and that he should be partaker of Gods Spirit, and prophetic with them: and that thereby his condition and disposition should be changed from the vulgar, into that which became a King elected and fauoured by God.

But the Prophets here spoken of, men indued with spiritual gifts, were not of the first and most reuerenced number, who by diuine reuelation fore-told things to come, reprehended without feare the errors of their Kings, and wrought miracles; of which number were Moses, Iosua, Samuel, and after them God, Nathan, Abiath, Eliab, Elisau, Isay, Ieremie, and the rest; for these Prophets, faith S. Chrysostome, Omnia tempora percurrant, praeterita, praesentia, & futura: but they were of those of whom S. Paul speaketh of, 1. Cor. 1. 14. who enriched with spiritual gifts, expounded the Scriptures and the Law.

At Mizpeh Samuel assembled the people, that hee might present Saul to them, who as yet knew nothing of his election: neither did Saul acquaint his owne Vncle therewith, when he asked him what had paist betwene him and Samuel: for either he thought his estate not yet assured, or else that it might be dangerous for him to reueale it, till he were confirmed by generall consent. When the Tribes were assembled at Mizpeh, the generall opinion is, that hee was chosen by lot. Chimbi thinks by the answer of Primo and Thumim: that is, by the answer of the Priest, wearing that mysticall vpon his breast when he asked counsaile of the Lord. But the casting of lots was not only much vsed among the Iewes, but by many others, if not by all nations. The Land of promise was diuided by lot: God commanded lots to be call on the two Goates, which should be sacrificed, and which turned off: a figure of Christs suffering, and our deliuerance, for whose garments the Iewes also cast lots, Cicero, Plautus, Panfanian, and others haue remembred diuers sorts of lots vsed by the Romanes, Gracians, and other Nations: as in the diuision of grounds or honours, and in things to be vnder-taken: the two first kindes were called diuinity; the third, diuinary; and into one of these three all may be reduced: all which kindes howeuer they may seeme chancefull, are yet ordered and directed by God: as in the Præterita: The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition is of the Lord. And inlike sort fell the Kingdome of Israel on Saul, not by chance, but by Gods ordinance, who gaue Samuel former knowledge of his election: from which election Saul withdrew himselfe in modestie, as both Iosephus confesse, and as it may be gathered by his former answers to Samuel, when he acknowledged himselfe the least of the least Tribe. But Samuel enlightened by God, found where Saul was hidden, and brought him among the people, and he was taller than all the rest by the shoulders. And Samuel made them know that he was the chosen King of Israel, whereupon all the multitude saluted him King, and prayed for him; yet some there were that enuied his glory (as in all estates there are such) who did not acknowledge him by offering him presents, as the manner was: of whom Saul, to auoid sedition, tooke no notice.

§. III.

Of the establishing of SAUL by his first victories.

NO sooner was Saul placed in the Kingdome, but that hee received knowledge that Nabes King of the Ammonites prepared to besiege Iabes Gilead: which Nation since the great ouerthrow giuen them by Iephtha, neuer durst attempt any thing vpon the Israelites, till the beginning of Saul his rule. And although the Ammonites did always attend vpon the aduantage of time, to recover those Territories which first the Amorites, and then Israel dispossessed them of; which they made the ground of their inuasion in Iephtha's time; yet they neuer perswaded themselves of more aduantage than at this present. For first they knew that there were many of the Israelites that did not willingly submit themselves to this new King: secondly, they were remembered that the Philistines had not long before slaine 34000. of their men of Warre: and besides had vsed great care and policie that they should haue no Smithies to make them swords or speares: neither was it long before that the Bethshemites and places adioyning, there perished by the hand of God more then 50000. and therefore in these respects, euen occasion it selfe invited them to enlarge their Dominions vpon their borderers: Iabes Gilead being one of the nearest. Besides it may further be coniectured, that the Ammonites were emboldened against Iabes Gilead, in respect of their weaknesse: since the Israelites destroyed a great part of them, for not loyning with them against the Beniamites: at which time they did not only slaughter the men and male-children, but tooke from them their yong women, and gaue them to the Beniamites: and therefore they were not likely to haue beene increased to any great numbers: and if they had recovered themselves of this great calamitie, yet the ammonite might flatter himselfe with the opinion, that Israel hauing for long time beene disarmed by the Philistines, was not apt to succour those whom they had so deeply wounded and destroyed. But contrariwise, when the tidings came to Saul of their danger, and that the Ammonites would giue them no other condition to ransom themselves, but by pulling out their right eies, by which they should be utterly disabled for the Warre, as elsewhere hath been spoken: Saul, both to valie himselfe in his first yeeres raigne, and because perchance hee was delcnded of one of those 400. Maides taken from the Gileadites, and giuen to the Beniamites, gaue order to assemble the forces of Israel, hewing a yoke of Oxen into pieces, and sending them by messengers ouer all the coasts, protesting thus: That whosoever came not forth after SAUL and after SAMUEL, so should his Oxen bee frused: threatening the people by by their goods, and not by their liues at the first. Seuen dayes had Saul to assemble an Armie, by reason that the Gileadites had obtained the respite of these seuen dayes to giue Nabab the Ammonite an answer: who, could they haue obtained any reasonable condition, were contented to haue secured themselves from Israel, and to become Vassals and Tributaries to the Heathen. In the meane while Saul assembled the forces which repaired vnto him at Beze, neere Jordan, that he might readily passe the Riuer; which done, he might in one day with a speedy march arrive at Iabel, vnder the Hills of Gilead.

1. Sam. 10.

1 Sam. 11. 8.

The Armie by Saul led, consisting of three hundred and thirty thousand, hereturned an answer to those of Iabel, that they should assure themselves of succour 10 by the next day at noone. For, as it seemeth, Saul marched away in the latter part of the day, and went on all night; for in the morning watch he surprized the Armie of Nabab the Ammonite. And to the end that he might set on them on all sides, he diuided his force in three parts, putting them to the sword vntill the heate of the day, and the weariness of Sauls troupe inorfit them to giue over the pursuit. Now the Ammonites were become the more careless and secure, in that those of Iabel promised the next morning to render themselves and their Citie to their mercie. After this happie successe the people were so farre in loue with their new King, that they would haue flaine all those Israelites that murmured against his election, had not himselfe forbidden and relisted their resolutions. Such is the condition of worldly 20 men, as they are violent louers of the prosperous, and base Vassals of the time that flourisheth: and as despightfull and cruell without cause against those, whom any misadventure, or other worldly accident hath throwne downe.

1 Sam. 11.

After the Armie remoued, Samuel summoned the people to meete at Gilgal, where Saul was now a third time acknowledged, and as some Commenters affirm, anointed King: and here Samuel vsed an exhortation to all the assembly, containing precepts, and a rehearfall of his owne Iustice, during the beginning of his gouernment to that day. After Saul had now reigned one yeere before hee was established in Gilgal, or Galgala, he strengthened himselfe with a good guard of 3000. chosen men, of which he assigned 1000. to attend on Jonathan his sonne at Gibeah, the Citie of his 30 natuities: the rest hee kept about his owne person in Micmas; and in the Hill of Bethel.

1 Sam. 13.

§. IIII.

OF SAULS disobedience in his proceedings in the Warres with the Philistims and Amalekites, which caused his final reiection.

NONATHAN with his small Armie or Regiment that attended him, 40 taking a time of advantage, surprized a Garrison of Philistims: the same, as some thinke, which Saul past by, when hee came from Rams, where hee was first anointed by Samuel, which they thinke to haue bene Cariath-icriarim: because a place where the Philistims had a Garrison, 1 Sam. 10. is called the Hill of God, which they vnderstand of Cariath-icriarim: but Iunius vnderstands this Garrison to haue been at Gibeah in Beniamin neere Gibba, where Jonathan abode with his thousand followers. Howsoever by this it appeareth that the Philistims held some strong places, both in the times of Samuel, and of Saul, within the Territory of Israel: and now being greatly enraged by this surprize, they assembled 30000. armed Chariots, and 6000. Horse, where-with they invaded Iudea, and incamped at Machmas, or Michmas, a Citie of Beniamin, in the direct way from Somaria to Hierusalem, and in the midst of the Land betwene the Sea and Jordan. With this sudden inuasion the Israelites were stricken in so great a feare, as some of them hid themselves in the caues of the mountaines, other fled ouer Jordan 50 into into Gad and Gilead: Saul himselfe with some 2000. men of ordinarie, and many other people, liaid at Galgala in Beniamin, not farre from the passage of Iosua when he led Israel ouer Jordan. Heere Saul by Samuels appointment was to attend the coming of Samuel seuen daies: but when the last day was in part spent, and that Saul perceived his forces to diminish greatly, he presumed (as some expound the place 1 Sam. 13. 9.) to exercise the office which appertained not vnto him, and to offer a burnt offering and a peace offering vnto God, contrarie to the Ecclesiasticall lawes of the Hebrewes, and Gods Commandements: others expound the word, obstuli, in this place, by obstuli per Sacerdotem, and so make the sinne of Saul not to haue bene any intrusion into the Priests office, but first a disobedience to Gods Commandement, 10 in not staying according to the appointment 1 Sam. 10. 8. secondly a diffidence or mistrust in Gods helpe, and too great relying vpon the strength of the people, whose departing from him he could not beare patiently; and lastly a Contempt of the holy Prophet Samuel, and of the helpe which the prayers of so godly a man might procure him. But whatsoeuer was his sinne, notwithstanding his excuses, he was by Samuel reprehended most sharply, in termes visiting his estate, had not extraordinary warrant bene giuen to Samuel so to doe, from God himselfe, at which time also Samuel feared not to let him know, that the Kingdome should be conferred to another (a man after Gods owne heart) both from Saul and his posteritie. 1 Sam. 13. 14.

20 After this Samuel and Saul returned to Gibeah, where Saul, when he had taken view of his armie, found it to consist of 600. men: for the most were fled from him and scattered, yea and among those that staid, there was not any that had either sword or speare, but Saul and his sonne Jonathan only. For the Philistims had not left them any Smyth in all Israel, that made weapons; besides, they that came to Saul came hastily, and left such weapons and armour as they had, behind them in the garisons: for if they had had none at all, it might be much doubted how Saul should be able 30 the yeere before, or in some part of this very yeere, to succour Iabel Gilead with 300. and thirtie thousand men, if there had not now bene any yron weapon to defend themselves withall, save onely in the hand of Saul and Jonathan his sonne. But howsoever, all the rest of the people were formerly disarmed by the Philistims, and all those craftsmen carried out of the land that made weapons: there being left vnto the Israelites onely files to sharpen and amend such stiffe as serued for the Plough, and for nought else: yet that they had some kinde of armes it is manifest, for els they durst not haue attempted vpon the Philistims as they did. And it is not said in the Text that there was not any sword in all Israel, but onely that there was not any found amongst those 600. souldiers which staid with Saul after Samuels departure: and it seemeth that when Samuel had publicly reprehended Saul, that his owne guards forsooke him, hauing but 600. remaining of his 3000. ordinarie souldiers, and of all the rest that repaired vnto him, of which many were fled from him before 40 Samuel arrived.

1 Sam. 13. 22.

With this small troupe he held himselfe to his owne Citie of Gibeah, as a place of more strength and better assured vnto him, then Gilgal was. Neither is it obscure how it should come to passe that the Philistims should thus disarme the most part of the Israelites, howsoever in the time of Samuel much had bin done against them. For the victories of Samuel were not got by sword or speare, but by thunder from heauen: and when these craftsmen were once rooted out of the Cities of Israel, no maruaile if they could not in a short peace vnder Samuel be replanted againe. For this erranny of the Philistims is to be vnderstood, rather of the precedent times, than vnder Samuel: and yet vnder him it is to be thought that by their crafts they 50 proceeded in the policie, not suffering their artificers to teach the Israelites, and so euen to the times of Saul kept them from hauing any store of armour. The same policie did Nabuchodonosor vse after his Conquest in Iulaea: Dionysius in Sicilie; and many other Princes else where in all ages. But these lost weapons in part the Israelites might repaire in Gilead, for ouer Jordan the Philistims had not invaded.

Sf

inuated. The rest of their defences were such as antiquitie vsed, and their present necessitie ministred vnto them; to wit, clubs, bowes, and slings. For the Beniamites exceeded in casting stones in slings; and that these were the naturall weapons, and the first of all nations, it is manifest; and so in the first of Chronicles the twelfth Chapter, it is written of those that came to succour Dauid against Saul, while he lurked at Siklag, That they were weaponed with bowes, and could vsie the right and the left hand with stones; and with a sling it was, that Dauid himselfe slew the Gyant Goliath.

While the State of Israel stood in these hard termes, the Philistims hauing parted their armie into three troupes, that they might spoile and destroy many parts at once; Ionathan strengthened by God, and followed with his Esquire onely, scaled a mountaine, whereon a companie of Philistims were lodged: the rest of their armie (as may bee gathered by the successe) being incamped in the plaine adioyning. And though hee were discovered before he came to the hill top, and in a kinde of derision called vp by his enemies: yet hee so behaued himselfe, as with the assistance of God hee slew twentie of the first Philistims that hee incountred. Whereupon the next companies taking the alarme, and being ignorant of the cause, fled away amazed altogether. In which confusion, feare, and ialousie, they slaughtered one another in stead of enemies: whereupon those Hebrewes which became of their partie, because they feared to be spoiled by them, tooke the aduantage of their destruction, and flew of them in great numbers. And lastly, Saul himselfe taking knowledge of the rout and disorder, together with those Israelites that throuted themselves in mount Ephraim, set vpon them and obtained (contrary to all hope and expectation) a most happie and glorious victorie ouer them. Heere was that prophetic in Deuteronomie fulfilled by Ionathan, That one of those which feared God, should kill a thousand, and two of them ten thousand.

This done, the small armie of Israel made retreat from the pursuit. And though Saul had bound the people by an oath not to take foode till the cuning, yet his sonne Ionathan being infeebled with extreme labour and emptinesse, tasted a drop of hony in his passage: for which Saul his father would haue put him to death, had not the people deliuered him from his crueltie.

The late miraculous victorie of Saul and Ionathan, seemed to haue reduced vnto the Philistims remembrance their former ouerthrow likewise miraculous in the daies of Samuel; so that for some space of time they held themselves quiet. In the meane while Saul being now greatly encouraged, vndertooke by turnes all his bordering enemies; namely, the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and the Arabians of Zobah, against all which hee preuailed. Hee then assembled all the forces hee could make, to wit, 210000. men, and receiuing the commaundement of God by Samuel, hee invaded Amalec, wasting and destroying all that part of Arabia Petraea, and the desert, belonging to the Amalekites, from Hauilah towards Tigeris vnto Shur, which bordereth Egypt; in which warre hee tooke Agag their King prisoner. But whereas hee was instructed by Samuel to follow this Nation without compassion, because they first of all other attempted Israel, when they left Egypt in Moses time: he notwithstanding did not onely spare the life of Agag, but reserved the best of the beards and spoile of the Countrey, with pretence to offer them in sacrifice to the liuing God. Therefore did Samuel now a second time make him know, that God would cast him from his roiall estate to little in his owne eyes. And though the offence was great in Saul for not obeying the voice of God by Samuel, had there bin no former precept to that effect: yet seeing Saul could not be ignorant how severely it pleased God to inioyne the Israelites to reuenge themselves vpon that Nation, he was in all vncexcusable. For so God had commanded that the Israelites should put out the remembrance of Amalec from vnder heaven. For the crueltie which the predecessors of this Agag vsed against the Israelites, especially on those which were ouerwearied, faint, sicke, and aged people, was now to be reuenged on him, & his Nation about 400. yeres after ward; and and now hee was to pay the debt of blood, which his forefathers borrowed from the innocent: himselfe hauing also sinned in the same kind, as these words of Samuel witnesse: As thy sword hath made other women childlesse, so shall thy mother be childlesse among other women; at which time Samuel himselfe (after he had bin by many bootlesse intreaties perswaded to stay awhile with Saul) did cut Agag in pieces before the Lord in Gilgal, and soone after he departed to Ramath, and came no more to see Saul, vntill the day of his death.

¶ V.

Of the occurments betwene the refection of Saul and his death.

Now while Samuel mourned for Saul, God commanded him to choose a King for Israel, among the sonnes of Israhel: which Samuel (doubting the violent hand of Saul) feared in a sort to performe, till it pleased God to direct him, how hee might auoid both the supposition, and the danger. And if Samuel knew that it was no way derogating from the prouidence of God, that by his cautious care and wisdom hee sought to auoid the inconuenience or dangers of this life, then doe those men mislake the nature of his diuine ordinance, who neglecting the reason that God hath giuen them, doe no otherwise auoid the perills and dangers thereof, than as men stupified in the opinion of fate, or destinie, neglecting either to beg counsaile at Gods hand by prayer, or to exercise that wisdom or fore-sight, where-with God hath enriched the mind of man, for his preseruacion. Neither did the all-powerfull God (who made and could destroy the world in an instant) disdaine here to instruct Samuel, to auoid the furie of Saul, by the accustomed cautious waies of the world.

Of the sonnes of Israhel Samuel by God directed, made choise of Dauid, the yongest, hauing refused Eliab, the first borne: who though he were a comely person and great strength; yet vnto such outward appearance the Lord had no respect. For as it is written, God seeth not as man seeth, &c. but the Lord beholdeth the heart. Hee also refusing the other sixe brethren, made choise of one whom his Father had altogether neglected, and left in the field to attend his flock; for of him the Lord said to SAMUEL, Arise and anoint him, for this is he: which done, Samuel departed & went to Ramath. Neither was it long after this that Saul began to seeke the life of Dauid: in which bloody mind he continued till he died, ouercome in battaile by the Philistims.

The Philistims hauing well considered (as it seemed) the increase of Saul his power through many victories by him obtained, whilest they had sitten still and forborne to giue impediment vnto his prosperous courses, thought it good to make new trial of their fortune, as iustly fearing that the wrongs which they had done to Israel might be repaid with aduantage; it euer opportunitee should serue their often intured neighbours against them, as lately it had done against Moab, Ammon, and the rest of their ancient enemies. Now for the qualitie of their Souldiers, and all Warlike provisions, the Philistims had reason to think themselves equal, if not superiours to Israel. The successe of their former wars had for the most part bin agreeable to their owne wishes; as for late disasters, they might, according to humane wisdom, impute them to second causes, as to a tempest happening by chance, and to a mistaken alarme, whereby their Armie possessed with a needlesse feare had fallen to rout. Hauing therefore mustered their forces and taken the field, encamping so neere to the Armie which King Saul drew forth against them, that they could not easily depart without the triall of a battaile, each part kept their ground of aduantage for a while, not ioyning in grosse, but maintaining some skirmishes, as refusing both of them to passe the valley that lay between their Camps. Iust causes of feare they had on both sides; especially the Philistims, whose late attempts had bene confounded by the angrie hand of God. Vpon this occasion perhaps it was, that they fought to decide the matter by single combat, as willing to try in one mans person, whether any stroke from heaven were to be feared. Goliath of Gath a strong Giant, fearing neither God nor man, undertooke to defie the whole hoste of Israel, prouoking them with despightfull words, to appoint a Champion that might fight with him hand to hand, offering condition, that the partie vanquished in Champion, should hold it selfe as overcome in groffe, and become vassall to the other. This gaue occasion to young David, whom Samuel by Gods appointment had anointed, to make a famous entrance into publicke notice of the people. For no man durst expose himselfe to encounter the great strength of Goliath, untill David (sent by his father on errand to the campe) accepted the combat, and obtained the victorie, without other armes offensive or defensive than a sling, wherewith hee ouerthrew the haughtie Giant, and after with his owne sword strooke off his head. Hereupon the Philistims, who should haue yielded themselves as subiects to the Conquerour, according to the covenant on their owne side propounded, fled without stay; and were pursued and slaughtered euen to their owne gates. By this victorie the Philistims were not so broken, that either any of their townes were lost, or their people discouraged from infesting the Territories of Israel. But David, by whom God had wrought this victorie, fell into the grieuous indignation of his master Saul, through the honour purchased by his well deferring. For after such time as the spirit of God departed from Saul, and came vpon David, he then became a cruell Tyrant, faithlesse, and irreligious. Because the high Priest Abimelech fed David in his necessitie with hallowed bread, and armed him with the sword of his own conquest taken from Goliath; Saul not only by his wicked Edomite Doeg murdered this Abimelech and 85. Priests of Nob, but also he destroyed the Cite, and smote with the edge of the sword both man and woman, both child and suckling, both Oxe and Ass, and sheepe. And he that had compassion on Agag the Amalekite, who was an enemy to God and his people, and also spared and preferred the best of his Cartell, contrary to the Commandement and ordinance of God, both by Moses and Samuel, had not now any mercie in store, for the innocent, for the Lords seruants the Priests of Israel. Yea he would haue slaine his owne sonne Jonathan, for pitying and pleading Dauids innocencie, as also once before for tasting the hony, when his fainting for hunger made him forget his fathers vnreasonable commination. The companions of cruelty are breach of faith towards men, and impetie towards God. The former he shewed in denying David his daughter, whom he had promised him: and againe in taking her away from him, to whom he had given her; also in that when David had twice spared his life in the Territory of Ziph, and Saul twice sworne to do him no hurt, and confessed his errors, yet he sought still to destroy him, by all the meanes he could. His impetie towards God he shewed, in that he sought counsell of the witch of Endor, which was the last preparatiue for his destruction. For whereas when he sought counsell from God he had bene alwaies victorious: from the Oracle of the Devil this successe followed, that both himselfe, and his three sons, with his neere and faithfulllest seruants, were all slaughtered by the Philistims: his bodie ouer the bodies of his sonnes (as a spectacle of shame and dishonour) were hang ouer the walls of Bethsan: and there had remained till they had found buriall in the bowels of rauensous birds, had not the gratefull Gileadites of Iabes holne their carcases thence and interred them. This was the end of Saul, after he had gouerned Israel, together with Samuel 40. yeres, and by himselfe after Samuel 20. yeres, according to Cedrenus, Theopbilus, and Iosephus. But yet it seemeth to mee, that after the death of Samuel, Saul did not rule very long. For in the beginning of the 25. chapter, it is written that Samuel died: and in the rest of the same chapter the passages are written of David, Nabal, and Abigail, after which the death of Saul quickly ensued.

An exceeding valiant man he was, and gaue a faire entrance to all those victories which David afterward obtained, for he had beaten the Ammonites, with their neighbouring Nations, crushed the Syrians, and their adherents, broken the strength of the Amalekites; and greatly wasted the power and pride of the Philistims.

Of such as lined with SAMUEL and SAUL; of HELLEN and HERCVLES, and of their issues: upon occasion of the DORIES, with the HERACLIDES, entering PELOPONNESVS about this time.

N the second yere of Samuel, according to Eusebius, was David borne: after Codoman later, and in the ninth yere: after Bunting in the tenth. For David, saith he, was thirtie yeres old when he began to reigne: whence it followeth, that he was borne in the tenth of the tenth yeres, which are given to Samuel and Saul. About the eleuenth of Samuel, Aeneas Silvius the sonne of Posthumus began his raigne ouer the Latines in Alba, who gouerned that State 31. yeres. There are who place before him Latinius Silvius, as brother to Posthumus, calling him the fifth from Eneas, and fourth King of Alba, whereof I will not stand to dispute. In the eleuenth of Samuel, Dercilius fate in the Throne of Affria, being the one and thirtieth King; he ruled that Empire 40. yeres. In this age of Samuel the Dores obtained Peloponnesus, and at once with the Heraclide, who then led and commanded the Nation, possit a great part thereof 328. yeres before the first Olympiad, according to Diodorus and Eratosthenes. For all Greece was anciently possit by three Tribes or Kindreds, viz. the Ionians, Dorians, and Aeolians: at length it was called Hellen, and the people Hellenes, of Hellen, the sonne of Deucalion, Lord of the Countrie of Phiotis in Thessalie. But before the time of this Hellen, yea and long after, Greece had no name common to all the inhabitants, neither were the people called Hellenes, till such time as partly by trading in all parts of the Land, partly by the plantation of many Colonies, and sundrie great victories obtained, the issues of Hellen had reduced much of the Countrie vnder their obedience, calling themselves generally by one name, and yet euery feuerall Nation after some one of the posteritie of Hellen, who had raigne ouer it. And because this is the furthest antiquitie of Greece, it will not be amisse to recount the Pedegree of her first planters.

Iapetus (as the Poets fable) was the sonne of Heauen and Earth, so accounted, either because the names of his Parents, had in the Greece tongue such signification: or perhaps for his knowledge in Astronomie and Philosophie.

Iapetus begat Prometheus and Epimetheus: of whom all men haue read that haue read Poets. Prometheus begat Deucalion: and Epimetheus, Pyrrha. Deucalion and his wife Pyrrha raigned in Thessalie, which then was called Pyrrha (as Cretensis Rhianus affirmeth) of Pyrrha the Queen. In Deucalion time was that great flood, of which we haue spoken elsewhere. Deucalion begat Hellen: whose sonnes were Xuthus, Dorus, and Aeolus: of Dorus and Aeolus, the Dores and Aeolians had name. The Aeolians inhabited Boetia. The Dores hauing first inhabited sundrie parties of Thessalie, did afterward scate themselves about Parnassus, and finally became Lords of the Countries about Lacedaemon: Xuthus the eldest sonne of Hellen, being banished by his brethren, for hauing diuerted from them to his owne use some part of their Fathers goods, came to Athens: where marrying the Daughter of King Erichonius, hee begat on her two sonnes, Achus and Ion. Of these two, Achus, for a slaughter by him committed, fled into Peloponnesus: and seating himselfe in Laconia, gaue name to that region: from whence (as some write) he afterwards departed; and leuying an Armie, recouered the Kingdome of his Grand-father in Thessalie.

Ion being General for the Athenians, when Enneolus the Thracian invaded Attica, did obtaine a great victorie, and thereby such loue and honour of the people, that they committed the ordering of their State into his hands. Hee diuided the Citizens into Tribes, appointing euery one to some occupation, or good course of life. When the people multiplied, he planted Colonies in Sycionia, then called Aegialos, or Aegialia: In which Countrie Solinus then raigning, thought it safer to giue his Daughter Helice in marriage to Ion, and make him his Heire, than to contend with him.

him. So Ion married Helice, and built a Towne called by his wives name in Ægilia, whence he, and his posterity reigned long, and (though not obliterating the old name) gave to that Land the denomination. But in after-times the Dores afflicting the Nephews of Heracles, invaded Peloponnesus, and over-coming the Achaens, possessed Lagania, and all those parts which the Achai had formerly occupied. Hereupon the Achai driven to seek a new feat, came vnto the Iones, desiring to inhabit Ægilia with them, and alledging in vaine, that Ion and Achaus had beene brethren. When this request could not be obtained, they fought by force to expell the ionians, which they performed; but they lost their King Tijamenes, the sonne of Orestes, in that Warre.

This were the Ionies driuen out of Peloponnesus, and compelled to remoue into Attica, from whence after a while they failed into Asia, and peopled the Welshire coast thereof, on which they built twelue Cities, inhabited by them, euen to this day, at the least without any vniuersal or memorabie transmigration. This expedition of the Ionies into Asia hath been mentioned of all which haue written of that Age, and is commonly placed 140. yeeres after the warre of Troy, and 60. yeeres after the descent of the Heracleids into Peloponnesus. These Heracleids were they of whom the Kings of Sparta issued ; which race held that Kingdome about 700. yeeres. Of their Father Heracles many strange things are deliuered vnto vs by the Poets, of which some are like to haue beene true, others perhaps must be allegorically vnderstood. But the most approved Writers thinke that there were many called Heracles, all whose exploits were by the Greekes ascribed to the sonne of Alcmena, who is said to haue performed the twelue great labours.

First, he flew the Nemean Lion ; secondly, he flew the Serpent Hydra, which had nine heads, whereof one being cut off, two grew in the place : The third was the ou-er-taking a very Swift Hare : The fourth was the taking of a wild Bore alive, which hanted mount Erymanthus in Arcadie : The fifth was the cleaning of Anguis his Oxe-hall in one day, which hee performed by turning the Riuer Alpheus into it :
The sixth was the chaine away of the Birds from the Lake Symphalis : The seventh was the fetching a Bull from Crete : The eighth was the taking of the Mares which so Dionides King of Thrace led with humane flesh : The ninth was to fetch a Girdle of the Queene of the Amazons : The three last were, to fetch Cerion : Beets from Gades ; the golden Apples of the Hesperides ; and Cerberus from hell. The Mythological interpretation of this I purposely omit, as both ouer-long to be here set downe, and no lesse perplexed than the labours themselves. For some by Hercules vnderstand Fortitude, Prudence, and Constance, interpreting the Monsters, Vices. Others make Hercules the Sunne, and his traualles to be the twelue signes of the Zodiac.
There are others who apply his workes historically to their owne conceits ; as well affured, that the expedition cannot have more vnlikelihoode, than the fables : That he rooke Elis, Pylus, Oechalia, and other Townes, being assailed by such as either admired his vertues, or were beholding vnto him. Also that he flew many Theeues, and Tyrants, I take to be truly written, without addition of Poetical vanitie : His traualles through most parts of the world are, or may seeme, borrowed from Hescules Libyses. But sure it is that many Cities in Greece were greatly bound to him :
for that he (bending all his induements to the common good) deliuered the Land from much oppression. But after his death no Citie of Greece (Athens excepted) required the vertue and deserts of Hercules, with conflant protection of his children, persequuted by the King Eurytheus. This Eurytheus was sonne of Sthenelus ; and grand-child of Perseus : he reigned in Mycene, the mightiest Citie then in Greece.
He it was that imposed those hard taskes vpon Hercules, who was bound to obay him (as Poets report) for expiation of that Murder, which in his madnesse hee had committed vpon his owne Children ; but as others say, because hee was his Subiect and Seruant : wherefore there are who commend Eurytheus for im-ploying the strength of Hercules to so good a purpose. But it is generally agreed by the best writers, that Heracles was also of the stock of Perseus, and holden in great esteem by Eurythene because of his vertue, which appeared more and more in the dangerous seruices, wherein hee was employed, so that hee grew great in reputation and power through all Greece; and had by many wives and Concubines above threecore children. These children Eurythene would faine haue got into his power, when Heracles was dead: but they fled into Corys King of Trachinia, and from him (for he durst not withland Eurythene) to Aethens. The Aethenians not onely gaue them entertainment, but lent them ayd, wherewith they encountered Eurythene. Iulani the brothers sonne of Heracles, who had assisted him in many of his trauels, was captaine of the Heracidae. It is said of him, that being dead, he obtained leave of Pluto to liue againe till he might reuenge the iniuries done by Eurythene: whom when hee had slaine in battell, hee died againe. It seemes to mee, that whereas hee had led Colones into Sicilie, and aboad there a long time forgotten; he came againe into Greece to afix his coullins, and afterwards returned backe. When the Peloponnesians vnderstood that Eurythene was slaine, they tooke Atreus the sonne of Pelops to their King: for hee was rich, mightie, and fauoured of the people. Against him the Heracidae marched vnder Hyllus the sonne of Heracles. But to auoid effusion of blood, it was agreed, that Hyllus should fight with Echemus King of the Tegate a people of Arcadia, who assisted Atreus, with condition, that if Hyllus were victor, hee should peaceably enioy what hee challenged as his right: otherwise the Heracidae should not enter Peloponnesus in 100. yeeres. In that combat Hyllus was slaine, and the Heracidae compelled to forbeare their Country, till the third generation: at which time they returned vnder Aristodemus (as the best authoritie shewes, though some haue said, that they came vnder the conduct of his children) and brought with them the Dares, whom they planted in that country, as is before shewed, hauing expelled the Achai, out whom the issue of Pelops had raised after the death of Eurythene foure generations.

OF HOMER and HESIOD, and many changes in the world, that happened about this age.

Bout this time that excellent learned Poet Homér lived, as many of the best Chronologers affirme. Hee was by race of the Moones, descended (as Fancius imagineth) of Berofis his Ammon, who gave name to that people. But this Fancius imagineth Homér the Poet to have beene long after these times, rashly framing his Ara according to 40 a Archilochus in the træd, or rather fragment of temporibus; and makes feuen more of this name to haue flourished in diuers Cities in Grecce. Whence, perhaps, spring the diuerſitie of opinions, both of the time and of the native Citie of Hom.

 to this Archilochus, Fundanus finds Hom about the time of Missaſſe King of Iuda, and Namus of Rome. He was called Mediceſus from the place of his birth, and at length *Hom*er, becauſe blind men follow a guide, which ſignification among others, is in the yerb hægus: for this *Hom*er in his latter time was blind. Clemens Alexandrinus recites many different opinions touching the queſtion of the time when Hom lived.
 So alſo Adrian Gellius, and Tatianus Affyrinus in his Oratid ad gentes. Paterculus recounts that *Hom*er flouriſhed 950. yeeres before the Coſſallip of Marcus Pinnius, which Mercator calleth yep in the worlds yere 3046. and after Trey Tenth, about 2600. yeeres: and about 250. yeeres before the building of Rome, making him to 50 haue flouriſhed about the time of Ichoſaphat King of Iuda. But Clemens Alexandrinus and Tatianus above named, mention authors that make him much anſcienter. The difference of which authors in this point is not unworthie the readers conſideration, that by this one influence hee may gueſſe of the difficultie, and fo pardon the spect of the valour of that Nation, that the Philistims would take Dauid's head, than see their foreskinnes. T his hope failing, when as now Dauid's victories begat new feares and iacobines in Saul, hee practised with Ionathan, and afterwards with his owne hands attempted his life, but his purposes were still frustrated. After all this hee sought to murder him in his owne house, but Michol his wife deliuered him. So Dauid sought Samuel at Ramath, and being pursued by Saul, fled thence vnto Nob in Beniamin, to Abimelech, then to Achis the Philistim, Prince of Geth: where to obscure himselfe, he was forc't to counterfeit both simplicitie and distraction. But being ill assured among the Philistims, he couered himselfe in the Cane of Adullam: and after conueying such of his kinsfolks as were not fit to follow him into Moab, he hid himselfe in the deserts of Ziph, Maan, and the hills of Engaddi, where hee cut off the lap of Saul's garments, and spared his life: as he did a second time in the desert of Ziph, after his passage with Nabal and Abigail. After which he repaired to Achis of Geth the second time, and was kindly entertained in regard of the hatred, with which his master Saul was knowne to persecute him.

Of Achis Dauid obtained * Siklag in Simen, pretending to invade Iudas: but hee bent his forces another way and strooke the Amalekites, with other enemies of Israel, letting none lye to claime vpon him. Achis supposing that Dauid had drawne blood of his owne Nation, thought himselfe assured of him: and therefore preparing to invade Israel, summoneth Dauid to assist him, who dissembling his intent, seemeth very willing thereto. But the rest of the Philistim Princes knowing his valour, and doubting his disposition, liked not his company, and therefore hee withdrew himselfe to Siklag. At his returne he found the towne burnt, his two wiues with the wiues and children of his people taken by the Amalekites: Hereupon his fellowes motiued, but God gaue him comfort, and assurance to recouer all againe: which hee did.

This armie of the Philistims commaunded by Achis, encountred Saul at Gilboa, in which hee and his three Sønnes were slaine. The newes with Saul's Crowne and bracelets were brought to Dauid at Siklag, in his returne from being victorious ouer Amalech, by a man of the same Nation, who auowed (though falsly) that himselfe at Saul's request had slaine him. Dauid, because hee had accused himselfe, made no scruple to cause him to be slaine at the instant: and the sooner, because the probabilities gaue strong euidence withall. Otherwise it followeth not that euery man ought to be beleeued of himselfe to his owne prejudice. For it is held in the lawes; Confessio reorum non habenda est pro expletato crimine, nisi approbata alia instruit religionem cognoscentia. The prisoners confession must not be taken for an euidence of the crime, unlessse some other prooffe informe the conscience of the Iudge. For a man may confesse those things of himselfe, that the Iudge by examination may know to be impossible. But because it is otherwise determined in the title de custodia reorum l. si confessus, et in cap. de penis l. qui sententiam, therefore doth the Glosse reconceit these two places in this sort: Si quis in iudicio sponte de seipso confitetur, et postea maneat in confessione, id est satis. If any man in iudgement doe confesse of himselfe, of his owne accord, and after doth perseuere in his confession, it is enough. That Dauid greatly bewailed Saul it is not improbable, for death cutteth asunder all competition: and the lamentable end that befell him, being a King, with whom in effect the strength of Israel also fell, could not but thrice vpon sorrow, and moue compassion in the heart of Dauid.

The victorie which the Philistims had gotten was so great, that some townes of the Israelites, euen beyond the river of Jordan, were abandoned by the inhabitants, and left vnto the enemy, who tooke possession of them without any resistance made. Wherefore it may seeme strange, that a Nation so warlike and ambitious as were the Philistims, did not follow their fortune with all diligence, and seeke to make the Conquest entire. Most like it seemes, that the Ciuill warre immediatly breaking out betwene Dauid and the house of Saul, wherein Iuda was diuided from the rest of Israel, gaue them hope of an easie victorie ouer both; and thereby caufed them to attempt nothing at the present, lest by so doing they should inforce their disagreeing enemies to a necessarie reconciliation; but rather to permit that the one part should consume the other, by which means, both the victors, and the vanquished, would become a prey to the violence of such as had beaten them, when their forces were vnited.

§. II.

Of the beginning of DAVID'S reigne, and the warre made by ABNER for ISBOSETH.

After the death of Saul, Abner, who commaunded for Saul in the war, sought to aduance Isboeth (or Ishbosus according to Iosephus) though hee had no right to the Kingdome of Israel: for Meophiboseth the first sonne of Ionathan liued. Against this Abner, and Isboeth, Dauid made a defenseless warre, till Abner past Jordan, and entred the border of Iuda, at which time he sent Iosh with such forces as hee had, to resist Abner: Isboeth remaining in Gilead, and Dauid in Hebron. The armies encountred each other nere Gibeon, where it seemeth, that Abner made the offer to trie the quarrell by the hands of a few; like to that Combat betwene the Lacedemonians, and the Argues, remembred by Herodotus, 300. being chosen of each Nation, of which number three persons were onely left vnlaine. The like triall by a farre lesse number was performed by the Hortij and Curiatij for the Romanes and Latines. The same challenge Goliath the Philistim made, whom Dauid slew: a custome very ancient. Edward the third offered the like triall in his owne person to the French King; and Francis the French King to Charles the Emperour. There were twelue chosen of each part, in this warre of Dauid with the house of Saul, to wit, so many of Beniamin, and as many of Iuda: whose force and valour was so equal, as there ensued not any one to challenge the victorie. But the quarrell staid not here: for the armie of Iuda prest Abner in grosse, and brake him. Three hundredth and sixtie men of Abners companions were slaine, and but twentie of Iuda; whereof Ashabel the brother of Iosh was one: who when he would needs pursue Abner, and by Abners perswasions could not be moued to quit him, he was forced to turne vpon him, wounding him to death, with the Brooke of his speare. For though Ashabel were an excellent footman, and as it is written in the Text, as light as a wild Roe, and as Iosephus reporteth, contented not onely with men, but with horses; and hoped to haue gotten great fame, if he could haue mastered Abner (who as Ashabel perswaded himselfe, had by being overthrown and flying away lost his courage) yet here it fell out true; That the race was not to the swift. That this ciuill warre lasted two yeeres, wee finde it written in the second of Samuel the second Chapter; though in the beginning of the third it is againe made probable, that this contention dured longer; and therefore the matter resteth still in dispute, and some of the Rabbines conceiue that Isboeth had then reigned two yeeres, when this was written, the warre as yet continuing a longer time. For Abner held for the partie of Isboeth after this, and till such time as there grew iacobine betwene him and Isboeth for Saul's concubine: neither did the death of Isboeth instantly follow; but how long after the murder of Abner it happened, the fame doth not certainly appeare.

§. III.

Of the death of ABNER, slaine by IOAB, and of ISBOSETH
by RECHAB and BAANAH.

2 Sam. 3. 27.

2 Sam. 3. 39.

10 of 39.

ABNER, reconciled to David, was anon by IOAB murdered; for IOAB could not endure a companion in Davids favour, and in the commandment of his forces, by which hee was growne so powerfull, as David forbore to call him to account; for thus much hee confesseth of himselfe: I am this day weake, and these men the sonnes of ZERUIAH bee too hard for mee. In this sort David complained after ABNERS death, and to make it cleare that hee hated this fact of IOAB, hee followed him with this publike imprecation; Let the blood fall on the head of IOAB, and on all his fathers house: and let them be subiect to plagues, to the leprosie, to lameness, to the sword, and to poyson, &c. For could any thing haue withstood the ordinance of God, this murder committed by IOAB might greatly haue indangered Davids estate; ABNER being the mouth and trust of all the rest of the Tribes, not yet reconciled. This mischance therefore David openly bewailed, so that all Israel perceived him to bee innocent of that fact. The place which ABNER held, being General of the men of warre, was of such importance, that the Kings themselves were faine to give them great respect, as hath bene already shewed more at large. This office IOAB held in the armie of Iuda, & thought himselfe worthy to hold the place entire, if once his Lord might obtaine the whole Kingdom. For hee was nere to David in kinred, and had bene partaker of all his aduersities; wherefore hee did not thinke it meete, that an old enemy should in reward of new benefits, be made his partner. Indeed he was by nature so jealous of his dignitie and place, that hee afterward slew ANASIS his owne kinsman, and the Kings, vpon the same quarrell, taking it in high disdain to see him ioyned with himselfe as capitaine of the hoste of Iuda; much lesse could hee brooke a superiour, and such a one as had slaine his brother, and bene beaten himselfe in battell. But howsoever IOAB did hate or despise ABNER, David esteemed highly of him as of a Prince, and a great man in Israel, excusing the oversight by which he might seeme to haue perished, by affirming that hee died not like a foole, nor a man vanquished, But as a man falleth before wicked men, so (said hee) diddest thou fall. And certainly it is no error of wit, nor want of valour and vertue in him whom a stronger hand destroyeth vnawares, or whom subtiltie in free trust bringeth to confusion. For vnder the Sunne are subiect to worldly miseries and misadventures. Howsoever ISBOSETH meant to haue dealt with ABNER, yet when he heard of his death, hee despaired greatly of his estate, and with him all Israel were posselt with great feare: inso-much as two of ISBOSETHS owne Captaines, RECHAB and BAANAH, murdered ISBOSETH, and presenting his head to David, received the same reward that the AMALÉKITES lately did, for pretending to haue slaine SAUL. ISBOSETH being dead, all the Elders of Israel repaired to David at Hebron, where he was the third and last time anointed by general consent.

Of the flourishing time of DAVIDS Kingdom, the taking of Ierusalem, with two overthrowes given to the Philistims, and the conduccion of the Arke to the Citie of DAVID.

2 Sam. 5.

When David was now established in the Kingdom, his first enterprise was vpon the Iebusites, who in derision of his force, and confident in the strength of the place (as is thought) manned their walles with the blinde and lame of their Citie; which David soon after entered: all their other forces notwithstanding. For hauing mastered the fort of

Zion

Zion (which was afterward the Citie of David) hee became Lord of Ierusalem, without any great danger, expelling thence the Iebusites, who had held it from the foundation, to the times of Moyses and Isua, and after them almost 400. yeeres. There are who expound this place otherwise: Except thou take away the blinde and the lame, thou shalt not come in hither. For some thinke that it was meant by the Idols of the Iebusites; others, that it had reference to the Couenent made long before with Isua, and Iacob: the one blinde by nature and age, the other made lame by wrestling with the Angell, and that therefore till thole (that is, till that Couenent) be broken, David ought not to molest them. But for my selfe I take it with Iosephus, that they armed their wals with certaine impotent people at first, in scorn of Davids attempt. For they that had held their Citie about 400. yeeres against all the children of Israel, Isua, the Iudges, and Saul, did not doubt but to defend it also against David.

When he had now posselt himselfe of the very heart and Center of the Kingdom, and received congratulatory Embassadors & presents from Itham King of Tyre: he entertained diuers other concubines & married moe wiues, by whom he had ten sons in Ierusalem, and by his former wiues he had six in Hebron where he reigned 75. yeeres.

The Philistims hearing that David was now anointed King, as well of Iudas as of Israel, they thought to try him in the beginning, before hee was fully warme in his feat. And being encountered by David at two severall times in the Valley of Rephaim, or of the Giants, they were at both times overthrowne. After which hee called the place

2 Sam. 5.

Baupersim.

Then David assembled 30000. choice Israelites to conduct the Arke of God from the house of Abinadab in Gibe, to the Citie of David, which businesse was interrupted by the death of RECHAB the sonne of Amiadab, whom the Lord slewe for presuming to touch the Arke, though it were with intent to lay it from taking harme, when it was shaken. But after three yeeres it was with great solemnitie brought into the Citie with sacrifices, musick, dances, and all signes of ioyfulness, in which David himselfe gladly bare a part. Hereupon Michal derided him for dancing before the Arke, and afterward told him in scorn, That hee was vnconquered as a foole in the eyes of the maidens: his servants; namely that hee forgot his regall dignitie both in apparrell and behaviour; and mixed himselfe among the base multitude, dancing as fooles doe in the wayes and streets: not that shee disliked Davids behaviour (as I take it) though she made it the colour of her derision. But rather the abundant griefe, which this spectacle stirred vp, beholding, the glorie of her husband to whom shee was deliuered lastly by force, and remembering the miserable end of her father and brethren, out of whole ruines shee conceived that the sonne of Isua had built this his greathouse, together with the many new wiues and concubines imbraced since his possession of Ierusalem, made her breake out in thole despitefull teares, for which she remained barren to her death.

This done, David consulted with the Prophet Nathan for the building of the Temple or house of God: but was forbidden it, because he was a man of warre, and had shed blood. So greatly doth the Lord and King of all detest homicide; hauing threatned, not in vaine, that hee would require the blood of man, at the hand of man and beast. The warres which David had made were iust, and the blood thereof was of the enemies of God, and his Church: yet for this cause it was not permitted that his hands should lay the foundation of that holy Temple. Hereby it appears how greatly thole Princes deceive themselves, who thinke by bloudshed and terror of their warres, to make themselves in greatnes like to the Almighty, which is a damnable pride; nor caring to imitate his mercie and goodnesse, or to seeke the blessednesse promised by our Sauour vnto the peacemakers.

1 Chron. 22. 3.

Now although it was not pleasing to the Lord to accept a Temple of Davids founding, yet was his religious intent so well accepted, that hereupon hee received both a confirmation of the Kingdom to him and his heirs, and that happie promise of the euermlasting throne, that should be established in his seede.

§. V.

The overthrow of the Philistims and Moabites.

2. Sam. 8. v. 1.

One after this David overthrew the Philistims, which made them altogether powerlesse, and vnable to make any inuasion vpon Israel in halfe. For it is written, Acceptit fructum Amgaris à manu Philistheorum; which place our English Genes conuerts in these words, And DAVID took the bride of bondage out of the hand of the Philistims. The Latine of Iunius giueth another and a better sense; for by that bridle of Amgar was meant the strong Citie of Gath, or Geth, and so the Genes hath it in the marginall note. This Citie of Gath was the fame which was afterward Dio-Cæsaria, set on the frontier of Palestina at the entrance into Iudea and Ephraim. From thence they made their incursions, and thereinto their retreat in all their inuasions, which being taken by David and demolished, there was left no such frontier towne of equall strength to the Philistims on that part. The hill whereon Geth or Gath stood, the Hebrewes call Amma, whereof and of the word Gar is made Amgar, of which Plinie in his first booke, and thirteenth Chap. This exposition is made plaine and confirmed in the first of Chro. the 18.

Iunius in 8. col. the second of Sam.

There was no nation bordering the Iewes that so greatly afflicted them as the Philistims did, who before the time of Saul (to the end they might not sharpen any weapon against them) did not leaue one Smith in all their Cities & villages of that kinde, but infort them to come downe into their territorie, for all iron worke whatsoever they needed; so as the Iudaes till this time of David were seldom free from paying tribute to the Philistims.

1. Sam. 13.

After this he gaue them foure other overthrowes: but the war of the Moabites and Arabians came betwene. In the first of which he was indangered by Ibbi-benob, the head of whose speare weighed 300. Shickles of brasse, which make nine pound three quarters of our poizes: at which time Abishai succoured David and slew the Philistim, whereupon the Councillors and Captaines of David (left the light of Israel might by his losse be quenched) vowed that he should not thenceforth hazard himself in any battaile. The second and third encounter and overthrow of the Philistims was at Geth a place neere Gesar, and the last at Gath or Geth. And being now better assured of the Philistims by the taking of Geth, hee invaded Moab, from whom notwithstanding in his aduersitie hee sought succour and left his parents with him in trust. But whether it were the same King or no it is not knowne.

2. Sam. 8. v. 17.

The Rabines saie that Moab slew those kinsfolkes of David, which liued vnder his protection in Sauls time, but questionlesse David well knew how that Nation had bin alwayes enemies to Israel, and tooke all the occasions to vex them that were offered. And he also remembered that in the 23. of Deuter. God commanded Israel not to seeke the peace or prosperitie of the Moabites, which David well obserued, for he destroyed two parts of all the people, leauing a third to till the ground. This victorie obtained, he led his armie by the border of Ammon towards Syria Zobah, the region of Adadazer the sonne of Rehob King thereof. The place is set downe in the description of the holy Land: to which I referre the Reader.

§. VI.

The warre which DAVID made vpon the Syrians.

It is written in the Text: DAVID smote also HADADZER &c. as hee went to recover his border at the river Euphrates. Now whether the words (as hee went to recover his border) be referred to David or Hadadzer it is not agreed vpon. Iunius thinks that the article (he) hath relation to David, who finding Tobu oppressed by Hadadzer, overthrew threw the one and succoured the other. But the ancient and most received opinion, that this recoverie hath reference to the Syrian, is more probable. For if David had intended any such enterprize towards Euphrates, hee was in farre better case to haue proceeded after his victorie than before: seeing that (Adadzer being taken) he had now left no enemy on his backe, either to pursue him, to take victuals and supplies from him, or to stop the passages of the mountains vpon him at his returne.

Againe, seeing David was either to passe through a part of Arabia the desert, or by the plains of Palmyrena, his armie consisting of footmen, for the most, it not all: Hee had now both horse and chariots good store to carry his provisions through those vncultivated places, by which he was to haue marched before he could haue reached Euphrates or any part thereof. But we find that David returned to Hierusalem, after hee had twice overthrowne the Syrian armie, not bending his course towards the river Euphrates, but seeking to establish his purchases already made. Whereby it may appeare, that it was the Syrian, and not King David, that was going to enlarge his border, as afore is said.

The king of Syria Damasena, and of Damasus, whereof that region is so called, hearing that Adadazer was overthrowne by the Iudaes, fearing his owne estate, & the losse of his owne country which adioyned to Syria Zobah of Hadadzer, sent for an armie of Aramites or Syrians to his succour: but these, as it appeareth, came too late for Adadazer, and too soone for themselves: for there perished of those supplies 20000. This king of Damasus, Iosephus (out of Nichelauran ancient Historian) calleth Adad, who was also of the same name & family as all those other Adads were: which now began to grow vp in greatnelle, and so continued for ten descents, till they were extinguished by the Assyrians, as is shewed heretofore. David hauing now reduced Damasus vnder his obedience, left a garrison therein, as he did in Edom: hauing also sacked the adioyning cities of Betah, and Berati, belonging to Adadazer, of which Cities Ptolemy calleth Betah, Tauba: and Berati he nameth Barabena, Tobu or Thoi whose country of Hamath ioyned to Adadazer (as in the description of the Holy land the reader may perceiue) sent his son Ioram to congratulate this successe of David: partly because he had warre with Adadazer, and partly because he feared David now victorious. He also presented David with vessels of gold, silver, and brasse, all which together with the golden shields of the Aramites, and the best of all the spoils of other Nations, David dedicated vnto God at his returne. Iunius translated the words (elypeos aureas) by ymbones, as if all the parts of the targets were not of gold but the bosses only. The Septuagint call them bracelets: Aquila golden chaines. But because Roboam made shields of brasse in place of these of Adadazer, at such time as Shishak the Egyptian sacked the Temple of Hierusalem, it may be gathered thereby, that those of Adadazer were golden shields.

This done, David sent Embassadors to Hannu King of the Ammonites to congratulate his establishment in his fathers Kingdome: for David in the time of his affliction vnder Saul, had bene relieved by Nahab, the father of Hannu. But this Ammonite being ill aduised, and ouer-calous of his estate, vsed Davids messengers so barbarously, and contemptuously (by curtailing their beards, and their garments) as he thereby drew a warre vpon himself, which neither his owne strength, nor all the aydes purchased could put off, or sustaine. For notwithstanding that hee had waged three and thirtie thousand Souldiers of the Amalekites, and of Moab confederates; to wit, of the vassalles of Adadazer twentie thousand, and of Maachab and Ithob thirtie thousand (for which hee disbursed a thousand talents of silver) yet all these great armies together with the strength of the Ammonites, were so by Iobab and his brother Abishai easily broken and put to ruine: and that without any great losse or slaughter at that time. And it is written that when the Aramites fled, the Ammonites also retreated into their Cities, the one holding themselves within the walles, the other in their desarts adioyning, till Iobab was returned to Hierusalem.
